

---

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google<sup>TM</sup> books

<https://books.google.com>

---

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google<sup>TM</sup> books

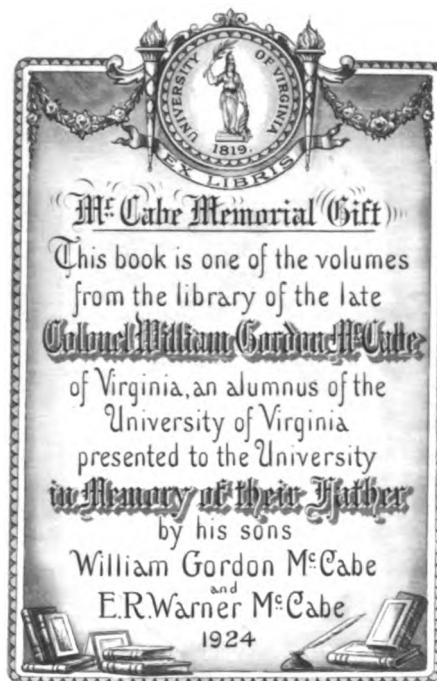

<https://books.google.com>

The Academy and literature

The A

Mend n ✓

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LIFE.

JULY-DEC

1899.

VOLUME LVII.

PUBLISHING OFFICE: 43, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

1899.

AP
4
.A15
105846
v.57
1899

LONDON:
PRINTED BY ALEXANDER AND SHEPHEARD, LTD., LONSDALE BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME LVII.

LITERATURE.

REVIEWS.

	PAGE
Abbott & Campbell's edition of Letters of Benjamin Jowett .....	180
Adams's (John) edition of Blackwood's Literary Readers .....	283
Ady's (Sidney Oldall) The Evolution of the English House .....	454
Albert's (Henri) Frédéric Nietzsche: Pages Choies .....	31
Allen's (Grant) The European Tour .....	428
Arnold's (Sir Edwin) translation of The Gubstan, or Rose-Garden, of Sadi .....	333
Arnold-Foster's (Frances) Studies in Church Dedications .....	598
Baker's (H. Barton) Stories of the Streets of London .....	251
Baldry's (A. L.) Sir John Everett Millais .....	428
Balfour's (Lady Betty) Lord Lytton's Indian Administration .....	680
Baring-Gould's (A.) A Book of the West .....	128
Barnett's (P. A.) Common Sense in Education and Teaching .....	107
Bartlett's (A. D.) Bartlett's Life Among Wild Animals in the Zoo .....	761
Bateson's (Mary) edition of Changes in the Ministry, 1785-67 .....	110
Becke & Jeffery's Admiral Philip: the Founding of New South Wales .....	250
Beckwith's (E. G. A.) Satura Grammatica; or, Latin Critical Notes .....	253
Beeching's (Rev. H. C.) Selections from the Poetry of Samuel Daniel and Michael Drayton .....	175
Bell's (C. Napier) Tungweera .....	483
Belmont's (Malcolm) Rembrandt Van Rijn .....	539
Bennett's (Mrs. Hugh) Conversational Openings .....	669
Bennett's (E. A.) Polite Forces .....	671
Benson's (Arthur Christopher) The Life of Edward White Benson, Archbishop of Canterbury .....	739
Billingshurst's (Percy J.) A Hundred Fables of La Fontaine .....	510
Blackman's (W. F.) The Making of Hawaii .....	205
Bloch's (I. S.) Is War now Impossible? .....	363
Blunt's (Wilfrid Scawen) Satan Abolished .....	593
Boxall's (G. E.) The Story of the Australian Bush-rangers .....	304
Brandes's (George) Henrik Ibsen: Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson .....	79
Breckmann's (C.) Hessfeld's German Grammar .....	285
Bright's (Canon William) Some Aspects of Primitive Church Life .....	158
British Empire Series, The .....	568
Brockington's (W. A.) Elements of Prose .....	12
Budge's (E. A. Wallis) Egyptian Ideas of the Future Life, and Egyptian Magic .....	740
Bullen's (E. T.) The Log of a Sea Waif .....	569
Cadell's (Gen. Sir Robert) Sir John Cope and the Rebellion of 1745 .....	59
— (Mrs. H. M.) translation of The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam .....	594
Caffyn's (W.) Seventy-one, Not Out .....	38
Carnoy's (Henry) Les deux Bossus .....	284
Carpenter's (George H.) Insects: their Structure and Life .....	285
Chambers's (George F.) The Story of Eclipses .....	158
Charles's (Alan B.) Nicolas Fouquet .....	58
Children's Books .....	510, 538, 744
Christmas Literature: .....
I. Gift Books .....	675
II. Children's Books .....	676
Churchill's (Winston Spencer) The River War .....	627
Churton's (Annette) Kant on Education .....	283
Clarke's (Frank Harold) On Fendland Reeds .....	204
Cleminson's (Emily J.) edition of Passages from the Diaries of Mrs. Philip Lybbe Pears .....	81

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Cobbe's (Rev. Henry) Luton Church .....	650
Colby's (Prof. C. W.) Selections from the Sources of English History .....	282
Collier's (W. F.) Country Matters in Short .....	718
Collingwood's (S. Dodgson) The Lewis Carroll Picture Book .....	688
Cook's (Jane E.) The Sculptor Caught Napping .....	510
Coutts's (W.) edition of Vergil's Æneid .....	283
Cox's (Palmer) The Brownies Abroad .....	510
Cupples's (George) A Spliced Yarn .....	511
Darmesteter's (Arsène) Historical French Grammar .....	284
Davenport's (Cyril) English Embroidered Bindings .....	571
Dearmer's (Mrs.) The Book of Penny Toys .....	538
Dele's (Lionel) Trooper 3,509: a Private Soldier of the Third Republic .....	199
Deluscar's (Horace) Songs to Morris .....	60
De Maupassant's (Guy) Roule de Suif .....	107
Dennis's (John) The Realms of Gold .....	599
De Rougemont, Louis, The Adventures of. By Himself .....	182
Detmold's (M. and E.) Pictures from Bird Land .....	510
De Vigny's (Alfred) Cinq-Mars .....	284
Dewar's (George A. B.) Wild Life in Hampshire Highlands .....	57
Dixon's (Charles) Bird Life in a Southern County .....	57
Donnison's (T. E.) Jaw-cracking Jingles .....	538
Douglas's (Sir George) James Hogg .....	427
Dowden's (Edward) edition of The Tragedy of Hamlet .....	600
Dresser's (Horatio) Methods and Problems of Spiritual Healing .....	83
Du Bose's (Prof. W. Porcher) The Soteriology of the New Testament .....	331
Dutton's (S. T.) Social Phases of Education .....	107
Earle's (Mrs.) More Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden .....	448
Edwards's (G. M.) edition of Xenophon: Anabasis IV .....	283
Eglinton, Yeats, and Larminie's Literary Ideals in Ireland .....	8
Ellis's (William Ashton) Richard Wagner: Letters to Wesendonck et al. .....	177
— Letters of Richard Wagner to Emil Heckel .....	177
Elton's (Oliver) The Augustan Ages .....	760
Ely's (George H.) Songs of Béranger .....	284
Encyclopædia Biblica .....	623
Ewart's (K. Dorothea) Cosimo de' Medici .....	157
Farmiloe's (Mrs. Edith) Rag, Tag, and Bobtail .....	510
Farrar's (Dean) Texts Explained; or, Helps to Understand the New Testament .....	452
Feilding's (Alice) Faith-Healing and "Christian Science" .....	368
Fernald's (Chester Bailey) adaptation of Heijermann's The Ghetto .....	370
Fielcing's (H.) Thibaut's Queen .....	164
Fiske's (John) Through Nature to God .....	37
Fitzmaurice Kelly's (J.) edition of Don Quixote (Spanish Text) .....	630
Fitzpatrick's (J. P.) The Transval from Within .....	450
Flather's (J. H.) edition of Lays of Ancient Rome .....	282
Fletcher's (J. B.) Picturesque History of Yorkshire .....	133, 483
Fol's (Edouard) After Big Game in Central Africa .....	226
Fortescue's (Hon. J. W.) History of the British Army .....	759
Foster's (Sir Michael) Claude Bernard .....	181
— (William) edition of Letters Received by the East India Company .....	224
— edition of The Embassy of Sir Thomas Roe to the Great Mogul .....	252
Fowler's (W. Warde) The Roman Festivals .....	745
Furness's (William Henry) Folk-Lore in B. runo .....	182
Galton's (Arthur) The Message and Position of the Church of England .....	106
Garland's (Hamlin) The Trail of the Goldseekers .....	38

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Garnett's (Dr. Richard) Essays in Librarianship and Bibliography .....	156
Geake's (Charles) edition of Lord Rosebery's Appreciations and Addresses .....	32
Geary's (Caroline) Rural Life .....	539
Genealogical Magazine, Vol. II. ....	13
Gent's (S. E.) Dictionary of the Terms Ancient and Modern of the Canting Crew .....	82
George's (Hereford B.) Napoleon's Invasion of Russia .....	58
Gerard's (Frances) The Romance of Ludwig II. of Bavaria .....	303
Gibbs's (Philip) Founders of the Empire .....	589
Giddings's (Franklin H.) The Elements of Sociology .....	286
Given's (Walker) Further Study of Othello .....	334
Godley's (A. D.) Lyra Fivola .....	570
Gonner's (Prof.) The Social Philosophy of Rodbertus .....	721
Gordon's (Home) translation of Dumas' The Snow on Shah-Dagh and Ammalat Bey .....	603
Gosse's (Edmund) Life and Letters of John Donne .....	505
Gould's (F. J.) Children's Book of Moral Lessons .....	13
Grace's (Morgan S.) Sketch of the New Zealand War .....	331
Graham's (Henry Grey) Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century .....	477
— (Prof. W.) English Political Philosophy .....	720
— (P. Anderson) Mr. Blackburne's Games at Chess .....	571
— The Revival of English Agriculture .....	590
Grego's (Joseph) edition of Picorial Pickwickiana .....	631
Grey's (Earl) Hubert Hervey .....	453
Gribble's (Francis) The Early Mountaineers .....	203
Gronow, Captain, Reminiscences and Recollections .....	508
Gwynn's (Stephen) The Decay of Sensibility .....	670
Haggard's (H. Rider) A Farmer's Year .....	449
Halcombe's (P. B.) edition of The Mad a la Puriprude .....	253
Hale's (Edward Everett) James Russell Lowell and his Friends .....	113
Halliburton's (W. D.) Kirke's Handbook of Physiology .....	295
Hand's (Rev. J. E.) edition of Good Citizenship .....	453
Hapgood's (Isabel F.) translation of Sergiyenko's How Count Tolstoy Lived and Worked .....	594
Harrison's (Frederic) Annals of an Old Manor House: Sutton Place .....	307
Hartog's (Alphonse) edition of Darmesteter's Historical French Grammar .....	284
Hatfield's (James Taft) edition of Guthrie's Hermann and Dorothea .....	285
Hazlitt's (W. Carey) edition of Lamb and Hazlitt .....	624
Heckethorn's (C. W.) London Souvenirs .....	483
Heijermann's (Herman) The Ghetto .....	370
Heilprin's (Angelo) Alaska and the Klondike .....	480
Hertford's (Oliver) Child's Primer of Natural History .....	623
Hiatt's (Charles) Sir Henry Irving .....	743
Hodgkin's (Dr. Thomas) The Frankish Invasions .....	565
Home's (Hon. James A.) edition of Lady Louisa Stuart: Selections from her MS. .....	165
Hopkins's (Tighe) An Idler in Old France .....	10
Housman's (Laurence) The Story of the Seven Young Goslings .....	538
How's F. D. Bishop John Selwyn: a Memoir .....	36
Hugo, Victor, The Memoirs of .....	487
Huish's Marcus B. Greek Terra-Cotta Statuettes .....	667
Huret's (Jules) Sarah Bernhardt .....	84
Hutton's (Frederick Wollaston) Darwinism and Lamarckism .....	152
— In Doors and Out .....	538
Jeffrey's (P. Shaw) The Study of Colloquial and Literary French .....	254
Jerram's (C. S.) The Armies of the World .....	234
Jessett's (Montague George) The Key to South Africa: Delagoa Bay .....	204
Johnson Club Papers. By Various Hands .....	599

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Johnson's (Brimley) edition of Julius Caesar ...	292
Clifton) Among English Dangers ...	718
Jones's (Stanley) The Actor and his Art ...	426
Julien's (F.) edition of Richelieu's Les Violette Blanches ...	284
Karageorgievitch's (Prince Bojidar) Enchanted India ...	89
Kearson's (Richard) Our Rarer British Birds ...	745
Kingale's (Rose G.) History of French Art ...	37
Kipling's (Rudyard) Stalky &amp; Co. ...	421
Kirk's (Robert C.) Twelve Months in Klondike ...	14
Kluge & Lutz's English Etymology ...	282
Knowlson's (T. Sharper) The Art of Thinking ...	428
Kropotkin's (P.) Memoirs of a Revolutionary ...	624
Lang's (Andrew) R d Book of Animal Stories ...	510
translation of The Homeric Hymns ...	718
Lapworth's (Charles) Intermediate Text-book of Geology ...	285
Lawrence's (Arthur) Sir Arthur Sullivan ...	743
Lecky's (W. E. H.) The Map of Life ...	507
Lee's (Frederic) translation of Fo's After Big Game in Central Africa ...	236
Lee-Hamilton's (E. & H.) Forest Notes ...	60
Le Frangols (Emile B.) edition of Carnoy's Les Deux Bossus ...	284
Le Havell's (Charles B.) Elementary French Grammar ...	284
Leland's (Charles G.) Aradun; or, the Gospel of the Witches ...	671
Lichtenberger's (Henri) La Philosophie de Nietzsche ...	371
Lindsey's (B.) Introduction to the Study of Zoology ...	283
(Lady) The Apostel of the Ardennes ...	595
Literature, Famous, The Library of ...	376, 629
Little's (W. J. Knox) Sketches and Studies in South Africa ...	110
Loane's (G. G.) edition of De Vigny's Cinq-Mars ...	284
Long's (W. H.) edition of Naval Visions, 1661-1831	449
Lubbock's (Alfred) Memoirs of Eton and Etonians	111
Lucas's (Herbert) Fra Girolamo Savonarola ...	127
(Winifred) Fugitives ...	482
(Mrs. E.) edition of Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales ...	510
Lützow's (Francis Count) History of Bohemian Literature ...	108
Lyll's (Sir Alfred C.) Asiatic Studies, Religious and Social ...	249
Lyde's (L. W.) Geography of Africa ...	283
Lynch's (Hannah) Toledo: the Story of an Ol. Spanish Capital ...	276
Lyle's (Sir H. C. Maxwell) History of Eton College	215
Mackintosh's (Robert), From Combe to Benjamin Kidd ...	163
Macnaghten & Ramsay's edition of Poems of Caullus ...	451
Macnaghten's (Hugh) The Story of Caullus ...	451
Mason's (Dr. B. R.) Essays on Subjects connected with the Reformation in England ...	309
Mansfield's (Charlotte) Flowers of the Wind ...	60
Martin's (Mrs.) edition of Selections from Addison's Spectator ...	283
Martyrdom of an Empress, The ...	34
Masse's (George) Text-Book of Plant Diseases ...	245
Matheson's (Annie) Selected Poems, Old and New	594
Maughan's (Harry Neville), Sir Paul Pindar, and Other Plays ...	201
Maxwell's (Sir Herbert) The Life of Wellington ...	718
Meakin's (Budgett) The Moorish Empire ...	482
Melville's (Lewis) The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray ...	447
Mercer's (Alexander Gardiner) Notes of an Outlook on Life ...	721
Metcalf's (John Henry) The Earl of Willes ...	283
Méville's (Sir Walter) Under Queen and Khedive	568
Mill's (Dr. H. R.) The International Geography ...	464
Millais' (John Guille) Life and Letters of Sir John Everett Millais ...	533
Mitman's (Helen) Outside the Garden ...	718
Minchin's (H. C.) The Arcadians ...	60
Mitchell's (Donald G.) American Lands and Letters ...	763
Moore's (T. Sturge) The Vine-dresser, and Other Poems ...	263
(Charles Herbert) Gothic Architecture ...	764
Morrow's (W. C.) Bohemian Paris of To-day	672
Morten's (Honour) Questions for Women (and Men) ...	330
Mulholland's (Rosa) Vagrant Verses ...	493
Müller's (Max) The Six Systems of Indian Philo- sophy ...	364
(Auld Lang Syne)...	364
Murison's (A. F.) King Robert the Bruce ...	158
Murray's (Dr. James A. H.) New English Dic- tionary ...	178
Neufeld's (Charles) A Prisoner of the Khalefu ...	367
Newbigging's (Thomas) The Scottish Jacobites	539
Newnam-Davis's (Lieut.-Col. N.) The Transvaal under the Queen ...	600
Nicholson's (William) Twelve Portraits ...	389
Nietzsch, Friedrich, The Works of ...	31
Norman-Neruda's (May), The Climbs of Norman- Neruda ...	510
Nys's (Prof.) Researches in Economics ...	720
Page's (T. D.) Virgil: Georgic III. and Æneid XI.	283
Park's (Carlton Moore) Book of Birds ...	538
Parker's (Joseph A.) Preacher's Life ...	426
Patterson's (Arthur) Oliver Cromwell ...	680
Pattison-Muir's (M. M.) Course of Practical Chemistry ...	286
Paul's (C. Kegan) Memoirs ...	762
Paulsen's (Prof.) A System of Ethics ...	721
Penfield's (Frederic Courtland), Present-day Egypt ...	454

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Pepys, Samuel, The Diary of ...	55
Phillips's (Stephen) Paolo and Francesca ...	685
Phillipotts's (Eden) The Hunan Boy ...	167
Platts's (W. Carter) The Tuttlebury Troubles	334
Pollock's (Sir F.) Spinoza: His Life and Philosophy (Walter Herries) Jane Austen ...	672
Poole's (Stanley Lane) Rulers of India: Babar ...	568
Porter's (T. C.) Impressions of America ...	133
Plummer's (Mary Wright) Contemporary Spain	274
Pressland & Tweedie's Elementary Trigonometry	286
Pritchett's (B. T.) Pen and Pencil Sketches of Shipping and Craft ...	568
Prothero's (R. E.) edition of Byron's Works; Letters and Journals ...	151
Quick, the Rev. R. H., Life and Remains of	38
Ram's (Mrs. Abel) Life and Reminiscences ...	630
Ransome's (Stafford) Japan in Transition	132
Rathborne's (Mrs. Ambrose) edition of Letters from Lady Jane Coke to Mrs. Eyre ...	742
Reid's (Wemyss) Memoirs and Correspondence of Lyon Playfair ...	567
Richelieu's (Emile) Les Violette Blanches ...	284
Ridder's (James) Practical Plane and Solid Geometry ...	248
Román Empresses, The ...	306
Rook's (Clarence) The Hooligan Nights ...	33
Rosevelt's (Theodore) The Rough Riders	123
Ropes's (Arthur R.) edition of Saintine's Piccola	284
Rosebery's (Lord) Appreciations and Address ...	32
Rossetti's (William Michael) edition of Pro- Raphaélite Diaries and Letters ...	741
Russell's (W. Clark) The Ship: Her Story ...	566
(Sir Edward) That Reminds Me ...	668
Saintine's (X. B.) Piccola ...	284
Saintsbury's (George) Mathew Arnold ...	329
Salles' (Prof. Auguste) Montagne: Etudes et Fragments ...	176
Schnabel's (Carl) Handbook of Metallurgy	286
School, At, and at Sea, By "Martello Tower"	721
Scott's (Edward) Dancing in all Ages ...	303
(Clement) The Drama of Yesterday and To-day ...	743
Selous's (Edmund) Tommy Smith's Animals ...	538
Sepet's (Marius) Saint Louis ...	202
Sergiyenko's (P. A.) How Count Tolstoy Lives and Works ...	564
Sharpe's (Reginald R.) Letter-Books of the City of London ...	109
Shayler's (J.) edition of Saunterings in Bookland	631
Shuckburgh's (E. S.) edition of Cæsar de Bellico Gulicis ...	263
Sidgwick's (A.) The Æneid of Virgil ...	283
Skirne & Rose's The Heart of Asia ...	109
Sloane's (Dr. T. O'Connor) Liquid Air and the Liquefaction of Gases ...	270
Smart's (Prof. William) Distribution of Income	720
Smeaton's (Oliphant) edition of English Satires	479
Smith's (G. Barnett) Heroes of the Nineteenth Century ...	631
Soul, The City of the ...	56
Spence's (J. C.) The Conscience of the King	720
(John) Shelley Folk-Lore ...	571
Spilermann's (M. H.) edition of The Hitherto Un- identified Contributions of W. M. Thackeray to "Punch" ...	628
Spinoza's Ethica Demonstrata in Geometrical Order	7
Statham's (Rev. S. P. H.) History of the East, Town, and Port of Dover ...	273
Stevens's (G. W.) The Tragedy of Dregfus ...	311
(In India)...	587
Step's (Edward) The Romance of Wild Flowers	111
Stephen's (H. L.) edition of State Trials, Political and Social ...	129
Stetson's (Charlotte Perkins) Women and Economics ...	330
Stevenson's (E. A. M.) Velasquez ...	422
(Paul Eve) By Way of Cape Horn	453
(Robert Louis) Letters to His Family and Friends ...	563
Stillman's (W. J.) Francesco Crispi ...	154
Stirling's (Amelia H.) revised translation of Spinoza's Ethica ...	7
Storr's (F.) edition of The Life and Remains of the Rev. R. H. Quick ...	36
Stout's (G. F.) Manual of Psychology ...	286
Stream's (Col. D.) Ruthless Rhymes for Heartless Homies ...	538
Stuart's (Alexander) Mr. Niggs ...	84
(H.) Lochs and Loch Fishing ...	453
Sweetman's (Edinor) Pastors, and other Poems	594
Swinburne's (Algernon Charles) Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards ...	634
Symonds's (J. A.) Introduction to the Study of Dante ...	247
Tarleton's (Francis A.) Introduction to the Mathe- matical Theory of Attraction ...	286
Taylor's (T. M.) Constitutional and Political His- tory of Rome ...	204
Teignmouth-Shore's (Canon) Worcester Cathedral Temple's (Sir Richard) The House of Commons	60
Terry's (Charles Swinford) The Life and Campaigns of Alexander Leslie, First Earl of Leven ...	424
Thiberton's (A. E.) Textual Notes on the Tragedie of Antony and Cleopatra ...	309
Thompson & Mills's edition of Plato: Ion ...	284
Thomson's (Clara) edition of The Adventures of Brownlow ...	283
Tille's (Dr. Alexander) edition of The Works of Friedrich Nietzsche ...	31
Tolke's (N. E.) French Historical Unscens ...	284
Tolstoy's (L.) The Resurrection ...	256
Townsend's (W. G. P.) Embroidery ...	205
Trent's (William P.) John Milton ...	80

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Ulysses; or, De Rougemont of Troy. By A. H. M.	638
Vallate's (Achille) J. Chamberlain ...	162
Vivian's (Herbert) Tunisia and the Modern Barbary Pirates ...	271
Vizetelly's (Ernest Alfred) With Zola in England	131
Wager's (Prof. C. H. A.) The Siege of Troy ...	511
Walker's (Rev. W. L.) The Spirit and the Incarna- tion ...	334
Walkley's (A. B.) Frames of Mind ...	715
Wallace's (Alfred) edition of The Poetical Works of R. S. Hawker ...	103
Wallace-Dunlop's (Miss) Fairies, Elves, and Flower-Idylls ...	510
Ward's (Prof.) Naturalism and Agnosticism ...	432
Waterman's (Dr. Lucius) The Post-Apocalyptic Age	103
Watson's (John) The English Lake District Fisheries ...	230
Wedmore's (Frederick) On Books and Arts ...	715
Weekley's (Ernest) Historical French Grammar	294
Weile's (H. G.) Tales of Space and Time ...	597
Welsh's (Rev. E. E.) In Relief of Doubt ...	133
West's (Sir Algernon) Recollections ...	666
Westcott's (Noyes) David Harum ...	289
Weston's (Jessie L.) translation of The Story of Tristan and Isolt ...	680
Wheatley's (Henry B.) edition of Pepys's Diary	55
White's (W. Hale) translation of Spinoza's Ethica	7
(A. Silva) The Expansion of Egypt ...	568
(Arnold) The Modern Jew ...	223
(Gilbert) The Natural History of Selborne	635
Whitman's (Sidney) edition of Reminiscences of the King of Roumania ...	290
Wiener's (Leo) History of Yiddish Literature in the Nineteenth Century ...	239
Williamson's (Dr. G. C.) Bernardino Luini ...	383
Windle's (B. C. A.) Shakespeare's Country ...	84
Wyndham's (Horace) Soldiers of the Queen ...	511
Zola's Recondite ...	542

FICTION.

Beaufort's (E. V.) Satan Finds Some Mischief Still	112
Benson's (E. F.) Mammon &amp; Co. ...	253
Besant's (Sir Walter) The Orange Girl ...	309
Black's (Clementine) The Pursuit of Camilla	722
Breslin's (J. W.) Thady Malloran of the Irish Brigade ...	254
Buchan's (John) A Lost Lady of Old Years ...	512
Bullock's (Shan F.) The Barry ...	681
Cashoden's (Edwin) When Knighthood was in Flower ...	112
Castle's (Egerton) Young April ...	573
Clarke's (A. W.) Jasper Tristram: a Story ...	206
Colmore's (G.) The Strange Story of Hester Wynne	160
Cusack's (George) The Reg Rag of hituit	540
D'Annunzio's (Gabriele) The Virgins of the Rocks	183
Dawson's (A. J.) Daniel Wayne ...	512
De Groot's (J. Morgan) Even If ...	601
Duncan's (Sara Jeannette) The Path of a Star	429
Fernald's (C. B.) Chinatown Stories ...	764
Fletcher's (J. S.) From the Broad Acres ...	85
Ford's (George) Postle Farm ...	14
Fraser's (Mrs. Hugh) The Custom of the Country ...	159
Frederic's (Harold) The Market-Place ...	61
George's (G. M.) The Patroness ...	335
Gordon's (Samuel) Lesser Destinies ...	85
Headlam's (Cecil) The Secret of Scrow ...	332
Hewlett's (Maurice) Little Novels of Italy	371
Hichens's (R. S.) The Star ...	601
Holmes's (Arthur H.) Quinford ...	309
Hope's (Anthony) The King's Mirror ...	429
Hughes's (Agatha) translation of D'Annunzio's Virgins of the Rocks ...	183
Jepson & Beames's On the Edge of the Empire	61
Lord's (M. L.) An Ostinate Paris ...	61
Mann's (Mary E.) The Potten Experiment	484
Mason's (A. E. W.) Miranda of the Balcony ...	681
Maughan's (W. Somerset) Orientalism ...	15
Miss Hale's last ...	540
Morrison's (Arthur) To London Town ...	275
Munro's (Neil) Gilman the Dreamer ...	484
Norris's (W. E.) Giles Ingilby ...	150
(Frank) McTeague ...	746
Pemberton's (Max) Signors of the Night	601
Pendered's (Mary L.) An Englishman	573
Pinkerton's (Thomas) Dead Oppressors ...	183
Punchinello ...	205
Quiller-Couch's (A. T.) The Ship of Stars	572
Raymond's (Walter) No Soul About Money	722
Ridge's (W. Pett) A Son of the State	276
Risley's (R. O.) Men's Trilogies ...	134
Sharp's (William) Silence Alarm ...	39
Smith-Williams's (W.) The Magic of the Desert	232
Somerville & Ross's Some Experiences of an Irish R.M. ...	631
Stewart's (John A.) Wine on the Lees ...	652
Swift's (Benjamin) Siren City ...	231
(Durdell)...	748
Thanet's (Octave) The Heart of Toil ...	150
Thickness's (Lily) Stig of the Conscience	15
Warner's (Charles Dudley) That Fortune	111
Wharton's (Edith) The Greater Inclination	40
Winter's (John Strange) A Name to Conjure With	335
"Zack's" On Trial ...	455

SUPPLEMENTS.

Autumn Announcements	389-412
Coloured Supplement	481
Educational	279-288

ARTICLES.

"Academy" Awards to Authors	685, 723
Allen, Mr. Grant	489
Anstruther, E. L. S. at	314
Book Illustration, Modern, The Advance of	484
Books, All the Newest	373
Children's	510, 538, 744
Favourite, of 1899	696, 723, 757
"Boy, only Boy"	457
Boys, Professions for	281
Braddon, Miss: an Inquiry	431
Brontë, Charlotte, Mrs. Humphry Ward on	490
Burns's Kilmarnock Editions	67
Collector-Ghoul, The	21
Copyright, How Long Should it Last?	579, 634, 696, 757
Critic, The Amateur:
A Forgotten Author	375
Charles Wells's Stories	375
A Striking Book for Children	375
The Howling Cheese	375
Walter Pater	435
"Like an Angel from a Cloud"	435
Mr. Watson's Poems	435, 462
Robinson Crusoe	435
"Meliboeus in London"	462
London in October	462
Improvement by Elision	462
Burdard Kipling	463
Good Writing v. Over-Writing	491
Mr. Chamberlain and Tennyson	491
"Eleu Fugaces"	491, 544
Catullus	491
Defoe on the Boer War	518
Mr. Murray Gilchrist's Earlier Work	518
No. 5, John Street	518
For an Anthology of Parody	544, 578, 636
The Brontë Spell	544
The Ancestors of the Boers	578
To Mr. Swinburne	578
The Tyranny of Association	578
Wanted: Novels of Observation	578, 691
Tod Lapraik and Prince Otto	695
Paul Deroulède	695
The Good Executor	695
A Georgian New Testament	695
Elia with Illustrations	695
A Promising Debut	695
"The King of the Golden River"	695
Introductions	695
Commas, Colons, and Semi-Colons	695
Ford's Lyrics	695
Wanted: a New Microcosmography	695
Charles Lamb's Time Sheet	695
Like Another Helen	726
Diaries and Novelists	727
Stevenson and Hazlitt	763
An English Novel "à la Française"	768
Where is "Dickens-Land"?	768
"Paolo and Francesca"	768
Criticism by Semaphore	691
D'Annunzio and Mr. Whiting	463
David Harum: an Inquiry	239
Dickens, The World of	717
Dreyfus and the Old Testament Hokmah	460
Dumas: "Discoveries," The	603, 633
In the Caucasus	633
"Edgely," The Ineligible	312, 361
Farctinosus Eruditio; or, The Instruction of
Sausages	279
Gissing, Mr. George: an Inquiry	724
Governance, The, in Fiction	163
Green Thoughts in Green Shades	765
Histories, Good, Wanted	161
Mocking, Mr. Silas, Popularity of	17, 214
Hokmah, The, and Dreyfus	460
Homes, Empty, of England:
Franks, near Farningham	92
Chesetown-on-the-Wye	139
Devizes Castle	260
Hugo on Hugo	487
Ibsen: Beau and Genius	292
Journalism, Enthusiastic, Essays in:
I. The "Lark"	212
II. "Le Petit Journal des Refusés"	258
III. "Phyllida; or, The Milkmaid"	230
Kingsley, Charles, as a Novelist	213
Knowledge, The, that Was	545
Lamb, Charles, New Letter Written by	373
Language, The Roots of, and Prof. Skeat	63
Levy, Amy, The Poetry of	162
Library, A, for Children	211, 237, 269
The Knapsack	233
Lé, A Masterly	256
Light Behind the Veil, The	41
Literature, Express	311
The World's, in Twenty Volumes	376
In 1899: a Retrospect	685
Liturgy, A New	770
Lott's (Pierre) Outlook	187
Lowell, James Russell	113
"Lowell," A Neglected	135
Novel, A Forgotten Notable	337
of the Moment, The: an Inquiry	575

ARTICLES—continued.

Novels for Girls in France and England	207
Over-Writing	458
Paris Letters	42, 136, 236, 378, 635, 766
Poe, Edgar Allan	137
Prize-Day Platitudes	287
Professions for Boys	281
Publishing on Commission	579
Reading-Class, The	280
Reputations, Younger:
Mr. C. F. Keary	688
Miss Mary Cholmondeley	689
Mr. R. Murray Gilchrist	689
Mr. A. E. W. Mason	690
Mr. F. T. Bullen	690
Scott, Sir Walter, Poem on, by "R."	20
Skeat, Prof., and the Roots of Language	63
Speeches, Reports of, Copyright in	191
Spencer, Mr. Herbert, Travestied	432
Stevenson, R. L., Memorial Stone to	314
Stindberg as a Pessimist	115
Style and the Edinburgh Review	577
Contemporary, Studies in:
I. The Relative Pronoun	379
II. Split Phrases	461
III. The Gaudy Manner	520
IV. Idioms: Sound and Unsound	607
V. "Literature and Journalism"	767
Taste, Bad, A Plea for	188
Taylor, Jeremy, The Love of	185
Tennyson and Virgil	88
Tennysonia, New	237
Tolstol's New Novel	235
Turgenev, Ivan: an Inquiry	514
Virgil and Tennyson	88
Ward, Mrs. Humphry, on Charlotte Brontë	490
Whiting, Mr., and D'Annunzio	443
Words, The 500 necessary	65
Yonge's (Miss) The Heir of Redclyffe	87
Zangwill's (Israel) "Children of the Ghetto" at the Adelphi Theatre	723
Zola's New Novel	542

CORRESPONDENCE—continued.

Lark and Rocket	728
Lexicographers, A Hint to	241
Library for Children	294
Lockhart, J. G. John Scott, and Horace Smith	22, 45
"Lowell," A Neglected	165, 189
Misconceptions	340, 381, 437, 465, 493, 547
"Morocco, The Place of, in Fiction"	547
Museum, British, The, and Books	317
Novels of Observation Wanted	724
Omar Khayyam	487, 494
Parallels, A Pair of	546
Peccadilloes	166, 190, 215, 261, 317
Phrases, Split	521
Poom Wanted	639
Prince Otto	723, 750
Prison, Letters in	69
Prize Books, Silly	294
Protest, A	520
Renan	493
Reprints, Sixpenny	262
Richardson, Samuel	262
Scott, John, Horace Smith, and J. G. Lockhart	22, 45
Shakespeare, Le Vieux, et la Jeune France	168
and Dr. Johnson	698
"Ship, Painted, As Idle as a"	639, 698
Smith, Horace, John Scott, and J. G. Lockhart	22, 45
Speeches, Reports of, Copyright in	191
Spencer, Mr. Herbert, and Chambers's New
Dictionary	141, 215
and the late Master of
Balliol	294, 340
Travestied	465, 493
Step's (Edward) Romance of Wild Flowers	141
Stevenson, A Pocket	581
Style, Contemporary, Studies in	639
Swanwick, Miss	581
Vaughan, Mr. Henry, The late	698
Walton (Isaac) Hotel, The	21
Wykehamists, Old	22, 69
Yonge, Miss Charlotte	21

SHORT STORIES.

Apologue (An) and an Apology	692
"Arms and the Man"	111
Beauchamp's Case	313
Fable, A	168
Glutton of Tangier, The	18
Madame Maman	214
Scripture Lesson, A	519
Wedding, Their Golden	208

CORRESPONDENCE.

Adverb, The Manifold Sins of the	381, 437
"And Which"	317, 341
Arnold's (Matthew) Creel	93
Author's Complaint, An	21, 45, 69, 520
Black, William, Memorial, The	261
Bookworm, The, On the Trail of	261
Braddon, Miss, and her Publishers	570
Bulfinch's (Mr.) Deprecatory Prefaces	492
Byron, Lord, The Character of	190
Cataloguing	163
Chambers's New Dictionary and Mr. Herbert
Spencer	141, 215
"Cheese, Howling, The"	437
"Correspondent, Gifted," Our	749
Courtesy of Our Columns, The	22
"Criticism by Semaphore"	728
Copples, George, or William Hansard	581
Dante in English	295
Cary's Translation of	316, 389
Darwin, Charles	46, 70
Darwinism and Lamarckism, Error by the Reviewer of	183
David Harum	317, 465
Disguises, Literary	117
Dodo, The Little Pinjandrum's	437
Dragon-Fly, The, and the Reviewer	520
Dumas, Romances, The	639
Evans, Mr. Sebastian, and the Legend of the
Holy Grail	45, 93, 141, 167, 190, 215, 239
Farctinosus Eruditio	316
France, La Jeune, et le Vieux Shakespeare	117
Gaelic Names of Plants	69
Guilty Manner, The	517
Henley, Mr. W. E., Mr. W. P. James, and Mr.
Andrew Lang	166
Henty's (Mr.) Books	483, 581, 639, 698
Hocking, Mr. Silas, Popularity of	44, 69
Hood's Death-place	22
Hudson's Bay Company, Forthcoming Works on	191
Initiative, Split, The	465
Johnson, Dr., and Shakespeare	698
Jowett, Benjamin, and Herbert Spencer	294, 340
Keane's (A. H.) Man, Past and Present	22, 45, 70
Kilmarnock Burns, Another	93
Kingsford, Dr. Annie	259
Knapsack Library, The	261, 316
"Knowledge that Was," The	697
Lane v. Walter	520

THINGS SEEN.

Bathos	577
Books, The Battle of the	236
Carriage Window, From the	137
Christian, The Modern	236
Conqueror, Saluting the	66
Conquest	42
Defeat	137
Eclipse, The	748
Elixir of Youth, The	461
Experiment, A Social	434
Freedom	257
Happiness	257
Heroism	374
Illumination	165
Incident	22
Ingratitude	461
Intruder, The	210
Library, Free, At the	484
Love, The Note of	517
Magnetism	434
Man, Pink, The	291
Mask, The	191
Meal, A Chance	291
Mood, A	89
Newspaper, The	210
October 31, 1899, 1.30 p.m.	517
Parker's Immortality	339
Patriotism, The Higher	637
People, Different	115
Piper, The	543
Progress	314
Proof	577
Renunciation	374
Repose	116
Road, On the	637
Self-Respect	692
Ships that Pass	42
Thief, The	543
Unthought	89
War, The Way of	748
White Man's Burden, The	65
Winchelsea, The City of	186
Woman, A Happy	164
Worcester Festival	314

MEMOIRS OF THE MOMENT.

Abergeldie Mains	239
Academy, The Royal, and Royalty	727
Aird, Mr. John, M.P., Illness of	315
Arab Hoax, Sale of, at Cabbat Park	68
Argyll, The Duke of, and Iona	380
Astor, Mr., the British Citizen	140
Belvoir Castle	90
Berkeley, Lady	727
Berthon, Rev. Edward Lyon, Career of	516
Bodley, Mr. J. E. C., and Cardinal Manning	238
Browning Letters, The	20

MEMOIRS OF THE MOMENT—continued.

	PAGE
Browning's (Mr. Robert Barrett) New Studio at Venice	117
Busch, Dr. Moritz, and Bismarck	606
Butcher's (Marquis of) The Alleged Haunting of a House	44
Butler's (Gen. William) Return from the Cape	189, 293, 315
Cannibalism on a Raft	339
Carstairs, Change of Ownership of	293
Castlereagh, Lord, The Coming of Age of	117
Casualties in the South African War	492
Cathedral, Roman Catholic, of Westminster	140
Chisholme, Colonel, at the Battle of Elands Laagte	606
Churchill, Mr. Winston, in South Africa	697
Cliffden, Viscount, and his Marriage	293
Clifford, Mr. Charles, Career of	436
Congrove, Dr., The Times Obituary Notice of	68
Costelloe, Mr. B. F. C., Career of	769
Cowley, Mr. Abraham, A Quotation from	580
Cranbrook, The Earl of	380
De Falbe, Mme., Career of	749
De Walden, Dowager Lady Howard	116
Disraeli, Mrs. Coningsby, Fortune Left to "Dutch Courage"	68
Dysart Trust, The	436
Eden's (Lady) Cottage Hospital at Bishop Auckland	339
Farrer, Lord, Career of	239
Forster, Mrs. W. E., Career of	444
French Servants at Dover	492
Garvin, Mr. Louis	315
Goethe Celebrations in Germany	110, 339
Grant, Baron	238
Hatz, the Home of the Symons Family	290
Hicks, Bishop John Wale, Career of	519
Hodgson, Mr. Stewart	464
Hope, Mr. Beresford	90
Howard, Lady Margaret, Reminiscences of	140
Hughenden Manor, Enlargement of	606
Keats's Prophecy , Choral Setting of	436
Kingsley and Cardinal Newman	90
Kruger, President, and Cardinal Richelieu	19
Landon, Walter Savage, and Dr. Parr	436
Leo XIII. and Lady Sophia Palmer	519
Letters, Private, Put up to Public Auction	519
Lewis, Lieut. Francis Owen, Career of	165
Llandaff, Lord, on Mr. Gladstone's Faith	687
Lloyd, Bishop, of Bangor	293
Macknight, Dr. Thomas, Reminiscences of	165
Marryat, Miss Florence, Career of	606
Maxwell-Scott, Lieut., at the Battle of Reithfontein	519
Mesmerism, Popular Belief in	697
"Mescaline," Performances of	193
Mexborough, The Earl of	91
Milhal, Sir John, and Cardinal Newman	214
Money-Coutts, Mrs.	516
Moody, Mr. Dwight Lyman	769
Newby Hall	769
Newlyn School of Art	240
Peel Heirloom Pictures, The	293
Penzance, Lord, Career of	727
Picher, Mr. Percy, Death of	727
Plater, Rev. Herbert, Career of	380
Public Record Office in Dublin, Parliamentary Vote for the	516
Quaritch, Mr. Bernard, Career of	43
Richelieu, Cardinal, and President Kruger	748
Russell, Lord, and the Dreyfus Trial	436
Commission and the Venezuelan Boundary	315
Rutland, The late Duchess of	444
Salisbury, Lady, Reminiscences of	728
Seitz, Prof. Ludovico, Alleged Interview with	68
Stelley, Lady	6
Skene, Miss	91
Stonehenge	464
Swanwick, Miss Anna	214
Tadema, Sir Lawrence Alma, and Van Dyck	515, 697
Tankerville, Earl of, Career of	189
Tate's (Sir Henry) Patronage of Art	749
Tennyson, Mr. Arthur	697
— Mr. Horatio	2
Thompson, Lewis	436
Top-Hats and Frock-Coats	214
Townshend, Marquis	110
Vaughan, Cardinal, and French Chivalry	619
— Mr. Henry	280
Victoria, Queen, New Portraits of	638
— French Ribald Caricatures of	90
Von Levetzow, Baroness Ulrika, and Goethe	638
Wanchope, General, Career of	581
Westminster, Duke of, Career of	749
Wilberforce's Canon) Afternoon Party at Westminster	768
Wilkie's Picture of the Queen (1837)	68
Wolsley, Trooper Hubert Joseph	116
Women, International Congress of	519
	20

POETRY.

Aphorisms, Modern	181
Apology on Reading the Browning Love-Letters	125
Australia on the War	463
Battery, The Going of the	559
Books, Ballads against	142

POETRY—continued.

	PAGE
Brother Joe	444
Captive, The Old	262
"Dark to its Nest the Light has gone"	189
De Profundis	365
Dorians Dead	91
Drunkard, Reflections of a, on the Banks of the Rhine	290
Fanshawe's (Miss) "Fragment in Imitation of Wordsworth"	636
Goethe	524
Henley's (Mr.) "Hawthorn and Lavender: Songs and Madrigals"	590
"England, my England"	711
Herkomer's Shield of Boam's, Lines suggested by	139
Horoscopes	47
Jack-o'-Lantern	93
Khaki, The Gospel of Peace in	161
Labouchere's (Mr.) Imaginary Poems	16
London Alley, In a	71
Muse, Minor, To the	100
Quinn's (Roderic) "Song of Winds"	186
Regnier, Fragments from	239
Steele, Sir Richard	130
Strawberry, In Praise of the	94
Triplet	293
Wayside Discourse	109
Winter, The Joy of	341
Wood, To Rightly Go into a	130

NOTES AND NEWS.

Academy, American, Plan for an	328, 502
Adams, Rev. H. C., The Work of	504
Allen's (Grant) Lower Slopes	473
Anglo-Saxon Review , The	3
Archer, Mr. William, on "The American Language"	360
Argosy , History of the	738
Ainslie, Matthew, Story Relating to	52
Austen, Miss, A Juvenile Effort of	125
Austrian Schoolboys' "Howlers"	197
Baker, Mrs., of Anne Hathaway's Cottage	325
Banker's Prose, Spicing of	220
Barrie, Mr. J. M., A Serial by	29
Beecher, Henry Ward, and Mr. Robert Bonner	124
Benson, Archbishop, Stories Relating to	737
Bernhardt, Mme. Sarah, Turgenev's Opinion of	590
Besant's (Sir Walter) Optimism	149
Survey of London	197
Betham-Edwards's (Miss) Exploration of the Brontë's District	244
Visit to Friends of the Heggers	244
Birrell, Mr., on Good and Bad Books	530
— on Charles Lamb	668
— Pilloried in the Periodical	735
Björnson, Characteristic Story of	27
Black, William, Memorial to	89, 147, 171, 288, 299
Blackwood Critic, The, on Stalky &amp; Co.	532
Book-Covers, Decorative Pictorial	327, 131
Books Selling Best in America	27, 172, 243, 359
— Technical, English, French, and German, compared	198
— Ideal, for Children	171, 300
— most Popular in England	359
Bookkeepers, Projected School of, in Paris	51
Borrow, Mr. George, and the Bible Society	4
Bowden, Mr., The Publications of	75
Boys' Own Paper, Popularity of the	419
Braddon's (Miss) First Work of Fiction	302
Brooke (Stoford) Professorship at University College	359
"Brother Joe"	444
Byrne, Mr. M. P., as a Novelist	52
Budgets, The Battle of the	417
Bullen, Mr. F. T., and his Prefaces	445
Burne-Jones Memorial Fund	123
Burns Memor at Mauchline	172
Butterfly, The	503
Butterworth's (Messrs.) House in Fleet Street	150
Cairns's (Hall) Dramatic Version of The Christian	327, 359
Campbell, Thomas, Tablet at Boulogne to the Memory of	326
Carlyle's After-Dinner Speech on Burns	198
Carroll, Lewis, Imitations of an Acrostic by	29
"Cats," Essays on, by "Israfel"	300
Cherbuliez, M. Victor, Career of	27
Chopin, "Israfel" on	503
Choral Songs by Various Writers	736
Church, Rev. Alfred J., The Work of	504
Churchill, Mr. Winston, as a Novelist	195
Claretie, M. Jules, on Shakespeare and Molière	76
Coincidences, Literary	101
Coleridge's "The Devil's Walk"	245
Collaboration in the Writing of Books	445
Collins, Mortimer, The Literary Future of	54
Complete Angler, Minute Edition of the	712
Copyright, Literary The Law of	147, 757
Correspondents at the Seat of War	501
Cottages for "Labourers" at Bromford	125
Cowper Centenary, The	76, 326
Criminals, Prizes for Poems Offered to	4
Criticism, A New Form of	171
Croix, La, The French Newspaper	474
Crockett's (Mr.) Story against Himself	501
Cromwell's Bible	619
— Soldiers' Catechism	641

NOTES AND NEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Croquet, Treatise on	174
Verse on	244
"Croskey's (Julian) Advice to Authors	147
Crosland's (T. W. H.) Address to the Minor Muse	100
Cruikshank's Progress of Mr. Lumbkin , Penny Edition of	268
Daily Mail War Train	443
De Blowitz, M., on the French Press and the Dreyfus Case	474
Dedications, New	6, 475
"Discount Question," The	3
Dogs, Poems Addressed to	245
Dooley's (Mr.) Remarks on Europe	301
— Burlesque Account of the Dreyfus Trial	360
— Skit on the Bertillon System of Identifying Criminals	419
— Estimate of the Boers	560
— View of the Moine Hospital Ship	712
Doubleday and Gomme's Edition of Victoria History of the Counties of England	149
Douce Box, The, at the British Museum	559
Doyle, Mr. Conan, and the Transvaal War	735
Dumas' The Snow on Shah-Dagh and Ammolat Bey	589
Duval's (Georges) Vie Véridique de Willem Shakespeare	529
Edgeworth, Maria, and Nebuchadnezzar	502
Elf, The: a Little Book	327
Elision, Improvement of Poetry by	418
Eton, Original Sonnet to, by Mr. A. C. Benson	737
Evening News , Soldiers'	735
Fable by Mr. Gautier de Nogent	419
Fasham, Mr. J. F., on the Pilgrim's Progress	531
Faucit, Helen (Lady Martin), Monument to	444
Fiction as a Trade	78
— Incomes Made out of	419
Field, Eugene, and a Rare Copy of Burns	149
Findlater, Miss J. H., on the "Sot of Fiction"	245
Fitzgerald's (Mr. Percy), Analysis of the Pickwick Papers	148
Fowler's (Miss Ellen Thorneycroft) Writings Parodied	591
Garnett, Dr., Presentation to	3
Germ, A Facsimile of the	53
Gille, Dr., and Goethe's Death	196
Gosse, Edmund, and Scandinavia	221
Gray's "Fleg" in Boys' Schools	620
Guineas, First, Earned by Well-known Writers	682
Gwynn, Mr. Stephen, on "The Decay of Sensibility"	52, 90
Haes's (Mr. Herbert) The P. St. Shewer	53
Haggard's (Mr. Rider) Supposed Visit to British Columbia	417
Hamlet's Physical Proportions	6
Hardy's (Mr. Thomas) Poem, "The Going of the Battery"	559
Harper and McClure Alliance, The	28, 711
Harraden's (Miss) The Fowler, The Bookman's Opinions of	718
Harte, Bret, in California	4
— Travesty of Victor Hugo by	475
Hatsuo, The Beard of	221
Head-line Editing	221
Heine, Heinrich, Bust of	758
Henley, Mr., on the Strawberry	75
— on Mr. Andrew Lang as an Editor of Dickens	100, 147
— Lyrics by, in North American Review	500
— Dedication of Hoby's Courtier , by	560
— Poem by: "England, my England"	711
Hetherington's (Miss) Index to Periodicals	101
Higginbotham, Miss Elsie, Triplet by	125
Hocking's (Mr. Silas K.) Stories, Popularity of	244
Hodgkin, Dr. Thomas	473
Hollingshead, Mr. John, Writings of	532
Hughes, Tom, Statue of, in Rugby School	5
"Hugo, Victor, Memoirs of"	148
Hull Literary Society, Humorous Invitation by	713
Hunt's (Leigh) World of Books and Other Essays (Horatio) Nero	77
Huxley's Criticism of some Lines of Shakespeare's	529
Hyde, Dr. C. M., and R. L. Stevenson	619
Ingersoll, Col. Robert	100
Irish Text Society's Publications	713
Irving, Sir Henry, Books on the Career of	269
Italy , A New Periodical	28
Johnston, Mr. C., on "The True American Spirit in Literature"	53
Jokai, Maurus, and his Guardian Angels	419
Kalidasa's "Sakontala"	5
Khaki, The Gospel of Peace in	361
Kingsley, New Light on the	325
Kipping, A Japanese View of	29
— Uniform Edition of the Works of	52
— New Poem by: "Cruisers"	172
— as an Orator	712
— and Sunday-school People	172, 246
— Departmental Ditties	174
— Appearance on the Stage	220
— Stalky &amp; Co. , Prefatory Poem to	361
— Books and Papers, Prices fetched by	593
— War Poem, Italian Translation of	619
"Kipling Calendar for 1900," The	531
Lang, Mr., on Reviewers	5
— on Golf	52
— New Volume for Children by	475
— Scrap of Autobiography by	620
— and American Humourists	754
Langbridge's (Rev. Frederick) Little Tapers	361
Le Gallienne, Mr. Richard, on a Holiday	119
Libraries, Free, Thefts from	325

NOTES AND NEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Maclaren, Ian, on the Energy of the American People	474
Magazine War in America, The	619
Malarin, Literary	178
Markham's (Edwin) "The Man with the Hoe," Criticism of	301
Marryat, Miss Florence, The Work of	504
Mervale, Charles, on Louis Napoleon's Coup d'Etat	444
Miles's (Eustace H.) The Teaching of Jesus To-day	561
"Mr. Miss," The Hero of	475
More's (Leon) Poèmes Divers d'Alfred Tennyson	787
Morley's (Mr. John) Monograph on Oliver Cromwell	502
Morris's (Mr. William) Views on the Foundation of the Page	263
Mosaic, Poetic, The	445
"New Century Library, The"	418
Notes and Queries, Fifteenth Anniversary of	530
"Occ. Verse," Specimen of	445
Omarian, American	361, 437
O'Neil's (Max) Dialogue on the "Pleasures of Poetry"	178
Ospovat's (Mr. Henry) Illustration of Matthew Arnold's Poems	620
Oxford Hall, Statues of the (1480)	620
Pail Mail Gazette , Verses from the	27, 61
Parallel, Curious	4, 173
Payn, James, Posthumous Paper by	503
"Peasants, Arthur," Anthology of	145
"Penny Horrible," Escape Attributed to the	149
Phillips's (Mr. Stephen) Address to France	195
— Play: "Paolo and Francesca"	360
— Poems on the Dreyfus	360
Case	360
Phil May Album , The	757
Pickwick, Resemblance of, to Don Quixote	220
Plagiarism, Charges of	4
— Mr. E. F. Benson on	712
Platt's (Mr. William) Circular to Art Lovers	712
Play-Writers' Theatre, Projected	51
Poets' Wives, Mr. Alfred T. Turner on	125
Poetry, Minor, An Anthology of, Required	100, 124
Portuguese Sonnets Translated into English	654
Poster, The Cult of the	124
Potter's Art, Neglect of the	101
Powell, Prof. York, on the late Mr. Gleeson White	90
"Problem Novel," Definition of	714
Quaritch, Mr. Bernard, and Mr. Gladstone	737
Quiney's (Richard) Letter to Shakespeare	148
Quinn's (Roderic) Booklet, The Hidden Tide	198
Rafferty, Translation of an Irish Folk-poem by	502
Reed's (Mr. E. T.) Pseudo-Heraldic Franks	222
Regnier's Epitaph	420
Beld's Sir Wemyss Journalistic Career	360
Bennes and the Marquis d'E	101
— The Trial at	195
— The Verdict at	267
Rogers, Dr. Showell, M.A., LL.D.	197
Roosevelt, Col. T., and his Rough Riders	51
Rosebery, Lord, and Mr. Birrell	530
Rylands, John, Character-Sketch of	418
Sainsbury, Prof.	77
Shakespeare Editions, Sale of, in 1790	591
Shorthouse, Mr. J. H., on the Papal System	54
Sierra Leone, Prize Offered for a History of	983
Spenser , The New Departure of	359
Speeches, The Copyright of	125, 147, 529
Stasov, Letters from Turgenev to	590
Stephen, Mr. Leslie, on James Payn	982
Stevenson Letters, Passages from the	28, 124, 219, 501
— Application of, for Edinburgh University Professorship	124
— "Thing Heard" on	712
Story, Short, Rise of the, in America	4
Stout Free Travelling Library, The	621
Suffolk Chronicle , The and Dickens	219
Sullivan's (Mr. J. F.) Satire, The Great Water Joke	5
Swinburne's (Mr.) Poem of the Sea	52
— Sonnets on the Boers	417, 444, 529
Tannahill's (Robert) Poems and Songs	77
Treatment , New, Twentieth Century	503
Thackeray and the Melodrama, "L'Abbaye de Penmarc'h"	329
"Things Heard," Suggestion respecting	552
Transvaal War and the Reading of New Books	443, 529
— Poems on the	501, 529, 559, 712, 755, 756
Triplett's Facts and Triplett's Fiction	503
Turgenev, Tolstoy on	504
— Letters from, to Stasov	590
Turner, Mrs. Elizabeth, Reprints of the Books of	621
Twain, Mark, De luxe Edition of	243
— on the Jew	243
— on Christian Science	445
— on the Boers	560
Tyrell's (Prof.) Latinisation of Hood's "Bridge of Sighs"	327
Uganda Chief's Letter to Sir H. M. Stanley	53
United Services College Chronicle, Sale of some Numbers of the	196

NOTES AND NEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Untold Half, The, by "Alien"	51
Unwin's Chap-Book	662
Verne, M. Jules	75
Wakley, Mr. A. B., on the Attitude of Authors to Critics	622
Ward's (Mrs. Humphry) Introduction to Shirley	621
Watson, Mr. William, on War Poetry	441
Watt's (Mr. A. P.) Book of Testimonials	733
Westcott, Edward Noyes, Stories concerning	445
Whiting's (Richard) revision of The Island	326
Whittier's Ballad of "Barbara Frietchie"	529
Williams, Mr. Jesse Lynch, as a Member of the Fourth Estate	101
Wood, Mr. Henry, Criticism on, by "Israfel"	172
Young Oxford, the Organ of Ruskin Hall	360
Zola, M., Mr. Henry James on	443
—'s new Novel Fécondité	76, 474

PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

	PAGE
No. 38, Result of	23
No. 39, " "	46
No. 40, " "	70
No. 41, " "	90
No. 42, " "	118
No. 43, " "	142
No. 1, New Series, Result of	341
No. 2, " "	361
No. 3, " "	438
No. 4, " "	465
No. 5, " "	494
No. 6, " "	521
No. 7, " "	548
No. 8, " "	581
No. 9, " "	608
No. 10, " "	639
No. 11, " "	698
No. 12, " "	729
No. 13, " "	750
No. 14, " "	770

ILLUSTRATIONS.

	PAGE
Æsopus	423
Allen, Mr. Grant, Portrait of	489
Arthur, Miss Julia, as Barbara Frietchie	591
Babur, First of the Great Moghuls, Portrait of	569
Bed, Blank, in the "Salle de Police"	199
Besant, Claude, Portrait of	181
Besant, Sir Walter, in his Study	197
Black (William), Memorial Beacon	171
Blue Beard's Picture-Book , End-Paper from	674
Book-Covers, Decorative, Pictorial	327, 679
— Mark of the Stout Free Travelling Library	621
Books, Design showing the comparative Popularity of	300
Bond-street Loungers, 1820	509
Boothby, Mr. Guy, Dictating a Novel into a Phonograph	53
Brunetiere, M. Ferdinand, Portrait of	376
Bryce, Mr. James, Portrait of	245
"Burglars, The," from The Golden Age	673
Churchill, Mr. Winston, Portraits of	195, 624
Cover designed by Miss Blanche McManus	744
Cowper, William, Portrait of	328
Crispi, Signor Francesco, Portrait of	154
Cunzio House, Anstruther, Rife	580
Dant's Face, The Mask of	217
Donne, John, Portrait of	505
— Monument to, in St. Paul's Cathedral	506
"Dream Children," from The Essays of Elia	675
Elf, The Cover of the	30
Elstow, "The City of Destruction"	631
Eton Eleven of 1858, The	13
Faucit, Helen (Lady Martin), Alto-Relievo Portrait of	444
Garnett, Dr., Portrait of	376
Gladstone, Mr., Mr. W. Nicholson's Portrait of	369
Gold Dust (Half-a-Million of) ready for Shipment	14
Gosse, Mr. Edmund, Portrait of	221
Harrison, Mrs. William ("Lucas Malet") Portrait of	361
Hawker, Rev. Robert Stephen, Portraits of	173
Herkomer's (Mr.) Shield of Enamels "Triumph of the Hour"	139
Hodgkin, Dr. Thomas, Portrait of	173
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Portrait of	114
Hooligan, The	33
Hugo, Victor, Portrait of	487
Ibsen, Portrait of	79
— at the Age of Forty	267
James, Mr. Henry, Portrait of	377
Johnson, Dr., in his Travelling Dress	598
Kingsley, Charles, Portrait of	213
Kropotkin, Prince Peter, Portrait of	624
"Laying the Cloth," from Pey Wollington	675

ILLUSTRATIONS—continued.

	PAGE
Leslie, Alexander (First Earl of Leven), Portrait of	424
Little Black Sambo , Illustrations from	677
Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth, Portrait of	114
Lowell, James Russell, Portraits of	118
Ludwig II. of Bavaria, Portrait of	303
Milbanke, Miss, Portrait of	151
Millais, John Everett, Portrait of	561
Mother Goose in Prose , Illustration from	677
Müller, Prof. Max, Portrait of	365
Neufeld, Mr. Charles, Writing in Prison	387
"Now He Fell in Love," from Tales from Bocaccio	676
Pepys, Samuel, Portrait of	55
Playfair, Lord Lyon, Portrait of	567
"Poets' Goose Step, The," from the Minneapolis Journal	663
Quick, Rev. Robert Hebert, Portrait of	36
Roberts, Lord, Mr. W. Nicholson's Portrait of	370
"Rochester and Jane Eyre"	490
Sainsbury, Prof. George, in his Study	77
"She's Fondlest of You," from Silas Marner	675
Skeat, Professor, in his Study	63
Spinoza, Portrait of	7
St. Agnes's Eve (Drawing by Sir J. Millais)	428
Stevenson's Treasure Island , Pictorial Cover to	531
Stevenson, Robert Louis, Portrait of	563
Stories from Froissart , Illustration from	676
Thoms, Mr. William John, in his Library	530
Tolstoy, Count, and his Wife	584
Tunisian Middle-class Woman and Servant	271
Turgenev, Ivan, Portrait of	514
Valdés, Señor A. P., in his Study	378
Verne, M. Jules, Portrait of	75
Westcott, Mr. Noyes, Portrait of	289
White, Gilbert, The House of	535, 536
Yeats, Mr. W. B., Fanciful Portrait of	28
Zangwill, Mr. L., Telegraphed Portrait of	662
Zola, M., in his English Garden	131
— Portrait of	542

DRAMA.

	PAGE
"Children of the Ghetto," at the Adelphi Theatre	726
"Devil's Disciple, The," at Kennington Theatre	338
"Moonlight Blossom, The," at the Prince of Wales's Theatre	338
"Weather-Hen, The," at the Comedy Theatre	67

OBITUARY.

	PAGE
Allen, Mr. Grant	489
Baker, Mrs.	325
Berkeley, Lady	127
Berthon, Rev. Edward Lyon	546
Busch, Dr. Moritz	606
Cherbuliez, M. Victor	27
Chisholme, Colonel	666
Cliffen, Viscount	293
Clifford, Lady	436
Costelloe, Mr. B. F. C.	769
De Falbe, Madame	749
Farrer, Lord	464
Forster, Mrs. W. E.	492
Grant, Baron	238, 260
Hicks, Bishop (of Bloemfontein)	464
Howard, Lady Margaret	606
Hughes, Mr. W. R.	589
Hyde, Dr. Charles M.	619
Ingersoll, Colonel Robert	100
Leathley, Mary Elizabeth Southwell	756
Lewis, Lieutenant Francis Owen	637
Lloyd, Bishop	105
Macknight, Dr. Thomas	606
Marryat, Miss Florence	519
Mexborough, Earl of	214
Money-Coutts, Mrs.	769
Moody, Mr. Dwight Lyman	769
Penzance, Lord	747
Peterson, Prof. Peter	243
Pitcher, Mr. Percy	380
Plater, Rev. Herbert	546
Quaritch, Mr. Bernard	748
Rogers, Dr. Showell	197
Rutland, Duchess of	68
Sainsbury, Lady	64
Skene, Miss	19
Southey, Rev. Thomas Castle	492
Tanwick, Miss Anna	545
Tankerville, Earl of	749
Tate, Sir Henry	697
Tennyson, Mr. Arthur	20
Vaughan, Mr. Horatio	436
Von Levetzow, Baroness Ulrika	638
Wauchop, General	540
Westminster, Duke of	768

[SUPPLEMENT TO THE ACADEMY,
13 January, 1900.

DARWIN ON TRIAL at the OLD BAILEY.
By DEMOCRITUS. With an Appendix, JUDICIAL SCANDALS AND ERRORS, showing Mrs. Grundy's Attempt to interfere with the Publication of Scientific Works at the end of the Nineteenth Century. Dedicated to the Right Honorable the Home Secretary. Bound in cloth, post free, 2s.

THE UNIVERSAL ILLUSION of FREE-WILL and CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY. By A. HAMON, Professor in the New University of Brussels. A most valuable Contribution to the Literature on the all-absorbing Question of Determinism and Free-Will. Post free, 3s. 6d.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, Limited, Watford, London.

THE SECOND PART OF
THE NEW STORY BY ZACK, ENTITLED
"ON TRIAL," APPEARS IN BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE

For JULY, 1899.—Price 2s. 6d.

WHICH ALSO CONTAINS:—

THE DOWNFALL OF FINLAND: AN OBJECT-LESSON IN RUSSIAN AGGRESSION.—WILLIAM MORRIS.
—MODERN GERMAN DRAMA. By LAURIE MAGNUS.—AN ANTHROPOMORPHIC CHRISTIAN.
—PIONEERING IN KLONDIKE. Conclusion. By ALEXANDER MACDONALD.—A BEDOUIN'S VENGEANCE. CHAPS. I.-III.—SOME GASTRONOMICAL RECOLLECTIONS.—TWO SPECTACLES.—BY WILLOW CREEK. By MOIRA O'NEILL.—THE LOOKER-ON.

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS,
EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS

Just Published. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Royston.

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Spiritual Principle of Nonconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.

Twenty-first Thousand. Limp cloth, price 6d., post free.

OUR PRINCIPLES: a Congregationalist Church Manual. By G. B. JOHNSON.

London: 21 & 22, Fumival Street, Holborn, E.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
(LIMITED),

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of
all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books
at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS
per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis
and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION IN ONE VOL.—(Condensed).

Extra crown 8vo, 10s. net.

BISMARCK: Some Secret Pages of his History.

Being a Diary kept by Dr. MORITZ BUSCH during Twenty-five Years' Official and Private Intercourse with the great Chancellor.

Third Thousand.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF

"ELIZABETH AND HER GERMAN GARDEN." THE SOLITARY SUMMER.

Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

SPECTATOR.—"The author of 'Elizabeth and her German Garden' has written a second book of the same description, which is even more charming than her first. In her company we have never been dull, no pages have to be skipped, and the only regret is that there are not more to read."

TWO HISTORICAL ROMANCES.

RICHARD CARVEL.

By WINSTON CHURCHILL, Author of "The Celebrity."

Crown 8vo, 6s.

* Upwards of 10,000 copies have been sold in America within three weeks of publication.

ENGLISH REVIEWS.

OBSERVER.—"A fine historical story of early American days; full of incident and 'go,' and admirably written."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Full of good things. The narrative excels in incidents, interesting, vivid, and picturesque."

AMERICAN REVIEWS.

N.Y. TRIBUNE.—"A remarkably workmanlike production."

BOOKMAN (U.S.A.).—"Mr. Churchill has cause to feel proud of his work."

BOSTON HERALD.—"Pure romance of the most captivating and alluring order."

RUPERT, BY THE GRACE OF GOD.

By DORA GREENWELL MCCHESNEY.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

ATHENÆUM.—"A singularly successful specimen of the 'historical' fiction of the day."

WORLD.—"The reader will rapidly find his attention absorbed by a really stirring picture of stirring times."

ROLF BOLDREWOOD'S NEW NOVEL.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"WAR to the KNIFE"; or, Tangata Maori.

ACADEMY.—"A stirring romance."

OUTLOOK.—"Any one who likes a good story, combined with any amount of information on strange lands, should get this book."

RHODA BROUGHTON'S NEW NOVEL.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE GAME and the CANDLE.

THE TRAIL of the GOLDSEEKERS: a Record of Travel

in Prose and Verse. By HAMLIN GARLAND. Crown 8vo, 6s.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

ROBIN. By Mrs. Parr. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MORNING POST.—"Excellent from first to last, and will recommend itself to all those who care for a well and gracefully-written novel."

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

JULY. Price 1s.

CONTENTS.

1. VALDA HANEM (the Romance of a Turkish Hartm). Chapters XVI.-XVII.
2. POPE and KING. By Sir JOHN ROBINSON, K.C.M.G.
3. DANTON. By H. C. MACDOWALL.
4. THE TRUE POET OF IMPERIALISM.
5. A CHELSEA MANUSCRIPT. Edited by RONALD McNEILL.
6. THE REAL D'ARTAGNAN. By GERALD BRENNAN.
7. THE WEDDING of a RAJPUT PRINCE.
8. THE TAKING of GIBRALTAR. By DAVID HANNAY.
9. THE SONG of YOUTH.
10. SAVROLA (a Military and Political Romance). By WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL. Chapters VI.-VIII.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE

CONTENTS for JULY.

Price 1s.

1. DONNA TERESA. By F. M. PEARD. Chapters IV.-VI.
2. A SUCCESSOR of SAMUEL PEPPY.
3. CYNTHIA'S WAGER.
4. A WHIRL through BATAVIA.
5. THE GARDEN of PROSERPINE.
6. SIGISMONDO CASTROMEDIANO.
7. NEW WINES and OLD BOTTLES.
8. A MEDLEY of VOICES.
9. FATHER MURDOCH'S LAST MASS.
10. THE STORY of ST. HELENA.
11. YOUNG APRIL. By EGERTON CASTLE. (Conclusion.)

THE ARGOSY.

CONTENTS for JULY. Price 1s.

1. THE TOWER GARDENS. Chapters XXIII.-XXVI. Illustrated.
2. THE RETURN to FRANCE. By O. E. MERTZKE.
3. SCENES in a NOVELIST'S LANDSCAPE. By GEORGE MORLEY.
4. FOR LOVE of TONY. By ELIZABETH M. MOON.
5. HEIDELBERG. By CHARLES W. WOOD, F.R.G.S. Illust.
6. BROKEN IDEALS. By Lady MARGARET MAGENDIE.
7. TWO OUTLOOKS: a Dialogue. By ALICE MACRAY.
8. A GAME of COTTAGES. By J. P. ROWSOTHAM, M.A.
9. AN UNNOTICED WELSH INDUSTRY.
10. THE INSECT JEWELS. By EDWARD MITCHELL.
11. THE PARTING of the WAVES. By CHRISTIAN BURKE. Also ready, Vol. LXVII, January to April, 1899. Price 6s.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, post-free, 16s.

The JULY NUMBER contains:—

- COLLIER'S PORTRAIT of RUDYARD KIPLING. Printed in Tint. Frontispiece.
RUDYARD KIPLING and RACIAL INSTINCT. By HENRY RUTGERS MARSHALL.
THE MAKING of "ROBINSON CRUSOE." By J. CUTBERT HADLEY.
FRANKLIN'S RELATIONS with the FAIR SEX. The Many-Sided Franklin. By PAUL LEICESTER FORD.
And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Illustrated. Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The JULY NUMBER contains:

- THE CREW of the "SANDPIPER." Story. By ISABEL CURTIS.
WITH the "ROUGH RIDERS." By HENRY LA MOTTE, M.D.
THE STRANGE STORY of a GOOSE. Story. By ELLA R. CURRIE.
And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & CO., LIMITED, London.

FROM OLIPHANT'S LIST.

NOW READY.

Royal 8vo, price 10s. 6d. With numerous Illustrations.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS
AND SOCIAL PROGRESSA Sociological Study of Foreign Missions.
VOL. II.By the Rev. JAMES S. DENNIS, D.D., Author of "Foreign Missions after a Century."

A New Edition of Vol. I. is now ready.

With upwards of 100 Full-Page Reproductions from original Photographs, price 10s. 6d.

Vol. III., completing the work, is expected in October.

FAMOUS SCOTS SERIES.

Post 8vo, price 1s. 6d., cloth; and extra gilt, 2s. 6d.

JAMES FREDERICK FERRIER.

By E. S. HALDANE.

With Introduction by R. B. HALDANE, M.P.

Being the 28th Volume of the Series.

"A vivid picture of the man, who, indeed, was of no common stamp."—SPECTATOR."Miss Haldane's sketch of the man and his work is clear and capable; it throws welcome sidelights on Scottish society, and sometimes also on Scottish philosophy."—SPEAKER."Ferrier the man, and even Ferrier the Professor, Miss Haldane brings near to us, an attractive and an interesting figure."—SCOTSMAN.

THE ISLANDS OF THE FORTH.

EMERALDS CHASED IN GOLD;
or, the Islands of the Forth. Their Story,
Ancient and Modern. By JOHN DICKSON,
F.S.A. Scot., Author of "Ruined Castles of Midlothian." With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, price 6s."Mr. Dickson has written a very careful and a very charming book."—ACADEMY."Mr. Dickson's book is extremely interesting, and forms a valuable contribution to Scottish local history."—SPECTATOR.Paterson's Handy Guides
For Tourists.Intending Tourists in Switzerland, the Rhineland, Scotland, &c., will find PATERSON'S GUIDES among the best and cheapest in the market. They are handy, well arranged, up-to-date, and full of Maps, Plans, and Illustrations.

CONTINENTAL.

Paterson's Handy Guide to Switzerland.
With 10 Maps and Plans. New Edit. Cloth, 1s. 6d.Paterson's Handy Guide to the Rhine and its Provinces. With 13 Maps and Plans.
Cloth, 1s. 6d.

SCOTLAND.

*"PATERSON'S GUIDES may be strongly recommended as handbooks to separate localities in Scotland. They are well mapped and illustrated, and deal severally with Edinburgh, Glasgow, and the Clyde,
the Southern Counties of Scotland, the Trossachs, &c."*—ACADEMY.Paterson's Handy Guide to Scotland.
Revised and Enlarged. With 13 Maps and Plans and numerous Illustrations. Linen fibre covers, 1s.; cloth, 2s. 6d.Paterson's Handy Guide to Edinburgh.
Revised and Corrected, with new Plan of the City and Illustrations. Linen fibre covers, 6d.; cloth, 1s.Paterson's Handy Guide to Glasgow, the Clyde, and Land of Burns. With Plan of Glasgow, Map of the Clyde, and Illustrations.
Linen fibre covers, 6d.; cloth, 1s.Paterson's Handy Guide to the Trossachs and the Lakes and Glens of Central Scotland. With Map and Illustrations. Linen fibre covers, 6d.; cloth limp, 1s.Paterson's Handy Guide to the Land of Scott and Southern Counties of Scotland.
With Map and Illustrations. Linen fibre covers, 6d.; cloth, 1s.Paterson's Handy Guide to Orkney and Shetland. With Map. Linen fibre covers, 6d.; cloth, 1s.

LONDON.

Paterson's Handy Guide to London and Suburbs. With 2 Maps. Linen fibre covers, 6d.;
cloth, 1s.OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER,
21, Paternoster Square, London, E.C.; and Edinburgh.

BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY READING

PUBLISHED BY

CASSELL &amp; COMPANY.

THE NOVEL OF THE DAY

IS

MAX PEMBERTON'S BRILLIANT STORY,
THE GARDEN OF SWORDS."There need be no hesitation in saying that 'The Garden of Swords' is, beyond computation, Mr. Max Pemberton's most significant literary achievement."
Daily Mail.The large First Edition has already been exhausted, and the Reprint is now on Sale.

Price 6s.

Other Works by the Same Author.

KRONSTADT. 6s.

A PURITAN'S WIFE. 6s.

THE IMPREGNABLE CITY. 6s. Popular
Edition, 3s. 6d.

THE SEA-WOLVES. Popular Edition, 3s. 6d.

THE IRON PIRATE. Popular Edition, 3s. 6d.

THE LITTLE HUGUENOT. 1s. 6d.

CHEAP EDITIONS.

Price 3s. 6d. each.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN
MORN. By FRANK R. STOCKTON.MRS. CLIFF'S YACHT. By Frank
R. STOCKTON.WHAT CHEER! By W. Clark
RUSSELL.

BY J. M. BARRIE.

SENTIMENTAL TOMMY. 6s.

THE LITTLE MINISTER. 6s.

BY STANLEY WEYMAN.

THE MAN IN BLACK. 3s. 6d.

THE STORY OF FRANCIS CLUDDE. 6s.
FROM THE MEMOIRS OF A MINISTER OF FRANCE. 6s.

BY R. L. STEVENSON.

Library Edition, 6s. each; Popular Edition, 3s. 6d. each

TREASURE ISLAND. CATRIONA.

THE BLACK ARROW. | KIDNAPPED.

THE MASTER OF BALLANTRAE.

ISLAND NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS.

THE WRECKER. By R. L. STEVENSON and LLOYD OSBOURNE.

BY RIDER HAGGARD.

KING SOLOMON'S MINES. 3s. 6d.

BY ANTHONY HOPE.

FATHER STAFFORD. 3s. 6d.

BY E. W. HORNUNG.

SOME PERSONS UNKNOWN. 6s.

YOUNG BLOOD. 6s.

THE ROGUE'S MARCH. 6s.

MY LORD DUKE. 6s.

"TINY LUTTRELL." 3s. 6d.

WORKS BY Q.

WANDERING HEATH. 5s.

DEAD MAN'S ROCK. 5s.

"I SAW THREE SHIPS." 5s.

NOUGHTS AND CROSSES. 5s.

THE SPLENDID SPUR. 5s.

THE BLUE PAVILIONS. 5s.

THE ASTONISHING HISTORY OF TROY

TOWN. 5s.

THE DELECTABLE DUCHY. 5s.

IA: a Love Story. 3s. 6d.

BY FRANK STOCKTON.

THE GIRL at COBHURST. 6s.

A STORY-TELLER'S PACK. 6s.

POMONA'S TRAVELS. 3s. 6d.

BY ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.

CUPID'S GARDEN. Cheap Edition, 3s. 6d.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD, London, Paris
New York, and Melbourne.SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S
LIST.NEW VOLUME of the "DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY."

JUST PUBLISHED.

Royal 8vo, 15s. net in cloth; or in half-morocco, marbled edges, 20s. net.

VOLUME LIX. (WAKEMAN-WATKINS)

OF THE

DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

\.* Volume I. was published on January 1, 1885, and a further Volume will be issued Quarterly until the completion of the Work, which will be effected within a year from the present time.*

From the TIMES, May 6, 1889.

"Steadily and punctually, like some great recurrent phenomenon of nature, the volumes of this great dictionary appear, and it is almost with regret that the student remarks how near the work is coming to its completion. Volume LVIII. brings us down to 'Wakefield,' which means, we suppose, that only three or four more volumes remain to be published. It would be superfluous at the present moment to repeat those general terms of praise of the design and execution of the book which have been bestowed upon each volume as it appeared; let us only say that the present instalment shows no falling-off in either respect."

NEW NOVELS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"A CONSPIRACY OF SILENCE."

PUBLISHED TO-DAY.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE STRANGE STORY OF HESTER WYNNE.

Told by HERSELF.

With a Prologue.

By G. COLMORE,

Author of "Concerning Oliver Knox," "A Conspiracy of Silence," "A Daughter of Music," &c.

A NEW NOVEL OF FRENCH LIFE.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

MA MÈRE; or, Sons and Daughters under the Second Empire. By the Vicomte JEAN DE LUZ.SPECTATOR.—"The author has evidently enjoyed exceptional advantages for depicting certain phases of French life, especially in Imperialist and Legitimist circles. The sinister side of the late Emperor's character is ruthlessly exposed."LITERATURE.—"A book that teaches unaware. It opens with a vivid account of the French 'flesh-market,' and the marriage of a girl still in a convent to a man whom she has scarcely seen.... As a novel written in good taste and not without dramatic power it may be commended."WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"The tragic history of La Marquise de Bersia is well worth reading."

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For JULY. Price One Shilling.

CONTENTS.

THE RISE of the "SHORT STORY." By BERT HARTE.

COLONIAL MEMORIES.—Part II. By Lady BROOMS.

THE DECAY of SENSIBILITY. By STEPHEN GWINN.

THE OLD MAN'S SON. By HORACE ANNESLEY

VACHELL.

SUDAN RECOLLECTIONS. By Lieut. H. C. B.

HOPKINSON, Seaforth Highlanders.

THE ABODES of the HOMELESS. By the Rev.

Canon BARNETT.

AT "the HOUSE" in the FIFTIES. By JOHN A.

BRIDGES.

THAT TERRIBLE QUIDNUNC: a Cricket Story.

By ALFRED COCHRANE.

"POLYGLOT RUSSIAN SCANDAL" in the SIXTIES. By GEORGE SOMES LATARD.

THE MOST SUCCESSFUL BIGAMIST on RECORD.

By F. SCARLETT POTTER.

THE HOTEL MUDIE: a Selection. By HORACE PENN.

CONFERENCES on BOOKS and MEN.—IV. By

URBANUS SYLVAN.

LITTLE ANNA MARK. Chaps. 23-31. By S. R.

CROCKETT.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO.,
15, Waterloo Place.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1417. Established 1869.

1 July, 1899.

Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE presentation to Dr. Garnett, to which one hundred and ninety persons subscribed, was made by Mr. Leslie Stephen last week. The gift consisted of Dr. Garnett's portrait, painted by the Hon. John Collier, and forty-seven volumes of reference chosen by the recipient. Mr. Stephen happily summed up Dr. Garnett's claims to the gratitude of all students, Dr. Garnett disclaimed having done more than his duty, and the proceedings were over. The works chosen by Dr. Garnett were as follow:

Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.

——— Christian Biography.

——— Classical Biography and Mythology.

——— Greek and Roman Antiquities.

——— Greek and Roman Geography.

Clinton. Fasti Hellenici.

——— Fasti Romani.

Head. Historia Numorum.

Stevenson and Madden. Dictionary of Roman Coins.

Murray. History of Greek Sculpture.

Plato, translated by Jowett.

Pausanias, translated by Frazer.

Gibbon, edited by Bury.

Grove. Dictionary of Music and Musicians.

Liddell and Scott. Greek Lexicon.

Chisholm. "The Times" Gazetteer of the World.

The volumes were uniformly bound by Zaehnsdorf.

THE first thing that strikes one on examining the Anglo-Saxon Review is its dignity, its spaciousness. In an age of pocket editions and octavos it is particularly pleasant to come upon this lordly tome, with its ample page, and fine, fair type. The cover, a close copy of the binding of a volume from the library of James I., is a delight. "After a brief, though not perchance unhonoured, stay on the writing-table," says Lady Randolph Churchill in her editorial introduction, the Anglo-Saxon Review "may be taken up into that Valhalla of printed things—the library." We think it will. Indeed, her aim, the editor explains, in projecting the Review has been to ensure a little longer life for contributions to periodicals, thus indicating to future ages something of the "transient brilliancy" of this.

OUR second impression is that Lady Randolph Churchill's quarterly was well worth waiting for, because the literature also is good. A poem by Mr. Swinburne, on the Battle of the Nile, is a sufficiently auspicious start. But the prize is the brilliant and searching essay on Peel by Lord Rosebery. Apart from the unfolding of Peel's character by one whose admiration has led him to ponder upon it very closely, we have here a number of peculiarly interesting reflections on the duties and difficulties of the Prime Minister's position, and such delicate and urbane writing as to lead us more than ever to wish that Lord Rosebery would follow his life of Pitt with another volume. The Anglo-Saxon Review prints also an article on the Sudan by Sir Rudolf Slatin; a story by Mr. Henry James; and the full text of "Osborn and Ursyne," the poetical drama by Mrs. Craigie which Mr. Alexander will produce at the St. James's Theatre.

ANOTHER remarkable publication of the week is The Book of the Masque, from Mr. Ashbee's press, presented by the Art Workers' Guild at the Guildhall. Printing, arrangement, reproduction of illustrations are alike admirable. Indeed, Mr. Wilson's design for the stage, to name but one of the illustrations, with its arrangement of pillars and sense of space, height, and mystery, produces that effect on the mind that leads to a mount and frame and a place on the wall.

THE Art Workers deserve the highest praise for the skill and patience they gave to the production of the Masque. The procession of famous cities was a thing to remember—a gorgeous and moving pageant. No doubt on another occasion, profiting by their present experience, the Guild will give us the Larger Idea only, and omit the parochial element. The modern Jerry Builder and the majesty of Imperial Rome do not coalesce.

It seems as if the "Christian daily paper," or, in other words, the "Nonconformist daily paper," of which so much has been said, may really be issued before very long. One advocate has even gone so far as to draw up a suggested staff. But it is not the staff that would be the difficulty, considering the number of professional Christians always accessible.

THE "Discount Question," which apparently goes to sleep for months together, has again awakened, this time with a start. An ultimatum, drafted nominally by the publishers, but really by the Publishers' and Booksellers' Associations acting in concert, has now been sent to all booksellers. It says: You must sell all net books at the published prices. If you don't, we shall refuse to give you the usual trade terms, and shall invoice net books to you at their full published price. With this ultimatum is issued a form of acceptance, which, in order that the scheme may be brought into operation at once, every bookseller is requested to sign. It may be that the recalcitrant booksellers will refuse to sign. Then the struggle will begin.

IN the Dominion of Dreams Miss Fiona Macleod acknowledges her indebtedness to an unpublished work. This is Mr. Alexander Carmichael's Oragus Ob, an important book which has been promised for years, and is now almost ready for publication. Mr. Carmichael has spent many years in the Outer Hebrides collecting material, and the result should be of the very highest interest to scholars. The work is a collection of the old hymns and incantations in use among the islanders. Another work on the same subject, with an introduction by Mr. Andrew Lang, has been promised for some time by Mr. Alexander MacBain, of Inverness, the well-known Celtic scholar.

MR. BRET HARTE writes in the Cornhill on the rise of the short story in America. He shows that it grew from the anecdote, or funny conversational tale; but was very long in coming to itself. It even allowed the Civil War, that great opportunity, to pass without finding therein any material upon which to work. A contrast of the activity of American story-tellers to-day, with the late conflict to draw upon, and the passivity of their predecessors after the greater struggle, is very instructive. Not until the gold rush to California in the late forties did the native short story really find congenial material; and Mr. Bret Harte was the pioneer. After seeing much life in the diggings, he became editor of the Overland Monthly, a San Francisco magazine, and it troubled him to find no characteristic Californian stories coming in. Everything artistic that was communicated was foreign or derivative:

In this perplexity he determined to attempt to make good the deficiency himself. He wrote "The Luck of Roaring Camp." However far short it fell of his ideal and his purpose, he conscientiously believed that he had painted much that "he saw, and part of which he was," that his subject and characters were distinctly Californian, as was equally his treatment of them. But an unexpected circumstance here intervened. The publication of the story was objected to by both printer and publisher, virtually for not being in the conventional line of subject, treatment, and morals! The introduction of the abandoned outcast mother, of the foundling "Luck," and the language used by the characters, received a serious warning and protest. The writer was obliged to use his right as editor to save his unfortunate contribution from oblivion. When it appeared, at last, he saw with consternation that the printer and publisher had really voiced the local opinion; that the press of California was still strongly dominated by the old conservatism and conventionalism of the East. . . . However, its instantaneous and cordial acceptance as a new departure by the critics of the Eastern States and Europe enabled the writer to follow it with other stories of a like character. More than that, he was gratified to find a disposition on the part of his contributors to shake off their conservative trammels. . . . The term "imitators," often used by the critics who, as previously stated, had claimed for the present writer the invention of this kind of literature, could not fairly apply to those who had cut loose from conventional methods, and sought to honestly describe the life around them, and he can only claim to have shown them that it could be done.

CURIOUSLY enough, the same month that brings us Mr. Bret Harte's article in the Cornhill brings an account in the Century of his career in California, from the pen of an old associate, Mr. Noah Brooks. The Overland Monthly's beginnings are there described. Says Mr. Brooks:

There were not many writers of fiction in our ranks, and Harte and I confidently agreed that we would each write a short story for the first number of the new magazine. We had four months to prepare for the great event, but the first issue of the Overland (July, 1868) had only one story in its contents, and that was mine. Harte, with many sighs and groans, confessed that he had been unable to finish the first short story that he had ever undertaken in his life. But he had composed a charming little poem for the first number. It was entitled "San Francisco, from the Sea." His own short story, when it did appear, in the second number of the magazine (August, 1868) was well worth waiting for. It was "The Luck of Roaring Camp." His second story did not appear until January, 1869; and that, too, was worth waiting for. It was the immortal "Outcasts of Poker Flat."

THE letters passing between George Borrow and the Bible Society, which Dr. Knapp failed to secure for his biography of Borrow, are being printed in the Society's magazine, beginning with July. It now seems that the conjecture that Joseph John Gurney first introduced Borrow to the Bible Society is wrong. It was the Rev. Francis Cunningham, of Lowestoft. In Mr. Cunningham's letter Borrow is thus described: "He is independent in circumstances, of no very exactly defined denomination of Christians, but I think of certain Christian principle. I shall make more inquiry about him and see him again. Next week I propose to meet him in London, and I could wish that you should see him, and, if you please, take him under your charge for a few days. He is of the middle order in society, and a very produceable person." Negotiations followed, and Borrow was employed. Thus "downily" did Borrow's first letter to the secretary of the Bible Society begin: "Rev. and Dear Sir,—I have just received your communication, and notwithstanding it is Sunday morning, and the bells with their loud and clear voices are calling me to church, I have sat down to answer it by return of post."

WITH regard to the parallel which was drawn last week between a passage in Mr. Hall Caine's novel, The Christian, and a passage in Swift, Mr. C. F. Kenyon writes: "Mr. Hall Caine rarely breaks silence either to correct the numerous mistakes of his critics or to defend the views he has expressed in his novels. This being so, you may, perhaps, excuse my writing to inform you that a few days prior to the publication of The Christian in book form Mr. Caine acknowledged to his readers, through the medium of interviews, &c., that he had used freely extracts from books, newspapers, diaries, letters, and many other quite legitimate sources of information, for the purpose of making his book as true and lifelike as possible. He made no secret whatever of this, and the instance you quote is one out of several which I have myself discovered or which have been pointed out to me."

MR. KENYON's letter is a sufficient explanation of the parallel. At the same time, an author's avowal, in an interview, that he has used other people's work wherever he wanted it is no justification. Many persons, happily, do not read interviews. The only place in which to explain a loan is in the book itself.

MEANWHILE, a charge of plagiarism has been brought by Mr. T. Hutchinson against Mr. Baring-Gould. According to Mr. Hutchinson, that fine, robust novel, John Herring—published in 1883—is no more or less than an English adaptation of Maurus Jokai's romance, Az Arány Ember, or, as it is called in translation, Timar's Two Worlds. In Blady's of the Steaponey, a recent novel, says Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Baring-Gould announces that one of the incidents is borrowed from Jokai's Pretty Michal; but that confession does not cover the more considerable loan of 1883. Mr. Baring-Gould's reply to Mr. Hutchinson's charges has not yet been published.

THE cultivation of letters is rare behind the gloomy walls of a prison; but the Warden of the Ohio State Penitentiary (U.S.A.) has brought forth some sweet sounds from the depths of this darksome abode of criminals by offering prizes for the best poems. A large number were submitted for the consideration of a specially appointed committee, and the first prize was won by a Mr. J. W. Dean, who is serving three years for burglary. His subject was "A Message," and the verses run as follows:

Thou art but a little flower,
Yet in thee do I behold
Something more than kingly dower,
Something more than wealth or gold.

As thy sweet perfume I'm drinking
Silently my lips do frame
A prayer; for I am thinking
Whence this tender message came.

Though the hand that gently plucked thee
Soon shall lie beneath the clay,
Thou wilt live within my mem'ry
Through a never-ending day.

The second prize was won by a Mr. James Harvey, who is imprisoned for life. His poem, which is better than that which took the higher honour, was entitled "Flowers":

In this prosaic life of ours,
Impregnated with terrestrial pain,
God's handiwork is shown in flowers
That shoot from seed and springtime rain.

Through metamorphosed bud and bloom,
Each petal opening into place,
They cheer our hearts, dispel the gloom,
And lend their fragrance and their grace.

No sculptor yet that e'er was born
Hath carved aught lovelier or more fair
Than in the freshness of the morn
The perfect flower waving there.

And many a tale these symbols tell;
By variegated form and hues
In mind and heart a hallowed spell
Create, and higher thoughts infuse.

Short-lived their beauty, like a dream—
And wherefore, 'tis not well defined;
Like some pure creatures doth it seem
To know long life were not designed.

In festive scene where music flows—
Mellifluous odours on him stealing—
The poet fancies ere he knows
A glimpse of Heaven, the flowers revealing.

MR. LANG, after some remarks in Longman's on multiple reviewing, turns to a grievance of his own. "The funniest way of reviewers," he says, "is when criticising one book, to disparage another book before it is published. Someone in the Saturday Review for May 27 treats an unpublished book of my own in this diverting manner. He 'cannot regard with equanimity' my poor unborn bantling. Well, here I have the advantage, for I can regard him with equanimity. My book 'will be lively, nothing more.' I wish I could hope for this measure of success; but is prophecy quite fair, or even entirely courteous, in the circumstances? . . . Altogether the ways of this critic, who deserts the book before him to express his views of the book which is not in existence, and to tell the world what it will be, are the quaintest that I have chanced to observe. However, I am really sorry that his equanimity is disturbed; and, if he will permit me the liberty, I would advise him, if ever my work does appear, to pitch into it in at least eight organs of private opinion."

ANOTHER sin of the literary paragraphist is brought to our notice by Messrs. Hutchinson. It seems that a writer in a contemporary, wishing to exalt No. 5, John Street, at the expense of A Double Thread, has been stating that, whereas Miss Fowler's story at first leaped far in advance of Mr. Whiteing's, it is now forgotten, while Mr. Whiteing's is selling more than ever. The method is not a good one at any time, but in the present case it is doubly wrong, for Messrs. Hutchinson have proofs that their novel has been far more widely distributed.

THE Elizabethan Stage Society is no slave to its name, for at the next performance, to be given in the Conservatory of the Botanical Gardens, Regent's Park, on July 3, Kálidásá's "Sakoontalá" will be acted. Kálidásá, the most famous Indian dramatist, lived probably in the sixth century after Christ. "Sakoontalá" is his most popular play, and has been praised by Goethe, Humboldt, Schlegel, and Sir John Lubbock. It tells of a king, who, while on a hunting expedition, comes unexpectedly among some hermits living in a sacred grove. There he falls in love with Sakoontalá, a beautiful maiden, who, passing for a hermit's daughter, is in reality of higher rank. She is secretly married to the king, who gives her a ring in token of recognition, and returns to his kingdom. Then follows a series of moving and interesting incidents. A curse is pronounced on Sakoontalá by a choleric sage, who prophesies her husband's loss of memory. She decides to set out for her husband's palace. On the way she loses her marriage token, and, being unrecognised by her husband, she is publicly repudiated; this is followed by her miraculous assumption to a celestial asylum, the unexpected discovery of the ring by a poor fisherman, and the king's agony on recovering his memory. Next is shown the king's aerial voyage in the car of Indra; his strange meeting with his own child, the son of Sakoontalá, and finally the happy re-union of the lovers.

A STATUE of Tom Hughes now stands in Rugby School. The ceremony of unveiling was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, who pointed to Hughes as in his time a living exponent of Dr. Arnold's educational methods. To understand Arnold thoroughly, he said it was necessary to read not only the life of Dean Stanley, but also Tom Brown's Schooldays. Mr. Goschen, another of the speakers, called Hughes "in a certain sense the most distinguished school-boy who ever lived. He was the incarnation of the highest type of British schoolboy in the sense of honour, chivalry, and hatred of sham." The statue represents Hughes standing bare-headed before a tree-stump, in an easy attitude. The sculptor is Mr. Thomas Brock, R.A.

THE Bishop of Hereford, who also spoke by virtue of his own long term of office as head master of the school, reminded his hearers that two other famous old Rugbeians awaited memorials—Matthew Arnold and A. H. Clough. When he was in America, he added, a distinguished lady handed him one hundred dollars towards a monument to Clough. The sum has not yet been augmented.

It is many years since Mr. J. F. Sullivan examined and exposed the British Working Man for the pleasure of those who had suffered under that tyrant's hands. He now comes to the defence of the unhappy Londoner with another clever satire, this time at the expense of the Water Company, under the title The Great Water Joke (Downey). It is hard hitting, both with pen and pencil; but Mr. Sullivan has fun, and with fun in the background no assault is really resented. It is possible, also, that he has justice too. This is the beginning of the sad story:

The simple LONDON PUBLIC said, a longish time ago,
"I should so like a little drop, a drop of H<sub>2</sub>O;
I wouldn't waste the precious stuff or treat it as a drug;
I only want a little drop to fill my little jug."

And here are other stanzas:

That PUBLIC paid an extra rate—(he was a simple chap!)—
For ev'ry cistern, gully, sink, and service-pipe and tap:
And when he'd duly paid on them the COMPANY arose,
And counted all his pots and pails and made him pay on those.

"O PUBLIC," said the COMPANY, "I notice you forgot
To say you had a buttercup a-growing in a pot:
Your drawing-room, which harbours it, becomes in point of fact

A rateable conservatory well within the Act."

He paid upon the garden which surrounded his abode;
The COMPANY assessed him on the puddles in the road;
They made him pay an extra on the tear within his eye—
Yet, after all he'd gone and paid, his little jug was dry!

Will not Mr. Sullivan next turn his attention to the public telephones?

CONCERNING our review of the book Was Shakespeare a Catholic? "R. C." writes: "In the issue for June 17 your reviewer of Father Bowden's work forgets his Trench and his logic. Trench protests against using words in a loose and slovenly sense. He would tell you that catholic means universal. A catholic taste for literature is correct enough, but I should not admit anyone to have a catholic taste for it if he read and enjoyed histories only. He uses Catholic and Protestant as if they were individually separate religions, which I object to, seeing that, if there be two religions, one cannot be catholic. If he wishes to be clear, let him say Roman Catholic or Romanist or Papist. The same loose use of the word occurs in 'Memoirs of the Moment.'

OUR correspondent adds, apropos a recent article on the Family Herald, that he knew a clergyman, a distinguished scholar, whose son is now one of the most brilliant scholars in Europe, who "chafed at the interval between issue and issue" of that engaging periodical. How many parsons, he asks, read such stuff now?

A SYMPOSIUM on Hamlet's physical proportions has been arranged by the Revue Blanche, apropos a recent encounter. It appears that opinions differ on this subject as much as on bimetallism or the decoration of St. Paul's. According to Max Nordau, Hamlet was red-haired, clean-shaven, stout, short, and thirty. He was a Wittenberg student and a great drinker. M. Louis Esnault considers him tall, stooping, fair, and eighteen. Signora Diligenti prefers to think of him as stout, robust, and twenty-five; while Mme. Rachilde calls him small, dark, ugly, and anything up to sixty. Sixty!

Two new dedications. Canon Knox Little's Sketches and Studies in South Africa:

I dedicate this volume, by permission, to the Right Hon. Cecil J. Rhodes, a far-seeing statesman and a faithful friend.

Sir Michael Foster's monograph on Claude Bernard:

To the physiologists of France, both to those who had the happiness to know Claude Bernard in the flesh, and to those who, like myself, never saw his face, this little sketch is dedicated, in the hope that, as he has been to me a father in our common science, so I may be allowed to look upon them as brethren.

Bibliographical.

APROPOS of the poetic mosaic described in the ACADEMY some months ago, which a contemporary has just discovered, I might remark that this particular species of futility is not new, but has simply been for a while out of fashion. It was, and is, tolerable only when the results are intentionally and actually humorous. Mr. W. T. Dobson gives a few specimens of this sort of "cento" in his Poetical Ingenuities and Eccentricities; but much better than any of his examples is the "prize poem," "Mne-mosyne," which Shirley Brooks concocted for Punch in 1865, and which was afterwards reprinted in his Wit and Humour. It begins:

Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
That to be hated needs but to be seen,
Invites my lays; be present, sylvan maids,
And graceful deer reposing in the shades.

Elsewhere we have:

Pity the sorrows of a poor old man,
When wild in woods the noble savage ran;
And from his lip those words of insult fell,
"It must be so. Plato, thou reasonest well."

Brooks, it will be remembered, was always ready and apt with quotation, especially in that "Essence of Parliament" which he distilled so well.

While joining in the praise so widely bestowed upon the "souvenir" of the Charing Cross Hospital Bazaar, I may be permitted, as a bibliographer, to express the hope that the example thus created will not be largely followed. The pursuit of bibliography is quite sufficiently laborious as it is, without being extended in this direction. Or, if literary and artistic publications of this sort are to become common, we must have a law compelling the promoters to lodge a copy in each of the big national libraries. It is not likely, however, that such "souvenirs" as that produced by Mr. Tree will ever be very numerous, if only for the reason that distinguished authors and artists will decline to be victimised in this way save on rare and extraordinary occasions.

By the way, talking of Mr. Tree's liber elegantiarum, does not Mr. Henley's "swallow-flight of song"—

A sigh sent wrong,
A kiss that goes astray,
A sorrow the years endlong—

remind one of George MacDonald's very familiar lines:

A sigh too much, or a kiss too long . . .
And life is never the same again?

Since Mr. W. S. Gilbert ceased, practically, to write humorous ditties which had claims to be regarded as literature, nobody has done that sort of thing so well as the gentleman who is known in the theatrical world as "Adrian Ross." Mr. "Ross," indeed, owes a good deal to the example of Mr. Gilbert, to whose ingenuity of rhyme and rhythm he comes very near. Latterly Mr. Ross has been publishing isolated songs in the monthlies and weeklies. I hope he will some day collect these, and, adding to them the best of the lyrics he has written for the stage, make a volume of them. Until he does that, there will never be the wide recognition of his ability and skill which those qualities, I think, deserve.

The new edition of Gray's letters promised us by Mr. Tovey will be welcome. Mr. Storr made a selection from the correspondence when he published an edition of the poems. There is, of course, Mr. Gosse's edition of the "works in prose and verse," issued in 1884; and there is Mr. Phelps's selection from the prose and verse, printed in 1895. Otherwise, not much special attention has been paid to the letters, though Mr. Tovey himself issued, nine years ago, a volume called Thomas Gray and His Friends: Letters and Lyrics. He has made a study of Gray; note his edition of English Poems by Gray, and his edition of the "Ode on the Spring" and "The Bard," both published by the Cambridge University Press last year.

That Busch's Bismarck is to be issued in a condensed, one-volume form is good news indeed. I hope the idea involved therein will spread. The notion of "condensed classics" is by no means new; but the "cutting down" of works comparatively young in years is somewhat of a novelty, and assuredly it is a process much to be commended. Big books we shall always have, because the great B.P. admires what is big; but we all know that there never yet was a very large publication which would not be benefited by compression. Travellers are especially prone to the long-winded, and yet, in general, all that they have fresh to say could be put into a comparatively small space.

I have read somewhere of a proposed volume of stories of life and character in Japan, which was to have been called The Custom of the Country had that title not been used recently in the case of a full-blown novel. It is always well to avoid any clashing of that sort; but there could be, of course, no question of copyright in the title, seeing that The Custom of the Country is the name of a play by Beaumont and Fletcher, printed about 250 years ago.

THE BOOKWORM

Reviews.

Spinoza.

Spinoza: His Life and Philosophy. By Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart. Second Edition. (Duckworth & Co. 8s. net.)

Ethic Demonstrated in Geometrical Order. Translated from the Latin of Benedict De Spinoza by W. Hale White; translation revised by Amelia Hutchison Stirling, M.A. (Edin.). Third Edition, revised and corrected. (Duckworth & Co. 7s. 6d.)

THE appearance in new revised editions of Sir Frederick Pollock's learned and lucid exposition of Spinoza's doctrine, and of Mr. Hale White's trustworthy translation of the Ethic, furnishes a suitable opportunity for a short, independent estimate of the philosopher and his work.

The seventeenth century, like all our back-worlds, bears the taint of monstrosity. If it be true that the world has not even now been able to get rid of "a certain smell of blood and torture," how bewilderingly offensive must the odours of that back-world have been. Yet in it lived a philosopher, the sanest and serenest that mankind has, perhaps, ever seen. Spinoza was born in 1632, born to write his treatise on "The Citizen and the State" (Tractatus Theologico-Politicus), his fragment on "The Emendation of the Understanding," his calm exposition of Ethic.

SPINOZA.

From the Original Portrait at Wolfenbüttel.

In England, a year afterwards, Prynne, the author of Histriomastix, a work directed against various public amusements, was condemned by the Star Chamber "to stand in the pillory at Westminster and Cheapside and to have one of his ears cut off at each place, to pay a fine of £5,000 to the King, and to be imprisoned for life." The civilised world was not rich in oases, and there was much to envy in the Polar calms. It was not for Spinoza to escape contact with the rough edge of the contemporary mob regnant; but, like his predecessor Descartes, he was singularly fortunate in remaining a spectator, and suffering mainly through sympathy with others, and the knowledge of the evil intention of his impotent enemies.

Holland, despite her enemies, was, indeed, a veritable oasis in Europe. The Dutch "were the first to assert that human institutions and human allegiance to governments are to be interpreted and maintained by their manifest utility"; that "men and women are not the private estate of princes." But even from a castle's loophole to look out upon the legalised horror of the world is unmanaging. We remember still, with the repugnance of elemental dread, our sensations when a Sunday-school boy confided to us the programme of a ceremonial of torture carried out by certain Indians. Nor are we able at this day to reflect that the process of Death by the Thousand Cuts is contemporary without an inward shuddering expostulation with the infinite variety that subsists in life. It is at this point that Philosophy steps in with the stern, but healing, word. It is not the philosophy which attributes to a lesson by suffering the power to "teach in song." It is the philosophy that has never deigned to bribe us even with songs, but has so saturated the mind with the consciousness of its parentage of reality that it has trained it to affirm and deny as it will. It seems so modern to say there is no more hell and no more heaven at one time than at another; it seems so redolent of the golden age to announce that good is as inevitable as evil. But to say that there is neither good nor evil is to have the genius of an anti-human phrase: to stand for a moment outside the world, passionless, yet throbbing with a boundless desire; a figure intimate with man, and remote from him as is the Hebrew God. It may fall within the scope of man's action to lie and betray under stress of fear, to carry through life a red sword against everything that threatens his being. Philosophy will not cast out the traitor and assassin: he is included in its benediction, that all may know there is no universal problem, no divine dissatisfaction, no last judgment, only tendency, kaleidoscopic changes, the infinite variety by which alone the infinite and inexhaustible thought of the universe can be expressed. "We do not know that anything is certainly good or evil, excepting that which actually conduces to understanding, or which can prevent us from understanding." Thus at one blow does Spinoza demolish the concept of good and evil as presented by State codes, the appreciation of comfort and discomfort, the law of meum and tuum, and the thirsty demand for reverence by the unknown God. Nietzsche, the reviler, was to run into the temple and goad a scandalised congregation into turning him out. Spinoza, centuries before, was decorously sawing away at the pillars as though he were a carpenter called in for repairs.

How did it begin? you ask. While the agnostic Francis van den Ende was teaching him? When the assassin tried to stab him? Not, we think, till they excommunicated him with words horrible and flatulent: "Cursed be he by day and cursed be he by night"; not till the vain prophecy went forth that the Lord should "destroy his name under the sun, and cut him off . . . from all the tribes of Israel, with all the curses of the firmament which are written in the book of the law."

It is easy to break with that which breaks from us, and under the baptism of these curses Spinoza was born again.

He could not be crucified. As an alternative one can imagine how his anathematisers would have rejoiced if he had become a drunkard, that undignified contributor to literature known as a "by-word." But no. Colerus* tells us of him during his life at the Hague that it is scarce credible how sober and frugal he was all the time. . . . It appears . . . that he lived a whole day upon a Milk-soop done with Butter, which amounted to threepence, and upon a Pot of Beer of three halfpence. Another day he eat nothing but Gruel done with Raisins and Butter, and that Dish cost him fourpence halfpenny.

* His Life of Spinoza is reprinted from the English translation of 1706 at the end of Sir F. Pollock's volume.

He even rather unphilosophically objected to dining at other people's expense, and after declining a bequest from Simon de Vries, would only avail himself of the heir's obligation by the will to confer an annuity on Spinoza to the extent of accepting one of 300 florins in lieu of 500 florins per annum offered him. His sisters endeavoured to disinherit him, but after having vindicated his rights in the law courts he gave up to them "everything but one bed."

When in 1672 the De Witts were murdered in Amsterdam by an Orange mob—Holland at that time struggling with England on the sea, and seeking to baffle the armies of Louis XIV. on land—the equanimity of Spinoza was shaken, "and he was hardly restrained from expressing his indignation in public at the risk of his life." After that excitement and an incident in which Spinoza, from an indiscreet visit to the headquarters of the French army, was in danger of being treated by his adopted countrymen as a traitor, his Jewish enemies had little to hope for from men in confirmation of their curses.

His calmness was extraordinary, and when death came, it came with a queer lack of officialism, allowing him to be up and about conversing with his landlord and his landlord's wife on the very Sunday (February 21, 1677) in the afternoon of which he died. He died of consumption, possibly accelerated by the inhalation of glass-powder.*

He left behind him a philosophy which, though preceded and in a sense originated by Cartesian study, shows very plainly a separate creativeness. Though, as Dr. Martineau truly says, "Spinozism is anti-theistic, and has no valid excuse for retaining the word God," in the conception of an infinite Monad Spinoza dignified the idea of a Supreme Being as much as Jewish theology degraded it. Spinoza's God is solitary, acts only from the necessity of His nature, is the free cause of all things, and loves Himself (i.e., the universe) with "an infinite intellectual love." Pain or sorrow "is man's passage from a greater to a less perfection."

Memory, that chain by which the sense of "feeling-I" is maintained, is wholly dependent on the existence of the body. But "in God, nevertheless, there necessarily exists an idea which expresses the essence of this or that human body under the form of eternity." It would seem, if we may expand the thought, that it is enough for the Omnipotent to remember the past for the past to live: in Him is our immortality. "Men are deceived because they think themselves free"; the concept of freewill is based on ignorance of the inevitableness of the causes which determine desire. For, as Kuno Fischer has pointed out, "if there is in truth but one substance"—Spinoza's fundamental concept—"things are merely modifications of it, therefore absolutely dependent in their nature." In his monism Spinoza lands his disciples in the region of paradox.

And here we touch the weakness of philosophy as distinct from science. The fault of all systems of philosophy has been that they would not let the universe speak for itself. Where the passionately recipient mind listens to a million voices they looked for one or two. Infinity of past and future, of space, of matter, of force, of form, elicited their dogmatism. They mistook a see-saw for the Archimedean plane. The world was no poorer when they were refuted, no richer when it followed their Pied Piper melody. But at least some of the rats went too—the Hamelin pest of low thinking and mean judging; for superstition is doomed whatever tune that piper play.

* Those who wish to obtain a vivid impression of Spinoza as a man cannot do better than read Mr. I. Zangwill's "A Maker of Lenses," printed in Dreamers of the Ghetto. Its only fault lies in the accentuation of the unauthenticated love-passage between Spinoza and Van den Ende's clever daughter.

But why should philosophy steal from religion the essentially unprovable concept of a Supreme Being? Kant, before whose merciless logic Descartes goes under, remarks: "The concept of a Supreme Being is in many respects a very useful idea; but, being an idea only, it is quite incapable of increasing by itself alone our knowledge with regard to what exists."

It seems, however, that is not enough to show that we cross a bridge between darkness and darkness. It is not enough to show the flames that quarrel for our recognition to be but will o' the wisps, to show that the calm love of the unfading and ever-changing skies and the reflections of their glory upon earth is better than a love reposed in that which palls when fully known, which wearies with hands that cling when the lips' sweetness has been drained. It is not enough to show that here and now is the ban of the perfect joy, the idea which, unshadowed by regret, is immortalised by the soul of its own will. It is not enough, though one would think it ought to be. But just as in novels the catastrophe, the element of things deliberately trying to prove their reality by gesticulation, is manufactured, so the philosopher has ever striven on his Patmos to invent the hidden truth and to believe in it. Even Nietzsche blazes upon us, with a paraffin glare, his doctrine of eternal recurrence, his concept of beyond-man. Even Spinoza reduces the universe to a Monad—passionless, perfect, eternal. Although he has explained the passions of man with unsurpassable acuteness, philosophically speaking, he is out of the fray—the contest is between Christianity and Science. The endless vista of possible discoveries within the reach of the observer of things visible points the way to an apprehension of eternity under every symbol, even under that of man himself. To save us from the taint of shame, of humility, from that self-consciousness which enfeebles life, science is invaluable. Christianity offers the Cross, austere denying Spinoza's definition of pain, yet conferring a loveliness on the sympathy which Spinoza disdains. The prestige lies with Christianity, but as the history of Christianity grows more recondite the strength of Science will accumulate. The future is with Science. Spinozism is, then, merely a bridge, a standpoint; but it is true, none the less, that the life and work of Spinoza exercise a great influence on the man who becomes familiar with them. Such a one's gleanings from his study may be condensed into a page or a chapter, but he will find himself breathing a purer air, he will think of goodness as joy. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

A Schism in the Celtic Movement.

Literary Ideals in Ireland. By John Eglinton, W. B. Yeats, A. E., and W. Larminie. (Fisher Unwin. 1s.)

WE have long heard of the Irish Literary Movement—a principal branch of the great Celtic Movement, or even the centre of it. It was vaguely supposed by the outsider that it had common aims and ideals. But now two principal writers of the Movement have come wholly to loggerheads as to what should be its aims, in the columns of the Dublin Daily Express; and their controversy, assisted by two subordinate writers (one of whom is content with the modest initials of "A. E."), is republished, plain for all folk to see, by Mr. Fisher Unwin. But the two protagonists are Mr. John Eglinton and Mr. W. B. Yeats. It is a very pretty controversy, and starts from the proper line to be taken by a (wholly conjectural) future Irish drama. It opens with mutual compliment and a considerable fundamental agreement, hidden from the disputants under a cloud of words. (For do not most disputants wrangle as to black or white, when in truth they both mean grey?) Finally they both become heated, fly asunder into irreconcilable difference; and, their blood being up, spare neither ink, nor each other, nor established reputations. Both speak blasphemies against the gods of literature. Probably not much harm is done, and Olympus may sit safe, in spite of the splinters which fly from this quarrel of the Irish Titans. Coleridge and Rossetti will persistently be Coleridge and Rossetti, though they please not Mr. John Eglinton; Shakespeare and Wordsworth, nay Dante, will not be materially, at least, affected, though Mr. Yeats condoles with them on their subjection to narrowing conditions. Wordsworth, indeed, moves our commiseration, since he suffers incidentally from both champion Eglinton and assailant Yeats. He reminds us of Mr. Pickwick in the immortal combat between the two Eatanswill editors, upon whose intervening person fell the blows destined for each other. It is a very pretty controversy.

Yet at bottom, into what does it resolve itself? Nothing else than the old, old quarrel between Realists and Idealists. To think that an Irish Literary Movement, at its very outset, should come to blows upon this familiar dispute! For this it is, disguise it under what new-fangled names they will. Nor is anything more natural. These are the two tendencies which divide all art, and all life. And it is true, as Mr. Yeats says, that the struggle between them is now acute and observable throughout Europe, though he cloaks it under the names of externality and symbolism. Title it how you will, it is just old Real and Ideal writ large. True, also, that idealism, under the name of symbolism, has prevailed in France, and (happily under no narrow label) is beginning to prevail in England. But there our agreement with Mr. Yeats ends. In truth, we can agree with neither combatant.

Both are extremists. Never had idealism (to give it the old name) a more extreme and narrow defender than Mr. Yeats. He concedes Wordsworth to his adversary as a realist; while that adversary actually describes Wordsworth as a man "certainly without great poetic talent or artistic faculty"! We ironically commiserated Wordsworth. We seriously commiserate the Irish Movement. If it had one poet with the genius ("talent," good heavens!) of Wordsworth, it might make itself a national power. But Wordsworth a mere realist! This is the penalty he pays for his famous theory, laughed at by his warmest sympathisers, notoriously defied in his own finest practice! Few poets are more symbolic than Wordsworth; everywhere he finds in Nature the shadow and image of things beyond Nature:

'Tis my faith that there are powers
Which of themselves our minds impress;
That we may feed this mind of ours
In a wise idleness.

That might satisfy even Mr. Yeats. And when he is older and wiser he will find this great poet brimful of the subtlest "intimations of immortality." The fact is, that Wordsworth, even now, is truly understood by very few. Several years ago one poet, now dead, said to another, still living, but old: "It will be a hundred years before Wordsworth is really understood."

It was with regard to the subtler meanings of the great poet that the words were uttered; but the conjoined utterances of these two Irish disputants, both men of undoubted ability, one a poet of very genuine, if lesser, gift, show that they are partly true in a grosser sense.

Think, too, of Mr. John Eglinton, who classes among "the poets of art and artifice"—whom does the reader think? Even Coleridge, most authentically inspired and direct of modern poets, in whose best work the word is so vitally close to and one with the thing that not even Wordsworth has equalled it for so sustained a length; and all, to any poet, obviously the birth of the immediate dictating spirit! But let us track no further these headlong errors of criticism, which should never have been perpetuated. What is the contention of Mr. Eglinton? That the incarnate poetry of the present day is "the steam-engine and the dynamo, . . . the cinematograph, phonograph," &c. There you have it in one word, the vital heresy of the present day, except by denial and direct defiance, of which no lofty poetry is possible. (We do not say absolutely no poetry.) Show a blockhead in England (as will one day be done) the face of another blockhead in India, and you shall be cried up for great, your pockets bulged with gold. Show him the face of the living God, and he will not pay five shillings to look at it. That is the attitude which Mr. Eglinton would have literature take. Mr. Yeats is at the very opposite swing of the pendulum. Idealism is not enough for him: poetry must be nothing less than mystic. It is to be suggestive—nay, super-suggestive, so that Mr. Yeats himself can only describe it in metaphors borrowed from French poets, the very meaning of which is doubtful and matter for discussion to him. Dante is tainted with a too material system of diction; Shakespeare "shattered the symmetry of verse and of drama that he might fill them with things and their accidental relations." Why, this is a more excellent song than the other! as Cassio says. Here is an extremist with a vengeance. And the models of this new Irish national poetry are to be Villiers de l'Isle Adam and Mallarmé—Frenchmen!

Between these two fierce extremes there is a medium. The Muse is not so narrow as partisans would have her. There is room in a nation's poetry for very diverse singers. The poetry which is occupied with daily life and the poetry of transcendental things need not exterminate each other; there is room for both; there are readers for both; both have their legitimate place. To fetter the entire poetry of an Irish people down to mysticism, France, and Mallarmé, is suicidal, but happily impossible. Does Mr. Yeats think, because he is mystical, there shall be no more cakes and ale? Yes, by St. Anne, and ginger shall be hot i' the mouth! A whole tribe of young men rushing with one accord to be "mystical poets" is a dismal forecast. It means bad poetry and bad mysticism. One in a hundred poets has such a vocation, and a man must labour in his vocation, Hal! Most poetry should treat divine truths indirectly, through its handling of life. The law which is behind life comes out in the poet's attitude towards life. It is the way of the dramatist, of Shakespeare, who knew better what he was about than to make his plays "mystical," as Mr. Yeats would have had him do. Mystical drama, like Maeterlinck's, is only for the closet. And it was from the subject of the future Irish drama that this controversy began.

It has, in truth, its melancholy, half-humorous side. Other writers step forth to staunch this literary feud, which, says one, "is bewildering to a country which has hesitated so long before adopting a literary ideal." Alas, yes! Our Celtic Movement, with fervent pushing and hauling, was got verily to move. Our Irish literature was really about to be made; and now, behold! a large rift within the Celtic lute which emits flat discord for tuneful music; and it appears we have not got our "literary ideal?" The movement threatens to cleave along the old lines of Real and Ideal, pushed to modern extremes, with modern names and terminology. One section wishes to use the old Irish legends in the interests of a mystical and symbolic poetry, founded on quite modern Parisian modes. The other, kicking against mysticism and Mallarmé, would go directly to the life of the people, and calls (seemingly) for an Irish Wordsworth. Well and good—if they can get him. Provided it be a true Wordsworth, not an unspiritualised Wordsworth, or perchance an Irish Whitman—for let our Celtic movement be literary. And what harm if the movement do thus divide? Is there not room for both? Would it not even be stronger for comprising both?

But a much more serious consideration is the fact that there should be all this palaver and discussion. A knot of men getting together solemnly to constitute a movement and commence a National Literature by writing as the French Convention tried to make a National Constitution by oration and on paper. Not so has any great movement arisen in English literature; not so was Elizabethan literature made. The one movement in that age which was thus conscious of itself was the classical movement for reconstituting our metres on classical models. It had a Spenser and a Sidney in its ranks; it pamphleteered and was counter-pamphleteered, and it failed utterly. The truly national movement was too great and manifold to be self-conscious; it did not stew theories and write about itself; but each man looked in his heart and wrote literature, influenced by his time without stopping to consider how, and individual without taking thought to himself how he should be individual. It triumphed, drew to itself repentant Spenser and repentant Sidney, for final result producing a Shakespeare, who never wrote a pamphlet. "Which of you by taking thought can add to his stature one cubit?" or produce a lily of the field or a national literature? Wordsworth indeed theorised—too much, and spoiled some of his poetry by it. But ultimately the poetry swallowed the theories, and grew fat on its meal, to the satisfaction of Wordsworth's own friends and disciples. A little less theory, may we recommend our Irish friends, a little more literature—literature which does not pause to consider the anatomy and physics of its flight before unfurling its wings? For they have able writers, who have done no little, or we should not deem it necessary to advise them.

About it, goddess, and about it,

Those Discreet Romancists!

An Idler in Old France. By Tighe Hopkins. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THIS book is an inquiry. It is vain, says Mr. Hopkins, to seek in fiction for any faithful picture of a mediæval city. And so, with old Paris in his mind, Mr. Hopkins has explored rare memoirs, unpublished reports, and the writings of the few who, like Brantôme, have told all. Mr. Hopkins now admires the discretion of the romancists. Particularly does he call our attention to the adroitness with which Victor Hugo evades, in his Notre Dame de Paris, the difficulty of describing in detail the Paris of the fifteenth century. "A tour through the streets of Paris when Louis XI. was king, Victor Hugo showing the way, would have been a great experience; but it would also have been, in very many respects, an extremely shocking one. What does Hugo do? He says nothing as to the state of the streets, but discreetly hinting that there is a fine view to be had from the towers of Notre Dame, he carries the reader forthwith to that chaste altitude." It has occurred to Mr. Hopkins that (since nothing can dethrone romance) it may be instructive to look into the state of those streets. Similarly, the toilet and the table manners of romance have been viewed from notoriously safe altitudes. Why not now, in a quiet way, probe for the truth? You perceive the task which Mr. Hopkins sets himself. He performs it as thoroughly as he dare, and as delicately as he may; and the result is a book of curious interest. Perhaps some of its statements are a little too haunting; but—well, you cannot touch new pitch or old Paris without being smirched.

The insanitary horrors of Paris in the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries are briefly touched on by Mr. Hopkins. This was the old Gothic Paris that shows so fine on canvas and is rapturously admired by Hugo from the heights. Those beautiful sky-lines were but surges on a sea of corruption. Let Mr. Hopkins's pages acquaint you with the everyday scenes of those narrow, stifling streets. We quote him gingerly: "The heaps and hillocks of rotting matter and other abominations, the gaping holes which received contributions of the same description, the pools of filthy water, and the reeking sewer as hideous to the sight as to the smell, made each frequented thoroughfare a separate centre of infection. The very names of the streets, cynical avowals of what the streets themselves were like, are the grossest reading." In these centuries not even palaces and monasteries, not even hospitals, possessed the most elementary sanitary appliances. The plague rose and subsided, and rose again, like a worm that would not be stamped to death. It makes an astonishing picture, this co-existence of churches and disease, of fine fabrics and filth, of outward splendour and universal lice.

A certain piquancy accentuates the spectacle when we come to the gorgeous seventeenth century. Here we are in the familiar age of Dumas' painting, among the gayest of courtiers, the most delicate and courtly of poets, the most elegant and scented of ladies—all the sparkling crowd of Molière. Fine company at a distance, but Mr. Hopkins is compelled to tell us that all these people were dirty. They washed occasionally if they followed their manuals. In the Laws of Gallantry, a code of manners published in 1640, the gallant is recommended "sometimes to pay a visit to the bath, to have his body clean" and "take the trouble to wash his hands every day." But these were clearly counsels of perfection. In the age of Louis Quatorze, that long delirium of elegance, fine ladies and gentlemen washed now and then. Another manual deprecates the use of water on the face, but recommends rubbing with a fine towel. The hair was powdered and re-powdered until its condition "went beyond description." And what of the houses and palaces through which this elect world sauntered with bowing and dalliance and studied deportment? They too went beyond description. The courts and staircases and corridors of the Louvre itself "presented a hideous spectacle," and Mr. Hopkins has unearthed a report presented to Louis XIV. upon the condition of this palace "which, if it could be imagined as written at this day of Buckingham Palace or Windsor, would keep the newspaper press in head-lines for a month."

And what of the Dumasian streets?—those streets through which D'Artagnan and Aramis hurried to and fro on M. de Tréville's errands or their own? We take down the Three Musketeers, which, you remember, opens in 1625, and we cannot forbear arranging a little contrast. Here it is without more words:

The Three Musketeers.

His visit to M. de Tréville being paid, D'Artagnan took his pensive but longest way homewards.

On what was D'Artagnan thinking that he strayed thus from his path, gazing at the stars in the heavens, and sometimes sighing, sometimes smiling. He was thinking of Madame Bonacieux. . . . D'Artagnan, reflecting on his future loves, addressing himself to the beautiful night, and smiling at the stars, re-ascended the Rue Cherche-Midi, or Chasse Midi, as it was then called. . . .

Paris for two hours had been dark, and began to be deserted. Eleven o'clock struck by all the clocks of the Faubourg Saint-Germain; it was delightful weather: D'Artagnan was . . . respiring the balmy emanations which were borne upon the wind from the Rue Vangeraid, and which arose from the gardens refreshed by the dews of evening and the breeze of night.

An Idler in Old France.

In this seventeenth century . . . with its four and twenty sewers, its gutters, . . . its river polluted through and through, its butchers' shops, of which front and back were alike strewn and heaped with offal, and its quite unmentionable trenches for the public convenience, the chief town of France was in this well-graced era the most pestiferous and, in its daily aspects, the most unsightly in Europe.

La Reynie did not despair of ridding the town of mud, but he failed to cure the Paris chamber-maid of her inveterate habit of sousing pedestrians with the contents of her pail. . . . "Gare l'eau!—Ware Water," was the cry, and up went the window-sash. . . . If you were passing at the moment, your only chance was to spring to the wall, pin your back against it, and wait. . . . How many gallants of Paris, setting out in their bravest to visit or to serenade a mistress, went home again unsatisfied and soaked

One would shut Mr. Hopkins's book crying "Enough!" but Mr. Hopkins's matter is too seductively curious, and his style far too winning, for that. He will have us meet the lords and ladies of romance at table. Much can be known about the royal tables of France, because it was an old custom for the monarchs of France to dine in public. Not courtiers only, but "anybody decently dressed," might go and see Majesty gorge or mince its food. Marie Antoinette, who detested this eating under the eyes of the crowd, as if she were a penny show, had to submit to it; and Mr. Hopkins quotes Casanova's curious details of the scene. Courtiers stood around the Queen in a semi-circle in dead silence while the Queen ate. At last she would turn and say:

"M. de Lowenthal!"

A very grand-looking man stepped from the circle, bowed, and said:

"Madame?"

"I believe, monsieur," said her Majesty, "that this is a fricassée of chicken."

"I believe so, your Majesty."

This response uttered, in the gravest tone imaginable, M. de Lowenthal stepped backwards into the circle, and the Queen finished her dinner without another word.

Not so did Louis XV. take his food. He liked the admiration of the Parisians, who craned to see him skillfully decapitate an egg. As for Louis XIV., his gluttony was one of the shows of Paris. Saint Simon tells us that "no one who watched him could ever grow accustomed to the sight." At one meal he would eat "four platefuls of different soups, a whole pheasant, a partridge, a great plate of salade, two great slices of ham, a plate of mutton seasoned with garlic, pastry, and after that fruit and hard-boiled eggs." The sequence of these dishes is nearly as wonderful as their number; but the order in which courses were served was not in those days dictated by anything more authoritative than the whim of the cook, who "might conceive the notion of sending the soup up after the roast, or he might try the effect upon the company of serving the tart before the game."

After all, romance has usually taken kings as they were; it is when we pry into the general dining habits of the beau monde, and the table habits of marquises that we experience a shock, and find our reminiscences of the costume novel deranged. Mr. Hopkins writes:

Could we restore for half an hour the dinner-table of old France, and obtain half a dozen instantaneous photographs of a royal banquet at any era between the reigns of Francis I. and Louis Quatorze, such a "cataract of laughter" would be heard as might disturb the serenity of Louis in Paradise. The duchess, her napkin tied securely round her neck, would be seen mumbling a bone; the noble marquis surreptitiously scratching himself; the belle marquise withdrawing her spoon from her lips to help a neighbour to sauce with it; another fair creature scouring her plate with her bread; a gallant courtier using his doublet or the table-cloth as a towel for his fingers; and two footmen holding a yard damask under a lady's chin while she emptied her goblet at a draught. . . . During a feast of inordinate length it was sometimes necessary to substitute a clean cloth for the one which the carelessness or bad manners of the guests had reduced to a deplorable condition.

It was only after Louis Quatorze's long gluttony was over that eating became civilised, and that the Paris cuisine shaped and attenuated itself to an art. Early in the eighteenth century Mme. Geoffrin could ask her friends to "a pullet, some spinach, and an omelette." The "feast of reason" had arrived, but with his alert and playful eye for remote connexions, Mr. Hopkins remarks that these new manners "encouraged talk on high and daring topics, speculation was not frowned on, minds began to be enfranchised at the table; hence (such an irony is there in things) we may trace even to the petits soupers of the dissolute, amiable Regent one of the first causes of the Revolution!"

The discretion of the romancists extended to things that were not unpleasant, but merely trivial. Romance can make use of fashions, but only in a broad and casual way; it must not seem, even for an instant, to find pleasure in handling millinery. Its philosophy of clothes is generous, not intricate; not the romancists, but their imitators, are careful of buttons. The romancists clothe men and women decisively, keeping the whimwhams for a Malvolio or other confessed fop. When Dumas spreads a banquet we hear nothing of Matthias Giegher's twenty-seven ways of folding a napkin, and when he calls a levée we count fewer varieties of wig than the forty-five recognised and manufactured by Binet. So also when your hero must scribble a billet-doux, he scribbles it, careless of the current nicety in notepaper. Only in real life did Racine write three letters to his daughter to keep her informed of the fashion in this particular.

The new mourning-paper is already out of fashion, as it is now quite a month old. The other two specimens are so much the rage that it is no longer possible to buy them; the ladies have emptied the stationers' shops. Adieu, my dear child. My letters are not very long; they are only to show you the kinds of paper we are at present using.

Of course, in the end no assault on romance is made by a book like this. Romance is for ever there, reality here. To contrast them piquantly has always been accounted amusing, and it is often instructive. Here it is both; and if there were no such contrast to hover over Mr. Hopkins's pages, they would still be pleasant reading. For our author knows where to find curious material, and he can arrange it with art.

A Family Book.

Memories of Eton and Etonians. By Alfred Lubbock. (Murray. 9s.)

MR. LUBBOCK was at Eton from 1854 to 1863, and to enjoy his book thoroughly it is necessary either to know him personally or to have been at Eton at the same time. Possessing ourselves neither of these privileges, we must confess to finding his memories and reflections rather perplexing and elusive. New names and nicknames appear bewilderingly on the page only to vanish for ever, while anyone who has the key—that is to say, who was an 1854-1863 Etonian—the mere mention of these names is enough to start the mind on long travels into the past, just as pressure on the button of an electric bell fills the distant chambers of the house with sound; to others, like ourselves, they are not exciting. We feel as if we were turning over the leaves of a strange family album without a guide. Without this key much of Mr. Lubbock's volume, though good-humoured and gay, is not very engrossing. He had as a boy very much the same adventures and misadventures as most schoolboys: he was swished occasionally, he was once nearly drowned, he played cricket very well, he fought, and he made friends. Lacking literary power, he does not do more than record these matters; they are not re-created. But the anecdotes of the little eccentricities of masters and other personages help to atone for so much unimportant personal—almost private—chatter. There is, for instance, an account of Eton preachers of that day, and the story of the deaf Fellow who said, "When Green preaches I catch only one word, 'God': when Coleridge preaches I only hear 'Devil'"; Hawtrej, Durnford, and Joynes are pleasantly touched off; there is a glimpse of the Prince Imperial; and the late Robin Lubbock, Mr. Lubbock's son, is made the subject of a graceful little memoir by another hand.

THE ETON ELEVEN OF 1858.

To our own taste, the best pages of Mr. Lubbock's book are those which give, somewhat in the true manner, another and later glimpse of the Bruisers of England :

There was one event which caused a considerable amount of interest among the sporting fraternity of the school, and that was the fight between Tom Sayers and John C. Heenan, otherwise styled the Benicia Boy, for the championship of England's belt and £200 a side. . . . We all backed Tom Sayers, the Englishman, naturally. The fight was one of the most extraordinary on record, lasting two hours and six minutes, with thirty-seven rounds, the betting constantly veering round from 2 to 1 on Sayers to 6 to 4 on Heenan. As early as the sixth round, when stopping one of Heenan's tremendous left-handers, Sayers' right arm was broken, and for the remainder of the fight he had the use of only one sound arm. Picture to yourself fighting a practised boxer, a prize-fighter, eight years younger,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches taller, 3 stone 5 lbs. heavier (Sayers was thirty-four years old, 5 feet 8 $\frac{1}{2}$  inches, and weighed 10 stone 9 lbs.; Heenan was twenty-six years old, 6 feet 1 inch, and weighed just 1 lb. under 14 stone), in such a condition ! It seems simply marvellous that Sayers managed to hold his own all the time, and after the fight was apparently the fresher of the two. . . . There can be little doubt that, when Sayers found his arm was powerless, he decided that his only resource was to blind Heenan, which he did by going for his right eye first, and never leaving it till he had completely bunged it up, and then giving all his attention to the other; and he must have nearly succeeded in his intention, for almost immediately the fight was over Heenan went stone blind and collapsed altogether, having to be lifted into the railway carriage, and upon arriving in London he had to be put to bed. Sayers, with the exception of his broken arm, seemed quite fresh after a few minutes, and showed few signs of the fearful punishment he had gone through. . . . After this fight Sayers retired from the P.R., and ran a circus, which sometimes visited Windsor. It used to come through Eton from Slough, and Sayers used to be seen driving a pair in his phaeton, with a massive gold chain on, and smoking a big cigar, with an enormous mastiff by his side. After the performance was over, he used to have the gloves on with some well-known member of the P.R., and go through a little mild sparring, and would then hold a sort of levée, in which some of the Eton boys would go through the form of being presented and shaking hands with him.

That is a long way behind Borrow, but it imparts something of the same feeling as the famous passage in Lavengro. "Let no one sneer at the bruisers of England."

Mr. Lubbock's memories of cricket fill the latter part of his book; but it is club cricket rather than cricket of the first class, and this again appeals to the few initiated more than to the general reader. We reproduce a quaint picture of the Eton Eleven of 1858.

Useful, not Final.

Elements of Prose. By W. A. Brockington, M.A., Principal of Victoria Institute, Worcester; Lecturer on English Literature to the Cambridge University Extension; Assistant Examiner in English to the University of London; formerly Lecturer on English Language and Literature in the Mason University College. (Blackie & Son. 2s. 6d.)

To a student pursuing the difficult and little recognised craft of writing, it is always agreeable to come upon any public recognition that such a craft does really exist. It is distinctly comforting to find a person with the many scholastic distinctions of Mr. Brockington declaring boldly, in English, that "in order to write well it is, first of all, necessary to dispossess one's self of the idea that by an intercourse merely casual or desultory, even with literature of the best, one may come by the secret of the craft"; that "our native speech is not native to us as a literary language"; and that "the possession of clear ideas does not necessarily involve clearness of expression"—all statements diametrically opposed to the average English belief, which agrees so far with that of Dogberry as to hold that writing, if not reading, comes by nature. Excellent, too, is the observation that "colloquial words are often vulgar, and more often vague."

But when we advance from these generalities to points of definite precept there is room for a good deal of disagreement. In the chapter on "The Unity of the Sentence," for instance, Mr. Brockington harps upon a figure of speech in which the sentence is treated as a circle: "The second thought runs tangentially from the circumference, instead of radiating from the centre"; "the second proposition must radiate from the same central idea"; and so forth, the section concluding with: "Take care that the thoughts in all sentences be as radii from a given centre, and not as tangents from the circumference." This section, it must be remarked, is one professing to deal, not with logical or rhetorical, but with grammatical unity. That the figurative method employed is likely to be confusing may be judged from the fact that several sentences cited as instances exhibiting defects of unity prove, upon inspection, to be grammatically correct; the faults are in the meaning. Thus: "A child trained in a good home, and surrounded by healthy home influences, generally grows up to honourable manhood; while, on the other hand, a child brought up in an untidy home is untidy and unmethodical when he becomes a man." On this the author's comment is: "Here, again, the two propositions do not run from the same centre; it is quite preposterous to oppose 'honourable manhood' to 'untidiness.'" It is preposterous, but not grammatically preposterous. The defect in co-ordination is one solely of signification. A true example of incorrect grammatical sequence presents itself in the following sentence from a recent business letter: "Whilst in this particular case we should have liked to be charitable, we are not in a position to do so." Here, while the meaning is perfectly consecutive, the grammar is dislocated. In the example from "The Elements of Prose" the grammar was faultless, though not elegant; it was the significations which did not match.

It is only at the close of the section dealing with rhetorical unity that we at last escape from the idea of a centre, and reach some really valuable remarks about the proper closing of sentences. It is a pity that no explanation is given of why the word, phrase, or clause, hanging loose at the end, spoils a sentence. The reason, of course, is, that the reader, not guided, like a hearer, by inflexions of voice, follows the thought to an expected conclusion, and then, coming upon the qualifying tag, is put out of his course by having to go back.

With the chapter upon "Sentence Structure" we find Mr. Brockington in clearer waters, though exception may be taken to his statement that "change of order can give neither additional stress-value nor increased significance to . . . some simple adverbs—e.g., only, merely, even, not." Surely there is a difference in emphasis (which we take to be the equivalent of "stress-value") and in significance between "even he" and "he even," between "you that not do obey me" and "you that obey me not."

In speaking of the differentiation of use between "who" or "which," on the one hand, and "that," on the other, Mr. Brockington gives no hint that the rule is not universally accepted. Yet many grammarians of repute do not so much as mention such a rule; and Mason's Grammar says, with perfect justice: "The best writers of English prose do not countenance this view." Yet some difference there certainly is. We all know that in some sentences "that" will not do; perhaps the truth is, that "who" or "which" can be used in every case, but "that" only when (to use Abbott's clear definition) it "introduces something necessary to complete the meaning of the antecedent." The chapter upon the use of stops is admirable. The functions of the comma have never been set forth more lucidly, more completely, or on more general, and therefore comprehensible, principles. "Functions" we say deliberately, for the comma represents with its one sign at least two essentially different stops—the single comma, which bears a close relationship to the semi-colon; and the double comma, whose function approaches that of the parenthesis.

On the topic of the paragraph Mr. Brockington is useful and suggestive, but not final. A student would find it a valuable exercise to analyse paragraphs upon his system; and the intelligent student who did so (or, as Mr. Brockington would have us say, "that did so") would presently find himself diverging from his master's rules. But, after all, it is part of the use of rules that they furnish a basis for divergence.

Against one observation of Mr. Brockington's it is necessary loudly to protest. "There is nothing," he declares, "more pernicious to the style of the beginner in prose than a persistent striving after harmony." This is as if an art-master were to say: "There is nothing more pernicious to the style of the art-student than a persistent striving after fine colouring." The writing-student must learn precision, as the art-student must learn correctness; but unless he also strives, and persistently too, after harmony, he will never, were he as precise as Euclid himself, produce literature. It is hardly too much to say that harmony—tune, the recurrence and the varying of sound and interval—is the specific quality of literature. Without it we may, indeed, have useful prose, and it is of prose that Mr. Brockington professes to teach the elements. But he should not try to dissuade his disciples from following the better way, which alone goes up to the heights of literature.

Other New Books.

THE CHILDREN'S BOOK OF MORAL LESSONS.

BY F. J. GOULD.

When we say that these pages are reprinted from the Ethical World, their scope will perhaps be sufficiently explained. Mr. Gould's aim is to promote conduct without the assistance of dogma, and he brings a wealth of illustrative anecdote to enforce his lessons. These examples are gathered from all kinds of sources, including the Bible. The project is a very worthy one as it is carried out, for Mr. Gould does not condemn religious teaching, he merely ignores it. That is to say, the child is taught above all things self-reliance, taught that effort and success alike come from within. Parents who feel that their children may develop better if put upon their mettle than if counselled to resort to Providence in all difficulties will be glad to have the benefit of Mr. Gould's lucid and attractive homilies. His moral standard is sometimes disturbingly high:

This gentleman that you see hurrying along with a portmanteau has just come from abroad. In his portmanteau he has concealed a number of cigars upon which he ought to have paid the tax or "duty," and the tax should have gone into the treasury of the country. He did not say: "I have no articles liable to duty." The cigars escaped the eye of the Customs officer. This gentleman's luggage—but, but—is he indeed a gentleman?

Mr. Gould is, as a rule, very apposite and telling; but his little excursus on the name "Frank" does not quite come off: "It is a splendid name, and if there is a boy here who bears it, let him smile to think of his proud title. Frank means free. In olden times there was a nation of Franks, and these Free Men gave a name to France, the land of the free." (Watts. 2s. 6d.)

THE GENEALOGICAL MAGAZINE: VOLUME II.

The second volume of the Genealogical Magazine fully maintains the high level attained by the first: the editor seems to have solved the difficulty of combining the useful and the attractive.

It is natural that a publication of this character should be to some extent occupied with contributions relating to particular families which at first sight appear to appeal in each case only to a limited circle; but the ramifications of genealogy are such that the unexpected is always happening, and it is never safe for the student to neglect the pedigree of an apparently alien house, for it may at any stage reveal an unforeseen connection with his own. The bulk of the volume, however, is composed of articles on matters of obviously general concern, among the more striking of which we may call especial attention to the following:—"The Law on Changes of Name"; "The Genealogical Origin of the Philip Faulconbridge of Shakespeare's 'King John'"; "Notes on Pedigree-making, by an Officer of Arms"; and "Sir John" as a generic title for priests in the Middle Ages. With reference to the last-named paper, we may add that the designation "Sir" as applied to bachelors of arts survives not only in the formal De., or Dominus, of the Cambridge Tripos lists, but even in colloquial usage at an Oxford college. At Queen's a scout, when giving orders for his masters at the buttery-hatch, calls out "Mr. Smith," "Sir Smith," or "Smith," accordingly as the person in question is an M.A., a B.A., or an undergraduate.

The projected Dictionary of Heraldry, which is appearing by instalments in tentative shape, should, when completed, be a most valuable production, and one that will supply a long-felt want. At present there exists no satisfactory glossary of heraldic terms. Armorial definitions are invariably and proverbially slovenly in form: the reason apparently being that those who have possessed the necessary technical knowledge of the subject have not received that training in the niceties of language which confers the capacity of writing in accurate and scholarly English. Even so conspicuously able a man as Planché, whose Pursuivant of Arms is, perhaps, the best book on armory that has ever appeared, was not always equal to the feat of expressing himself grammatically in his mother-tongue; and the same criticism will apply to the other leading heraldic works down to the most recent, the late Dr. Woodward's otherwise excellent book on Heraldry, British and Foreign. If the Dictionary of Heraldry is carried out with a due regard to these two and distinct qualifications, the editor will have done a very real service to the study of the science. Genealogists will be grateful also for the happy thought of printing in the magazine the Calendar of the Duchy of Lancaster Inquisitiones post mortem. Altogether, we may repeat the congratulations with which we hailed the advent of the first volume a year ago. (Elliot Stock.)

TWELVE MONTHS IN KLONDIKE. BY ROBERT C. KIRK.

This is the best book about Klondike that has yet come in our way. Mr. Kirk brought back from the new

HALF A MILLION OF GOLD DUST READY FOR SHIPMENT.

Eldorado a great many intelligent observations and a number of capital photographs. We reproduce one of the latter, in which we see gold-dust packed ready for transport in buckskin sacks. Mr. Kirk describes his journey to Klondike in the early stages of the "boom." The point of arrival, Skagway, had been a town only sixteen days when Mr. Kirk saw it from the deck of the steamer. Goods and equipments were dumped on the shore, and the confusion and anxiety to be moving were extreme. When, four days later, Mr. Kirk returned from a reconnoitre of the Skagway Pass, he could hardly recognise Skagway. "I searched for an hour for a certain blacksmith's tent where I had left some mule shoes, and finally found that the 'street' in which it stood, instead of being the main street as it was when I had been there before, was out in the 'suburbs,' the town having grown more rapidly in another section." Twelve months later Skagway had miles of streets, hotels, banks, wharves, and a water system.

We might quote many interesting passages from Mr. Kirk's lively account of Dawson City, which now boasts about 25,000 inhabitants. Particularly interesting are his accounts of stampedes to new creeks:

When Swede Creek, a small tributary of the Yukon, which joins it a short way above Dawson, was stampeded, there was an immense amount of suffering, because mistakes were made in estimating the distance and the time that was necessary in making the trip. In many instances men were forced to spend the nights in the woods without robes or blankets, and others, rather than try to get rest under such difficulties, travelled day and night for several days without stopping and practically without food. No less than four deaths resulted from this one stampede, and many others had long spells of sickness as a direct consequence of the exposure. Stampedes were of common occurrence. Often the news of a discovery on a new creek would be circulated about the saloon and dance-halls after the hour of midnight, and half an hour later men would be seen hurrying through the streets in the direction of the new strike with their blankets strapped to their backs, and provisions to last during the journey.

The name Klondike, by the way, is a corruption of the Indian name "Thron-Duik," meaning "River of Fish." "Thron-Duik" is still written in official documents. (Heinemann. 6s.)

Fiction.

'Postle Farm. By George Ford.
(Blackwood & Sons. 6s.)

It would seem that George Ford is a woman. She (if it be so) has written a book which has deeply disappointed us. The opening of the story (save the absurd prologue—this disease of incomprehensible prologues seems to be spreading) is a beautiful piece of rural fiction. These first chapters of life on a Devonshire farm disclose poetical vision, sense of humour, grasp of peasant character, and real strength of imagination. The child "crazy Cathie" is an exquisite creation, a genius who shows her genius. "Grandfer" is an old man really old. The brutal Uriah, and his slave Annie, and the baby, have authentic life. Each is individual, distinct, unmistakable—not a type, but a separate person, complete, rounded with every personal idiosyncrasy. The simple common scenes are made memorable by pathos or humour; let us note specially the drowning of the baby and the composing of the rhymed epitaph for the baby's tomb; not often are humour and grief knit so close as here. The child Cathie shines in a score of pictures:

Presently, with the incoming tide came a drifting mist. It crept up the valley till it reached the child; and she held up her little face to it, and it lay in a myriad beads upon her cheeks and in tears upon her eyes. It and the wind together caught her soft hair and curved it into tendrils that clung about her brow. She looked like a spirit of the driving mist as she opened her clear-cut lips like a scarlet goblet and showed her ivory teeth and laughed, as she shut her eyes to keep the rain out. But when she opened her eyes, they were such beautiful human eyes that she did not look like a spirit at all, but a happy child.

The shadows of evening fell upon the lonely hillside, and Cathie turned slowly homewards. The rain beat so fast now that she walked quickly. Half-way up the hill she paused, and, tossing the wet hair from her eyes, looked down on the brimming river. As she looked, her eyes dilated; she bent forward with a little cry. So wide open and fixed was her gaze, that a night-owl skimming by her did not cause it to flicker for an instant. She stood transfixed, as one seeing much, but terrified to see more.

All this fine achievement ends abruptly on page 64. (There are 359 pages in the book.) Thenceforward we are plunged into a twopenny mystery of a wicked lord, a conniving butler, a child changed at birth, and the love of an aristocrat for a daughter of the soil. In fact, the usual ingredients, if we mistake not, of a Family Herald excitement! The imagination falls to pieces, conviction disappears; the treatment is loose and sketchy; the superfluous abounds, while one is constantly irritated by the stale trick of omitting important passages; the writing is by turns feeble and hysterical; the characterisation is unsure and flaccid; the philosophy merely pretentious. Indeed, we have seldom encountered a book at once so amazingly good and so amazingly bad as Postle Farm. We have the highest opinion of the author's gift. But she appears to be quite in the dark about the principles which underlie the technique of fiction. If she is fully to utilise her talents she must study her art. Things like Lewes's Principles of Success in Literature, De Maupassant's Essay on Gustave Flaubert, Tolstoi's Essay on De Maupassant, and the Journal of the De Goncourts, exist in vain if they are not to be a source of profit to writers like George Ford.

Orientalisms. By W. Somerset Maugham.
(T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

MR. MAUGHAM begins to be interesting. This book is much better than either the shrill and hysterical Lisa of Lambeth or the rather mediocre Making of a Saint. It consists of a group of short stories, and from a preliminary quotation in the French tongue we gather that these stories are the result of the author's efforts to find his "moi littéraire." They do not, however, differ from each other as widely as Mr. Maugham would seem to imply. There are narratives of modern life, mediæval narratives, and narratives of Arabian fantasy; but though the subjects vary so widely, the treatment is practically identical throughout. We like that treatment, particularly of modern subjects; we think it discloses Mr. Maugham's veritable moi littéraire—a moi trenchant, sincere, candid, humorous, witty, and flippant (the flippancy is happily less than it used to be; one could entirely spare it). We imagine that Mr. Maugham has formed his technique upon that of De Maupassant; if so, he has gone to a good master. The best work in the book is strongly reminiscent of the author of L'Inutile Beauté, though it has a less severe and grave style and distinctly more humour. "A Bad Example," being the record of an absolutely common city clerk who, through sitting on a coroner's jury, was converted to the most advanced form of altruism, is an admirable piece of writing, full of concise observation, freshness of view, and authentic humour. The concern of the wife for her husband's sanity when the convert insists on reading the Bible instead of the Daily Telegraph is very funny, and very pathetic too; and the subsequent examination of the patient by a specialist in lunacy is perhaps even better:

"I mean, do you see things that other people don't see?"

"Alas! yes; I see Folly stalking abroad on a 'obby 'orse."

"Do you really? Anything else?" said the doctor, making a note of the fact.

"I see Wickedness and Vice beating the land with their wings."

"Sees things beating with their wings," wrote down the doctor.

"I see misery and un'appiness everywhere."

"Indeed!" said the doctor, "Has delusions. Do you think your wife puts things in your tea?"

"Yes."

"Ah!" joyfully uttered the doctor, "that's what I wanted to get at—thinks people are trying to poison him. What is it they put in, my man?"

"Milk and sugar," answered Mr. Clinton.

"Very dull mentally," said the specialist.

There is nothing else equal to "A Bad Example." The more fantastic tales lack point, or such point as they have is unoriginal; they also suffer severely from a flippancy which can only be called inane. "De Amicitia" has a certain vigour of presentation, and some wit, but it is a little late in the day to relate how a man and a woman tried to be platonic friends and then fell in love. Mr. Maugham, to our thinking, is a man who will survive many defects. He has an abundance of vitality, which is perhaps the scarcest thing in modern literature.

Stuff o' the Conscience. By Lily Thicknesse.
(Harper & Brothers. 6s.)

IN this badly-named but arresting book Miss Thicknesse shows the defects of an artist whose conceptions are beyond her technique. Like many other novelists, she has not taken the trouble to learn her craft, the mere craft of the writer. She is not at home with words. Her pen moves uneasy amid relative clauses and subordinate sentences; she is scarcely decided between systems of punctuation. Further, her literary taste is unformed. She sometimes searches conscientiously after style—after freshness, originality, sincerity of utterance; and yet she is capable of writing: "Cimmerian darkness reigned in the auditorium"; with her the congregation "streams" out, "toil" is "uncongenial," silence hangs "like a pall," ideas "dawn upon" people, and, in fact, all the usual literary things happen.

This is a pity, for in Stuff o' the Conscience Miss Thicknesse has done a remarkable feat. She has not only told us that her hero is great (as so many novelists are content to do)—she has actually made him great. No one can follow the career of Roland Withington, who from a member of an insignificant touring company rose to be the most applauded actor in London, without being impressed by the individual charm, strength, and genius of the man. He acts, thinks, talks like a person of real distinction. He is a creation, authentic and convincing. Even at the end, when Withington, mysteriously following an ideal which baffles us, abandons London and fame for the spiritual comradeship of a strange monarch of Eastern Europe—even then, when his action amazes and astounds, we believe in him.

There is much in the book that is mediocre, and much that too yearningly yearns (if the phrase be permitted); but the character of Roland Withington stands for an achievement. Artistically, and in all other ways, he is head and shoulders above the other persons of the piece. Linda, his wife, is so different as a woman from what she was as a girl that we cannot grasp her. Benita Norton, the true heroine, the married woman whom Withington should have married, is deeply imagined. She may be hysterical and incoherent; she may rave about Withington in a manner that was doubtless suggested to her by Ouida's remarks on Shelley; but she lives, she cannot be gainsaid.

A consideration of the merits of Stuff o' the Conscience makes its defects seem inexcusable. They are, indeed, inexcusable, and since they may be quickly cured, we shall expect not to find them in Miss Thicknesse's next book. Would it not be shameful that a writer endowed with the rare gift of a large imagination should, through indifference, omit to acquire that skill of the craft which may be the possession of all?

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE MARKET PLACE.

BY HAROLD FREDERIC.

This is the last work we shall see by the author of Gloria Mundi and Illumination. Its power and interest are additional cause of regret that Mr. Frederic's life terminated so suddenly. In The Market Place we have a financial novel, embodying in Joel Thorpe a type of the modern successful speculator, a masterful man of great will power and insensibility to other people's feelings. (Heinemann. 6s.)

FROM THE BROAD ACRES.

BY J. S. FLETCHER.

One of twenty stories by the author of The Paths of the Prudent, illustrating rural life in Yorkshire. Mr. Fletcher has searched Yorkshire as Miss Wilkins searches New England, for quaint incidents—sometimes humorous, sometimes pathetic. (Grant Richards. 2s. 6d.)

THADY HALLORAN.

BY J. WILLIAM BRESLIN.

A stirring story, opening in 1714. Thady's adventures in France, where he devotes himself to the service of the Jacobite pretender, are bright, brave reading. On page 212 he is fighting seven Germans single-handed with his sword, counting them off as he slays them, and crooning to himself a catch "from some old song, first heard long years ago among the green shades of his own far-distant country." "D'Arey, my boy, 'twas the glory of a fight," were not Thady's last words. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE CHRONICLES OF TEDDY'S VILLAGE.

BY MRS. MURRAY HICKSON.

Twelve pleasant sketches by the author of Concerning Teddy. They are pleasant, tranquil reading, these vignettes of life in Warling Dean village—love affairs, tragedies, tea-table strategies. (Ward, Lock, & Co. 3s. 6d.)

THE UNTOLD HALF.

BY "ALIEN."

A New Zealand story, full of local colour—we had almost written local pigments, in view of the second sentence in the book, which reads: "The virgin snows that capped the mighty mountains flanking the lake touched the crimson sky, and the blood-red west poured its colour into the silver of cascades tumbling from indigo rocks to meet the purple and russet waters below." The italics are ours, and we do not insert them unkindly, but this sentence is more suggestive of an artist's colourman than of landscape. (Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

HEART'S DESIRE.

BY VANDA WATHEN-BARTLETT.

A lightly-going love story, depending for its interest on the dialogue which flows on and on in different, but not very different, keys. "'Why do all you barristers clean-shave?' she asked. The question was irrelevant, following on his last words. He was nettled. 'I am not a barrister,' he answered shortly. 'No? I fancied you were?' 'I have a Government berth.' 'Delightfully vague,' she thought. 'He might be an inspector of nuisances!' But aloud she remarked, musingly: 'I am so glad that I am not an inquisitive woman.'" (Lane. 6s.)

MRS. JIM BARKER.

BY V. FEATHERSTONHAUGH.

A "Great North-West" story. The heroine, "Mrs. Jim," has been brought up as a boy, so far as was possible, this having been the wish of her mother, who desired her "to be so unfitted for a woman's natural duties that a woman's natural life should be impossible for her, that she might thus escape marriage." Yet it is as Mrs. Jim that we first meet this curiously-named beauty. Her vagaries and repentances make a readable story. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

THE HOUSE OF STRANGE SECRETS.

BY A. ERIC BAYLY.

A melodramatic story foreshadowed in such chapter-headings as "The Man that Disappeared," "The Haunted Barn and its Strange Inhabitant," "Major Jones's Midnight Errand," "Mr. Potter Shows His Hand," "The Squire's Story (continued)," and "The Wizard's Marsh." There is a mysterious creature of "shrill voice and ape-like agility," whose identity and captivity are gradually explained. (Sands & Co. 3s. 6d.)

WHOSE DEED?

BY HADLEY WELFORD.

The author writes under a pseudonym. His story deals with a crime, and is written after the methods of Wilkie Collins, to whose memory it is dedicated. (Jarrold. 3s. 6d.)

MY MAN SANDY.

BY J. B. SALMOND.

A work of Scotch humour. "He's a queer cratur, my man Sandy! He's made, mind an' body o' him, on an original plan a'thegither. He says an' does a' mortal thing on a system o' his ain. . . . I wudna winder to see him some day wi' Donal' yokit i' the tattie-cairt wi' his heid ower the fore-end o't, an' the hurdies o' him whaur his heid shud be." And so on. (Sands. 1s.)

SLAVES OF CHANCE.

BY FERRIER LANGWORTHY.

"Ah love! could thou and I with Fate conspire to grasp this sorry Scheme of Things entire. Would we not shatter it to bits—and then re-mould it nearer to the heart's desire!"—that is the motto of this book. It is a rather sordid seamy Scheme of Things in which we find ourselves, among a number of young people of restless nature, and it badly needs re-moulding. At the end "they were, alas! both smoking, but in spite of that sign of depravity a deep, all-enduring love shone in the eyes of each." (Smithers. 4s. 6d.)

MONA.

BY ALICE A. CLOWES.

The story of the estrangement of a husband and wife. At the end they are reconciled. "Laying her hand on the glossy curls she used to think so god-like, now streaked with grey, she said gently: 'For the children's sake, Richard.'" (Sonnenschein. 3s. 6d.)

THE SPORT OF CIRCUMSTANCE.

BY G. G. CHATTERTON.

A study of a wayward young woman named Alywyn Grey. She remarks to a man: "In foods farinaceous lies our security, and the afternoon teapot becomes a chaperon. Lemonade and cutlets form for you and me a short cut to perdition." The villagers called it "a feast unto the eyes t' see her'n walk adown aisle of t' church." (Long. 3s. 6d.)

THREE BACHELOR WOMEN, AND OTHER STORIES.

BY E. COSBY.

"Unappropriated womanhood may, roughly speaking, be divided into three great classes: the Romantic, the Antagonistic, and the Unappreciated." With this prefatory dictum, the author proceeds to sketch the love-histories of three "bachelor women." "You like homely men, do you?" says one of the characters. "Very much," she answered sweetly, "if they would only stay at home." (Swan Sonnenschein.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 21s. 8d., including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Mr. Silas Hocking's Popularity.

An Enquiry.

THE case of Mr. Silas Hocking deserves consideration. He is probably the most popular of living novelists. By comparison with him Miss Marie Corelli is esoteric, Mr. Hall Caine the fad of a mere coterie, and Mr. Kipling a timid emerger from the unknown. Mr. Hocking has been writing for twenty-one years, and during the whole of that extended period the sale of his novels has averaged one thousand copies per week. The exact total of sales, as officially furnished to me by the courtesy of Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co., is one million and ninety-three thousand one hundred and eighty-five copies, exclusive of publications other than fiction. Such figures astound. They do not ask, they silently compel attention. They enshrine a dazzling and marvellous secret.

When in my thoughtlessness I began to sound a leading West End bookseller as to the first cause of Mr. Hocking's popularity, the austere reply was: "We have never been asked for his novels; we have never, so far as our recollection goes, had a copy of any of them in our shop." I should have known as much. Mr. Hocking is a minister of the Methodist Free Church. His fame is rooted in Dissent, and Kensington never dissents. Though he is doubtless well-known in less orthodox London, it is in the industrial districts of mid and northern England, and perhaps also in Cornwall, that Mr. Hocking chiefly flourishes. I have found in the bookseller's shop of a small provincial town whole rows of Her Benny, God's Outcast, Ivy, For Abigail; and the comment of the bookseller has been: "Yes, the market is constant. I buy them in thirteens and twenty-sixes. No, I stock practically no new novels except Mr. Hocking's." In that town the literary topic of the present hour is not A Double Thread or The Awkward Age or the Browning Love-Letters or Doyle v. Nicoll. It is The Day of Recompense, by Silas K. Hocking, with original illustrations by A. Twidle (cloth gilt, bevelled boards), of which Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co. have just put forth an immense first edition.

I have read The Day of Recompense with curiosity. It seems to me to be less characteristic of its author than other works from the same hand which I have encountered aforetime, but nevertheless it is individual, distinct; and one may gather from it some clue to Mr. Hocking's success. To begin at the beginning, one must consider the attitude of Dissenters of the trading and industrial classes towards the art of literature. (The other arts, by the way, scarcely exist for them: they eschew the theatre; music means hymns, anthems, and sometimes "The Messiah"; to painting they are completely indifferent; architecture as an art has never occurred to them.) That attitude is at once timid, antagonistic, and resentful. Timid, because print still has for the unlettered a mysterious sanction; antagonistic, because Puritanism and the Arts have by no means yet settled their quarrel; resentful, because the autocratic power of art over the imagination and the intelligence is felt without being understood. In the single phrase of dismissal, "It's only a story," uttered with bravado as the last leaf was turned, I have detected all these qualities. One may say that imaginative literature exists here on sufferance, and only in so far as there is nothing to take its place. And therefore it must behave itself. It must not presume on its magic power, or it will suffer the fate of a disobedient African god. How often have I heard the impatient words: "This is too exciting for me; if I went on I shouldn't be able to leave it"! It mustn't startle, for that would be sensationalism, and sensationalism is of the devil. It mustn't engage the intellect; intellect is reserved for theology, politics, and business. It must on no account be realistic, for these people seek in art a means, not of getting closer to life, but of receding from it—so mean and unlovely as life is to their unseeing eyes. It must show nothing new, for that would be disconcerting. Lastly, it must respectfully kneel to the current moral and spiritual ideal—that always-present ideal (whatever it happens to be) whose mere existence, in an age not of ideals, is the finest trait in Mr. Hocking's public.

See, then, how fiction lies bound and scorned, and yet must she smile and discreetly dance for the amusement of her grim oppressors! Changing the metaphor, let us call her a clever poor relation who lives by her tact. Decidedly the clue to Mr. Hocking's vogue must be sought in neither his originality nor his power, but in his tact. He is not original, he is not powerful; such qualities would be fatal. His hero, Roger Carew, is the squire's son, "bookish, studious, grave," "true as steel, chivalrous to the core, and generous almost to a fault." From childhood Roger has lived in intimacy with Kitty Bolitho, the heroine, who is pretty and impulsive and good, and has "friends and books and pets, and more pretty frocks than she could wear." Comes a time when Roger declares himself: "My boyish affection has grown into a man's passionate love." Whereupon "she burst out into a silvery laugh." "Oh, Roger, please don't. Now you are spoiling yourself and spoiling everything! Why can't we be as we have always been?" Then Roger disappears, and in due course his body is found in the river and he is buried. Kitty, who has been temporarily distracted by the designing attentions of Roger's wicked uncle, soon discovers that she loved only Roger. The villagers discourse upon the moral excellence of Roger and his influence for good. Roger's father dies, and the wicked uncle comes into the property and title. Then suspicion arises, at first like a thin cloud. Not Roger's body, but that of a man exactly like him, has been buried. At this point we are taken back to the point of Roger's disappearance, and we follow his adventures. He is kidnapped by his uncle's minions, who imprison him and plot his death; but he escapes via a subterranean tunnel to the seashore, finds a boat, and boards a ship bound for somewhere. The ship is wrecked, and eighteen months are spent on a desert island; during that weary time Roger's faith "flickers and wavers," but comes back to him again, and "he is able to preach hope and patience and courage to his companions." Ultimately he returns to his domain and ousts the wicked uncle, whose dying miseries, however, he does his best to assuage. And finally there is Kitty. "'Darling,' he said at length, 'this is recompense for all.' And for answer she let him kiss her again." And that, plus a mildly amusing love-affair between an Established Church young lady and a Dissenting young gentleman, is the whole of the plot.

Perhaps the enlightened reader may wonder where tact could enter into such a scheme. It enters in a thousand ways. The central mystery is nicely designed so as not to incommode the most tender susceptibility. The tepid scenes of sentiment are handled with fulness of detail and some conventional appearance of verisimilitude, while the melodramatic passages, the thrills and excitations, are carefully kept down; all the desert island business is accomplished in a page or two. The recital of Roger's captivity and escape is dispassionately calm, and forms, indeed, a mere ground upon which the reader's imagination may work or not as it chooses. All the characterisation, and the play of character on character, is tremendously simplified, in order to arrive at a broad and easily grasped effect. Every complication beyond the main one is neatly nipped in the bud.

In short, the intellect and the intelligence are treated as invalids, waited on hand and foot; the only demand upon them is, that they shall sit up and take a little nourishment. To excite, surprise, strain, fatigue, bully them—that is by no means the plan. The policy is to soothe, to lull while gently diverting and sustaining. Only a sleepless tact could do this—and a tact which is natural, like that of the born nurse. Mr. Hocking was born to his craft. His tact was not acquired. There is no question of a calculated design on his part to meet the taste of the Methodist million. He is the Methodist million made vocal. I have no doubt that he expresses himself in these books of his as sincerely as any Meredith or Henry James who has sacrificed popularity to the artistic conscience. I am convinced that he never courted popularity. He has the single eye. His work is the work of a man with a moral ideal. To win admiration at the smallest cost of sincerity would be repugnant to him. He writes, obviously, to please one person; and that in pleasing one person he pleases a thousand thousand is due to the fate which combined in him the common vision with the vocal gift. Such success as his is not the reward of contrivance or artificiality, or even of long striving. It is not achieved; it comes. The wind bloweth where it listeth. Mr. Hocking could no more give the recipe for The Day of Recompense than the boy Blake could say how he came to write:

O deck her forth with thy fair fingers; pour Thy soft kisses on her bosom; and put Thy golden crown upon her languished head
Whose modest tresses were bound up for thee.

The style is the man, be the man who he may, and it is the style which pleases. Also, it is the style which defies definition. I have tried fairly to explain the phenomenon of Mr. Hocking, but from the start I knew that I could do no more than walk round it. That tact of which I have spoken is negative; it consists in refraining. What is it that Mr. Hocking does? What is that quality, lurking in every sentence on every page, which attracts? To this question, though I have approached it sympathetically and without arrogance, I find no answer. When souls call aloud to each other in the night, each knows its fellow; and that is absolutely all one can say.

E. A. B.

The Glutton of Tangier.

THE Soko was crowded to excess, for the morrow would be Christians' Sabbath, the principal market-day of the week. All Tangier was awash in the streaming gold sheen of approaching sunset. The first week of February and the third of Ramadan were drawing to an end. Beside the entrance to the camel-fondac Hamman Soosi was engaged in beating his wife with conscientious thoroughness and enthusiasm. A small crowd of irritable women in his rear egged the man on with mocking cries of encouragement. Before him a knot of hungry, sour-tempered men reviled Hamman and loaded him with pointless abuse. Near the Saints' grave in the Soko's centre two country Moors were fighting like mad goats, the bloody heads of the twain their only weapons. In three different tents three children were being beaten by three exasperated mothers. Their howls made thirty times three discords.

The day-long fast of month-long Ramadan means abstinence from food and drink between sunrise and sunset. But that is nothing. It means total abstinence from the solace of any grain of kief, hascheesh, snuff, green tea, tobacco, and every kind of narcotic. That is much to a Moor.

As the sun climbed down toward the mountain ridge behind Tangier, its beams flushed every ragged coping, and danced upon each gaudy tile in the mosque towers. It was like a child's radiant dream of an Arabian Night's city.

Not a man or woman in all that crowded Soko but was filled full of gall and smouldering ill-temper. Unless, perhaps, one: Haj Absalaam el Hraa—he was perspiring with eagerness and excitement over the cooking of his evening meal. Absalaam had never found time or money to spare for the purchase of a wife. Moreover, he had never met a woman whose cooking satisfied him. Not for nothing was Haj Absalaam called "the glutton of Tangier." Eating was his only love, and fondly he served her. He had once eaten a sheep at a sitting, for a wager. But he had insisted on being allowed to cook it for himself. Now he bent over his great earthen pot, steaming and sizzling over a brazier of charcoal.

The kous-kousou was done to a turn, and ready. Readiness is too tame a word with which to describe Haj Absalaam's breathless emotion as he stared, first into his cooking-pot, then across the hills to the bed of sunset. His lips dropped water. The man's whole soul yearned for warm, rich food.

Life suddenly died out from the light that bathed Tangier. On the minaret of the principal mosque there appeared a gaunt, white-robed figure of a man, with one hand raised to his mouth. The longed-for cry boomed out over Tangier. "There is but one God," echoed Haj Absalaam aloud. "There is but one kous-kousou," added the hungry soul of him.

Absalaam's ablutions were already performed. With tremulous hands he lifted his supper from the brazier, settled down before it, and at once buried five fingers in the odorous and buttery mass. Then he lifted his eyes impatiently. A young man and an old woman were creeping past him, their gaze held obliquely magnetised by Absalaam's steaming kous-kousou. Strangers they were, and country folk, not born in poverty, one fancied, yet now gaunt, ragged, and wolf-like from starvation. The pride of other days lived in them yet, for they uttered no word.

During ten pregnant seconds Haj Absalaam glared at the starving couple with nothing less than murder in his small eyes. The fingers of him were still knuckle-deep in his kous-kousou. Then the man bounded to his feet like an acrobat. With one hand on the shoulder of each, he dragged the ravenous strangers to his fire, almost flinging them to the ground beside his kous-kousou.

"Eat!" he shouted, with the meaningless grin of a madman.

The wolves hung over the kous-kousou trembling.

"Will ye not eat with us, Sidi?" stammered the youth.

Haj Absalaam's face beamed refulgent idiocy. He threw his head back and hummed in his throat.

"No," he said. "I have no appetite. La ilaha illa 'llaho!"

And so he swaggered off, singing, while the hungry ones fed full.

NEVER weather-beaten sail more willing bent to shore,
Never tired pilgrim's limbs affected slumber more Than my wearied sprite now longs to fly out of my troubled breast—
O, come quickly, sweetest Lord, and take my soul to rest.

Thomas Campion.

Things Seen.

The Mask.

Her image has escaped the flux of things,
And that same infant beauty that she wore
Is fixed upon her now for evermore.

WHEN the ladies rustled from the room, the two men—one of the elder, the other of the younger generation—seated themselves by their host. On the facing wall hung a marble mask of a girl's head—a face small and sensitive, with smooth, parted hair, and thin, compressed lips. The face wore the enigmatic smile that persists after death—the smile that some interpret by the words, "I know!" The elder man gazed at that spot of living white on the sombre panelling. To him, through all the flow of idle talk, she had been importunate. The host, noticing his steadfast gaze, spoke: "I call her Pompilia, you remember:

The white I saw shine through her was her soul's . . .
The snow-white soul that angels fear to take Untenderly. . . .
Pompilia—the same great, grave, grievous air. . . ."

The younger man frowned, but the host continued: "I call her Pompilia. So I imagine Pompilia to have looked. The rough stone held her that day on the hill when Browning planned The Ring and the Book—now she is recovered, made visible. Do you know the story? When Browning had found the 'square old yellow book' that 'memorable day' in June—er—'65, was it not?—and his brain had fired at the notion, he strode off countrywards, halted on the hillside, and arrayed around him a series of stones, a stone for each character. The stones became individualised, they talked—the book was planned. And there is Pompilia carved from her stone." Addressing the elder man, he continued: "Why do I tell you this? Because a remark that you once made signalled an epoch in my life." The elder man moved restlessly and dropped his napkin. "Yes, it was so, although probably you have forgotten the incident. It arose from a chance encounter in a drawing-room a few weeks before Browning's death. You spoke fervidly of his work, to which I made the trite comment: 'Then you are a Browningite?' Your reply was not what I expected. You said, 'Naturally'; and there was surprise in your tone." The host became emphatic. "That single word 'naturally' marked an epoch in my life. For a quarter of a century I had worked for Browning's recognition, often despairing, never giving-in. And lo! the new generation take to him—'naturally.' In that moment I realised that my work was done. It was a great moment for me." The host paused. The elder man looked uncomfortable. The younger man knocked the ash off his cigarette. "I'm sorry to seem ungrateful," he said, "but I can't read Browning: he's so amorphous, so optimistic. Now Huysmans —." The host clutched the arms of his chair. The eyes of the elder man twinkled. "Browning —," continued the younger man on a falsetto note—but the host had risen. He crossed the room, and rested his fingers tenderly on the smooth marble hair of the mask. Then, striking a match, he let the flame play upwards from round chin to smooth forehead, and under light and shadow the smile seemed to awake and flicker over the still features, and say

If I seem without him now,
That's the world's insight!

Taking an arm of either man, the host said: "Three generations!—the first sows, the second reaps, the third scorns. Well! well! Come, let us join the ladies."

Memoirs of the Moment.

LADY SHELLEY's death seems to increase the barrier between her father-in-law and the present generation. By his early death Shelley appears to rank with a generation really earlier than his own; for Disraeli and Lord John Russell might, as grown-up readers, have had the pleasure of "discovering" both Keats and Shelley on their first appearance in print. Coleridge and Wordsworth, born a generation earlier than Shelley, are vaguely thought of as later men because they lived longer. Yet among the comparatively recent remembrances of the present writer is that of hearing the late Sir Percy Shelley, apparently in the prime of life, referring to "my poor father." That brought Shelley near enough; but nearer even in some ways was he brought by the intense personal worship of his daughter-in-law. Sir Percy had only the vaguest memory of having seen his father. Not even that dim tradition was in Lady Shelley's possession. Born of a North-country family which created few ties for her, she was a widow, the Hon. Mrs. St. John, when—let it be frankly said—she accepted, not so much the man she married as the son of the poet she adored.

HER heart was dedicated to that worship. She knew the poetry by heart; she knew the life as far as it could be known; she loved and tended in old age Mary Shelley—born Mary Godwin, not Mary Woollstonecraft as one obituary notice confuses the generations by recording; she watched with alert loyalty the bearing of Shelley's few surviving acquaintances in their allusions towards him. In the room at Boscombe Manor, near Bournemouth, in which she kept her Shelley relics, she showed herself a fervent priestess who approached them with tremulous hands, and guarded sacredly the shrine at which she had seen, she declared to herself, something more than the mere glove, the portrait, the MS., the fragment of wreck—had seen and communed with visions of the poet himself. In the corner of that sanctuary was a little glass case containing locks of hair of Shelley's friends, and among the rest Trelawny's. But Trelawny wrote of Shelley what this guardian angel of his memory could not approve. "I have written to him," she said, "to ask if he wishes to have his own lock of hair removed from the companionship with those of Shelley's friends." What he answered I never heard, nor whether that reliquary was finally rifled of the Trelawny curl.

MR. WILFRID BLUNT is sitting for his portrait to Mr. Watts, R.A., who is remarkably well, and in the best of spirits about things in general and this portrait in particular.

APROPOS of the interest attaching to the adhesion of Kingsley's daughter to the religion of her father's great antagonist, Newman, a correspondent furnishes me with a letter which shows how much softened by time were the asperities that are remembered now mainly as having called forth the Apologia—a book of which George Eliot said that it "breathed new life into her." Kingsley at Eversley had a near neighbour in the Rev. Sir William Cope at Bramshill, where his predecessor had kept grooms and trainers, whom Kingsley delighted to visit. Sir William was also a friend of Newman's, and to him, the day after Kingsley's death, Newman addressed a letter, which is very much to the point now:

The death of Mr. Kingsley, so premature, shocked me. I never from the first have felt any anger towards him—it is very difficult to be angry with a man one has never seen. Much less could I feel any resentment against him when he was accidentally the instrument, in the good Providence of God, by whom I had an opportunity given me of vindicating my character and conduct. I heard, too, a few years back from a friend that he chanced to go into Chester Cathedral and found Mr. Kingsley preaching about me kindly. And it has rejoiced me to observe lately that he was, as it seemed to me, in his views generally nearing the Catholic view. I have always hoped that by good luck I might meet him, feeling sure that there would be no embarrassment on my part, and I said Mass for his soul as soon as I heard of his death.

All which must make very agreeable reading for Lucas Malet just now.

MR. ARTHUR TENNYSON, the brother of the Laureate, was eighty-five when he died on Tuesday. A writer of some pleasant reminiscences in a daily paper speaks of Arthur's great resemblance to his brother in appearance and in temperament. This was a somewhat superficial likeness after all; and, much as it pleased Arthur's brotherly piety to allow the legend, he was obliged on one occasion, when the heads had been likened to each other, to put on Alfred's hat, which was simply an extinguisher to his own much less massive head. Arthur liked to think he had "something of the Tennyson spark"; and there is no doubt that all the brothers had more than traces of the rather morbid nature of their father. The Laureate admitted as much when he said: "I am black-blooded, like all the Tennysons—I remember all the malignant things said against me, but little of the praise." You have to pay for everything—even for being the brother of a poet. Two domestic events the writer of the reminiscences overlooks: Arthur Tennyson's first and his second marriages—of great consequence to him in his manner of life.

ARTHUR TENNYSON used to speak of Alfred as having been as a boy a particularly kind elder brother. His first salient recollection of the future poet was a somewhat unexpected one: he remembered him as wildly excited over Bewick's British Birds, reading it in the garden at Somersby, and rushing in at whiles to show the woodcuts to the younger scholars at their lessons. These two brothers especially were friends, and took long Lincolnshire walks together. It was on one of these rambles that Alfred first seemed to form his life-plans. "Arthur, I mean to be famous," he announced to his proudly and easily—but not too easily—convinced little brother.

It is not necessary to say much about the temper and tone of Mr. Moulton-Barrett's second letter to the Standard. Its immediate occasion was the exposure, by Mr. Tillard, of the error made in his first letter by Mr. Moulton-Barrett when, in order to heighten the claudesmy of Mr. Browning, he said that his sister never left her room. Mr. Tillard reminded him of the carriage exercise mentioned in the Letters. "The carriage exercise I forgot," writes the brother who is bent on continuing the feud of his father against Browning; "nor does it matter," he amazingly adds; "I repeat, my sister never left her room." After that, it is hardly worth while to carry comment further; though one might, at will, quote allusion after allusion from the same Letters to Miss Barrett's visits to the drawing-room, and even to her walk in the park, for instance, on that day when Floss was stolen.

NOTHING has been said, apparently, as to one aspect of the International Congress of Women—the æsthetic. And yet a meeting of thousands of women, such as is taking place twice and thrice a day in London, is exceedingly strange as a mere spectacle, as strange to the ear, and a thing not to be seen or heard again, probably, in the course of the lives of those who are witnesses of it this week. A great concourse of tender colours and of the infinite soft detail of modern women's dress, more or less harmonised by the very diversity and chance medley of tints—for all the colours coming together, not in mass, but in tiny detail, make a very soft, not a hard, confusion, when the multitude is great enough—this is the impression to the eye. The ugliness of a modern crowd is all at once done away. The impression to the ear is even pleasanter. Any superior being leaning his ear over an ordinary human crowd must find the discord as hard as nails. The talk of a few thousands of women is perfectly agreeable. The limitations of the feminine voice in public speaking are, however, unfortunate. A man addressing a large meeting strains his voice and produces unmusical sounds without scruple. An actress learns by long practice how to make her voice carry without losing its beauty; a woman unused to speaking in public seems rather to choose to be inaudible than to crack her speaking notes. Those who are well used to the work, however, such as Lady Aberdeen—most able and sweet-tempered of presidents—have learnt by experience the unstrained but carrying note.

"Of Nothing Human He the Hater."

In the July number of the Century, a most readable and varied collection of literary matter, are two articles on Sir Walter Scott, one describing certain hitherto unpublished portraits, and the other giving an account of his first love, Willamina Stuart, afterwards Lady Stuart Forbes. Between these articles is a striking poem, which we quote below. The verses are signed with the letter "R." Who "R." is we know not, but we hazard the conjecture that the initial stands for Mr. Richard Hovey.

I.

Rhymers and writers of our day,
Too much of melancholy!
Give us the old heroic lay;
A whiff of wholesome folly;
The escapade, the dance;
A touch of wild romance.
Wake from this self-conscious fit;
Give us again Sir Walter's wit;
His love of earth, of sky, of life;
His ringing page with humour rife;
His never-weary pen;
His love of men!

II.

Builder of landscape, who could make Turret and tower their stations take
Brave in the face of the sun;
Of many a mimic world creator,
Alive with fight and strenuous fun;
Of nothing human he the hater.
Nobly could he plan:
Master of nature, master of man.

III.

Sometimes I think that He who made us,
And on this pretty planet laid us,
Made us to work and play
Like children in the light of day—
Not like plodders in the dark,
Searching with lanterns for some mark
To find the way.
After the stroke of pain,
Up and to work again!

IV.

Such was his life, without reproach or fear.
And at the end,
When Heaven bent down and whispered in his ear
The word God's saints waited and longed to hear,
I ween he was as quick as they to comprehend;
And when he passed beyond the goal,
Entered the gates of pearl no sweeter soul.

The Collector-Ghoul.

MR. TEMPLE SCOTT has produced another volume of his Book Sales (Bell & Sons). Apparently the issue of the volume has been somewhat delayed, as it ends with the sales of the second and third portions of the Ashburnham Library a year ago. But some of Mr. Scott's comments are interesting, especially in regard to modern writers and modern éditions de luxe. He thinks that the multiplication of éditions de luxe which was so noticeable a little while ago, and is now so significantly unnoticeable, was largely brought about by the rise in the value of the works of Stevenson and Mr. Kipling:

What is good for such writers' works is, surely, think the publishers, good for other writers, and they begin by proclaiming the issues of fine editions of Fielding, Smollett, Whyte-Melville, Meredith, and the rest. What is the result? One needs but to look over the shelves of the booksellers' shops to answer this question. There these works stand, neglected by the true book collector, and out of reach of the man of slender purse. It is no use to attempt to force or foist a fashion.

The collector of passing fashions in books is warned that he must decide whether he is seeking pleasure or profit. If profit, then "he must watch his time and realise at once." At present there is not much new literature that offers itself to the small collector with a speculative intention at the back of his head. But the works of Stevenson and Kipling provide a little mild excitement, and Mr. Scott advises their acquisition. "Of Kipling's works, prose especially, would I urge this. Such books as the two Jungle Books, and the illustrated volumes of Soldiers' Tales, and Captains Courageous, will certainly be sought for. As will also the pamphlet on A Fleet in Being. About Stevenson it is difficult to decide. The very rare Davos Platz pamphlets are certain to receive a special attention, if only for the unique circumstances which attended their publication; but I would hesitate to say that all his publications will ever become very dear." The actual rise in the prices of Mr. Kipling's works, for several years, is shown by Mr. Scott in a table, a portion of which we take leave to quote:

	1896	1897	1898
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Departmental Ditties (1886) . .	—	20 15 0	19 0 0
		16 0 0	10 0 0
			14 0 0
Plain Tales from the Hills (1888)	—	4 4 0	—
Letters of Marque (1891) . . .	1 14 0	5 7 6	6 10 0
		6 10 0	6 15 0
			6 15 0
Soldiers Three (1890) . . . .		—	—
Story of the Gadsbys (1890) . .		0 10 0	—
		0 12 0	—
Phantom 'Rickshaw (1890) . .	The average price	1 0 0	1 11 0
In Black and White (1890) . .	rose to	—	0 19 0
	about 5s.	—	0 13 0
	or 7s. 6d.	—	0 10 0
	each.	1 3 0	1 5 0
Under the Deodars (1890) . . .		1 0 0	1 10 0
Wee Willie Winkie (1890) . . .		2 6 0	2 2 0
City of Dreadful Night (1891) .		—	3 12 0
Barrack Room Ballads (1892, L.P.)	0 11 0	—	1 0 0
	0 17 0
	1 5 0

We have glanced only at a few modern developments. Mr. Scott, of course, directs many of his remarks to the higher book collecting. Undoubtedly this "is becoming more and more a pastime for the very rich." And the speculative fever, which is spoiling cricket and many another pastime, is advancing here with giant strides. "What was once the gentle exercise of the amiable among the leisured in position, or of the quiet in mind, is forming a new pabulum for the retired man of business who cannot find rest for the speculative instincts he satisfied on the Stock Exchange and elsewhere. . . . He is the collector-ghoul." Mr. Scott has compiled this volume with all his usual care, and like its fellows, it not only fulfils its immediate purpose, but is—if one pleases to make it so—a mine of literary suggestion.

Correspondence.

An Author's Complaint.

SIR,—I have read Mr. Mullett Ellis's letter in your issue of June 24, and think it right, on behalf of the Society of Authors, to make the following statement. To anyone who has perused the correspondence in the June Author the position is quite clear. Mr. Mullett Ellis's letter does not fully state his case. If the statement he puts forward were complete his conclusion might be accepted.

Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son, according to their letter to Mr. Mullett Ellis, refused to put his book on the stalls because, in their opinion, it was not likely to have a ready sale. Mr. Mullett Ellis says that it was because of its title. Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son have every right to carry on their business in whatever way may seem likely to them to bring in the biggest profits. If the question had been one of literary censorship the Society might have interfered to the extent of making a protest, even if such protest had been unavailing, but from Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's point of view this was not the case. The endeavour of the Society to obtain assistance from the publishers was repudiated by that body, no doubt on the ground that Messrs. Smith claim to be allowed to trade in what stock they choose.—I am, &c.,

MARTIN CONWAY,
Chairman of the Committee of Management of the Society of Authors (Incorporated).

4, Portugal-street: June 28, 1899.

The Isaac Walton Hotel.

SIR,—A report has gained currency, through the medium of your publication, that the Isaac Walton Hotel, Dovedale, is to be made into a private residence.

I beg to contradict this assertion and to inform you that this is not the case, I myself having taken the hotel and fishing on similar terms to the present tenant, and hope to have the future support of the large number of anglers and tourists who have frequented it in the past.

It will be my earnest endeavour to maintain the good reputation that the house has always enjoyed and ensure the comfort of the many visitors to the hotel and Dovedale.

May I ask you to insert this in your next publication? and, thanking you in anticipation,—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM EVANS.

Dovedale, Ilam, Ashbourne: June 24, 1899.

Miss Charlotte Yonge.

SIR,—Will you allow me to inform those of your readers who are interested in the Charlotte Yonge Scholarship that on July 19, at the Winchester High School, the Bishop of Winchester will present, on behalf of the subscribers, an address to Miss Yonge, together with the names of the donors to the fund. Further contributions received before or after that date will be duly acknowledged, and will be added to the sum already collected.—I am, &c., ESME STUART (hon. sec.).

Witham-close, Winchester: June 27, 1899.

The Courtesy of our Columns.

SIR,—Will you grant me the courtesy of your columns to ask who was really the originator of the harmless little pleasantry by which Scripture is paraphrased to compare the publisher with Barabbas? I have always understood it was Byron; but in reading the Memoirs of Murray the other day I found that Smiles attributes the joke to Campbell. Can any authority be cited on either side? It was certainly Campbell who toasted Napoleon because he had ordered a bookseller to be shot.—I am, &c.,

Edinburgh: June 27, 1899. J. CUTHBERT HADDEN.

Wanted—a Book.

SIR,—Could you or some of your numerous readers inform me where I could obtain a book published in Edinburgh about the middle of the century (1850-60), entitled Plant Names in Gaelic and English, by Cameron?—I am, &c.,

CORMAC DEMPSEY.

40, West Thirty-Second-street, New York City, U.S.A.: June 20, 1899.

“Man Past and Present.”

SIR,—In the notice of this book (ACADEMY, June 24) I am credited with the authorship of Anthropology, which was written by Prof. E. B. Tylor. The work intended is no doubt my Ethnology. Further on the reviewer represents me as bringing the Kelts “into Europe from the Eurasian plains.” This misrepresentation upsets the whole argument in which I try to disentangle the intricate problem of early Aryan migrations. I bring the Kelts of both branches “from Asia Minor, through the Balkan Peninsula, to and up the Danube to the former Keltic lands of Bohemia, Helvetia, Gaul, and Britain” (pp. 523-4), the traces of the Q. Kelts being effaced by the P. Kelts arriving later. I support this position by reference to the foremost Keltic authorities, and with Thurneysen equate “the Greek Παιρία, the name of a district on the route taken by the Q.’s to the Danube, with Erin, in which word Keltic scholars generally recognise a loss of p” (ib.). It is the Homo Europæus—the Teuton—that I bring from the Eurasian steppe, and the point is of vital importance in my proposed explanation of long-heads and round-heads, both of Aryan speech from prehistoric times. As I claim, rightly or wrongly, to have solved this crux, I naturally expect that my views be at least correctly represented.

The writer goes on: “Anthropologists ought to tell us what are the conditions which determine round-headedness.” He has overlooked the passage (p. 520-1) where these conditions are given, in connexion with de Lapouge’s pessimistic theory that in France the “inferior” round-heads are absorbing the “superior” long-heads.

June 25, 1899.

A. H. KEANE.

Hood’s Death-place.

SIR,—I beg to thank your correspondent, Mr. W. F. Prideaux, for pointing out that I was wrong in stating that Thomas Hood died at 17, Elm Tree-road, St. John’s Wood, and that the actual house in which the poet breathed his last was Devonshire Lodge, Finchley-road, which it seems was, unfortunately, pulled down some years ago. I am very sorry to have made such an error, but in my defence permit me to say that I got the information from an illustrated magazine article, which I supposed was perfectly correct.—I am, &c.,

ALGERNON ASHTON.

44, Hamilton-gardens, St. John’s Wood, N.W.:
June 19, 1899.

John Scott, Horace Smith, and J. G. Lockhart.

SIR,—I am afraid your readers will think the subject of this letter somewhat resembles, in its length and ambiguity, the Ancient Mariner’s tale; but I ask your indulgence to enable me finally to answer Mr. Andrew Lang’s courteous but, I think, inconclusive letter.

I cannot admit that Horace Smith in his communications with Christie and Scott committed any error of judgment in his use of the word “satisfaction,” instead of “apology,” for he, like many others, habitually employed the term in its old-fashioned Johnsonian sense of “amends,” “atonement.”

Mr. Lang’s suggestion that the author of Rejected Addresses (a man who moved in the best society, and was up to date in the ways of the world) might possibly have been ignorant of the construction usually placed upon the expression, “the satisfaction due to a gentleman,” requires too great an effort for my imagination.

Mr. Lang and I agree that Horace Smith told Christie that if Lockhart offered an explanation he (H. S.) was authorised to offer “satisfaction.” This obviously meant that explanation from Lockhart would be met by an apology on Scott’s part. If that happy consummation had been arrived at, no duel would have been necessary, as gentlemen, even in those fire-eating days, rarely went “on the sod” after an apology had been properly offered.

How, then, could Horace Smith, admittedly the mediator, have misled anybody?

I believe I understand the ideas prevailing in 1821 respecting the code of honour; yet it seems impossible to me that so humane and enlightened an individual as Sir Walter Scott would—as Mr. Lang maintains—have refused ever to speak again to Lockhart, his son-in-law, had he sought to delay (I will not say “shirk”) a duel until his wife had safely got over her confinement.

Mr. Lang says he prefers the evidence of 1821 to that of 1847 (Horace Smith’s) or of 1858 (Cyrus Redding’s), the one an actor in, and the other a witness of, the events that preceded the fatal encounter.

To my mind, the testimony of these gentlemen is worth as much as “the letters and pamphlets or printed statements of the persons engaged” used by Mr. Lang in writing his Life of Lockhart, and which, “without prejudice,” I suggest have been pressed into use rather too exclusively in the interests of Lockhart and his fellow-countrymen.—I am, &c.,

Fulham, S.W.:

ARTHUR H. BEAVAN.

June 27, 1899.

Old Wykehamists.

SIR,—I think in your review (June 17) of a History of Winchester College you should have named Thomas Adolphus Trollope, as well as Anthony, among the list of Mr. Leach’s omissions of eminent Wykehamists from his book. Surely his chapters in his autobiography, “What I Remember,” on his old school were almost too detailed for general readers, possibly for collegians also.—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM MERCER.

Painswick, Glos: June 23, 1899.

That Butterfly.

MR. EYRE HUSSEY, an untiring critic of our columns, whose remarks we rarely have the courage to print, writes to correct the author of last week’s “Thing Seen” called “Incident.” How could a June wind have wafted a butterfly over the south side of Fleet-street?—north winds do not blow in June: such is the substance of Mr. Hussey’s pungent questions. We have consulted the writer of “Incident,” and he says the wind was a west wind, but the butterfly “tacked.” We hope this will satisfy our critic.

Holiday Reading. Our Prize Competitions.

RESULT OF No. 38.

We asked last week for a list of reading for holidays, dividing the day into six periods: (a) in bed, before getting up; (b) in the middle of the morning, while resting; (c) after lunch, in a hammock; (d) after tea; (e) after dinner; and (f) in bed, before sleep; and requiring a different book for each time. Some excellent suggestions have been received in reply. We like best this from H. Head Buckingham, Old Shoreham, Sussex:

- (a) Jungle Book.
- (b) Compleat Angler.
- (c) Virginibus Puerisque.
- (d) Pride and Prejudice.
- (e) Boswell.
- (f) Montaigne.

None of these works make any strong demand on the mind; all can be laid down after a few minutes; and all are good. We quote certain other lists also containing desirable holiday reading, but not quite so suitable as that above recommended:

- (a) Essays of Elia.
- (b) Marinus the Epicurean.
- (c) Tennyson.
- (d) Ordeal of Richard Ferval.
- (e) Omar Khayyam.
- (f) Religio Medici.

[W. M. M., Dublin.]

- (a) The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius.
- (b) Pippa Passes.
- (c) Scholar Gipsies (by John Buchan).
- (d) The Shaving of Shagpat.
- (e) Virginibus Puerisque.
- (f) The Pickwick Papers.

[W. G. H., London.]

- (a) Omar Khayyam.
- (b) Walden.
- (c) Il Decamerone.
- (d) The Gamekeeper at Home.
- (e) The Egoist.
- (f) Shakespeare's Sonnets.

[F. H. P., Maidencombe.]

- (a) Pepys' Diary.
- (b) Pride and Prejudice.
- (c) The Forest Lovers.
- (d) Shakespeare or Tennyson.
- (e) Cellini's Memoirs.
- (f) The Decameron.

[C. R. D., Moseley.]

- (a) Boswell.
- (b) A Sentimental Journey.
- (c) The Compleat Angler.
- (d) Pascal's Pensées.
- (e) Sheridan's Plays.
- (f) Clarissa Harlowe.

[W. E. T., Caterham Valley.]

- (a) The Bible ("Song of Solomon").
- (b) Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow.
- (c) The Dolly Dialogues.
- (d) Byron's Letters.
- (e) Shakespeare.
- (f) Urn Burial.

[Mrs. C., Ealing.]

- (a) Hunger. (This will get you up for breakfast.)
- (b) Where Shall We Go? (There will be no time to go there; but what of that!)
- (c) A Hard-Headed Christian. (In case the hammock-rope breaks.)
- (d) Dinners and Dinners. (To act like a sherry and bitters.)
- (e) Man Past and Present or Well, After All —. (Depending on the lodging-house cook.)
- (f) Brown on the Thirty-Nine Articles. (It will beat chloral into cocked hats.)

[E. H., Ledbury.]

Replies received from: Miss H. H., Brighton; Miss N. H., London; Mrs. E. N. L., London; J. S. M. S., Kent; Miss G. N., Bristol; G. M. W., Hull; A. S., London; Miss M. B., Underhill; T. C., Buxted; H. J., London; L. C. J., Edinburgh; J. D. W., London; Miss E. A., Ilfracombe; Mrs. C. N., London; R. M. H., Eastbourne; H. H., Edgbaston; J. S., London; C. F. K., Eccles; C. E. H., London; Miss E. M. L., London; Miss A. H., London; Miss G. M., London; Miss E. L. K., Dublin; D. V., Winchelsea; R. W., Liverpool; S. C., Brighton; A. T. B., Cambs.; A. R. B., Malvern; Miss I. B., London; M. B. A., Manchester; F. G. C., Hull; G. W. O., Woking; J. W. F., London; B. R., London; Lady M. S., London; J. H., Cheltenham; No Name, Aston Manor; Mrs. E. B., Liverpool; F. G. N., Rugby; A. C., Stirling; M. H. B., Leicester; H. J., London; F. B. D., Torquay; F. W., Oxford; H. S., Woburn; F. A. P., Sandgate; Miss G., Reigate.

Competition No. 39.

In Mr. Lang's story "A Bookman's Purgatory, in Books and Bookmen, we read: "Blinton was wont to say he expected to come across 'Triplets of a Tribune,' by Mr. John Bright, and 'Original Hymns for Infant Minds,' by Mr. Henry Labouchere, if he only hunted long enough." Let us suppose that he did hunt long enough, and came upon Mr. Labouchere's work. For the best selection from its pages, not exceeding 24 lines, we offer a prize of a guinea.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, July 4. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the third column of p. 24 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Books Received.

Week ending Thursday, June 29.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Kilpatrick (Rev. T.), Christian Character ..... (T. & T. Clark) 2/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES-LETTRES.

Rickards (M. S. C.), Music from the Maze ..... (Chiswick Press) net 4/6
 Haylings (D. M.), Realism ..... (Unwin)
 Maugham (H. N.), Sir Paul Pinder ..... (Grant Richards) net 12/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

"Mid-On," Seventy-one, Not Out ..... (Blackwood) 6/0
 Garland (H.), The Trail of the Gold-seekers ..... (Macmillan) 6/0
 Foster (M.), Masters of Medicine: Claude Bernard ..... (Unwin) 3/6
 Parkman (F.), The Conspiracy of Pontiac and the Indian War after the Conquest of Canada ..... (Macmillan) net 17/0
 Foster (W.), Letters Received by the East India Company, Vol. III., 1616 ..... (Sampson, Low)
 Bax (E. B.), The Peasants' War in Germany, 1525-1526 ..... (Sonnenschein) 6/0

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Porter (T. C.), Impressions of America ..... (Pearson) 10/6
 Kirk (R. C.), Twelve Months in Klondike ..... (Heinemann) 6/0
 Clerke (E. M.), Fable and Song in Italy ..... (Richards) 5/0
 Furness (H.), Australian Sketches ..... (Ward, Lock, & Co.) 2/6
 Little (W. J. Knox), Sketches and Studies in South Africa ..... (Isbister)
 Moncrieff (A. R. H.), Black's Guide to Somerset ..... (Black) 2/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Carpenter (G. H.), Insects, Their Structure and Life ..... (Dent), net 4/6
 Bidwell (S.), Curiosities of Life and Sight ..... (Sonnenschein) 2/6
 Massee (G.), Text-Book of Plant Diseases ..... (Duckworth) net 5/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mathews (N.), Early Printed Books and Manuscripts in the City Reference Library, Bristol ..... (Hemmons) 6/0
 United States Geological Survey, 1898-7. Parts I., III., and IV. (Government Printing Office, Washington)
 Minchin (H. C.), The Arcadians ..... (Unwin) net 3/6
 The Geographical Journal, Vol. XIII. .... (Royal Geographical Society)
 Coxhead (A. C.), Cricket Records ..... (Lawrence & Bullen) 1/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Ruskin (J.), Præterita, Vol. II. .... (Dent) net 5/0
 Handbook to Somerset. Fifth Edition ..... (Murray) 6/0
 Dickens (C.), Old Curiosity Shop, 2 vols. .... (Dent) each 1/6
 Dewar (G. A. B.), Wild Life in Hampshire Highlands, (J. M. Dent & Co.) net 7/6
 Busch (Dr. M.), Bismarck. Condensed Edition ..... (Macmillan) net 10/0
 Murray (Dr. J. A. W.), A New English Dictionary, (Reissue in Monthly Parts), Part I. .... (Clarendon Press) 3/6
 Herford (C. H.), Shakespeare's Works, Vol. VI. .... (Macmillan) 5/0
 "Saul Smiff," The Pottle Papers, Third Impression ..... (Unwin) net
 Gorman (W. G.), Converts to Rome. Fourth Edition ..... (Sonnenschein) net 2/6
 The Chiswick Shakespeare: "As You Like It" ..... (Bell) net 1/6

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

Announcements.

Forest Notes is the title of a little collection of country poems by Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Lee-Hamilton which Mr. Grant Richards will publish on July 4.

LAST week Mr. J. C. Snaith's cricket novel, Willow the King, which is published at six shillings, was attributed to Mr. J. G. Snaith, and priced five shillings.

THE MARIA GREY TRAINING COLLEGE, Salisbury Road, Brondesbury, London, N.W.

A FULL COURSE OF TRAINING in preparation for the CAMBRIDGE TEACHERS' CERTIFICATE in the Theory and Practice of Teaching is offered to Ladies who desire to become Teachers.

Kindergarten Teachers are also prepared for the Higher Certificate of the National Froebel Union. Junior Students are prepared for the Cambridge Higher Local Examinations.

Scholarships offered in all Divisions.
COLLEGE YEAR BEGINS SEPTEMBER 13th, 1899.
The Winkworth Hall of Residence for Twenty-one Students will be opened opposite the College in September, 1899.
Address Miss ALICE WOODS, Principal, The Maria Grey Training College, Salisbury Road, Brondesbury, N.W.

BOROUGH of DERBY.

MUNICIPAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the appointment of PRINCIPAL to the above College. Further particulars can be obtained on application to the undersigned.

Applications must be sent in not later than Tuesday, July 25th.

Canvassing in any form will be a disqualification.
WILLIAM COOPER, Honorary Secretary,
Derby, June 25th, 1899.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.4, have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 32, or 64-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

KELMSCOTT PRESS BOOKS WANTED.

—£2 each offered for "Biblia Innocentium," "Shakespeare," "Herrick," "Athalanta," "Sigurd," "Glittering Plain," "Florus," "Love is Enough," "Shelley," "Keats," "Bavonarda," "Poems by the Way," "Sidonia," "Well at World's End," "Coleridge," "Rossetti," "Laudes," "Guenevere," "Godefrey," and reports of any others. Rare and Out-of-print Books supplied, any subject. State wants. EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeking Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish. Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.,
68, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing in foreign languages.

TYPE-WRITING, by ex-Journalist.—AUTHORS' MSS. carefully, promptly copied from 8d. per 1,000 words, inclusive. Poetry, Plays. Superior machine and paper. Specimen free.—J. Mason, 4, Grange Road, Egham, Surrey.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained; or Complete Sets may be had separately for 3s. 6d.:—

BEN JONSON.
JOHN KEATS.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.
TOM HOOD.
THOMAS GRAY.
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
LEIGH HUNT.
LORD MACAULAY.
ROBERT SOUTHEY.
S. T. COLERIDGE.
CHARLES LAMB.

MICHAEL DRAYTON.
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
SAMUEL PEPYS.
EDMUND WALLER.
WILKIE COLLINS.
JOHN MILTON.
WILLIAM COWPER.
CHARLES DARWIN.
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.
ANDREW MARVELL.

ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS CARLYLE.
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.
CHARLES DICKENS.
JONATHAN SWIFT.
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.
WILLIAM BLAKE.
SIR RICHARD STEELE.
ALEXANDER POPE.
DOUGLAS JERROLD.
FRANCIS BACON.
HENRIK IBSEN.

Monthly, price Half-a-Crown.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

CONTENTS FOR JULY.

THE CONSERVATISM of PRESIDENT KRUGER. By HERBERT PAUL.
THE VOICE of the UITLANDERS. By FRANK SAFFORD.
PURITANISM and ENGLISH LITERATURE. By Professor DOWDEN.
THE SITUATION in FRANCE. By E. D.
THE PRESENT PHASE of the TEMPERANCE QUESTION. By Canon HICKS.
LAMB and KEATS. By FREDERIC HARRISON.
THE TROUBLES of a CATHOLIC DEMOCRACY. By WILLIAM BARRY, D.D.
THE POSSIBILITY of a CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY. By A MODERN CATHOLIC.
DENMARK and GERMANY. By GEORGE BRANDES.
THE CANCER PROBLEM. By WOOLS HUTCHINSON, M.D.
THE INDEPENDENCE of CUBA. By ANTONIO G. PÉREZ, LL.D.
THE IMPERIALISM of BRITISH TRADE. By RITORTUS.

London: ISBISTER & CO., LIMITED, Covent Garden, W.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

No. 269.—JULY, 1899.

ARE WE TO LOSE SOUTH AFRICA? By Sir SIDNEY SHIPPARD, K.C.M.G. (late Administrator and Chief Magistrate of British Bechuanaland).
SCHOOL CHILDREN as WAGE-EARNERS. By the Right Hon. Sir JOHN GORST, M.P.
THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN in CONGRESS. By the COUNTESS OF ABERDEEN.
THE OPEN SPACES of the FUTURE. By Miss OCTAVIA HILL.
THE MEDIEVAL SUNDAY. By the Rev. Father THURSTON, S.J.
THE NATIVE AUSTRALIAN FAMILY. By Miss EDITH SIMCOX.
DANTE'S GHOSTS. By D. R. FEARON, C.B.
WHILE WAITING in a FRIEND'S ROOM. By the Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON WEST, K.C.B.
THE TEETH of the SCHOOLBOY. By EDWIN COLLINS (Editor of "The Dentist").
THE OUTLOOK at OTTAWA. By J. G. SWEAD COX.
THE ENGLISH MASQUE. By Professor EDWARD DOWDEN.
IS THERE REALLY a "CRISIS" in the CHURCH? By the Hon. Sir CHARLES ROE.
LORD ELLENBOROUGH. By Sir SPENCER WALPOLE, K.C.B.
OLD-AGE PENSIONS in FRANCE. By ARTHUR F. WOOD.
PARLIAMENTARY GOVERNMENT in JAPAN. By H. N. G. BUSHBY.
A SUPREME MOMENT (a Play in one Act). By Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

A THIN COCOA.

EPPS'S

The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistency of tea, of which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—JAMES EPPS & Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.

COCOA ESSENCE

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £1.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

The Old Series of THE ACADEMY, which ended on October 1st, completed a volume. The Index can be obtained gratis on application to the Publisher.

"THE ACADEMY"

LITERARY COMPETITIONS.

No. 39.

All readers attempting this week's Competition (described fully on page 23) must cut out this Coupon and enclose it with their reply.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

CHAPTER I.

The Old and the New Mediterranean Trade—The Pioneer Steamship—Arrival at Marseilles—The Cholera—Origin of the Crimean War—French Hilarity succeeded by Disappointment.

CHAPTER II.

The Passage to Constantinople—Reminiscences of Antiquity—Ashore in the Dardanelles—Disinterested Kindness of Suleyman Pasha—Constantinople and its Surroundings—The Passage to the Crimea—The Seaports and the Battlefields—Starvation at the English Camp—French Economy and Hospitality.

CHAPTER III.

The Mistake of the Allies in Making their Landing—The Commencement of the Siege and the Misery attending it—Another Passage from Marseilles—Narrow Escape from Foundering in a Gale—Arrival at Kamiesh—The Monastery of St. George.

CHAPTER IV.

The American and the French Cuisine—A Trip to the Sea of Azof—Contrasted Scenes of Peace and War—Vandalism of the Allies at Kerch—Trading with a Pasha—The Unsuccessful Attack on Sebastopol—Panic at Kamiesh and Balaklava—Return to Marseilles—Trip to Algeria.

CHAPTER V.

Return Again to the Crimea—Ravages of Disease in the Camps—French Transport System compared with Ours in the Civil War—The Sisters of Charity—The Capture of the Malakoff and Redan—A View of the Ruins—Bomb-proof Female Curiosity.

CHAPTER VI.

Entering the Turkish Service—The Turk a Man of his Word—Good Pay and Little Work—Our Philosophic Chief Officer—The Pasha's Bedclothes—His Friendship—No Use for a Propeller.

CHAPTER VII.

Hafiz Effendi and his Harem.

CHAPTER VIII.

Mustapha Pasha Wide Awake—We are Hurried Off to Eupatoria—A Rescue in the Black Sea—A British Frigate comes to our Aid—Arrival at Eupatoria.

CHAPTER IX.

The Blunder of a British General—A Post-Mortem held by Mr. Sears and Some of his Religious Ideas—The End of the War and Comments on its Results.

By Capt. CODMAN.

Frontispiece. 198 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained; or Complete Sets may be had separately for 3s. 6d. :—

BEN JONSON.
JOHN KEATS.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.
TOM HOOD.
THOMAS GRAY.
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
LEIGH HUNT.
LORD MACAULAY.
ROBERT SOUTHBY.
S. T. COLERIDGE.
CHARLES LAMB.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
SAMUEL PEPYS.
EDMUND WALLER.
WILKIE COLLINS.
JOHN MILTON.

WILLIAM COWPER.
CHARLES DARWIN.
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.
ANDREW MARVELL.
ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS CARLYLE.
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.
CHARLES DICKENS.
JONATHAN SWIFT.
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.
WILLIAM BLAKE.
SIR RICHARD STEELE.
ALEXANDER POPE.
DOUGLAS JERROLD.
FRANCIS BACON.
HENRIK IBSEN.

Holiday Reading.

A visit to any of the Great London Termini would show to the most casual observer that the usual annual exodus from hot, dusty London has set in. At this season of the year one's thoughts turn towards sea breezes and country rambles with a persistency not to be resisted. But even the most delightful country or seaside resort is apt to pall on us if not amply provided with pleasant relaxation in the shape of interesting books, and amongst the many that are now issued daily and weekly, we might almost say hourly, it is difficult to know what to choose from our librarian or bookseller.—THE FORTRESS OF YADASARA, by CHRISTIAN LYS, price 6s., is well worth obtaining. To quote the SCOTSMAN.—"The story is cleverly written, and the action moves freely and rapidly. There is plenty of excitement and adventure, and the marvellous element has the effect of humour by reason of the genial way in which the reader's incredulity is taken for granted and disregarded."

A clever Detective Story, FORTUNE'S TANGLED SKEIN, by the American Authoress, Miss JEANETTE H. WALWORTH, can be purchased for 3s. 6d., or procured at any library. The plot of this book is well worked out and the dénouement unexpected, which to the average novel-reader is a thing to be thankful for and seldom obtained.—A FAULTY COURTSHIP is a good book for a hot day, when one feels less inclined to exert oneself with sports, or even a country ramble; but on no account should WAYSIDE and WOODLAND BLOSSOMS be omitted from our trunks when setting forth on a holiday trip. These are two delightful little volumes, not dry reference works, but handy pocket-books for the amateur, by which any lover of wild flowers can identify even the simplest daisy plucked from the roadside without the smallest labour or research. One sees with pleasure that their Author, Mr. EDWARD STEP, is now engaged in the editing of PRATT'S FLOWERING PLANTS, and that it is being produced by the publishers in weekly parts, price 1s., which places this grand work within the reach of the general public. Space prevents our adding to this list of books, which it would be well to provide oneself with when away from home, but it suffices to add they can be obtained of all booksellers or libraries, or direct from the publishers, FREDERICK WARNE & Co., 15, Bedford Street, Strand, London, who will also send a catalogue free on application.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORTH WALKS COAST. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
BOSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED, and SNOWDON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVY.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICETH, and PWLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post

SECOND EDITION, ENLARGED, 5s.—80 Illustrations, 21 Maps and Pl.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With an additional Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'

HARPER'S NEW NOVELS.

Each in 1 vol., price 6s.

THAT FORTUNE. By Charles DUDLEY WARNER, Author of "The Golden House," "A Little Journey in the World," &c.

WHEN the SLEEPER WAKES. By H. G. WELLS, Author of "The Time Machine," "The War of the Worlds," &c. With Illustrations.

"Mr. Wells sustains his reputation as the leading novelist of the unknown in his latest effort of imagination."—World.

CARR of DIMSCAUR. By Theo. DOUGLAS, Author of "Behind a Mask," &c. "The book is astonishingly well done, and deserves serious reading as a literary performance."—Westminster Gazette.

ESPIRITU SANTO. A Novel. By HENRIETTA DANA SKINNER. Cloth Extra. "The final scenes are really poetical and touching."—Guardian.

WILLOWWOOD. By Esther MILLER. "Well and powerfully written."—Observer.

STUFF o' the CONSCIENCE. By LILY THICKNESSE, Author of "Two Sinners," "Egeria," &c. "Should make wider the public already acquainted with the work of the author."—Observer.

THE ADVENTURERS. By H. B. MARIOTT WATSON. With Illustrations by A. I. Keller. "It is a book to give a boy and then to borrow from him for one's own reading."—Fall Mall Gazette.

OLD CHESTER TALES. By MARGARET DELAND. Illustrated by Edward Pyle. Cloth extra. "There is a sterling ring about these tales. Here, indeed, there is no base metal."—Fall Mall Gazette.

HIS COUNTERPART. By R. M. GARNIER.

THE WORLD BEWITCHED. By the AUTHOR of "THE SON of the CZAR."

THE WHITE WOMAN. By W. EDWARDS TIREBUCK, Author of "Meg of the Scarlet Foot." "Quite unforgettable."—Sketch.

AN ANGEL in a WEB. By Julian RALPH, Author of "Alone in China." "Mr. Ralph writes pleasantly and unaffectedly..... the book is a good one."—Literature.

CROMWELL'S OWN. By Arthur PATERSON, Author of "A Man of His Word," "Father and Son," &c.

THE SPAN o' LIFE: a Novel. By WILLIAM McLENNAN and J. N. McILWRAITH. Profusely Illustrated by F. de Myrbach. Cloth extra. "The volume is brimful of interest from beginning to end."—Publishers' Circular.

RAGGED LADY: a Novel. By WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS, Author of "A Story of a Play." Illustrated by A. I. Keller. "Ragged Lady" has in full measure the sovereign qualities of fascination and distinction."—Spectator.

RUPERT ARMSTRONG. By O. SHAKESPEAR, Author of "Love on a Mortal Lens," &c. "A sincere and felt piece of work, well realized and very well written."—Literature.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
London & New York.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

"MASTERS OF MEDICINE."—New Volumes.
CLAUDE BERNARD. By Sir MICHAEL FOSTER. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

A FASCINATING NEW NOVEL BY LORD ERNEST HAMILTON.

THE PERILS of JOSEPHINE. By the Author of "The Outlaws of the Marches," &c. (Unwin's Green Cloth Library.) 4s. (Ready July 12.)

THE SUPPLEMENT TO THE CENTURY DICTIONARY.

A CYCLOPEDIA of NAMES: a Pronouncing and Etymological Dictionary of Names in Geography, Biography, Mythology, History, Ethnology, Art, Archaeology, Fiction, &c. Edited by BENJAMIN E. SMITH, A.M. In 1 vol., half-cloth extra, £2 2s. net. Also in half-morocco, £2 15s. net.

A ROMANCE of CEYLON. By E. O. WALKER, C.I.E. Cloth, 6s. (Just out.) The author of this novel has resided in India and Ceylon for some years, and designs to picture some of the phases of European and native life and the beauties of the scenery in that island with which he has become familiar. The relations between European and Singhalese are touched upon, and the difficulties attending the removal of the hard barrier separating the two classes brought into relief.

AN OBSTINATE PARISH. By M. L. LORD ("Sydney Christian"). Author of "Lydia." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. "The novel is written with great power.... there is not a character but what fills its niche most effectively."—Aberdeen Free Press.

THADY HALLORAN. By William BRESLIN. Cloth, 6s. (Just out.) The story of a light-hearted, reckless Irishman whose ardent Jacobinism leads him into trouble with the authorities. To escape arrest he flies to take service with the Irish Brigade in France. He wins the favour of the old Pretender, and is sent to England in connection with the rising of 1715, where he contrives the escape of the Jacobite prisoners from Newgate.

AN ESSAY AGAINST IBSENISM.
REALISM a PARADOX. By David MARTINEAU HAYTINGS. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net. A brief inquiry into the Principles of Realism in Dramatic Art, calling attention to the paradoxical nature of the movement, and showing that it must inevitably defeat its own ends. London: T. FISHER UNWIN, 11, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

F. V. WHITE &amp; CO.'S LIST.

JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW BOOK.
Now ready, in paper cover, illustrated, price 1s.
THE BINKS FAMILY.
THE BINKS FAMILY.

ARCHIBALD CLAVERING GUNTER'S NEW NOVEL.
Now ready, in 1 vol., price 6s.
A FLORIDA ENCHANTMENT. By the Author of "Mr. Barnes of New York."

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.—Now ready

A RATIONAL MARRIAGE. By FLORENCE MARRYAT.

BONNIE MAGGIE LAUDER. By ALAN ST. AUBYN, Author of "A Fellow of Trinity," &c.

SAROLTA'S VERDICT: a Romance. By E. YOLLAND, Author of "In Days of Strife," &c.

HENRY MASSINGER. By Mrs. ROBERT JOCELYN (the Hon. Mrs. Jocelyn), Author of "Lady Mary's Experience," "Only a Horse Dealer," &c.

THE SECRET of LYNNDALE. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The Bohemian Girls."

THE GODS SAW OTHERWISE. By F. H. MELL.

NORRINGTON LE VALE. By J. G. LYALL, Author of "The Merry Gee-Gee."

BELLING the CAT. By Perrington PRIMM.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

VOLUMES I. and II. NOW READY.

UNIFORM EDITION OF THE PROSE WRITINGS OF RUDYARD KIPLING.
In 10 vols., extra crown 8vo, red cloth, gilt tops, 6s. each.

PLAIN TALES FROM THE HILLS. LIFE'S HANDICAP.
Being Stories of Mine Own People.

FOURTH THOUSAND.
NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "ELIZABETH and HER GERMAN GARDEN."
THE SOLITARY SUMMER

Extra crown 8vo, 6s.
SPECTATOR.—"The author of 'Elizabeth and her German Garden' has written a second book of the same description, which is even more charming than her first.... In her company we have never been dull, no pages have to be skipped, and the only regret is that there are not more to read."

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION IN ONE VOL (Condensed.)

Extra crown 8vo, 10s. net.
BISMARCK: Some Secret Pages of his History.
Being a Diary kept by Dr. MORITZ BUSCH during 'Twenty-five Years' Official and Private Intercourse with the Great Chancellor.

THREE HISTORICAL ROMANCES.
RICHARD CARVEL. By Winston CHURCHILL, Author of "The Celebrity." Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Upwards of 10,000 copies have been sold in America within three weeks of publication."

ENGLISH REVIEWS.
OBSERVER.—"A fine historical story of early American days; full of incident and 'go,' and admirably written."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Full of good things. The narrative excels in incidents, interesting, vivid, and picturesque."

AMERICAN REVIEWS.
N.Y. TRIBUNE.—"A remarkably workmanlike production."
BOOKMAN (U.S.A.).—"Mr. Churchill has cause to feel proud of his work."
BOSTON HERALD.—"Pure romance of the most captivating and alluring order."

RUPERT, by the GRACE of GOD. By DORA GREENWELL McCHESNEY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ATHENÆUM.—"A singularly successful specimen of the 'historical' fiction of the day."
WORLD.—"The reader will rapidly find his attention absorbed by a really stirring picture of stirring times."

HUGH GWYETH: a Roundhead Cavalier. By BEULAH MARIE DIX. Crown 8vo, 6s.

OBSERVER.—"A romance of the seventeenth century full of spirit and 'go.'"
BOOKMAN.—"A stirring tale.... Thoroughly well told and interesting."

LEEDS MERCURY.—"An attractive, capable story of the closing scenes in the reign of Charles I."

ROLF BOLDREWOOD'S NEW NOVEL.
"WAR to the KNIFE"; or, Tangata Maori. Crown 8vo, 6s.
ACADEMY.—"A stirring romance."

RHODA BROUGHTON'S NEW NOVEL.
THE GAME and the CANDLE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

MRS. HENRY WOOD'S NOVELS.
The New and Cheaper Editions, each Story in one volume, crown 8vo, red cloth, price 2s. 6d., or in green cloth, price 2s., may be obtained at all Booksellers, where a complete list of the Thirty-seven Stories may be seen.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.
ROBIN. By Mrs. Parr. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
GRAPHIC.—"An exceedingly graceful and attractive tale."

MACMILLAN & CO., LIMITED, London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1118. Established 1869.

8 July, 1899.

Price Threepence
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

Now, when the interest in the year's pictures is exhausted, Sarah Bernhardt gone, Mr. Rhodes a D.C.L., and Fiona McLeod proved to be Fiona McLeod, we are reluctant to lessen the number of subjects for gossip. Yet we must do so. Some person, possibly malicious, probably feckless, has spread a report that the ACADEMY has changed, or is about to change, ownership. The rumour is absolutely without foundation.

WITH the beginning of next year Punch will undergo very considerable changes in form, size, and character. Among other things, a wider scope will be given to literary matter.

THE late Victor Cherbuliez was an excellent specimen of the gentleman of letters. He was learned, cultured, witty; he loved books and he loved Nature too—particularly in the form of roses; he was interested in politics, in scholarship, and in art. He began his career as a novelist in 1863, with Comte Kostia, and everyone was delighted. Since then he has poured out fiction copiously, passing by degrees into the naturalistic school. He wrote an excellent work on Greek art, Apropos d'un Cheval; he became a member of the Academy; he reviewed books for the Revue des Deux Mondes, his particular gift being rapid and attractive summary. He was not great, and latterly people were finding it out; but he was exceedingly accomplished. He died suddenly last week at the age of seventy.

A new and characteristic story of Björnson is related by the Paris correspondent of the Morning Post. The recent Congress of the Scandinavian Press, at Christiania, was a very important affair, including receptions by King Oscar and the Municipality of Christiania, and Björnson and Ibsen had both been invited to take part in it. Neither, however, put in an appearance. Ibsen wrote a polite letter explaining that his old age prevented him from accepting the invitation. Björnson was not so courteous. He sent the following telegram to the President of the Congress: "I do not make long voyages to dine with people who spread calumnies against me, and attack my honour daily."

IBSEN, says the same authority, is working at a drama, the title of which he is concealing jealously. He hopes to complete the work by the autumn. It will not, however, be produced at the inauguration of the new Municipal Theatre of Christiania, the author not considering it suitable for that occasion. Ibsen is thinking of writing his memoirs.

THE drawing by Mr. W. Nicholson which serves as frontispiece to The Hooligan Nights, and is reproduced in our review of that book, on another page, is not, it should be understood, a portrait of Mr. Rook's hero, but a character-sketch of the Hooligan type. We have seen a photograph of Young Alf, the central figure of the book. He has neither the brutality nor sensuality of Mr. Nicholson's imaginary sinner, but is clean cut, alert, and intelligent-looking. Young Alf's rule of life—

If you want a flog you got to take it—would, by the way, make an excellent motto for Imperialist Britain.

THE most popular books in America during the past month were still

David Harum. E. N. Westcott.
When Knighthood was in Flower. E. Caskoien.
Mr. Dooley. F. P. Dunne.
Red Rock. T. N. Page.
The Day's Work. R. Kipling.
Aylwin. T. Watts-Dunton.
Dross. H. S. Merriman.

Surely America has been reading David Harum long enough.

It will surprise many persons to hear that Mr. Douglas Sladen has severed his connexion with Who's Who. The circumstances leading him to take this step need not be explained; but Mr. Sladen expresses his intention of bringing out an annual of his own, upon which he will set to work as soon as the arrangements are complete. This publication will be similar in character to Who's Who, but will also contain an entirely new feature of importance.

WE hope that some day the Pall Mall Gazette will publish a selection of the little poems that flutter through its Occasional paragraphs. The following verses, which appeared in our contemporary last Wednesday, have a note of personality and feeling not usual in newspaper verse:

So I have harvested my womanhood
Into one tall green bush of southernwood;
And if the leaves are green about your feet,
And if my fragrance on a day should meet
And brace your weariness, why, not in vain
Shall I have husbanded from sun and rain
My spices if you chance to find them sweet.

I have grown up beneath the sheltering shade
Of roses: roses' poignant scents have made
My sharp spice sweeter than 'twas wont to be.
Therefore, if any vagrant gather me
And wear me in his bosom, I will give Him dreams of roses; he shall dream and live,
And wake to find the rose a verity.

Gather me, gather. I have dreams to sell.
The sea is not by any fluted shell
More faithfully remembered, than I keep
My thought of roses, through beguiling sleep
And the bewildering day. I'll give to him
Who gathers me more sweetness than he'd dream
Without me—more than any lily could;
I that am flowerless, being southernwood.

SOME time ago a volume of short stories entitled A Browning Courtship was published. The other day a customer entered a book-shop and asked for the book. He was handed The Letters of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

ONE or two changes in publishing firms are announced. Messrs. Harper & Brothers and Messrs. McClure, Doubleday & Co. are uniting their forces, and should make a very strong combination. Messrs. Service & Paton have, meanwhile, dissolved partnership. Mr. Service retires altogether from publishing, and Mr. Paton joins Messrs. Nisbet, who will henceforward issue the books associated with his late firm, among them being some good illustrated editions of standard books and some of Mrs. Atherton's novels.

It is, of course, in America that the effects of the Harper & McClure alliance will be most noticeably felt, but they will probably extend to this country too. In an interview published in the New York Sun Mr. Harper says: "We have some plans looking toward developments in the magazine world in a field in which Mr. McClure has been very successful. Mr. McClure believes, too, that our facilities would enable us to carry out together certain important publishing plans of his, since we have one of the largest plants in the country, and issue more periodicals than any other house. So, finding a number of points of common interest, we decided to work together." A work of very considerable dimensions and importance is already announced to be published by the amalgamation—The Harper-McClure Encyclopædia. This will be, it is said, the most ambitious encyclopædia yet projected.

The Daily News Weekly is rather a light-hearted miscellany than a summary of the week. Everyone seems to be under orders to be lively, so much so that an article by Mr. F. T. Bullen is headed by a drawing of that gentleman astride on a whale, or something very like one, with the legend beneath, "He struck oil." In its first number Mr. Richard Whiteing has a sketch in the manner of No. 5, John Street, and Mr. W. H. Fitchett, the author of Fights for the Flag, tells why Australians are loyal. Mr. Fitchett, by the way, is also contributing to the Spectator his impressions of London.

Now that the cause of Finland is arousing so much attention, and a memorial has even been sent from certain English friends of freedom to the Czar, our readers might like to look again at a clever novel by Miss Elsa D'Esterre Keeling, called Appassionata, published in 1893, the scene of which is laid in great part in Finland, and the heroine a Finnish girl who marries a Russian. The book, a German translation of which exists, serves as a useful commentary on the present situation.

APROPPOS of Finland, the periodical, to which we lately referred, that has been founded to further the cause of the Finns, has quickly been followed by Italy, a periodical intended to draw closer together the country after which it is named and Great Britain. Italy, "the only English Organ for Italians and Friends of Italy in the United Kingdom," hopes "to act as an intermediary between the two countries, which, albeit far apart in point of nationality, climate, customs, and religious feeling, are proceeding on parallel lines towards the goal of the good, the beautiful, and the true," and it is apparently conducted by an Italian editor. The little paper is a monthly.

The American Bookman states that Mr. J. K. Jerome's next book will probably be entitled Three Men on a Bicycle, and will describe a tour in the Black Forest.

The Book of the Art Workers' Masque, which we noticed last week, is also the Summer Number of The Studio, and was prepared under the supervision of the editor of The Studio. It is yet another example of his taste and thoroughness.

THE fanciful portrait of the Irish poet and mystic, Mr. William Butler Yeats, which we give below is the work of Mr. W. T. Horton. Mr. Horton, as joint author with Mr. Yeats of A Book of Images, should know his subject well. He has made his picture both a portrait and criticism. Mr. Yeats's experiments in necromancy are suggested by the retort and the volume on which he stands, his poetry and mysticism by other books; and there is, in fact, nothing in the drawing that has not special significance. One thing, however, the artist has not quite realised—Mr. Yeats's height. The poet is long and willowy.

MR. W. B. YEATS.

Drawn by W. T. Horton.

WE find the following announcement in the Paris Journal:

En attendant, le JOURNAL publiera les
PIRATES DE LA MER, émouvante nouvelle, inédite de
H.-G. WELLS,

le célèbre romancier anglais, qui unit à la verve amusante de Jules Verne la profondeur et l'étrangeté d'invention d'Edgard Poe.

Traduction Littérale de
M. HENRY D. DAVRAY.

PASSAGES from the new Stevenson letters in Scribner's. From a reply to Mr. Stevenson, sen., who had complained of the confrontation, in "Admiral Guinea," of Pew's blackguardism and the captain's piety. November, 1884:

Religion is in the world; I do not think you are the man to deny the importance of its rôle; and I have long decided not to leave it on one side in art. The opposition of the Admiral and Mr. Pew is not, to my eyes, either horrible or irreverent; but it may be, and it probably is, very ill done: what then? This is a failure; better luck next time: more power to the elbow, more discussion, more wisdom in the design, and the old defeat becomes the scene of the new victory. Concern yourself about no failure; they do not cost lives, as in engineering; they are the pierres perdues of successes. Fame is (truly) a vapour, do not think of it; if the writer means well and tries hard, no failure will injure him, whether with God or man.

To Mr. Henley:

But I do desire a book of adventure—a romance—and no man will get or write me one. Dumas I have read and re-read too often; Scott, too, and I am short. I want to hear swords clash. I want a book to begin in a good way; a book, I guess, like Treasure Island, alas! which I have never read, and cannot though I live to ninety. I would God that some one else had written it! By all that I can learn, it is the very book for my complaint. I like the way I hear it opens; and they tell me John Silver is good fun. And to me it is, and must ever be, a dream unrealised, a book unwritten.

To J. A. Symonds:

Have you read Huckleberry Finn? It contains many excellent things; above all, the whole story of a healthy boy's dealings with his conscience, incredibly well done.

To P. G. Hamerton:

I am almost glad to have seen death so close with all my wits about me, and not in the customary lassitude and disenchantment of disease. Even thus clearly beheld I find him not so terrible as we suppose. But, indeed, with the passing of years, the decay of strength, the loss of all my old active and pleasant habits, there grows more and more upon me that belief in the kindness of this scheme of things, and the goodness of our veiled God, which is an excellent and pacifying compensation.

In a letter to Mr. Gosse from Bournemouth, Stevenson thus subscribed himself: "Robert Louis Stevenson, the Hermit of Skerryvore. Author of 'John Vane Tempest: a Romance,' 'Herbert and Henrietta; or, the Nemesis of Sentiment,' 'The Life and Adventures of Colonel Bludyer Fortescue,' 'Happy Homes and Hairy Faces,' 'A Pound of Feathers and a Pound of Lead,' part author of 'Minn's Complete Capricious Correspondent: a Manual of Natty, Natural, and Knowing Letters,' and editor of the 'Poetical Remains of Samuel Burt Crabbe, known as the melodious Bottle-Holder.' Uniform with the above: 'The Life and Remains of the Reverend Jacob Degray Squah,' author of 'Heave-yo for the New Jerusalem,' 'A Box of Candles; or the Patent Spiritual Safety Match,' and 'A Day with the Heavenly Harriers.'"

How many people are aware that Mr. J. M. Barrie once wrote a pretty considerable serial which he has had the courage to leave in the pages of the magazine where it appeared. It was an Irish story, and saw the light in the Young Man shortly after Mr. Barrie was "discovered" by Dr. Nicoll. These were the days of his nom-de-plume "Gavin Ogilvy." The tale had little signs of the Barrie we now know, though there is a slight similarity between the opening chapters and the beginning of Sentimental Tommy. Mr. Barrie is, like all true Scots, an economical workman, and if he hits on a good idea in an article he is pretty sure to elaborate it in his "full dress" books. By the way, it is curious how few of his clever things have got into circulation. For example, could anything be neater than his definition, which still holds good, of the two kinds of realism: "One describes the cup with the crack in it, the other the crack in the cup." One wonders if his politics remain as they were in the days when he wrote of Lord Rosebery: "He was a peer; I flung a clod at him; these were my politics."

FROM an article in the Arena, by Mr. Adachi Kinnoasukô, entitled "A Japanese View of Kipling," we cull a few blossoms:

Stevenson, Barrie, Watson. Then came Kipling, and the public surveyed him between its half-closed eyes, like the Viceroy watching Mellish with the fumigatory, and said, "Evidently this is the wrong tiger; but it is an original animal."

In 1888 the Plain Tales from the Hills came out. When the writer (an utter stranger to Kipling's fame then) took up a copy of the book, the summer evening was lazy in Hot Springs, and a mighty host of mosquitoes was spoiling the amiable temper of a patient lamp. But the sorcery of words in the very first piece, "Lispeth," struck him. He gasped, smiled, soliloquised, and said, among many other things, "This man may write how a hen picked a grain, and I would pronounce his account artistic."

Anglo-Saxon genius is much with Kant and Scott French and the Orient are different. Kipling came from the Orient. "Soldiers Three" was published in 1888.

Molière may very likely treat Kipling with respect. Mr. Kipling's wit is as dry and as calm and as solemn as a mule putting a boy through the most extraordinary acrobatic feat of jumping between its long ears and over its head.

Speaking of a Hindoo widow of about fifteen years of age, Kipling says: "And she prayed the gods day and night to send her a lover, for she did not approve of living alone." Will you observe the effect of the latter clause as you read the passage? The picture of a fifteen-year-old widow praying for a lover is touching, truly so. Kipling reduced this most natural and ardent feeling of a girl into a mere outcome of a fallacious, pseudo-comical, intellectual reasoning—"because she did not approve of living alone!" and as a matter of course butchered the delicate effect.

The absence of stories—really good stories—in the writings of Mr. Kipling is remarkable, and his indifference as to the matter and the content is well-nigh sublime—like unto that of the logicians. All is the way in which the commonplace tales are told; all is form in which they are put; and old Mrs. Kendrick's turkey-gobbler with a plug hat on is strutting all through his stories.

THE Idler, which under the joint editorship of Mr. Arthur Lawrence and Mr. S. H. Sime has gained in character, includes, in a readable summer number, an illustrated criticism of Goya, the Spanish artist.

WE find ourselves unexpectedly, and very much to our surprise, in the position of being able to instruct the readers of Notes and Queries. It happens thus. Some time ago we published an acrostic by Lewis Carroll beginning with the line "My first is followed by a bird," the answer to which was "Imagination." At the end Lewis Carroll made an offer of five pounds to anyone who could write another acrostic with the same opening, yet making no use of the answer to the original one. As it is obviously impossible to compose an acrostic without employing a certain amount of imagination, the offer was safe; none the less, one of our readers alleged that he had done so, the following charade being the result:

My first is followed by a bird,
My second's met by plasters,
My whole's more shunned, but less absurd,
Than prigs or poetasters;
'Tis also a symbolic word
For architects' disasters.

He enclosed with it the answer.

OUR readers had been so worried by Lewis Carroll's riddle that they were unable to come to this second problem with any spirit, and we were not called upon to divulge the solution. We had, indeed, forgotten all about it until the other day, when a reader asked us to put an end to her difficulties in the matter. We did so, and our attention was then called to certain recent numbers of Notes and Queries, that wonderful repository of stray information and quaint curiosity. On March 11, it seems, a gentleman of North London quoted the charade and asked for the answer. Why he did not apply to the paper which printed it passes understanding, but he did not. On March 25 a reply came:

CHARADE (9th S. iii. 187).—It is very easy indeed; answer—Blackleg. WALTER W. SKEAT.

Prof. Skeat is as learned as man can be, but how he can consider "blackleg" a symbolic word for architects' disasters beats us. It beat also another correspondent of Notes and Queries, who wrote, on April 15:

CHARADE (9th S. iii. 187, 237).—The charade may be very easy, but the key furnished by Prof. Skeat does not seem to fit the wards of the lock. ST. SWITHIN.

On April 29 another critic returned to the charge:

CHARADE (9th S. iii. 187, 237, 296).—Prof. Skeat's solution is a blindfold one. How is blackleg "a symbolic word for architects' disasters"? (See first reference.) I offer a more likely solution—humbug. F. ADAMS.

And on June 17 he wrote again:

CHARADE (9th S. iii. 187, 237, 296, 331).—I withdraw the solution offered at the last reference, having now no doubt that the correct solution is billsticker. A bird, of course, "follows its bill" in place of a nose. F. ADAMS.

THE answer is "Eyesore."

ANOTHER of the little personal magazines—"chipmunks" they call them in America—which from time to time appear and disappear is promised by Mr. James J. Guthrie, an Essex artist. Its title is the Elf, and it will be published once a quarter for a year. This is a dull world, and there is room for an Elf now and then.

THE COVER OF THE "ELF."
Designed by J. J. Guthrie.

ing much of the seamy side of London life during the last twenty-five years. It will be profusely illustrated.

Bibliographical.

I AM sorry to gather that Mr. Clement Scott, in his forthcoming book, The Drama of Yesterday and To-day, will begin no farther back than the year 1841. That, it appears, was the year of his birth—an inadequate reason, surely, for starting his narrative at that point. It would have been more natural to start at the point at which Mr. Scott's personal acquaintance with the acted drama began. I express my regret in this place, because, if Mr. Scott is going to give us a systematic history of the English stage from 1841, it is a pity he did not begin where Genest, in his well-known English Stage, left off—namely, in 1830. English plays from 1830 onwards want "Genesting" badly, and one hopes that the task may some day be undertaken and carried through. All that we possess in that direction is only fragmentary. Henry Morley's Journal of a London Playgoer extends from 1851 to 1866; Dutton Cook's Nights at the Play, from 1867 to 1881; and Joseph Knight's Theatrical Notes, from 1874 to 1879; but in no case is the narrative complete, or approaching to completeness. E. L. Blanchard's Diary covers the ground, in a sense, from 1844 to 1889; but his entries are mere jottings, which have been annotated by his editors in over-elaborate fashion. A sequel to Genest is still to be desired.

It is said that Mr. Frank Mathew, who has already made Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn the central figures of a work of fiction, proposes to do the same thing for "Bloody Queen Mary" and for "Good Queen Bess" (with whom, as the legal phrase is, Mary Queen of Scots). Mr. Gomme has recently shown, by the issue of his Library of Historical Fiction, that we are, as a nation, none too well off for novels of this sort. English history has not greatly attracted our romancists. Even good old G. P. R. James, though he gave us Darnley, Gowrie, and a few other such, seemed to find better or more attractive material in Continental annals, turning out, one after another, such tales as Agincourt, Agnes Sorrel, Attila, Henry of Guise, The Jacquerie, Mary of Burgundy, Philip Augustus, Richelieu, and so forth. Harrison Ainsworth was more loyal to his native land; and many an imagination is still being coloured by his Boscobel, and Guy Fawkes, and Star Chamber, and Tower of London, and Windsor Castle, to name no others. It would have been well if all our "historical" novels had been written by real masters of history.

The paper in Macmillan on "The True Poet of Imperialism" raises some interesting points in the bibliography of Tennyson. In 1852 the poet contributed to the Examiner three patriotic lyrics. One of these, "The Third of February," he included in his Collected Poems, for the first time, twenty years afterwards. Of another, "Hands All Round," he took the original first stanza, altered it slightly, and, adding two new stanzas, printed the result in Tiresias, and Other Poems (1885). The two new stanzas—and especially the second of the two—were admirable. Still, it is impossible not to regret that the poet did not reprint "Hands All Round" exactly as it first appeared. However, it figures in full in his Biography, and I see that the writer in Macmillan quotes one of the stirring stanzas addressed to America. The third poem, "Britons, Guard Your Own," has never been reprinted entire. The version included in the Biography is a selection from the original, slightly altered; it is that for which the poet's wife wrote some music.

The late Mrs. Southworth—or, to give her full name, the late Mrs. Emma Dorothy Eliza Nevitt Southworth—was, I take it, very much better known in America than in England. Nevertheless, at least twenty of her books found publishers and (we may assume) readers in this country; and some others, printed and published in the States, obtained circulation here. Her first appearance in England as an authoress seems to have been made so long ago as 1853, in which year our public had the opportunity of reading four of her works. Then came such masterpieces as The Lost Heiress, The Deserted Wife, Winnie Darling, The Island Princess, The Hidden Hand, The Lost Bride, Retribution, The Two Sisters, and Astraea. The year 1878 seems to have been that of her grand climacteric in our midst. In 1878 no fewer than eight of her fictions were published in London. To the present generation, however, she can be but the shadow of a name.

It is permissible, I hope, to conceive that the book which is to be called With Zola in England will turn out to be more or less Boswellian in character—the work of an intimate admirer, based on close acquaintance and inspired by genuine sympathy. The spirit of Boswell still reigns in many a literary personality. One could name a good many books of the more or less immediate past, which, though quasi-biographical, were really the outcome of conscious or unconscious "interviewing." Of such were Mr. Joseph Hatton's With Henry Irving in America and the same writer's Reminiscences of J. L. Toole. When M. Zola writes about England, he will do so in his own way. Meanwhile, we may as well have his "impressions" of us and ours in an informal and uncommitting way.

Since 1869—I find a brother bibliographer remarking—that venerable piece of work, Pollok's Course of Time, "has gradually dropped out of notice"; but, so far is this hoary classic from being utterly played out that a new edition of it, with a memoir of the author, appeared so recently as May 1898, while, so lately as last December, Miss Rosaline Masson made Pollok one of the two subjects of a volume in the "Famous Scots" series.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Philosophy with the Hammer.

THE WORKS OF FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE.—Edited by Alexander Tille, Ph.D. Vol. I.: A Genealogy of Morals, and Poems. Vol. II.: Thus Spake Zarathustra. Vol. III.: The Case of Wagner, &c. (Fisher Unwin.)

La Philosophie de Nietzsche. Par Henri Lichtenberger. (F. Alcan.)

Frédéric Nietzsche: Pages Choisies. Publiées par Henri Albert. (Mercur de France.)

"NIETZSCHE," says Dr. Tille, "has already become an European event like Hegel." Says Mr. Havelock Ellis: "Nietzsche represents one of the greatest spiritual forces which have appeared since Goethe." He is "a man who has certainly stood at the finest summit of modern culture, and has thence made the most determined effort ever made to destroy modern morals." On the Continent, Nietzsche is regarded as the founder of a new school of philosophy, centring in the Nietzsche-Archiv at Naumburg and Weimar, which has produced the authoritative edition of his works, and has collected material for the voluminous biography by his sister, Elizabeth Förster-Nietzsche. France has produced an admirable monograph by Prof. Lichtenberger, while another is in preparation by M. Albert. In England, with the exception of a few lectures and magazine articles, singularly little direct attention has been paid to Nietzsche. In grappling with German speculation, English thinkers have got about as far as Hegel. This attempt of Mr. Fisher Unwin's to put an English translation upon the market is, we believe, the second that has been made; and we should like to feel assured that any volumes beyond the first three will ever be published. Inquiring at Oxford, we learnt that the late Prof. Wallace once lectured upon Nietzsche, and that another lecturer had used him as a modern parallel to illustrate the position of the blatant sophist Thrasymachus in The Republic. We do not feel sure that this latter judgment, so very characteristic of Oxford, will not prove to be the right and ultimate one. But in the meantime it is worth while to read Nietzsche, if only because he gives naked and unashamed expression to views of life and ideals of conduct which, often latent and unavowed, appear for the moment to be an increasing influence as an element in modern civilisation. That they represent a backwater we do not doubt; but they should none the less be faced and accounted for.

Whatever is thought of Nietzsche's philosophy, his life is an interesting and a very tragic one. Though he has long ceased to write he is still alive, and afflicted with incurable dementia. He was the son of a long race of Lutheran ministers. The legend of his boyhood we may perhaps pass over. He studied at Bonn and Leipzig, became a favourite pupil of Ritschl, devoted himself to philology in the broader German sense of the word, and in 1869 was chosen professor of classical philology—the Humanities, as we should say—at Basle. But philology never interested him so much as philosophy. He came under the influence, firstly, of Schopenhauer, and, secondly, of Wagner, with whom for many years he was on intimate personal terms. A treatise on the Birth of Tragedy, containing some imaginative speculations on the "Dionysian" and "Apollonian" elements in Greek civilisation, initiated his career as an independent thinker. This work, together with the series of early essays which ends with the Wagner in Bayreuth, contains the germs only of his subsequent intellectual development. In 1876 Nietzsche broke with Wagner, in whom he had come to see the incarnation of the Christian, altruistic tendencies which he himself was growing to regard as the canker of civilisation. About the same time his health broke down. Between 1876 and 1880 his chief literary work consisted in a series of volumes of pensées, which are not yet included in Prof. Tille's translation. In the latter year he resigned his chair; and, shortly afterwards, began the succession of books which are the most complete and uncompromising expression of his individual philosophy. Thus Spake Zarathustra, his most ambitious writing, appeared in 1884; the Genealogy of Morals, the most tangible, in 1887; the Case of Wagner, in the summer of 1888. Then Nietzsche began, as he put it himself, to "philosophise with the hammer." The Twilight of the Gods was intended as a prelude to a great effort, by which Nietzsche proposed a complete overthrow of current ideals, a Transvaluation of all Values. Of this he wrote only The Antichrist, a criticism of Christianity. This was to have been followed by The Free Spirit, a criticism of philosophy; The Immoralist, a criticism of "the most fatal kind of ignorance, morality"; and Dionysos, a constructive attempt to establish a "philosophy of eternal recurrence." This scheme was never carried out. Most of Nietzsche's later books show distinct traces of mental aberration, which betrays itself not in any defection of the general argument, but in that not uncommon symptom of insanity known to alienists as megalomania. Nietzsche had formed an extraordinary conception of the significance of his own work, and of his position as the prophet of the "Uebermensch," who should be to Man, when Man gave up altruism, what Man now is to the Ape. "I have given to men the deepest book they possess, my Zarathustra," he wrote; and in a letter of November, 1888, to his friend George Brandes: "I swear to you that in two years the whole earth will be writhing in convulsions. I am a Fate (ein Verhängnis)." On January 4th, 1889, he wrote another letter to the same friend, which he signed "Der Gekreuzigte," "the crucified one." A few days later, at Turin, the blow fell, and Nietzsche was hurried off to a lunatic asylum.

The disciples of Nietzsche hold by Thus Spake Zarathustra as their gospel. It is, says Prof. Tille, "a work half philosophy, half fiction; half an ethical sermon, half a story; a book serio-jocular and scientifico-fantastical; historico-satirical and realistico-idealistic; a novel embracing worlds and ages, and, at the same time, expressing a pure essence of Nietzsche—an astounding prose-poem." To us, unfortunately, the sayings of Zarathustra, a kind of Teutonised Zoroaster, seem to be, as literature, completely illegible. They are verbose, inflated, entirely lacking in that definiteness and lucidity of expression which alone can justify the pensée. Nietzsche, who hated his fellow-countrymen, never seems to have quite realised how German he really was. A more orderly and systematic expression of Nietzsche's leading philosophical doctrines will be found, not to speak of Lichtenberger's excellent little summary, in the Genealogy of Morals. But even here it must be borne in mind that Nietzsche looked upon himself more as a devouring personality than as a maker of systems. Want of system is a convenient failing for an illogical philosopher, because of the unexampled advantages it affords for wriggling when you are pinned. And as the most of men absorb indefinite and disconnected ideas more readily than systematic and consistent ones, it does not make the philosophy less dynamic.

Nietzsche closes The Antichrist as follows:

This eternal accusation of Christianity I shall write on all walls, wherever there are walls; I have letters for making even the blind see. . . . I call Christianity the one great curse, the one great intrinsic depravity, the one great instinct of revenge for which no expedient is sufficiently poisonous, secret, subterranean, mean; I call it the one immortal blemish of mankind.

Nietzsche's detestation of Christianity—a detestation in which he fully included those modern thinkers who, rejecting Christianity, attempt to find a new basis for the content of Christian ethics—arose from the fact that it stands in the development of European culture as the great representative of altruism. Around altruism, the ethics of pity, all Nietzsche's speculation centres. Logically he starts, not so much, as Prof. Lichtenberger tries to make out, from Schopenhauer, as from the conclusions of modern biology. From the point of view of biology, "higher," as applied to man, means "more able to hold his own in the struggle for existence," or, as Prof. Tille puts it, "with greater physical strength, more richly differentiated, able to defend its life against more dangerous enemies, gifted with more effective means of motion and of getting food, having progeny which at birth, though smaller, is almost as perfect otherwise as the parents. Bodily differentiation and the qualification of the individual for self-defence and food-acquisition stand in the foreground." Translated into ethical language, this comes to the same as saying that the higher man is the man in whom the "self-regarding" instincts and desires are most strongly developed. In opposition to this, modern and Christian ethics maintain that the "higher" man, from the ethical point of view, is just the man in whom these "self-regarding" impulses are, roughly speaking, subordinated to those which are "other-regarding," "unselfish," "altruistic." How, if at all, is this antithesis between the biological and the ethical standpoints to be got over? For Nietzsche the answer is very simple. He denies altogether the value of the ethical pronouncement. Altruism, he declares, is hurtful to life, to the expansion of the individual, or the species. It is a sign of decadence, of degeneration. And the lesson of Zarathustra is simply the lesson of the denial of pity. "This new table, O my brethren, I put over you: Become hard! . . ." The only true morality is that which is in accordance with the biological standard, that which springs from the will to live, is self-assertive, victorious—in a word, selfish. This, he maintains, is the natural morality of aristocrats, and in particular of the "blond Aryan beast," the conquering Teutonic tribes, who overran and became overlords of Europe. And he contrasts it with the "slave" morality of the small dark races, such as the Jews, which glorifies altruism because it cannot kill, and which, through the cunning of a priest caste, has imposed itself as Christianity upon modern life. Hence the physiological evils which beset modern man and the pessimism which is the natural reflex of these.

Stated nakedly, the gospel of Nietzsche is not very convincing. Apart from the false philology and the ethnology pour rire upon which it partly rests, the central fallacy becomes too conspicuous. It is too obvious that the "higher" of biology and the "higher" of ethics are quite distinct things. It is of the essence of what is ethically "higher" to be the end of human conduct. It is a goal and object of desire. And unless you can explain away the moral sense as an illusion produced by psychological processes which do not imply a moral sense, then the authority of the moral ideal remains untouched. But no such direct and underived authority attaches itself to the biological "higher." The mere fact that a particular human type is best fitted, in the biological sense, to survive gives it absolutely no claim as an end for human conduct. The sole arbiter of "values" is the moral sense, since for this alone "values" exist. Consequently, physical perfection is an end only so far as it can justify itself before the bar of the moral sense. But Nietzsche, philosophising with his hammer, would shatter the moral sense, and does not see that with this he is shattering all values whatsoever. It is, therefore, in its obscure and veiled forms that the philosophy of Nietzsche is really dangerous; and we seem to trace it in many glib current phrases, both in ethics and politics, wherein "the need for expression," or "the need to live your own life" or "to realise your own personality," are held up as suggesting an ideal from which principles of conduct, for persons and for States, can be derived and justified.

An Artist in Occasional Speech.

Appreciations and Addresses. By Lord Rosebery. Edited by Charles Geake. (Lane. 6s.)

A COLLECTION of Cardinal Manning's occasional essays was some years ago issued under the title of Pastime Papers, though to few men would the writing of such papers appear a pastime. The addresses before us were equally well worth collecting, if only as the recreations of a Prime Minister. The preparation of them must have been hard work enough—and, for that matter, an energetic man's recreation is always hard work. Yet they have the air of recreations. It would be absurd to pretend they can take rank as independent literature, as essays. Nor yet are they oratorical literature, such as the speeches of Pitt and Fox, often mentioned, seldom read. Least of all are they great orations, Demosthenic, Ciceronian, Burkian. They belong rather to the same class as the occasional speeches of Lowell. They are after-dinner deliveries, or occasioned by the opening of a library, the unveiling of a statue, and suchlike public occasions, which merely are occasions for a speech. It requires a peculiar art to excel in this manner of speaking. You must not be oratorical, you must not be literary, you must not be conversational. You must be all, yet none of these; your speech should be a happy salad, where the three ingredients hold one another in delicate poise. You must be judicious with the literature, sparing with the oratory, liberal yet crafty with the conversational seasoning. Few possess the gift—for a gift it is. Since Lowell, a born master, no one has been quite so successful, we think, as Lord Rosebery. Burke, he observes, was a failure oratorically because his speeches were calculated rather for reading than hearing; and he instances the famous speech on the Nabob of Arcot's debts, which Pitt and Dundas agreed was too dull for answer. Yet Pitt and Dundas were delightedly surprised by it in print.

This is not all the truth, we think. Firstly, Burke was not always ineffectual with auditors: witness the great impeachment of Hastings, and its overwhelming effect on Hastings himself, emphasised in Macaulay's famous essay. "I thought myself, for the moment, the most guilty man in England." In the second place, it seems very probable that Burke had an inefficient delivery. The Nabob speech might have shaken the House, fulminated from that wonderful tongue of Chatham. But that for immediate success Burke talked too much like a marvellously eloquent book is certain. Lord Rosebery is quite otherwise. Especially in handling quiet themes like those in the present volume, which give no scope for brilliant oratorical outbursts, he knows that something short of literary fulness, complete literary effectiveness, is needed for instant effect. Comparative sparsity of matter, comparative diffuseness of language, is requisite if you are easily to be followed by an audience. He observes these conditions, yet skilfully imparts a certain tone of literary cultivation to his utterances that is matched by few speakers in these days. But these conditions have to be remembered in reading him. While we follow pleasantly the facile literary disquisition, we should pause to reflect that the pleasant reading must have been absolutely delightful hearing.

These addresses, then, are not literature with a capital letter, nor oratory with a capital letter. They are mostly the oratorical counterpart of the chatty and discursive essay. To speak like a good literary talker girding himself for an effort, to glide in an apposite story, to give views of your subject which are just and refined but not too deep for ready comprehension: that is the art of such speaking, and Lord Rosebery is excellent in his art. He tells how Burke used to finish the day, at his country house, by compounding pills for the poor. At once he slips in adroitly the neat little story which will brighten his audience. Said Burke: "I am like an Irish peer whom I used to know, who was also fond of dealing out remedies to his neighbours. One day that nobleman met a funeral, and asked a poorer neighbour whose funeral it was. 'Oh, my lord,' was the reply, 'that's Tady So-and-so, the man whom your lordship cured three days ago.'

Another ingredient he possesses most germane to this light, fluent, yet polished style of oratory. He has an excellent playfulness, the playfulness of a thoughtful man unbending. It is too slight, too unpretentious, to be called humour. For humour has now become a very serious thing. Men "joke wi' deeficulty," joke for a living, and discuss their "Humour" (it has a capital, like all things nowadays) as gravely, as self-consciously, as the modern poet discusses his Art. Lord Rosebery does not tighten his girdle and make for a jest like a high-jump, which he must take or die. He unbends, as we have said; and unbends very prettily. He imagines, for example, the consequences to any Ministry of a strike among the permanent officials of the Civil Service. You can conceive how the audience must have rippled quietly over the pleasant conceit. No "roars of laughter," such as greet the recognised political clown, but a subdued and tickled merriment. Thus he pictures the result:

From all the purlieus of Downing-street, and all the recesses of Whitehall, there would come streaming forth in their hundreds of thousands first-division clerks, and second-division clerks, and all other mysterious categories, beaded, I suppose, by men like Sir Edward Hamilton and Sir Francis Mowatt. They would proceed to Trafalgar-square and hold the customary meeting, the Under-Secretaries occupying the lions at the base of the Nelson monument. . . . But in the meantime . . . what would become . . . of a political head if he was deserted by his permanent subordinates? Of course, his first business would be to import blacklegs into the office. From their various retreats you would see the retired civil servants, some of them covered with ribands, some adorned with coronets, and all, I hope, endowed with an adequate pension, brought back to the hated service of the State. You would telegraph for Sir Alfred Milner from the Cape of Good Hope. You would bring Lord Welby in chains from the chair of the County Council to occupy in that fettered condition his old arm-chair at the Treasury. And last, but not least, you would catch Lord Farrar. He is one of those men who acquire youth as they grow old, and my imagination of Lord Farrar as a blackleg in the Civil Service is this, that you would have to put him to look after half-a-dozen departments, which he would be able cheerfully to undertake, if, indeed, like the Duke of Wellington in 1834, he did not dispense quite adequately the whole business of Government.

Apart from its playful charm, could you have more delicate and skilful compliment to a body of men, or individuals of that body, than is insinuated in this passage? Tact, indeed, is eminently one of Lord Rosebery's gifts. Little personal sidelights sometimes add an interest to these addresses. He quotes Burke's famous exclamation, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!" and his comment on it admits the shadowiness of political aims, the almost certain failure of high ideals during a man's lifetime, in a manner that becomes pathetic, when you reflect that he was then Prime Minister, one of the apparently fortunate and successful men in English public life. Yet if there be substance in a politician's aims, he need be no shadow, nor does he ultimately pursue shadows. If, indeed, we pursue shadows, then, indeed, we are shadows. Not otherwise. Possibly Lord Rosebery was already feeling the sickness and pettiness of those ignoble squabbles and intrigues which (if report lie not) ultimately drove him from leadership. In his address on "Bookishness and Statesmanship" he strikes the note of literary retirement—or, at least, a literary oasis in the midst of a statesman's life—after a fashion which goes far to explain his quiet aloofness from the daily broils of politics during recent years. So, too, his statement that a politician often feels "the want of serious and patriotic work" which may enable him "to do his duty to his country" in opposition, is eminently characteristic of the politician who has shown so much more care for country than party. The speech "On the Duty of Public Service" is one of the best and most typical, full of that high Imperialism we associate with Lord Rosebery. But whether the subject be Burns or Burke, literature or life, he is always the same adroit and masterly speaker. The book should find a popular welcome in England.

A Study in Unmorality.

The Hooligan Nights. By Clarence Rook. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

THE full title explains the book: The Hooligan Nights, being the Life and Opinions of a Young and Impenitent Criminal, recounted by Himself, and set forth by Clarence Rook. This is exact. The young criminal, being astute, saw that there is money in revelations, and for a consideration expressed his readiness to reveal accordingly. By a happy chance Mr. Rook became his confidant: hence this book. We say by a happy chance, because there is only one way in which such a book could be written in order to be tolerable; and Mr. Rook has chosen that way. Once the preface is passed, Mr. Rook takes up exactly the right attitude—that of the amused but unprejudiced historian, who permits his subject to unfold himself in his own words and elucidates no more than is necessary. A sterner, a more serious student of humanity might have probed farther into young Alf's nature, but the book would have been the less readable. The task, in short, needed a humorist, and a humorist was forthcoming.

THE HOOLIGAN.
As imagined by W. Nicholson.

What Mr. Rook has done is this: with unflagging humour and good humour, and a positively radiant aloofness, he has set before us a young London criminal. There he stands, this Hooligan, naked and unashamed, and we know him through and through—his vanity and his resource, his pluck and his misgivings, his cunning and his philosophy. The circumstance that Mr. Rook knows nothing of him in action, the accident that the deeds recorded here are from his own lips—remembered in tranquillity, or in a state as near tranquillity as a Hooligan permits himself to enjoy—renders the history incomplete in the matter of weaknesses; but these an ordinarily intelligent reader will be able to supply himself. Given certain qualities, one does not need to flounder much in the search for defects. The only really dastardly deed which young Alf admits to is the blacking of Alice's eyes, and even then he was unconscious of offence. With that to work upon we can deduce a good deal.

Mr. Rook speaks of young Alf as a type, but we are a little doubtful. He seems to us to differ sufficiently from other predatory youths to stand alone. His wisdom must be unusual. His willingness to accept whatever comes and leave bigger jobs to others is unusual, when taken into consideration with his cheerful alacrity in attacking the bigger jobs as they suggest themselves. We cannot believe that Lambeth is full of such calm philosophers: young Alf must be a mind apart. And the circumstance that

Mr. Rook once saw him risk his life to stop a runaway van is against the type theory. A boy who will follow a man some distance in order to abstract eightpence from his ticket pocket, who will stop a runaway Pickford van in a crowded street, and who will expend the money he carried off from a large establishment in buying three horses at Aldridge's, is not typical but extraordinary. Nor are we perfectly certain that the name Hooligan really describes young Alf at all. The Hooligan, as we have conceived him, has fewer brains and more brutality. Young Alf's power of looking ahead, of carefully covering his retreat; his wit and his loneliness; his willingness to marry Alice when trouble came to her; these are not compatible with Hooliganism as we understand it. The Artful Dodger and Charley Bates were not Hooligans, and young Alf derives from them. But this is merely a question of definition. For practical purposes "Hooligan" will do.

We quote two passages. The first is Mr. Rook's description of his hero:

Young Alf is now eighteen years of age, and stands 5 feet 7 inches. He is light, active, and muscular. Stripped for fighting, he is a picture. His ordinary attire consists of a dark-brown suit, mellowed by wear, and a cloth cap. Around his neck is a neatly-knotted neckerchief, dark-blue, with white spots, which does duty for collar as well as tie. His face is by no means brutal; it is intelligent, and gives evidence of a highly-strung nature. The eyes are his most remarkable feature. They seem to look all round his head, like the eyes of a bird; when he is angry they gleam with a fury that is almost demoniacal. He is not prone to smiles or laughter, but he is in no sense melancholic. The solemnity of his face is due rather, as I should conclude, to the concentration of his intellect on the practical problems that continually present themselves for solution. Under the influence of any strong emotion, he puffs out the lower part of his cheeks. This expresses even amusement, if he is very much amused. In his manner of speech he exhibits curious variations. Sometimes he will talk for ten minutes together, with no more trace of accent or slang than disfigures the speech of the ordinary Londoner of the wage-earning class. Then, on a sudden, he will become almost unintelligible to one unfamiliar with the Walk and its ways. He swears infrequently, and drinks scarcely at all. When he does, he lights a fire in the middle of the floor and tries to burn the house down. His health is perfect, and he has never had a day's illness since he had the measles. He has perfect confidence in his own ability to look after himself, and take what he wants, so long as he has elbow-room and ten seconds' start of the cop.

The other passage illustrates Mr. Rook's lighter manner, and also gives us one of the anomalies of Lambeth. Young Alf and Alice, it must be explained, are to be married very soon, and Mr. Rook has been asked to see their home. Alice is the daughter of a bookmaker of unbridled temper, who objects to the match:

Young Alf picked up the guttering light from the table, and held it aloft so that I might see and admire the pictures.

Nailed to the middle of the wall over the mantelpiece was a framed engraving of a pigeon, which young Alf had certainly not acquired by honest purchase. But there was a sentimental interest about it, for he had started the serious business of life, as you may remember, by sneaking pigeons. Beneath this, the photograph of a horse.

"That's a 'awse I got at Brighton," said young Alf, holding the candle with one hand, and with the other turning the light on to the picture. "Sold it up 'ere in Lambeth. It's workin' 'ere now."

A photograph of young Alf and Alice, arm-in-arm, in very low tone, taken in Epping Forest. Another photograph of the bookmaker with the unbridled temper. No, certainly not a lovable man; a man to keep at a respectful distance. This piece of decoration was clearly Alice's idea, and young Alf swept the candle past it. To right and left of the bookmaker a pair of coloured prints, representing "Christ Blessing the Loaves and Fishes" and "Christ on the Sea of Galilee."

Alice returned, and the illumination was increased by a candle.

"Alf bought them," said Alice, indicating the representations of Our Lord, "'cause I liked 'em."

"Give a penny each for 'em," said young Alf, in apology for being reduced to purchase.

The last sentence reminds us of the only slip we have noted in the book. It is when young Alf is explaining the dire need for new boots which came upon himself and Maggots. "We 'greed that them trotter cases 'd 'ave to be got, even if we sneaked 'em," he is made to say. Surely he would have said: "Even if we bought 'em." In the matter of language Mr. Rook's pages are of high value, and to them must all students of the argot of 1898-9 resort. This London slang of ours is always in a fluid state, and new words—"snide neologues," as they may be called, mysteriously coined, where and by whom no one knows—are put into circulation every week. A book wherein so many are crystallised is certain of long life.

We close the book without rancour that young Alf is still prosperous and at large. Just as Mr. Rook credits the Lambeth lass with all the virtues but virtue, so we find in him a very admirable fidelity to his pals and to his theory of the problem of life. The theory may be wrong, but he could not well have come by another. "You've either got to be a mug or a spieler," said an Australian sage. "Gentlemen with brains and no money," said the Claimant to the Tichborne estates, "has got to live on gentlemen with money and no brains." "If you want a fang, you got to take it," says young Alf. Herein, in various ways, is expressed one of the great lower laws of the universe. Young Alf conforms to it. We cannot all soar. Moreover, to know all is to forgive all, and Mr. Rook has told us so much that the corollary is pat. And, finally, may it not be a salutary thing that this quickener of wits is in our midst to help to raise the general level of intelligence? For an honest community must be a very sleepy one.

Elizabeth: an Analysis.

The Martyrdom of an Empress. (Harper Brothers. 7s. 6d.)

"THERE are things one woman knows instinctively about another which even her lover fails to guess." Thus—a modern novelist. But when a woman's soul is subjected to paper dissection, as in the present instance of Elizabeth, daughter of Duke Maximilian of Bavaria, Empress of Austria and Queen of Hungary, something more than a merely emotional recognition of certain qualities is required from her biographer. The hand which holds the knife—and pen!—must be steady. The putting together of a memoir such as this must almost inevitably be a woman's task; but to give a clear portrait of any character in history or fiction a writer should be level-headed, accurate, above all—unbiased. To lay an exaggerated stress on some points, to slur over others, is to present a distorted view, a one-sided reflection. To sift true from false—to obtain one clear image of the real Elizabeth out of the highly coloured kaleidoscope of shifting pictures before us—is no easy matter. The writer's prejudiced championship weakens, not strengthens, the cause she has at heart.

Not a pen is grasped to vindicate Elizabeth's memory [she complains]; not a voice raised to refute the inane calumnies which have pursued her. . . . I am but discharging a debt of honour in placing before the public a true and authentic version. . . . That this work is also one of love may serve to heap coals of fire upon the heads of those . . . who took a fiendish delight in lending colour . . . to the ever recurring reports which strove to give the masses an entirely false idea of the Empress's personality, and which mercilessly placed her in the pillory of an unfair and ignorant judgment.

In her effort to whitewash one character the writer tars many. It is possibly for this reason that she struggles to preserve her anonymity. Of the Empress herself there is much to say, both in censure and praise. Of her biographer—whose lapses from good feeling are frequent—little but the former. The suggestion concerning the communication made by the King to his son on the eve of the Crown Prince's marriage is but one instance among many. Such records can only defile the living and disturb the dead. "Some things are too horrible to write about."

In a less exalted position, married to a man of less ardent a nature than Franz Joseph's, who knows what Elizabeth might not have become? True, she fell romantically in love. As the writer says, "the marriage between the ruler of a great country to the little daughter of the impoverished Duke Maximilian in Bavaria is one of the most poetical and romantic pages of modern history." But it was a child's love which Elizabeth felt, not a woman's. "If the Empress possessed one fault, it was an absolute lack of human passion. She married, not in the least knowing what marriage meant; . . . her . . . spirituality . . . made it impossible to share her . . . lover's . . . feelings. The obligations of such a love . . . frightened her."

The marriage was further handicapped by the rooted dislike of the archduchess for her daughter-in-law. Here again Elizabeth's biographer is not merely content to imply—she implicates. She deliberately states that "the old lady . . . seeing that her son was more enamoured with his lovely wife than she thought it desirable . . . managed to surround him with temptations." He soon "tattered upon the pedestal of virtues which" Elizabeth "created for him in her soul and . . . disgust overcame her."

It is at this point that we reach the real root of the question. Nearly every trouble which came to Elizabeth was indirectly of her own making. That "early disgust" of which her biographer speaks tainted nearly every action of her after-life. She made no real effort to keep her husband's love. To "put herself in his place," to blame herself for his infidelity, to see that her lack of response almost drove him to seek distraction elsewhere, never seems to have occurred to her. She herself had no temptations: why should others? She thought of her own fidelity as virtue, and punished her husband's unfaithfulness relentlessly. It was sufficient to her to condemn—she never even sought to understand.

There was another matter which made the position of the Royal pair difficult. At Possenhofen—the home of her childhood—Elizabeth had run wild, now on foot, now riding, hunting, shooting, leading a free, untrammelled existence, more like a gipsy girl's than a princess's. Pomp and pageantry were distasteful to her: the life of the Court seemed to her as a prison-house from which she never ceased to attempt to escape. Concerning the attitude she took, her biographer simply says she "refused to make a perpetual show-figure of herself for the benefit of a pageant-loving public."

Every class in life has its obligations. Surely it is the people's right occasionally to see the Queen whom, practically, they subsidise! In this case there was no barrier to be broken, no ice to melt. Elizabeth's people were ready to love her. She could have held their hearts in her hand had she wished. But she did not. Whenever it was possible to do so she avoided public functions. Whenever she appeared in Vienna she was in consequence mobbed. In individual cases of poverty or sickness she was more than generous, ever ready to spend both money and time and sympathy in the alleviation of misfortune. But—en masse? A warm-hearted nation suffered keenly from the obvious fact that, as a whole, she held aloof from them.

Elizabeth could give—but she could not forgive. We have spoken of her conduct abroad—what of her conduct at home? Here the king was too soon to become—as Elizabeth's biographer herself admits—"wearied, perhaps not entirely without cause, by his wife's silence, effacement, and unspoken reproach. . . . Her melancholy increased daily"—until, indeed, a complete estrangement arose, which ended actually in the Empress's flight.

"A very unpalatable adventure of which her husband was the hero . . . broke the last restraint upon" her Majesty's "indignation, and without informing anybody of her intentions she left the imperial palace for Trieste, and set sail for the Ionian islands fully resolved never to allow her husband to approach her again. The scandal caused by this flight may be more easily imagined than described. . . . Despairing of catching up with her . . . the Emperor . . .," who had followed her immediately from Minorca to the Straits of Gibraltar, "returned to his dominions."

"The step she took was extreme," her biographer actually acknowledges, "but her youth seems a sufficient excuse." Yet she had at the time been married some years and had children! A more undignified action it would be difficult to realise. In even middle-class life it would be hard to condone: in Elizabeth's position it was inexcusable. But this she could not see. "She hardened her heart against everybody, and even the mention of her children failed to make any impression upon her. She . . . wrapped herself in her sorrow to the exclusion of everything else. . . . Days, weeks, and months drifted on." She was, of course, forced occasionally, "by reasons of state and of policy, to make actes de présence at her husband's Court." But "as soon as her official duties were discharged she left the country again."

That "nearly seven years elapsed before this detestable modus vivendi came to an end" seems incredible. But the fact remains. Finally, Court exigencies demanded Elizabeth's presence, and she returned. "We have both much to forgive," she said when the King knelt to her. The one excuse that can be urged on Elizabeth's behalf is that of the hereditary taint of mania in her family. Courageous, intelligent, beautiful, her many endearing qualities were marred by an unbalanced mind. She continually looked at herself—at her own wrongs, at her own misfortunes. To be self-centred is usually to lose the possession of true self-control.

That she paid a heavy penalty for her mistakes no one will deny. Certain lives are chiefly valuable as warnings. Elizabeth's was a tragic figure, and her history is painful reading. For she is not alone in her mistakes. Failure to understand has been the rock many a woman's happiness has split upon. Is it the Scotch who say: "She wove her shroud and wore it in her life-time"?

In great difficulties Elizabeth was brave. She met her son's end and her own alike with courage. But where her pride suffered she fell. Other women have built idols before now and seen them crumble. But they have not necessarily lost their ideals of wifely duty and true womanhood.

This narrative is presumably written by one who, if not herself holding a high official position at Court, was at least an intimate friend of, and in close attendance upon, the Empress. Inquiry of one whose position renders the information valuable elicited the fact that, notwithstanding the reticence of the Embassy concerning the narrative, certain grave inaccuracies of detail, which the English reviewer must, through ignorance, pass over, as well as the manifest breaches of taste, have been remarked "in high places."

The plains and the hills aloof
Hear the uproar of all these books,
But it is only a little ink more or less.

From Stephen Crane's "War is Kind."

Schoolmaster and Diarist.

Life and Remains of the Rev. R. H. Quick. Edited by F. Storr. (Cambridge: University Press. 7s. 6d.)

THOUGH a London curate from 1855 to 1858, and vicar of Sedbergh from 1883 to 1887, it is as a schoolmaster that Robert Hebert Quick will be always remembered.

He turned to teaching [writes Mr. Storr] not, in the first instance at any rate, as impelled by any conscious bent or bias, but rather as an obvious alternative, the second string, so to speak, that every English cleric has to his bow. His own bringing up at private schools and at Harrow had left him profoundly dissatisfied with existing methods, and although at that period he had not thought out for himself any better way, he knew, or thought he knew, "how not to do it," and felt assured that even if he failed he could not well do worse than his own masters had done for him.

Abundant opportunities were afforded him for thinking out "a better way," by his experience as assistant master at Lancaster, Guildford, Hurstpierpoint, Cranleigh, and Harrow, and afterwards as head of small preparatory schools in Bayswater and Guildford. (Of these opportunities he took full advantage, and when he died in 1891 the cause of the science of education lost one of its doughtiest champions.

ROBERT HEBERT QUICK.

The hope of some memoir of his life has been long deferred; but the present volume will be none the less welcome both to those who knew the man and those who only know his Essays on Educational Reformers—the first attempt in the English language at a history of education. A man of one book, but that book a classic, Quick—for better or for worse—was a conscientious diarist, and left behind him a large mass of notes on men and things, from which his editor, by patient sifting and the wholesale sacrifice of everything not educational, has compiled a volume which, while it will be attractive mainly to teachers, may haply also afford pleasure—and instruction—to many besides.

The personality of the man—his originality, his kindness, his ardour for his ideals—stands out well, and will touch and inspire as he himself touched and inspired. So will many a pregnant sentence in his frank outpourings to himself anent the things he did and the things he saw. The man who in 1868 conceived and wrote Educational Reformers, who in 1878 was chosen by the University of Cambridge as its first lecturer on education, and who, though a clergyman, was so profoundly convinced of the ethical significance of good schoolmastering, must have looked about him with eyes that knew what to look for and how to look at it. The impressions of such a man, registered for posthumous publication only, will be of high value, now and always, to the student of education, and will go far to compensate for the loss of the "useful essays," which, as he somewhat forebodingly writes in 1886, "I may, perhaps, be able to write before the end of my journey."

The Life, largely autobiographical, is not intended to be a finished picture. All we need to know of Quick the teacher is put in in a few bold strokes; the rest is silence. The Remains might be characterised as original variations on a well-worn theme. "Boys and Masters," "School Wrinkles," "Child Nature," "Training of Teachers," "Preaching and Lecturing," "Criticisms of Books," are among the sectional headings, and each section betrays the same insight, the same fearlessness, the same twinkling humour. The book by its very nature is too scrappy to be more than stimulating, though there is one piece of consecutive writing—"A Study of Child Life"—which is a distinct contribution to educational science, and which, as Mr. Storr observes, "has an almost unique interest as the study of a close observer and original teacher on his own children, to whom he was able to devote a large portion of his time, and on whom he tested his own educational theories." Those theories may perhaps be summed up in his own words: "The life of education does not consist in the list of subjects nor in the stages into which each subject is divided. It consists in a great measure in the action of the intelligent mind of the teacher on the minds of the taught, awakening their intelligence, and rendering them capable of thinking and acting for themselves." And, again, in speaking of a book he was reviewing for the ACADEMY: "The author has grasped a truth than which none can be more important or more commonly neglected—that moral training is prior to intellectual." But his idée motrice was that the natural man, even though graduated, is not a safe teacher; that experience, if it helps at all, helps too slowly and at too great a cost, and that he who would be a master teacher must first be taught to teach. The difficulty is that the natural man does not believe this. As Quick puts it: "The schoolmaster says of his boys—'They won't think,' but that is true of us all, the schoolmaster included. We are happy only when we are fussing about some work that seems necessary, but whether it is necessary, and, if necessary, whether it is best done as we are doing it, we will not be at the pains to inquire." There is a good deal of this sort of mild denunciation in the book. Only once, in the account of a visit to a struggling "genteel" private school, does it rise into a righteous indignation. "No parents who had any regard for their children," he cries, "would send them to such a place . . . to be starved and stunted in mind and body. . . . I think we are as a nation extremely culpable in allowing such schools to be kept." It is also "a glimpse behind the scenes in private school life" that gives rise to the following reflection: "Except among the professional criminal class, there is, as far as I know, nothing that comes up to the shameless immorality one finds in school life." An obvious remedy for many school evils is registration and State inspection; but, strange to say, though Quick was one of the earliest advocates in this country of professional training for teachers, there is not one word in the book on its corollary.

Of the many bits of pedagogic folly pilloried in these notes, perhaps the most ridiculous is the following pulpit appeal to Harrow boys: "Let your pleasantries, my younger friends, be like the coruscations in the summer sky, lambent yet innocuous."

Thanks largely to the care and judgment of the editor, who has understood when to speak and when to be silent, the book is eminently readable. A possible criticism may be that, as many of the extracts are undated, it is often difficult to judge whether the wisdom is that of impulsive youth or of sober age; and a possible regret that so much as nine-tenths of the material available should have been withheld.

A MAN said to the Universe:

"Sir, I exist,"

"However," replied the Universe,

"That has not created in me

A sense of obligation."

From Stephen Crane's "War is Kind."

Natural Theology.

Through Nature to God. By John Fiske. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

THE restatement of the case for natural theology goes forward apace. No astronomer would think it clever to remark on the absence of a deity from the field of his observation, as Lalande did; and the most convinced of materialists will no longer hail as an aphorism Moleschott's "No thought without phosphorus." Physical science deals with secondary causes; its servants have learned, by the very magnitude and wealth of their achievements, to develop a spirit of modesty and caution, the first-fruit of which is a general recognition of the fact that their discoveries, though they were tenfold greater, must still stop short of the Absolute. Nevertheless, whether to confirm or to confute, the results of physical research have a legitimate bearing, at least by way of analogy—even as they had in the days of Butler—upon the religious ideas which were framed and postulated before ever the chronicles of the earth and the stars were read.

Of the three parts into which this book is divided, the first, on the Mystery of Evil, was designed to be a supplement to the author's The Idea of God. Its sense is clear; and its reasoning, within the author's limitations (of which we shall have something to say in a moment), is certainly valid. Briefly, "we cannot know anything except as contrasted with something else"; cannot know pleasure, therefore, but by pain. Similarly moral evil and good are correlatives: "in a happy world there must be sorrow and pain, and in a moral world the knowledge of evil is indispensable." "The stern necessity for this has been proved to inhere in the innermost constitution of the human soul." Thus, in fine, "God is the creator of evil." Must evil then always endure in order to the beatitude of him that overcometh? Hear Mr. Fiske:

It is only after long ages of social discipline, fraught with cruel afflictions and grinding misery, that the moral law becomes dominant and religious aspiration intense and abiding in the soul. When such an age is reached we have at last in man a creature different in kind from his predecessors, and fit for an everlasting life of progress—for a closer and closer communion with God in a beatitude which shall endure.

Effectual as is the author's manner of showing how things work together in the present order towards a good end, it is necessary to point out that a great fundamental difficulty remains untouched. Why this order? Wherefore the deliberate choice of a method that involves these hideous incidents? Mr. Fiske finds nothing more radical to suggest than that the Creator's power "is limited by some inexplicable viciousness in the original constitution of things." But it is precisely as an Origin, as a First Cause, that the mind of man has demanded His existence. To postulate a compelling principle other than Himself in obedience to which He acts is to subject Him to some supreme Anagke; is, in fact, to depose the First Cause in favour of a Cause precedent; so that He becomes a mediate cause, and, for the purpose of this inquiry, negligible. In order to preserve that absolute liberty of initiation which, by hypothesis, is proper to the First Cause, and at the same time to fortify our assurance that the Source of Being is unmixed good, it seems, after all, as if no better way had been found than that of the scholastics, who, identifying esse with bonum, resolved evil into a negation, and justified God in creating something inferior to the best of all possible worlds by the consideration that the enactment of infinite perfection must drain dry even infinite power.

The second section, entitled "The Cosmic Roots of Love and Self-Sacrifice," was delivered in the form of a lecture in answer to Huxley's famous Romanes lecture. It is probable that that lecture was, in a measure, misunderstood: if not, it was not for want of loose and equivocal phrasing. Mr. Fiske here elaborates the argument to be deduced from the development of the altruistic sense by the lengthening of infancy, which has already been rendered familiar in this country by Prof. Drummond, but which he claims as his own contribution to the doctrine of evolution—so far as we are aware, accurately.

The most interesting portion of the book is the final section, on "The Everlasting Reality of Religion." By the word our philosopher understands three related ideas: (1) An idea of the Deity as quasi-human, (2) an idea of an unseen world in which human beings continue after death, and (3) a recognition of the ethical aspects of life as related in a special and intimate sense to this unseen world. Upon Mr. Herbert Spencer's luminous dictum—"Life is the continuous adjustment of inner relations to outer relations"—he bases an argument, near akin indeed to the traditional argument from the necessary veracity of God, but fairly claimed by him, in its immediate application, as original, and, as it seems to us, of great importance. Moral evolution has been advanced by the conviction that these things are so. Is that conviction true or a dream? True, he answers:

To suppose that during countless ages, from the seaweed up to Man, the progress of life was achieved through adjustment to external realities, and that then the method was all at once changed, and throughout a vast province of evolution the end was secured through adjustments to external non-realities, is to do sheer violence to logic and to common sense. . . . All the analogies of Nature fairly shout against the assumption of such a breach of continuity between the evolution of Man and all other evolution. So far as our knowledge of Nature goes, the whole momentum of it carries us onward to the conclusion that the Unseen World, as the objective term in a relation of fundamental importance that has co-existed with the whole career of Mankind, has a real existence; and it is but following out the analogy to regard the Unseen World as the theatre where the ethical process is destined to reach its full consummation. . . . Of all the implications of the doctrine of evolution in regard to Man, I believe the very deepest and strongest to be that which asserts the Everlasting Reality of Religion.

With this brave credo we may fitly conclude our notice of a book that shall both stimulate the sluggish mind and confirm the feeble of heart.

Jean d'Arras to Auguste Rodin.

A History of French Art, 1100-1899. By Rose G. Kingsley. (Longmans. 12s. 6d. net.)

To the average Englishman French art is something of a sealed book. Ruskin and Symonds and the Pre-Raphaelites have sent him to Italy for the good of his soul; but Paris he thinks of as a vast café-chantant, and, while he will talk glibly of Botticelli and Michael Angelo, Fragonard is to him a shade, and Nicholas Poussin the shadow of a shade. However, the admirable condition of the French cycling roads and the near prospect of another great Exhibition are turning the thoughts of the pilgrim to new fields, and any day curiosity may awake as to the châteaux of the Loire or the marvellous experiments of the Luxembourg. Such a curiosity Miss Kingsley's History of French Art is well calculated in advance to satisfy. Miss Kingsley has many qualifications for her task—a sufficient erudition, a catholic sympathy for the most diverse schools, and for architecture and sculpture as well as painting, and a power of writing modest but quite pleasing critical English. The book is conveniently arranged. Substantially, it is a biographical chronicle of artists, but each group or period is introduced by some general considerations which serve to link the generations together, and to make the general trend of evolution clear. French art, indeed, lends itself quite exceptionally well to this particular mode of treatment, for the French temper has always been such as to display to exaggeration the rhythmic law of action and reaction which lies at the bottom of all history. It is safe to say that at any given moment the formulæ of the Parisian studios will rest on a basis of feud between les jeunes and les vieux. As Miss Kingsley puts it, speaking of 1812 to 1848, "The Classics cried 'Malfaiteurs!'; the Romantics shouted 'Perruques!'" Boucher, "the painter of Louis XV. and the Pompadour," becomes for the journals of the First Empire "Boucher maudit," or "Boucher de ridicule mémoire." We should have been glad to have lived under the First Empire, because then you could buy a landscape of Boucher's for twenty-two francs, and a shepherd teaching a shepherdess to pipe for forty-one. Obviously this tendency has not diminished in recent years, and the succession of warring décadents, symbolistes, impressionistes, vibratiles, and the like, has become perfectly bewildering. Miss Kingsley, however, proves a patient and competent guide to them all. The following passage, on the spirit of impressionism initiated by Manet, may be taken as a fair sample of her sane and intelligent method of criticism:

The Impressionist doctrine has been summed up by their latest historian as "the study of luminous phenomena and of social phenomena." These artists are not occupied with the past in history or in tradition. They desire to represent modern life, and the world in which they find themselves at the present moment. Light is what they have sought beyond all besides. And while the more lyric Romantics chose the sunset as their favourite effect in nature, the Impressionists in their preoccupation with close analysis take the light of full mid-day. "In this ardent and exclusive contemplation of atmosphere made visible," says M. André Michel . . . "and the better to express its splendour, or its more fugitive nuances, they have made use of all that science has been able to teach about colours; they have decomposed the elements of each tone, and placed them side by side upon the canvas, in order to obtain by this 'mélange optique' more transparent lights, more delicate vibrations." These little blots of pure colour, which, when seen close, are a fruitful source of rude and imbecile merriment to the ignorant public, resolve themselves at a little distance—the right distance—into flaming skies, shivering trembling leaves, luminous dancing shadows, reflected in liquid rippling waters. Such effects as these were worth recording. They do not sum up the whole of Art. They are not the ultimate end and attainment of the painter's craft. But they form a link, a very solid and brilliant link, in the ever-lengthening chain. And such as they are, they are worthy of serious and intelligent consideration.

Not to take sides, not to glorify or to condemn, but to understand—that is the ideal which Miss Kingsley has set herself in this book; and for the reader who goes to her for information it is a very fortunate one. We own to having been particularly inspired by her with an interest in the work of Henri Martin, décoratif and symboliste, of Toulouse, and in that of Gustave Moreau, a highly imaginative painter, whose later works have only just been revealed to the world by his death, and who, like Rossetti in England, has for some years enjoyed the esoteric reputation of the Poet-Artist "enfermé dans sa tour d'Ivoire." Henri Martin and Gustave Moreau will be the gods of our questing when our bicycle next lands us at the doors of the Luxembourg.

We must conclude by quoting an interesting passage in which Miss Kingsley indicates the direction which she thinks the coming revolt from Impressionism will take, and the men who may be destined to be its leaders:

Art in France is never absolutely stationary. It is always searching, reaching forward to some fresh revelation. And already signs are to be seen of a new movement among the younger artists, of which it is too soon to speak with any authority. Certain among them, "while they profit by the acquisitions of the school of the open-air, while they remain attentive to the play of reflections and delicate harmonies of the envelope, are returning to a closer study of form, and a relatively sombre and 'ancient mode of painting, which reposes us from the excesses of Impressionism." These artists would seem to consider that the preoccupation of the Impressionists with light—sometimes with violent, unmitigated light—has been carried far enough. They prefer the crépuscule. And they choose the mysterious light of plain or forest, or the dimness of an interior, at the lovely hour when daylight dies on the earth, but still lingers on tree-tops and cloud and hill. Such men as M. René Ménard, M. Lucien Simon, MM. Prinnet, Griveau, Boulard, Dauchez, &c., will have to be counted with in the twentieth century.

Other New Books.

THE TRAIL OF THE GOLDSEEKERS. BY HAMLIN GARLAND.

Mr. Garland, already well known as a novelist by his Rose of Dutcher's Coolly, and other stories, here recounts his experiences in a journey to the Klondike. But we cannot call it successful. The record has a tameness and a conscious literary artifice that make it uninspiring reading. Mr. Garland's intentions were honourable, as his poem shows:

I will wash my brain in the splendid breeze;
I will lay my cheek to the northern sun;
I will drink the breath of the mossy trees,
And the clouds shall meet me one by one.
I will fling the scholar's pen aside,
And grasp once more the bronco's rein;
And I will ride and ride and ride,
Till the rain is snow and the seed is grain.

But the promise of this resolve is not fulfilled. Mark Twain and Bret Harte, Mr. Kipling and Mr. Steevens have spoiled us for travels that lack vigour; while Sterne and Stevenson, to name no others, have spoiled us for travels that lack charm. Mr. Garland's book falls between the two. His cowboys and miners are not picturesque enough, his personality is not attractive enough. Many a man who invents fine stories fails when he comes to the record of his own first-person-singular wanderings, and Mr. Garland fails in good company. Nor are the little poetical impressions which are sandwiched between the prose chapters remarkable. They lack music and spontaneity. Here is one chosen at random:

THE COWBOY.

Of rough, rude stock, this saddle sprite
Is grosser grown with savage things.
Inured to storms, his fierce delight
Is lawless as the beasts he swings
His swift rope over.—Libidinous, obscene,
Careless of dust and dirt, serene,
He faces snows in calm disdain,
Or makes his bed down in the rain.

As a poem this is without any grace; as a character sketch it is incomplete; and the fifth line is a horror. Sometimes Mr. Garland has a lyrical moment, but for the most part his verses suggest the foot rule. To all persons who have friends at the goldfields we can recommend the book for a faithful account of the difficulties they have to fight and the society they live among; but we cannot think that Mr. Garland's reputation is advanced by it in the least, except as a man of courage and endurance. (Macmillan. 6s.)

SEVENTY-ONE, NOT OUT.

BY W. CAFFYN.

William Caffyn, George Anderson, and Bob Thoms, the umpire, are the only survivors of Clarke's famous All England Eleven; and by a stroke of good fortune Caffyn's recollections have been given permanent form while he is still in possession of a good memory and good health. William Caffyn, called variously the Surrey Pet and Terrible Billy, was one of the great cricketers of the middle of the century, both with bat and ball: a Surrey man by birth, a member of Clarke's team, and of the first team to visit Australia and the first to visit America. The circumstance that he remained in Australia between 1863 and 1871 as a professional coach renders him to-day a peculiarly interesting figure, for there is no doubt that some valuable traces of his instruction, transmitted from those days, play their part in enabling the Australian team now visiting us to make so admirable a show for themselves. Caffyn's own career, as recorded here, is agreeable reading enough, but the special value of the book resides in his memories of his great contemporaries. As each illustrious name comes up, one or two personal characteristics are remembered and set down, and the result is a noble gallery of heroes. Even Beldham is remembered: he walked from Farnham to Godalming in 1852 to see a match in which Caffyn played—an old man between eighty and ninety, in a tall hat and white smock, with stories of the old matches. Lambert is here too, Lambert who as a young man would walk from Red Hill to London, in order to get a game on Kennington Common; and William Clarke (Old Clarke) who would choose the best end for bowling and then say to the other bowler, "I'll have this end, and you can have which you like"; and Fuller Pilch, who stood over six feet high, and spoke rarely, and smoked a churchwarden, and hit Caffyn and every one else over the tavern at Lords; and Billy Hillyer, who remonstrated with a scorer for spelling his name wrong, and was told, "If a haitch and a hi and a hel and a hel and a hi and a he and a har doesn't spell 'Illyer, I don't know what will"; and Felix, who invented batting gloves, and who learned to cut better than any one else in his day by suspending a ball from the ceiling and practising on that; and Alfred Mynn, the greatest of them all, who weighed twenty stone, and told Caffyn that beef and beer were "the things to play cricket on." Caffyn, who remarks very sensibly on modern cricket, is in favour of running-out all runs. "It would," he says, "be the means of reducing the enormous scores which are made at the present time. Having to run our hits all out in the old days was, I know from experience, often the cause of losing our wickets. It was no easy matter to stop a shooter on the middle stump after running a six for the previous ball." Caffyn himself once played and defeated eleven of Winchester with the assistance of two fieldsmen. He made 35 and 1, and Winchester made 4 and 4. We can recommend his book very heartily. (Blackwood. 6s.)

ENCHANTED INDIA.

By PRINCE BOJIDAR KARAGEORGEVITCH.

This is a translation, by Mrs. Clara Bell, from a French book that has not yet been published. The author, the possessor of a serious, sensitive temperament touched with poetry, passed through India, notebook in hand, attempting to make us in our turn see what he himself, a calm, interested spectator, had first observed. The result is a volume of impressions, of Things Seen, which, aiming at nothing in the nature of completeness, yet leaves one with a richer sense of India's mystery and beauty and wonder than many works more pretentious and more bulky. In French some of Prince Karageorgevitch's descriptions must be exquisite. Here is the picture of a sacred festival in a temple at Madura, which he watched secretly:

A muffled sound of instruments, mingling in confusion in the myriad echoes, came dying on my ear, hardly audible. A gleam of light flashed in the corridor and then went out. Then some lights seemed to be coming towards me, and again all was gloom. An orchestra of bagpipes, of kemruches and darboukhas, sounded close by me, and then was lost in the distance, and the phantasmagoria of lights still went on. At last, at the further end of the arcade where I was standing, two men raised green-flamed torches at the end of long poles, followed by two drummers and musicians playing on bagpipes and viols. Children squatting on the ground lighted coloured fire that made a bright blaze, and died out in stifling smoke, shrouding the priests—a cloud hardly tinted by the torches.

A golden mass, an enormous shrine chased all over and starred with tapers, now came forward, borne by a score of naked men. Against the gold background, in a perfect glory of diamonds and pearls, sat Vishnu, decked out with flowers and jewels, his head bare, with a huge brilliant in his forehead.

The music played louder, light flashed out on all sides, the god stood still, and bayadères performed their worship. With slow gestures, their hands first hollowed and held to the brow, then their arms flung out, they bowed before the idol with a snake-like, gliding motion, while the music played very softly and the lights burnt faintly. The nauchnees, in dark muslin drapery spangled with gold, bangles on their arms, their necks, and their ankles, and rings on their toes, swayed as they danced, and swung long, light garlands of flowers which hung about their necks. And there were flowers in their hair, in a bunch on each side of the head, above two gold plates from which hung strings of beads. The flying, impalpable gauze looked like a swirl of mist about their limbs.

Very gradually the measure quickened, the pitch grew shriller, and with faster and freer movements the bayadères were almost leaping in a sort of delirium produced by the increasing noise, and the constantly growing number of lights.

Then, in a blaze of coloured fire, a fortissimo of music, and a whirlwind of drapery, they stopped exhausted in front of the idol. The lights were put out, the tom-toms were the only sound, and the procession moved on, escorting the shrine, which glittered for some time yet, till it disappeared at an angle, leaving the temple in darkness just tinted blue by the moon.

The book gradually gets one entirely in its power; one is hypnotised by page after page that describe India's drowsy magic with a certain magic of their own. (Harpers. 6s.)

Fiction.

Silence Farm. By William Sharp.
(Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

THIS novel of farm life in the Scotch lowlands seems to have been written under the influences of Maeterlinck, Rémy de Gourmont, Marcel Schwob, Fiona Macleod, W. B. Yeats, and Zola. It is a conscientious and not uninteresting attempt to combine the real with the unreal, to envelop the crudity of daily facts in an atmosphere of dark suggestion—the suggestion of beauty, horror, terror. An artistic intention is evident throughout, from the first chapter, recording the death of a cow in parturition, to the last, in which the heroine Margaret (with a feeling for symbolism rare enough in farm-girls) sticks a copy of Evangelina leaf by leaf into a manure heap. Although we are convinced of the quality of Mr. Sharp's intention, we cannot admire the results obtained. Silence Farm lacks conviction; and it lacks conviction because it lacks genuine imagination. It is an affair of ingenious artistic theories which have obviously preoccupied the author during composition. It is unusual, bizarre, strange, but it does not stir the temper; it has not the authenticity of life; it is without vision.

Further, we consider that beneath this overlay of the elaborately unusual there is a substratum of utter commonplace. Take the naked story. James Ruthven, son of a well-to-do farmer, is in love with Margaret Gray, his father's "ward." For secret and frightful reasons his stern, cold, passionate father will have none of the match. The son goes away; the father is financially ruined, and dies. But the girl remains faithful to the old man, and before he dies he calls her to him and ejaculates: "Girl, you are my daughter." Well, of course she is, though Mr. Sharp attempts to make a weird mystery of an affair absolutely translucent from the first. Such a plot does not sound promising, nor does Mr. Sharp, though he embellishes it with familiar trickeries of incident (sudden bankruptcy, midnight assaults, and so on) make anything of it whatever.

Mr. Sharp has taken great pains with the writing of the book. Every phrase shows a self-conscious fastidiousness. Such care is praiseworthy, but we do not think that style has been achieved. The best bit of writing in the whole volume is this description of old Ruthven :

The laird was a tall, powerfully built, but gaunt man of about five-and-fifty. He looked at least five years older, partly because of his long grey hair, which in patches was of a bleached white. Once, when he looked up, the unchanging coal-black eyes added to the sternness of the face, rugged, heavily-lined, carved out of moor granite, it seemed, clay-like in its pallor, with vivid scarlet lips compressed to a firm, relentless, dogged mouth. The man had always more or less of a frozen look about him. There was little sign of nervous life, except in the long-fingered and, for a man such as himself, strangely white and delicate hands, with their supple thumbs, flexible, emotional. On his forehead there was a blue vein which always stood out, like a rib of fluor-spar in rock, and, when he was angered or excited, tightened like a strained cord in which something lived and quivered. That vein, those white alive hands with their long talon-like fingers, that heavily scarred and moulded death-white face with its scarlet lips—red as poppies slit by a cart-wheel in the dust of the highway—how well James Ruthven knew them !

If this is style, then style is a mere business of searched-for epithet and simile. Style, however, is nothing of the kind, but something far more spontaneous, deeper, more intimately residing within the soul.

The Greater Inclination. By Edith Wharton.
(John Lane. 6s.)

THIS book of short stories comes out of America, and it is good. It is very good. Mrs. Wharton is one of the few to grasp that obvious but much-neglected fact that the first business of a writer is to be able to write. Mrs. Wharton writes with the finished ease of the skilled craftsman, and with the feeling and distinction of an artist. Her imaginative talent is therefore absolutely at her disposal, a force which she can control perfectly and exploit to its fullest. Such a phenomenon is rare, especially among women writers.

She is clearly of the school of Mr. Henry James. Her subjects are chosen similarly to his—dramas of sentiment, of the soul; excursions into the obscure recesses of psychology. But there are exceptions, and it must be said that though she is subtle she is much less subtle than Mr. James, and — may we utter it? — possibly more articulate. She, at any rate, has divined that the expressiveness of language has limits.

The story which pleased us best is "The Pelican," being the history of a lady-lecturer, a widow who began to earn a living "for the baby," and couldn't give up posing pathetically as a stressful sacrificial mother even when the baby was a rich financier with a wife and family.

They began by being drawing-room lectures. The first time I saw her she was standing by the piano, against a flippant background of Dresden china and photographs, telling a roomful of women pre-occupied with their spring bonnets all she thought she knew about Greek art. The ladies assembled to hear her had given me to understand that she was "doing it for the baby," and this fact, together with the shortness of her upper lip and the bewildering co-operation of her dimple, disposed me to listen leniently to her dissertation. Happily, at that time Greek art was still, if I may use the phrase, easily handled : it was as simple as walking down a museum-gallery lined with pleasant familiar Venuses and Apollos. All the later complications—the archaic and archaistic conundrums; the influences of Assyria and Asia Minor; the conflicting attributions and the wrangles of the erudite — still slumbered in the bosom of the future "scientific critic." Greek art in those days began with Phidias and ended with the Apollo Belvedere; and a child could travel from one to the other without danger of losing his way.

Throughout this tale the phrasing is of the finest, the analysis unerring, the satire kindly keen, and the form without flaw.

What Mrs. Wharton lacks, and we feel the shortcoming to be grave, is a sense of the dramatic. Her themes are dramatic enough, but the drama seems to be decentralised, frittered away, instead of being gathered up (as surely the short story demands) into a single resounding stroke. This is so with "The Pelican," where the scene in which the "baby" makes his mother confess her duplicities distinctly does not show that effectiveness which is latent within it. "A Journey," again, suffers in the same way : the plight of the woman travelling with the husband whose death she must at all costs keep secret from the other occupants of the Pullman, is tremendous; but there is no clou, no adequate culmination. On the other hand, "Souls Belated" has a climax which is at once legitimate and striking.

The Greater Inclination may impress itself on neither the English nor the American public, but it is none the less distinguished and delightful; and if Mrs. Wharton continues to write up to the level of it, she cannot fail ultimately to make her mark.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE STRANGE STORY OF HESTER WYNNE. BY G. COLMORE.

Throughout this novel we are ever on the verge of horrors. The prologue describes a drunkard's death, and then come such chapters as these: "The Beginning of the Dread," "The Door that Moved," "The Figure in the Moonlight," "The Groping Hands," "The Figure by the Bed," "The Dread draws Nearer," "The Terror by Night," "The Scream." (Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

A ROMANCE OF CEYLON. BY E. O. WALKER.

Ceylon has not been overdone in fiction. In this story a beautiful Cinghalese girl, Kirimanica, loves and is loved by an English official named Gray; and the author elaborates—too much, perhaps, for the taste of impatient readers—the differences of custom and religion between her country and his. Ceylon is no mere titular background to the book, but a part of it. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE MAGIC OF THE DESERT. BY W. SMITH-WILLIAMS.

A brightly-written story of English upper-class country life, and skirmishing off the Spanish coast. Aunt Julia, who keeps the early chapters lively by her unceasing chatter and oddities, is a pleasant addition to the long roll of attractive aunts of fiction. Afterwards we say goodbye to frivolity, and settle down to the stern duties of the warrior. (Blackwood. 6s.)

BONNIE MAGGIE LAUDER. BY ALAN ST. AUBYN.

The author of A Fellow of Trinity may be counted on with certainty for the kind of story which romantic young misses enjoy. Here he has done it again. Bonnie Maggie Lauder is a tale of Exmoor, of squires, of impoverished estates, of frustrations and difficulties, and finally of happy affection. (White. 6s.)

FROM THE LAND OF THE WOMBAT. BY W. S. WALKER.

The land of the Wombat is Australia, and this is a collection of Australian yarns by a writer known as "Coo-ee." He dedicates it to Rolf Boldrewood. The stories are of colonials and natives, and their local colour is very strong, and their interest often quite lurid. (Long. 3s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 21s. 8d., including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Light Behind the Veil.

CHAUCER, Shelley; Botticelli, Turner; Crabbe, Blake; Michael Angelo, Whistler: those who love the sharp sweetness of definition, and those who love the mystery and mysticism of the dazzle of light that is a veil—I found a brief treatise on their opposite methods in two diverse aspects of Hastings fishing village, viewed first from one cliff, and then from the other.

From the Castle cliff the picture presented was one of exquisite minutiae, crusted with definition, rich with the full-blooded colour of time. The daring combination of fierce red roof, deep azure sea and green cliff, was fused into a harmony like the splendid perfection of a parrot's wing. The clear-cut outlines of tile and wall and wave edged and sharpened the mellow glow which they confined, so that the senses apprehended a limited exactitude which seemed almost pre-Raphaelite, an angularity of beauty at once stiff and sweet. It was an incarnation of mediæval art.

From the opposite cliff there was nothing to be seen in the valley but a vague, uncertain shimmer beneath a sunlit haze—a shimmer that was a dim tremble of blue where the sea was, and that touched, with casual light tinges of red and green, the mist between the hills. The whole world tingled with indefinite light, faded in excess of radiance: its muffled vistas suggested infinite distance; its limitations were lost in the mystery of a loveliness that was elusive and remote. Here was an embodiment of a modern conception of art—the art of the mystics, the art of the Celts—which strives by veils and symbols, glimmering and vast, to suggest that beauty whose essence is too subtle for words.

The mediæval and the modern! They are, roughly speaking, like those two infinities of Edward Dowden's sonnet: the infinitely little, the speedwell plot wherein he loves each separate flower; and the infinitely great, the shining plain, the mountains, the sky, "fathomless and broad." And one infinity is not more marvellous than another; and each loving mediæval grass-blade is as exquisite as Turner's last ecstatic remoteness of sun-suffused distance—only the distance, the remoteness, appeal to us more closely in this age of prosaic ugliness, wherein reaction drives our thoughts back along the dim, hazy corridors of the past or into the shadowy halls of Eastern or Celtic mysticism, wherein our souls hunger beyond the reach of our eyes, so that for us to-day the beauty that is half concealed beneath a veil exceeds in significance and potency the beauty of fullest definition.

Draw a veil over the most commonplace landscape, and immediately it becomes fraught with a mysterious extension: all its features undergo a subtle transfiguration. It conceals, not the familiar fields and trees, but a beauty too delicate for the gross sight of man; it is a mist, not between the eyes and the material world, but between the soul and infinity. It is beneath the heat-haze that Swinburne divines the most perfect beauty:

Sleep lies not heavier on eyes that have watched all night
Than hangs the heat of the noon on the hills and trees.
Why now should the haze not open, and yield to sight
A secret fairer than hope or than slumber sees?

Are not our veiled moons lovelier to us than their naked sisters? I will not take that most barren of all similes, wherein Alfred de Musset likens the moon above the "clocher jauni" to "un point sur un i"; but those weary, slow-climbing moons of Sir Philip Sidney and of Shelley, and the love-heavy moon of Walt Whitman—these do not equal in beauty the moons of Wordsworth, veiled by trees:

Light birch, aloft upon the horizon's edge,
A veil of glory for the ascending moon.

Or in the following lines, where the light behind the veil is made to stand as a symbol for the celestial spirit of man:

As the ample moon
In the deep stillness of a summer even,
Rising behind a thick and lofty grove,
Burns like an unconsuming fire of light
In the green trees; and kindling on all sides
Their leafy umbrage, turns the dusky veil
Into a substance glorious as her own. . . .

The veiled vision in Alastor is more exquisite by sheer reason of her veiling than the more definite vision in Endymion; though both these fade before the vague purity of Milton's vision, wherein are no "glowing limbs," no "beamy bending eyes," no "pearl-round ears," no "blush-tinted cheeks"—nothing but the abstract light behind the veil:

Came vested all in white, pure as her mind:
Her face was veiled, yet to my fancied sight
Love, sweetness, goodness in her person shined. . . .

In these lines we approach a more subtle mystery of veiling, wherein the physical becomes in itself the veil through which we penetrate to the light behind. And there seems little doubt that flesh made transparent shows us loveliness infinitely more ravishing than the most delicate perfection of its opaqueness. Gather together the tenderest descriptions of physical beauty, call up the Loves of the Poets, with their lips of geranium, of coral, of poppy; their eyes of pansy, of the blue of still waters; their cheeks like rose and lily, skin of ivory, snowdrifts of breasts; and say if among them all there is one to equal the loveliness of Milton's Alcestis, or of that St. Bride "whose soul was like sunlight behind a white flower." Marlowe knew better than to hamper with physical detail his Helen of ideal beauty; huge similes suggest the light that is in her:

O, thou art fairer than the evening air
Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars;
Brighter art thou than flaming Jupiter
When he appeared to hapless Semele;
More lovely than the monarch of the sky
In wanton Arethus's azur'd arms. . . .

And beside this splendid piling of imagery we may place another star-comparison, the quietest of all star-comparisons:

Her face was like the milky way i' the sky—
A meeting of gentle lights without a name.

Spenser, who has all the Elizabethan delight in physical perfection, yet veils his Una; and when she undoes her fillet, and lays her stole aside, her angel face,

As the great eye of heaven, shined bright,
And made a sunshine in that shady place,

—the light of the soul shining through the veil of the flesh. Light radiates from Juliet on the moonlit balcony:

But soft! what light from yonder window breaks?
It is the East, and Juliet is the sun. . . .

Wordsworth's "phantom of delight" has in her the light of the cheerful dawn, though her eyes are like stars of twilight, and like twilight her hair, which last comparison is one much used by Mr. W. B. Yeats. Then Marian Erle: her very flesh is light:

The small fair face between the darks of hair
I used to liken, when I saw her first,
To a point of moonlit water down a well.

The light not only shines behind, not only shines through, but makes a halo about the Michal of Paracelsus:

And Michal's face
Still wears that quiet and peculiar light,
Like the dim halo floating round a pearl?

Pompilia's face has also pearl-light in it—that loveliest of all women's faces, "shaped like a peacock's egg and pure as pearl."

Pompilia! the heart fills with worship towards the man who has given us so exquisite a piece of womanhood. She lives shrined in the inmost part of us—shrined as Guiseppe saw her at the window,

Framed in its black square length, with lamp in hand,
Pompilia; the same great, grave, grief-ful air
As stands i' the dusk on altar that I know,
Left alone with one moonbeam in her cell,
Our Lady of all the Sorrows.

And she too, where description reaches its final perfection, is veiled; but there never was a lovelier light behind:

. . . till at last
Began a whiteness in the distance, waxed
Whiter and whiter, near grew and more near,
Till it was she; there did Pompilia come:
The white I saw shine through her was her soul's
Certainly, for the body was one black,
Black from head down to foot. She did not speak:
Glided into the carriage; so a cloud
Gathers the moon up.

E. W.

Things Seen.

"Ships that Pass —"

My hired wherry-yacht—ugliest of hermaphrodite craft—lay moored to the bank. There was nothing moving on river or land save a couple of red cows making their leisurely way across that stretch of emerald-green velvet. The remains of a deserted windmill stood up gaunt and grey against the pale blue of the early morning sky. On the other side of the sluggish river the undrained reed-marshes stretched away to the twin churches just visible on the horizon, a dark ridge of taller reeds tracing the course of the dyke leading to a hidden, half overgrown broad. A tiny ripple chattered against the ugly slab side of the "yacht." The rattle of frying-pan against stove came from the galley forward; the dinghy's painter squeaked a little. Suddenly there were new sounds added to these: the splash and "suck" of a quant, and the louder, fussier ripple made by the bows of a moving boat. I looked up—and there, floating gaily down stream, were Monsieur, Madame, et Bébé. Their home was something between a very small house-boat and the cabin of a launch mounted on a man-o'-war's cutter; it was diabolically gaudy with black and scarlet paint, fresh and glistening. Madame, in black and scarlet—like her ship—leant against the long tiller, and steered by the lithe inflections of her young, trimly belted figure, her fingers busy the while with gleaming steel pins and a rudimentary grey sock; Monsieur, short and just a little stout, holland-coated and spectacled, one moment struggled with his over-long quant, the next ran forward to manipulate the sail; Bébé, fat and stolid, sat in his chair, tethered by scarlet cords to a stanchion on the cabin-roof, watching with placid eyes his mail-cart towing in the dinghy that curvetted behind. The paraphernalia of an artist littered the deck aft; forward a pile of tin pots and pans shone like silver in the sunshine. As the clumsy argosy came abreast of me a tiny breeze caught the red-brown rag of sail; it filled; the drowsy babble of the water round the boat's bluff bows grew more insistent, and Monsieur, breaking into a cheery whistle, drew in his quant, its wreaths of dripping green weed sprinkling the deck with silvery drops.

Five minutes later I had the river and the June morning to myself again.

Conquest.

SOME little girls were busy over the piece of poetry set for learning by heart. It was Cowper's "Lines on Receiving His Mother's Picture."

One of them wore a black dress in memory of a dead mother. She loved poetry, and had even written little rhyming verses which that mother had praised. She was only twelve years old, but these lines of Cowper's showed her, as in a picture, the whole misery of orphanhood.

Yet her pride rebelled at the thought of exposure: she would learn them and say them, and no human eye should discover that it was her own aching heart that was crying aloud.

Perhaps after all she did not really care so very much. No one at least should know that she cared.

And so the time came for the repeating of the lesson, and the children, with hands behind them, stood ready.

O that those lips had language! Life has passed With me but roughly since I heard thee last came rather coldly from the lips of a rosy creature whose life had been along the primrose-way. One after the other took up the cue, and at last came the orphan's turn:

My mother! when I learned that thou wast dead,
Say, wast thou conscious of the tears I shed?
Hovered thy spirit—

And then followed hesitation, a droop of the head, and choking tears.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

La Vogue is a tiny monthly magazine, robed in yellow. On my return from Italy, I find the two last numbers upon my table. I open one, and alight upon a criticism of the Anglo-Saxon idol of the hour. I translate portions:

Much noise has been lately made round Mr. Rudyard Kipling, which causes naive souls to believe that he has a great deal of genius. When I have said that Mr. Kipling has a good deal of talent, I believe I remain strictly within the limits of truth; and when I add that he owes his popularity to reasons foreign to literature, I am sure of advancing nothing false. Mr. Kipling writes as we box, with the robust intention of knocking his reader down. He has the alert and insolent pen of the journalist he was, even when he rises to a kind of verbal lyricism which is not without a slight echo of Bret Harte. Behind his eye-glass he shows the imperturbable glance of the Yankee reporter—whose nervously impressionable retina he possesses. Agitated in repose, calm in effort, Mr. Kipling is a man of action. He is the poet of men-of-war, agents of destruction, as Walt Whitman was the poet of steam-engines, instruments of regeneration. Absolutely lacking in general ideas, he shares, with sincere enthusiasm, which at the same time makes his fortune, all the prejudices of the crowd. . . . He refused to enter a university, which refusal explains, without excusing, his bad style. . . . In London he wrote The Light that Failed, a novel which widely established his reputation, though it hardly rises above the stories of Rider Haggard. What have we to say of this young man, who, lately ill, received at New York daily thousands of telegrams from England, Canada, India, Australia, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Emperor of Germany himself? Now that he is cured, we dare affirm that he should be named poet-laureate to Mr. Cecil Rhodes.

Writing of the Jungle Book, this critic says :

Mr. Kipling sometimes deserves better than his universal popularity. He sometimes earns the esteem of writers . . . in lending himself to comparisons, more ingenious than just, with Pierre Loti and Leconte de Lisle. Mr. Kipling is quite original in these tales, whose heroes are wolves, panthers, tigers, pythons, elephants, and even seals. But spare us all comparison with La Fontaine, whose genius was made up of grace, of malice, and of moderation.

A new French book to be recommended is Passage de Bédouins, by an unknown writer, Myriam Harry, evidently a pseudonym. Like Mr. Kipling's Plain Tales from the Hills, these delightful short stories deal altogether with Eastern life. But they deal with an Oriental race less mysterious, less complex, and different in quite another way from the Indian race. These children of the desert make very simple, slightly monotonous studies. The stories lack in treatment, the variety, the compelling force of Mr. Kipling; but, on the other hand, they possess what Plain Tales from the Hills cannot lay claim to : grace, distinction, and elegance. Their style is very charming, even when the subject is extremely thin. When the writer, towards the end of the book, leaves the desert, with its animal and fugitive loves, so delicately recorded, and its terrible hates, it is to take us to Jerusalem, where we read a pathetic and softly satirical tale of a mad woman, claimed by all the rival religions, because successively she patronised each one, was baptized by the pope, confessed to the priest, and was confirmed by the Protestant minister, and was denied by all in her death, when she was found drowned in her cistern. Of Jerusalem Christmas Myriam Harry writes :

The Grotto of the Nativity is invaded by wealthy Americans, who have paid for their seats with gold, while the poor and humble recite their prayers in the courtyard. There, where once knelt simple shepherds, priests, a blaze of gold, carelessly recite the Christmas Gospel, and above may be heard the drawl of a pope reciting a rival Mass. The straw on which Christ was born is replaced by a marble bed, on which you are shown the impress of his mother's body. Instead of the crib so humanly miserable is an altar of porphyry, outrageously inlaid with jewels, royally profaned with lace and ermine. An alabaster slab indicates the spot where the Magi knelt, they who worshipped in the dust ! And one thinks if Christ were to appear He would tear away those jewels from the walls, and distribute their price among the poor who pray without in the courtyard.

Those fond of travelling sketches, written with gravity and delicate skill, M. Ary Renan's Paysages Historiques will please and interest. The essays are off the beaten track, and embrace half-a-dozen of historic spots from Torcello, the cradle of Venice, to the torrents of Upper Lebanon. M. Renan's prose is distinguished and precise, as befits that of a son of the most exquisite writer of prose this century has produced; but when we remember the father the son seems a very small person indeed. Strange to sign a page "Renan" and lack charm, lack that wavering, serpentine, almost fluid enchantment of atmosphere, that cadenced beauty of phrase which make Renan's prose a delight far above poetry, because it is, as well as lovely, clear and intelligent, and smiling and softly satirical and beguiling with witchery. M. Ary Renan, in his interesting essay on Torcello, quotes most solemnly George Sand from her description in Lettres d'un Voyageur of her visit to this mournful island of the Lagoon. The French guide-book to Venice also largely quotes from these letters, by no means worthy of George Sand. Like all hasty and prolific writers, the mighty and admirable George wrote a vast amount of rubbish along with some very delightful masterpieces. The best she ever wrote of Venice are the opening chapters of Consuelo. "Madame Sand," says M. Ary Renan, "looked at Torcello with an absent eye." In her Lettres d'un Voyageur she certainly did not look upon Venice, nor thought about it, with the eye or mind of an artist. She was too busy acting her transparent comedy of "George," and trying to take in a public only too well acquainted with her sex and her idle loves, with her schoolboy strut, her trousers, and her collegian's cap.

The South of Europe has apparently conquered Paris. Quite a horde of lions has invaded us, coming by the Pyrenees and by the Alps. First Duse, then Annunzio, Novelli, Foggazzaro, Giacomo; then Guerrera (the Spanish actress), Emilia Pardo Bazán; and, last, Mathilde Serao, the Italian novelist, who has been interviewed, partaken of banquets enough to be ill for the rest of her life, and has just left us for repose in her native land.

H. L.

Memoirs of the Moment.

DEBATES in the House of Commons are sometimes amusing, despite the dullness of the record of them made in the daily press. The other evening, for instance, when the vote of £39,000 was being taken for the Public Record Office in Dublin, the whole proceedings formed a very sprightly footnote to current Irish history. From the Irish benches there was an allegation of favouritism in the permissions given to applicants to search out documents in the Record Office's historic archives. Mr. Gerald Balfour said that such permission, while it was given to eminent and impartial historians like Mr. Froude and Mr. Lecky, must be denied to mere politicians whose history was necessarily partisan. The impartiality of Mr. Froude! Mr. Lecky supported the proposition. He had used the privileges of inspection gingerly, he had not inflamed men's minds, he had exercised a wise discretion which could not be expected from mere ordinary mortals, and he gave his support to the Government in its refusal to open its doors to political or historical writers who approached the documents with a bias.

THEN Mr. Swift MacNeill, who had sat opposite feasting his ears on these acerbities of feeling expressed in tones of dulcet monotony, sprang to his feet. "The right hon. gentleman," he said, shooting out a finger at Mr. Lecky, who shook his impartial head to deny in advance anything an Irish member on the other side might blurt out—"the right hon. gentleman has a most remarkable memory [more shakes of the head from Mr. Lecky], for the description he has just given of the partisan historian, intended to justify the Government in its refusal to allow me to see these documents, reproduces almost word for word a footnote of his own, published years ago, in criticism of the methods of Mr. Froude." (More, but feebler, shakes of Mr. Lecky's head.) Then Mr. MacNeill went on to say that when he made his first visit to the Dublin Record Office, many years ago, he made it in company of a man whom "even the Superior Person 'opposite' would admit to be a civilised human being—the late Dean of Christ Church, Dean Liddell. (The Times, by the way, is the only paper that tried to report the name, and then it came out "Little.") The Dean and his companion were received by Sir Bernard Burke, who, in a certain room, said: "This is where Froude and Lecky work; but I never let them in together, for fear they'd take to boxing." The loud laugh which went up from both sides of the House found Mr. Lecky still shaking his head, his dissent on this occasion finding further expression in the hardly relevant remark that he and Froude were never in Dublin together. Mr. Swift MacNeill had made his point. If he, one of Her Majesty's Counsel, a professor in an Irish university, and the author of a History of the Irish Rebellion of '98, was to be refused access to public documents because his published result would, as Mr. Gerald Balfour said, "inflame public passions," then it was monstrous to say that Mr. Froude should have been made free on the papers. Not even Mr. Lecky would say that the only "impartial" historian known to Mr. Lecky was Mr. Lecky himself. Not only Mr. Dillon and Mr. T. P. O'Connor, but Mr. Asquith and Mr. Bryce, insisted on the absurdity of the censorship; and the good-humoured encouragement given by a group of Conservative members to all Mr. Swift MacNeill's sallies at Mr. Lecky the monopolist found expression in a little speech of protest directed by Lord Charles Beresford against Mr. MacNeill's exclusion. If the political opinions of applicants to see public records in Ireland are to be considered, why not the literary opinions of applicants for readers' tickets in the British Museum? The task of the censor is as absurd in the one case as in the other; and the boycotted debate on the boycotted Mr. Swift MacNeill will probably prove an effective protest against the official gagging of historical inquiry, and will end Mr. Lecky's momentary appearance in the character of an inquisitor.

WHEN you see B with a dash after it, B—— in fact, and this literally on every page of a good-sized book, you naturally think that the diction is that customary, according to a recent witness, among Masters of Hounds. But a second glance will persuade you that you are quite mistaken as to the character of The Alleged Haunting of B—— House. It is an absolutely correct book, so far as propriety goes, whatever may be divined by the unsympathetic reader as to its accuracy. Above all, it is a book of mystery. If B—— House, on the T—— River, is haunted, people known by half the letters of the alphabet shall bear witness to it, though its owners, the S—— family, who like to let the house as if ghosts did not already inhabit it rent free, may object to the exposure. Frankly, is not this assumption of initial mystery in a book edited by the Marquis of Bute and Miss A. Goodrich-Freer (one is glad to get an honest name or two somewhere) a little unnecessary and not a little provoking? And the futility of it all! For there, to the undoing of the "B——" upon the binding, of the "B——" upon the title-page, of the "B——" on every headline of every page, of the "B——" a hundred times repeated in the text—to the deleting of all these dashes, upon page 82, the —— is let out of the bag, and by an oversight the name is printed in full—BALLECHIN. This, of course, is the doing of no ordinary printer's demon, but of a "malignant influence." No doubt Lord Bute will cancel the edition, a very prettily printed one, published by Mr. Redway; for a British marquis is not going to own himself beaten by a sprite. The reader, for his part, would prefer to have the blanks everywhere filled: Ballechin in place of B——, the Steuart family for the S—— family, the Tay for the T——, Dunkeld for D——, and so on through all the maze of dashes that stand for proper names, sometimes to the number of fourteen upon a single page.

A COINCIDENCE may be worth recalling. In Lothair Lord Beaconsfield made, on one page, precisely the same betraying slip of the pen, when instead of "Monsignor Catesby" he wrote "Monsignor Capel," the original from whom his Catesby was drawn. And Lord Bute was the hero of that book.

A STORY is none the worse because it is not new, as Mark Twain's recent efforts in oratory have proved. Hence one feels quite justified, if only that Mark may care to add it to his repertory, in telling again the tale of the 'bus conductor and the watch chain. All down the Strand the conductor, at intervals of a few yards, dangled his watch chain before the driver of the 'bus behind him. "Why do I do that?" he said, in reply to a passenger. "Oh, it's only a little joke between me and Bill: his father was hanged."

Correspondence.

Mr. Silas Hocking's Popularity.

SIR,—I hope I am not insensible of the honour you have done me in devoting a special article to an inquiry into the cause or causes of what you are kind enough to call my "popularity." Nor do I complain of the measure of praise or dispraise meted out to me. I cannot help thinking, however, that the writer of the article has done less than justice to the great body of Nonconformists to which I have the honour to belong. He appears to accept without qualification the traditional idea that they are "Philistine" to the core—that they have neither refinement nor culture nor education.

"The other arts, by the way," he says, "scarcely exist for them: they eschew the theatre; music means hymns, anthems, and sometimes 'The Messiah'; to painting they are completely indifferent; architecture as an art has never occurred to them."

Now, however true this may have been in the past—say a hundred years ago—it seems to me incredible that any man can believe that it is true to-day. For good or ill, I fancy that Dissenters know as much about theatres as other people; nor have they failed in appreciation of art or in artistic achievement, nor shown themselves deficient in the higher branches of learning. I admit that many of our chapels are irremediably ugly; but it must be remembered that most of them were built by the freewill offerings of the poor, without a farthing's help from the State, and art in architecture is a luxury that only the rich can command.

In creative literature also I claim that Dissenters have not fallen a whit behind. It is no secret that Barrie and Crockett and Ian Maclaren, and Miss Thorneycroft Fowler and John Oliver Hobbes, and even Kipling, are all of them Nonconformists, or the children of Nonconformists. Hence it is unfair to gird at Nonconformists as though education and culture and refinement were all a matter of going to the Established Church, or not going. I can quite believe that fashionable Kensington knows me not; but the explanation of that is not to be found in the fact that I am a Dissenter, for in other parts of the country Churchpeople have bought tens of thousands of my books, and the question of sect or creed, as far as I know, has never been raised. Perhaps even Kensington may condescend to notice me some day.

But the truth is, I have not attempted to write for the fashionable few. Most likely I should fail were I to try. I have aimed at the multitude—the middle and working classes; have written about what I think I understand. How far I have succeeded is not for me to say.

One other point. The writer of the article says: "It [the novel] must on no account be realistic, for these people [the Dissenters] seek in art a means, not of getting closer to life, but of receding from it—so mean and unlovely as life is to their unseeing eyes." This—not to put too fine a point on it—is not flattering to the Dissenters. Yet I would like to remark that my book, God's Outcast, which some critics described as too painfully realistic, has run through eight large editions in as many months.

In conclusion, I have only to add that I am quite convinced, from the whole tenour of the article, from its sympathetic references to myself, that the writer would not intentionally do an injustice to any section of the community. It is still the misfortune of Nonconformists to be misunderstood. The traditional caricature still holds the field. Prejudices die hard. But literature and the arts should know nothing of Episcopacy or Dissent, and the reading public cannot be classified by any reference to Church or Chapel.—I am, &c.,

SILAS K. HOCKING.

Highgate: July 3, 1899.

An Author's Complaint.

SIR,—It is impossible to allow Sir Martin Conway's letter, published in your issue of July 1, to pass unchallenged. He states that the Society of Authors might have interfered in the case of my boycotted novel to the extent of making a protest "if the question had been one of literary censorship."

Surely the correspondence in the June Author clearly establishes that the veto of my novel was a particularly clear case of literary censorship. Mr. Kingdon (the departmental manager of Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son) told me personally that he "could not permit a novel with such a title to appear amongst other books on their stalls," and he distinctly gave that as his reason for not taking the book into stock.

I directly challenged Mr. Kingdon to deny this in my letter to Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son of October 24, 1898 (see June Author). It was impossible for him to make any such denial, and he has never denied the accuracy of my statement, although, in consequence of this case, leading articles condemning the Smith censorship appeared in the Morning Post, the Daily Chronicle, the Daily News, and many other journals. Not only so, but a number of gentlemen, electors of the Strand Division, invited me to contest the Hon. W. F. D. Smith's seat in Parliament upon this very question of the censorship, as it arose in my case; and an account of these proceedings was reported at length in the leading newspapers—still without provoking the denial which I had challenged Mr. Kingdon to make, and which it was his bounden duty to give had he been able to do so.

The literary censorship is thus, in fact, admitted; and it is not open to the Society of Authors to take the view which Sir Martin Conway expresses.—I am, &c., T. MULLETT ELLIS.

Savage Club: July 3, 1899.

"Man Past and Present."

SIR,—I am sorry if I have misrepresented Prof. Keane, and certainly I admit the slip by which I called his earlier book "Anthropology" instead of "Ethnology," although I did not, as a matter of fact, confuse him with Prof. Tylor. With regard to the route of the Kelts, I am afraid there is some vagueness and inconsistency of statement in Prof. Keane's own account of the subject. Shortly before the passage he quotes in his letter to you, he says (p. 511):

Europe would appear to have been reached by two routes, first . . . across the Mediterranean, . . . then round by Asia Minor and the Eurasian steppe. . . . Both routes were followed by both types.

However, I now understand that Prof. Keane's full meaning is, that the round-headed Keltic type went by Asia Minor, and the long-headed Teutonic type by the Eurasian steppe. Only, surely, the farther apart you keep round-heads and long-heads the more difficult it becomes to explain the conjectured adoption by the round-heads of the long-head language. Under what conditions does one people adopt en masse the language of another with which it does not coalesce, and with which it is carefully prohibited, during one period of its wanderings at least, from even coming into contact?—I am, &c.,

THE REVIEWER.

Giving Satisfaction.

SIR,—Mr. Beavan, as a logician and historian, is beyond my calibre. He says that Horace Smith could not have been ignorant of the construction usually placed upon the expression "the satisfaction due to a gentleman." He then sees no conceivable harm in Mr. Smith's use of that phrase "satisfaction" when he meant something totally different from the common construction. I have no hope of making Mr. Beavan understand the situation. Either he has read the contemporary documents in the case, or he has not. If he has read them, let him not "suggest" that I have used them "rather too exclusively" in Lockhart's interest; let him prove his point by citation. If Mr. Beavan has not read the documents, he has no locus standi, and I have no more to say to him.—I am, &c., 1, Marloes-road, W.:

A. LANG.

July 2, 1899.

The "High History."

SIR,—When Mr. Alfred Nutt lectures your reviewer on the incorrectness of his "critical attitude," and the Athenæum takes me to task for the defect of my "critical method," will you kindly allow me to call the attention of these eminent "Celticists" to the extremely "critical position" of the theory they patronise? This theory is that the legend of the Holy Graal has its origin in Celtic tradition. Celtic folklore and mythology have accordingly been ransacked for parallels to certain episodes and personages in the story of the Graal, and the search so far has been successful in "equating" Sir Perceval with the "Great Fool" of Celtic nursery tales and the Graal with the Cauldron of Keridwen, or some other such highly-gifted utensil honourably mentioned by Cambrian or Hibernian rhapsodists. These are, I believe, the very closest correspondences yet detected between the legend and Celtic tradition, and few, I imagine, will be found to deny that the bond which connects the romance with pre-Christian story is as cogent as that which unites the ace of spades to the Great Mogul. Mr. Nutt somewhat minimises the scope of his own theory when he confines himself, as he does in his letter to you, to stating his belief that "the Graal legend contains elements immeasurably more antique than our greyest cathedrals," and that "the framework and many essential incidents of the legend are largely pre-Christian." As to its containing "elements" of pre-Christian or even pre-historic antiquity, I apprehend that the same might as truly be predicated of Mr. Kipling's latest batch of tales as of the Graal legend. The pâté de foie gras does not owe its origin to the truffles it contains. But to maintain that the framework and many essential incidents of the legend are largely pre-Christian and Celtic—for this is Mr. Nutt's real contention—is simply, as Prof. Courthope has well said before me, "to advance a proposition that can hardly be sustained by argument." Argument, indeed, is out of the question. The High History gives the legend; the Celtic framework and corresponding incidents are simply non-existent. A "critical method" capable of discerning the germs of the Graal legend in any of the imaginary parallels cited by Mr. Nutt in his Studies is equally capable of finding the central idea of Pickwick in the Hittite inscriptions, or reading adumbrations of Tom Jones between the lines of the Rosetta Stone. Had the Celticists ever unearthed a single real likeness, comparable, for instance, with the likeness of Shakespeare's "Hamlet" to the Amlethus of Saxo Grammaticus, their case would have been impregnable. But such a likeness they have not found, and, it is safe to prophesy, will not find. For of what is the Graal the symbol and representative? In mediæval romance, the Graal is always and everywhere the emblem, not merely of the Eucharist, but of the Eucharist interpreted according to the dogma of Transubstantiation. The whole story, warp and woof, belongs to an age when that dogma was in the very air men breathed, when the religious sentiment of Christendom demanded that it should be formally declared a necessary article of faith. To look for its origin in pre-Christian ages is to dig for coal in the primeval granite. It is not there, and cannot be there. The "Celticists" may perhaps be adepts at boring, but their knowledge of literary geology is at fault. The "Celtic theory," in fact, as applied to the Graal legend, is played out, and the sooner the fact is recognised, the better. It is heart-breaking to see good hard work and wide erudition wasted in futile attempts to bolster up an hypothesis never supported by any argument founded on fact or likelihood, and now rendered obsolete by the establishment of a fait nouveau wholly unknown to its exponents. This "new fact" is that the prose romance printed by M. Potvin, and translated by me as the High History, is the identical work which, as early as the middle of the thirteenth century, was known as "The Graal, the Book of the Holy Vessel." The centre of gravity of the whole controversy as to its origin is, in fact, shifted, now that the legend itself is proved to be something quite different from what the controversialists believed it to be. Mr. Nutt's own "critical attitude" towards the High History I do not understand. If he had read the French romance, or Mr. Williams's translation of the Welsh translation, when he wrote his Studies, why did he not give an abstract of the version as he did of all the other known versions? Why did he leave it to me to point out for the first time that this and none other is "the Graal, the Book of the Holy Vessel"? On the other hand, if he had not read it, how came he not to make himself acquainted with a document so vitally connected with his subject? The French, the Welsh translation of the French, and the English translation of the Welsh, had been under his very nose for years, yet he failed to show the slightest appreciation of their bearing or value. Even now, both he and the Athenæum magisterially inform the world that the High History is, after all, nothing more than a mediæval French romance, neither better nor worse than many others, as if this were the point at issue. The point is really whether or not it is the Book of the Graal. If it is, let it be accepted as such, whatever its literary merit may be. It is significant, however, that these high authorities scrupulously refrain from naming any other French prose mediæval romance which can bear a moment's comparison with the High History. Their reason for this singular omission is, I admit, quite conclusive, though undivulged. They cannot. The High History remains as I described it, "not only the most coherent and poetic of all the many versions of the legend, but also the first and most authentic." It is hardly "cricket" for even "Celticists" to run down the real legend of the Graal simply because it does not suit their theories to acknowledge the fact that it is the legend. Here, for the present, I take my leave of the "Celticists." When they have produced any proof that there exists or ever has existed any version of the Legend of the Graal of an earlier date than the High History, any proof that it has been interpolated or tampered with, any proof that it is not the work known in the Middle Ages as the "Book of the Holy Vessel," I am quite prepared cheerfully to admit that it is not what I take it to be—"the original story of Sir Perceval and the Holy Graal, whole and incorrupt, as it left the hands of its first author."—I am, &c., SEBASTIAN EVANS.

Charles Darwin.

SIR, — In looking over last week's number of the ACADEMY, I find that you have awarded a prize for an epitaph which asserts that Charles Darwin demonstrated the law of evolution. Is there not something wrong here? The law of evolution, as far as I can understand the history of science, has been demonstrated by nearly all scientists since Aristotle. What Charles Darwin did do was to attempt to explain the law of evolution by natural selection.—I am, &c.,

A. STODART WALKER.

30, Walker-street, Edinburgh.

[Dr. Walker's remonstrance is quite to the point. But it must be borne in mind that in these Competitions the prize goes to the best, and the best is not necessarily perfect.—ED. ACADEMY]

Mr. Labouchere's Imaginary Poems.

Our Prize Competitions.

RESULT OF No. 39.

THE terms of last week's competition were thus explained:—"In Mr. Lang's story 'A Bookman's Purgatory,' in Books and Dooms, we read: 'Blinton was wont to say he expected to come across "Triplets of a Tribune," by Mr. John Bright, and "Original Hymns for Infant Minds," by Mr. Henry Labouchere, if he only hunted long enough.' Let us suppose that he did hunt long enough, and came upon Mr. Labouchere's work. For the best selection from its pages, not exceeding 21 lines, we offer a prize of a guinea."

In reply, several very interesting extracts from Mr. Labouchere's imaginary work have reached us. The best is the following, contributed by L Kent, Southwood, Highgate, N.:

NO. 15 OF MR. HENRY LABOUCHERE'S ORIGINAL HYMNS FOR INFANT MINDS.

Good little children are not proud;
Their meekness they proclaim aloud:
And this is still their infant song:
"Our side is always in the wrong."

Our mothers are not good nor kind;
They slap us if we do not mind,
And put us in the corner too—
A thing they have no right to do."

And though each child would dearly love
Its father's actions to approve;
Yet must it see, with pained surprise,
That they are neither just nor wise.

"The other children's parents are Better," it moans, "than my papa.
I fear he is a greedy man,
Getting and keeping what he can."

But I, with all my little might,
Will do my best to set him right;
And weekly raise, both loud and high,
My truthful and condemning cry."

Thus runs the virtuous infant's lay.
Its parents it will not obey;
But still proclaims in tireless song
That they are always in the wrong.

Other hymns follow:

GOLDEN RULES FOR LITTLE ENGLANDERS.

Come, little children, list to me:
Learn my Commandments Ten.

- I. Love all your fellow-men, except Your fellow country-men.
- II. Don't thank the goodness and the grace
That on your birth have smiled—"—
A Matabele's better far
Than a mere "English child."
- III. When waging war 'gainst savage hordes
Greet their defeat with tears—
Politely hand them Maxim guns,
And take your chance with spears.
- IV. Hate all who seek your country's weal.
- V. Love all who work her woe.
- VI. Remember, an "Imperialist"
Is your most deadly foe.
- VII. Foreign aggression meekly meet
With "Please, sir, step this way."
- VIII. Never resort to force of arms.
- IX. All demands gladly pay.
- X. Cultivate peace at any price.
(No need to win your spurs.)
Do all these things, and you shall be Great "Little Englanders."

[G. N, Clifton.]

God bless Harcourt. God bless me,
And save our precious souls !
God keep Her Gracious Majesty,
And God bless Tommy Bowles.

God bless our little English isle—
It's spreading much too far—
And make me, in a little while,
A Minister of War.

Oh, straighten out our crooked Rhodes,
And make the rough ways plain ;
Wipe out the Daily Mail-y codes,
And build up TRUTH again.

[B. B., Birmingham.]

I love my Little England,
So prosperous and free ;
The Rhodes that lead to Empire
Are not the roads for me.

Though Tory Bumbles bungle :
Though pushing paupers cheat,
I love my Little England
(But not her costly fleet).

I love to watch her rulers
Their little faults to find.
I love my Little England,
She suits my little mind.

[E. M. B. U., London.]

Little England, Little England,
Ere you grow to man's estate,
Learn from me this humble lesson :
It is folly to be great.

Primrose paths that lead to glory
It is foolishness to roam ;
Are there not for young explorers
Labyrinths of Truth at home ?

Should they tempt you with an atlas,
Show you where the Transvaal lies ;
Listen with polite attention,
But with pity in your eyes.

Tell them that they really shouldn't
Try to teach geography—
"Boots are made in gay Northampton,
That is quite enough for me!"

[N. P., London.]

Replies received also from : J. H., Tunbridge Wells ; T. C., Buxted (?) ; J. D. A., Ealing ; Miss C., Redhill ; M. A. C. M., Wells ; H. P. B., Glasgow ; J. H., Tavistock ; A. H. B., London.

Competition No. 40.

IN a letter from Robert Louis Stevenson to Mr. Henley, written in 1884, and quoted in part on pp. 28, 29 of this number of the ACADEMY, the writer complains that novelists will not produce the brave romances his soul loves ; nor do their books open in the right way. He then gives three openings of his own invention as specimens of what he likes. This is one :

CHAPTER I.

The notary, Jean Rossignol, had been summoned to the top of a great house in the Isle St. Louis to make a will ; and now, his duties finished, wrapped in a warm roquelaure and with a lantern swinging from one hand, he issued from the mansion on his homeward way. Little did he think what strange adventures were to befall him !—

We offer a prize of a guinea to the author of the best adventure which befell the notary, Jean Rossignol, on this occasion. The account or summary of the adventure must not exceed 250 words, and it ought to be remembered by competitors that the adventure should be likely to please Stevenson.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, July 11. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 48 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names—both Christian name and surname—and addresses should always be given : we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon, or stamps for the same ; otherwise the first to be looked at will alone be considered.

Horoscopes.

From the French of François Coppée.

BEFORE the sibyl with her haunted eyes
Two sisters sat with delicate arms enlaced ;
Watched as she dealt the cards, and, without haste,
Spelt out the rune of their two destinies.

Brown-haired and gold-haired, fresher than the dawn,
Poppy and white anemone were they,
A flower of autumn and a flower of May,
They watched to see their fates from darkness drawn.

"Life will be sad for you and yours, heigho !"
The sibyl told the autumn-coloured maid.
"But will my lover love me ?" "Ay," she said.
"Why, then, I shall be all too happy so."

"With earthly love you never shall be fed,"
The sibyl told the lady white as snow.
"But shall I love at all ?" "Ay, even so."
"Then happy I shall live and die," she said.

NORA HOPPER.

Books Received.

Week ending Thursday, July 6.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Nash (H. S.), Ethics and Revelation ..... (Macmillan & Co.) 6/0

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES-LETTRES.

Deluscar (Horace), Deluscar's Morris, and Other Poems ..... (Gay & Bird) 3/6
Moore (T. Sturge), The Vinedresser, and Other Poems ..... (Unicorn Press) 2/6
Cornwallis (K.), The War For the Union ..... (New York : Wall-street Investigator) 2/6
Lee-Hamilton (Eugene and Annie), Forest Notes ..... (Grant Richards) 3/6
Mansfield (Charlotte), Flowers of the Wind ..... (Elkin Mathews) 2/6
Beeching (H. C.), A Selection from the Poetry of Samuel Daniel and Michael Drayton ..... (Dent)
Aveling (H.), Poems and Paragraphs ..... (Digby, Long)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Trent (W. P.), John Milton ..... (New York : The Macmillan Co.) 3/6
Elson (H. W.), Side Lights on American History ..... (New York : The Macmillan Co.) 3/6
Blackman (W. F.), The Making of Hawaii ..... (New York : The Macmillan Co.) 7/6
Narfon (Julien de), Pope Leo XIII. Translated by G. A. Raper ..... (Chapman & Co.)
Zimmermann (Father B.), Carmel in England ..... (Burns & Oates) 6/0
Sidney (Philip), Memoirs of the Sidney Family ..... (Elkin Mathews) 10/6
Bridge (Edited by Cyprian A. G.), The Russian Fleet during the Reign of Peter the Great ..... (Navy Records Society)

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Miller (W. J. C.), Essays and Nature Studies ..... (Elliot Stock) 10/6
Baker (H. B.), Stories of the Streets of London ..... (Chapman & Hall) 7/6
Lynch (Hannah), Toledo ..... (Dent) 3/6
Teignmouth-shore (The Rev. Canon T.), Worcester Cathedral ... (Isbister) 1/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Shelley (H. C.), Chats About the Microscope ..... (Scientific Press) 2/0

EDUCATIONAL.

Cutting (S. W.), Lessing's Minna von Barnhelm ... (The Macmillan Co.) 3/6
Fairgrieve (Clara A.), Sequel to the Child's French Grammar ..... (Edinburgh : Oliver & Boyd)
Smith (Charles) and Bryant (Sophie), Euclid's Elements of Geometry. Books III. and IV. ..... (Macmillan) 2/0
Berthon (H. E.), Specimens of Modern French Verse ..... (Macmillan)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Murray (Edited by Dr. James A. H.), The Oxford English Dictionary. Horizontality—Hywe ..... (Clarendon Press) 8/0
Lockie (Katherine F.), Picturesque Edinburgh ..... (Lockie) 3/6
Sturpe (H. R.), Calendar of Letter Books of the City of London. Letter Book A. ..... (Francis)
British School at Athens, Annual of the ..... (Macmillan & Co.) 7/6
Schreiner (Olive), An English-South-African View of the Situation ..... (Hodder & Stoughton) 1/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Dale (R. W.), Laws of Christ for Common Life ..... (Hodder & Stoughton) 3/6
Parr (Mrs.), Robin ..... (Macmillan) 3/6

\* New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.*

\* Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.*

DARWIN on TRIAL at the OLD BAILEY.
By DEMOCRITUS. With an Appendix, JUDICIAL SCANDALS and ERRORS, showing Mrs. Grundy's Attempt to interfere with the Publication of Scientific Works at the end of the Nineteenth Century. Dedicated to the Right Honble. the Home Secretary. Bound in cloth, post free, 2s.

THE UNIVERSAL ILLUSION of FREE-WILL and CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY. By A. HAMON, Professor in the New University of Brussels. A most valuable Contribution to the Literature on the all-absorbing Question of Determinism and Free-Will. Post free, 3s. 6d.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, Limited, Watford, London.

BOROUGH of DERBY.

MUNICIPAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the appointment of PRINCIPAL to the above College. Salary £500 per annum. Further particulars can be obtained on application to the undersigned.

Applications must be sent in not later than Tuesday, July 25th.

Canvassing in any form will be a disqualification.

WILLIAM COOPER, Honorary Secretary.
Derby, June 24th, 1899.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have especially built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 66121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

MR. HENRY J. DRANE, Publisher,
Salisbury House, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, is prepared to consider MSS. for the coming season. Authors desirous of publishing on their own account can, by applying to Mr. Drane, receive fair treatment, and avoid all middlemen's profits and commissions. No fees charged for reading, &c. Magazines and Periodicals published on a low commission.

BOOKS WANTED, at Prices affixed.
—"Snob and Gownman," 1829-30, £5.—"The Germ," 1859, £2.—"Old Paris," 1874, £2.—"The Lover's Tale," 1831, £5.—"Borrow's" "Wild Wales," 1862, £1.—"Moore's" "Alps in 1864," £3.—"Titmarsh's" "Comic Tales," 1841, £5.—"Queen Mab," 1813, £7.—"Alice in Wonderland," 1866, £2.—"Pauline: a Fragment," 1852, £20. 2000 Books Wanted at fancy prices. List free.—EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish. Apply, by letter, to D. C. DAHLGREN, 8, Farnival Street, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.,
68, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing in foreign languages.

The Old Series of THE ACADEMY, which ended on October 1st, completed a volume. The Index can be obtained gratis on application to the Publisher.

"THE ACADEMY" LITERARY COMPETITIONS.

No. 40.

All readers attempting this week's Competition (described fully on page 47) must cut out this Coupon and enclose it with their reply.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED),

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of
all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS
per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis
and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;
And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £1
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums in deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

JUST READY,

THE AMBITIONS OF ST. PAUL. By Rev.
W. GARRETT HORDER.

CONTENTS: Concerning Ambition—Three, not One—The First Ambition—The Second Ambition—The Third Ambition.

"This little book is laden with many a precious thought."—Christian Age.

"It is full of freshness and suggestion."
Sunday School Chronicle.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d., post free.

CONVICTED OF HEROISM. A Tale of John Penry, Martyr, 1559–1593. By HERBERT M. WHITE, B.A. Illustrated by Frank H. Simpson.

"Excellent, unusual grasp of events, robustity of ideal, vividness, and grace of style."
Rev. ARCHIBALD DUFF, D.D.

"Ought to have a large sale in our schools and churches."—A. E. HURTON, Esq., M.P.

London: 21 & 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, E.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

SELECTIONS FROM

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.
THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.
"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes .... full of thought and knowledge and power."
British Weekly.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.
"Forcible, clear, gracious, and suggestive."
Presbyterian.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. MacLaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."
New York Observer.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."
Methodist Times.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."
North British Daily Mail.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d., post free.

ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN. Containing over 500 beautiful and suggestive illustrations. With a Textual Index and Alphabetical List of Subjects.

"Gems from a prince of illustrators."—Freeman.

Just Published. Price 4s., or 3s. per dozen.

RELIGIOUS EQUALITY. A Lecture by
Dr. MACLAREN.

Just Published. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Royston.

The Freeman says: "Preachers and teachers will find in them many helpful suggestions."

The Glasgow Herald says: "They will probably interest and instruct many who would an ordinary sermon flee."

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Spiritual Principle of Nonconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.

"Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence."—Manchester Guardian.
"Nothing could be more timely than these learned and suggestive lectures."—Christian World.

Twenty-first Thousand. Limp cloth, price 6d., post free.

OUR PRINCIPLES: a Congregationalist Church Manual. By G. B. JOHNSON.

Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CONDUCT of PUBLIC MEETINGS. By J. HUNT COOKE. A Clear and Concise Manual for all Public Speakers.

Just Published. Post 8vo, cloth, with Portraits, price 6s., post free.

WELSHMEN in ENGLISH PULPITS; or, Sermons by English Congregational Ministers from Wales. With Introduction by Rev. CHARLES A. BERRY, D.D. Edited by Rev. DANIEL WATERS.

The Expository Times says: "And here we have thirty excellent portraits of prominent and eloquent Congregational preachers, with their thirty sermons, and the price is but a few shillings."

London: 21 & 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, E.C.

SELECTIONS FROM
ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S
PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 6s. each, post free.
THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.
"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes..... full of thought and knowledge and power."
British Weekly.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.
"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.
"Forceful, clear, gracious, and suggestive."
Presbyterian.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.
"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-scouring power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.
"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."
New York Observer.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.
"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."
Methodist Times.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.
"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."
North British Daily Mail.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.
"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d., post free.
ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN. Containing over 50 beautiful and suggestive illustrations. With a Textual Index and Alphabetical List of Subjects.

"Gems from a prince of illustrators."—Freeman.
Just Published. Price 4d., or 3s. per dozen.
RELIGIOUS EQUALITY. A Lecture by Dr. MACLAREN.

Just Published. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.
"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Royton.
The Freeman says: "Preachers and teachers will find in them many helpful suggestions."
The Glasgow Herald says: "They will probably interest and instruct many who would an ordinary sermon flee."

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Spiritual Principle of Nonconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.
"Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence."—Manchester Guardian.
"Nothing could be more timely than these learned and suggestive lectures."—Christian World.

Twenty-first Thousand. Limp cloth, price 6d., post free.
OUR PRINCIPLES: a Congregationalist Church Manual. By G. B. JOHNSON.

Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 1s. 6d., post free.
THE CONDUCT of PUBLIC MEETINGS. By J. HUNT COOKE. A Clear and Concise Manual for all Public Speakers.

Just Published. Post 8vo, cloth, with Portraits, price 6s., post free.

WELSHMEN in ENGLISH PULPITS; or, Sermons by English Congregational Ministers from Wales. With Introduction by Rev. CHARLES A. BERRY, D.D. Edited by Rev. DANIEL WATERS.
The Expository Times says: "And here we have thirty excellent portraits of prominent and eloquent congregational preachers, with their thirty sermons, and the price is but a few shillings."

London: 21 & 22, Farnival Street Holborn, E.C.

THE LEADING WORK on the SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR.
THE ROUGH RIDERS.

By Col. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,

Author of "Ranch Life and the Hunting Trail."

With 40 Full-Page Illustrations from Photographs, and 2 Portraits.

Demy 8vo, 9s.

The distinguished author was, with Col. Wood, the organiser and commander of the Rough Riders, and he tells in his book the picturesque story from the inception of the original idea to the mustering out of the justly famous regiment. This book has the distinction of being an authoritative narrative, personal and intensely vivid, of a unique fighting corps. The illustrations, from photographs by experts, are especially noteworthy.

To be obtained of all Booksellers, or the Publishers,
KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD, Paternoster House, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

READY, MONDAY, JULY 17th.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'.

WITH ZOLA IN ENGLAND.

THE STORY OF HIS EXILE.

Told by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY.

With 4 Portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Price 1s. net.

TALMATHA: a Play in Four Acts.
By ARTHUR CRUMP.

"'Talmatha' is well done, and is good to read. Zermos, cool and calculating, and Tostroy, jealous, headstrong, and passionate—two hostile kings—make the foundation. Then imagine Talmatha, daughter of Zermos, possessed of a sense of filial duty, which is only after a long struggle overcome by her affection for Pouder, son of Tostroy; Pouder, a prince, whose love for Talmatha blinds him to all reason; Fosfora, Pouder's mother, faithless to her husband, and indifferent to everything but her intrigues with Zoab; Zoab willing to sacrifice all to realise the supreme happiness of his love for Fosfora; and we have the materials for a plot as bold and original as need be. With such a plot to work upon, it would not be difficult to write a play—of a kind. But Mr. Crump, as we have said, has done it well. His mingled blank verse and rhyme is full of graceful similes and felicitous turns of expression. There is a philosophy of life and of love in it which shows a keen observation and a mind capable of pondering on things seen. The interest is by turns sustained by a happening of the unexpected, by a charming vein of humour, or by plain-spoken eloquence which cannot but arrest the attention. In conclusion, it may be said that the scene in which Tostroy debates within himself whether to sacrifice his wife's honour that he may overcome his enemy by strategy is very powerful, as is that where Tostroy finds his queen and Zoab together; and Caspar is a well-drawn character of a bluff old soldier."—Richmond and Twickenham Times.

HISCOKE & SON, Richmond, Surrey.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORTH WALES COAST. THE ISLE of WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
BOSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, BRYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED, and SNOWDON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes."—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

SECOND EDITION, ENLARGED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With an additional Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & CO., LTD., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers

MR. JOHN LONG'S NEW LIST.

Mrs. LOVETT CAMERON'S NEW NOVEL. THE CRAZE

OF CHRISTINA.
By the Author of "A Fair Fraud," &c. In specially designed cover, art vellum gilt, 6s.

ESMÉ STUART'S NEW NOVEL. IN THE DARK.

By the Author of "Sent to Coventry," &c. In specially designed cover, art vellum gilt, 6s.

T. W. SPEIGHT'S NEW NOVEL. THE CRIME IN THE WOOD.

By the Author of "The Doom of Siva," &c. In striking picture cover, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

WILLIAM S. WALKER'S NEW BOOK. FROM THE LAND OF THE WOMBAT.

By the Author of "When the Mopoke Calls," &c. In striking picture cover, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. With 13 Full-Page Illustrations by J. A. SMYTH.

G. G. CHATTERTON'S NEW NOVEL. THE SPORT OF CIRCUMSTANCE.

By the Author of "A Darn on a Blue Stocking," &c. In specially designed cover, art vellum gilt, 3s. 6d.

London: JOHN LONG, 6, Chandos St., Strand.

THE DAINTIEST LITTLE BOOKS FOR MANY YEARS. THE BIBELOTS. A Series of Reprints for the Book-lover.

Size 5 by 2½.

Portrait, Head, and Tailpieces, tastefully bound in stamped leather, gilt edges, 2s. 6d. net each.

* * A volume sent on approval if not on sale at local Booksellers.

Vol. I.—COLERIDGE'S TABLE-TALK.

Vol. II.—HERRICK'S WOMEN, LOVE, and FLOWERS.

Ready this week.

Vol. III. LEIGH HUNT'S THE WORLD OF BOOKS.

Just published, large 8vo, pp. 292, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

SONGS TO MERRIS. By HORACE DELUSCAR.

Glasgow Herald.—"Some of the miscellaneous poems possess considerable merit."
Scotsman.—"The volume has all sorts of short poems in it, many of which imitate, while some patronise, Burns. The author, like Shakespeare, appears to have some knowledge of French and Latin, however groggy he may be about his genders and his grammar."

Outlook.—"Everywhere in the volume before me I find detestation of cant, of towns, of pure prosperity. His retort on Sydney Smith, who reproached the Scotch head for its imperviousness to a joke, is tremendous.... He really is a poet, by the way, though it must be terrible news to him."

London: GAY & BIRD, 22, Bedford St., Strand, W.C.
Agency for American Books.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

JULY, 1899.—Price 2s. 6d.

Contains:

A CHANNEL PASSAGE, 1855.

By A. C. Swinburne.

A PLEA for a RUSSO-AMERICAN UNDERSTANDING.

By Prince E. OOKTOMSKY.

UNIVERSAL PEACE.

By Baroness BERTHA VON SÜTTNER.

GOLF on a ST. ANDREW'S POINT OF VIEW.

By ANDREW LANG.

And other Articles.

London:

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

CHAPTER I.

The Old and the New Mediterranean Trade—The Pioneer Steamship—Arrival at Marseilles—The Cholera—Origin of the Crimean War—French Hilarity succeeded by Disappointment.

CHAPTER II.

The Passage to Constantinople—Reminiscences of Antiquity—Ashore in the Dardanelles—Disinterested Kindness of Suleyman Pasha—Constantinople and its Surroundings—The Passage to the Crimea—The Seaports and the Battlegrounds—Starvation at the English Camp—French Economy and Hospitality.

CHAPTER III.

The Mistake of the Allies in Making their Landing—The Commencement of the Siege and the Misery attending it—Another Passage from Marseilles—Narrow Escape from Foundering in a Gale—Arrival at Kamiesh—The Monastery of St. George.

CHAPTER IV.

The American and the French Cuisine—A Trip to the Sea of Azof—Contrasted Scenes of Peace and War—Vandalism of the Allies at Kertch—Trading with a Pasha—The Unsuccessful Attack on Sebastopol—Panic at Kamiesh and Balaklava—Return to Marseilles—Trip to Algeria.

CHAPTER V.

Return Again to the Crimea—Ravages of Disease in the Camps—French Transport System compared with Ours in the Civil War—The Sisters of Charity—The Capture of the Malakoff and Redan—A View of the Ruins—Bombproof Female Curiosity.

CHAPTER VI.

Entering the Turkish Service—The Turk a Man of his Word—Good Pay and Little Work—Our Philosophic Chief Officer—The Pasha's Bedclothes—His Friendship—No Use for a Propeller.

CHAPTER VII.

Hafiz Effendi and his Harem.

CHAPTER VIII.

Mustapha Pasha Wide Awake—We are Hurried Off to Eupatoria—A Rescue in the Black Sea—A British Frigate comes to our Aid—Arrival at Eupatoria.

CHAPTER IX.

The Blunder of a British General—A Post-Mortem held by Mr. Sears and Some of his Religious Ideas—The End of the War and Comments on its Results.

By Capt. CODMAN.

Frontispiece. 198 p.p. Price 3s. 6d.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

BLACKWOOD'S CLASSICAL TEXTS.

IN CROWN 8VO VOLUMES.

With numerous Plain and Coloured Illustrations.

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS have pleasure in announcing the issue at an early date of the opening volumes of a new Series of CLASSICAL TEXTS under the general editorship of H. W. AUDEN, M.A., Assistant Master at Fettes College, late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge, and Bell University Scholar.

Some Leading Features of the Series.

The primary aim of the Series is to supply cheap, attractive, and practical editions of the more ordinary school classics.

Introductions will be short and interesting, containing (a) a life of the author; (b) some account of his works generally; and (c) a notice of the special work under treatment.

Text.—A sound text will be given in every case, but textual criticism will be avoided except where the MS. is of some general interest, historically or otherwise.

Notes will be as brief as is consistent with the proper elucidation of the text. In this respect the practical aim of the Series as School Editions will be strictly kept in view.

Appreciation of Contents.—To this end careful attention will be given to typographical arrangements. Marginal analyses will be given, together with useful summaries (in Appendix) collecting results of what has been read—e.g., tabulation of similes in Vergil, of military terms in Xenophon, and chronological tables.

Realisation of Greek and Roman Life.—The publishers hope to make this a special feature of the series by numerous maps, plans, and illustrations (both plain and coloured), from the best German and other sources.

General.—Practical hints on translation, &c., will be given, and wherever possible the more certain modern results of comparative philology, mythology, and archaeology will be touched on.

The following Volumes are arranged for:—

CÆSAR—GALLIC WAR, Books IV.-V.
By ST. J. B. WYNNE-WILLSON, M.A., late Scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge; Assistant Master at Rugby. Price 1s. 6d.
[Ready in August.]

VERGIL—GEORGIC IV. By J. SARGAUNT, M.A., late Scholar of University College, Oxford; Assistant Master at Westminster.
[Ready in August.]

OVID—METAMORPHOSES (Selections).
By J. H. VINCE, M.A., late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge; Assistant Master at Bradford. Price 1s. 6d.
[Ready in August.]

CÆSAR, GALLIC WAR, Books I.-III.
By J. M. HARDWICH, M.A., late Scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge; Assistant Master at Rugby.

CICERO—IN CATILINAM, I.-IV. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A., late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge; Assistant Master at Fettes College.

HOMER—ODYSSEY, Book VI. By E. E. SIKES, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of St. John's College, Cambridge.

OVID—ELEGIAC EXTRACTS. By A. R. F. HYSLOP, M.A., late Scholar of King's College, Cambridge; Assistant Master at Harrow.

SALLUST—JUGURTHA. By J. F. SMEDLEY, M.A., late Fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge; Assistant Master at Westminster.

The following are also arranged for:—

HOMER: ODYSSEY, Book VII. By E. E. SIKES, M.A.—DEMOSTHENES: OLYNTHIACS, 1-3. By H. SHARPLEY, M.A.—CICERO: PRO LEGE MANILIA and PRO ARCHIA. By K. P. WILSON, M.A.—TACITUS: AGRICOLA. By H. F. MORLAND SIMPSON, M.A.—XENOPHON: ANABASIS, Books I.-III. By A. R. F. HYSLOP, M.A.—XENOPHON: HELLINICA (Selections). By G. MIDDLETON, M.A.—EURIPIDES: HECUBA. By F. GRIFFIN, M.A.

Other Volumes to follow.

Specimen Copies will be sent on application.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
Edinburgh and London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1419. Established 1869.

15 July, 1899.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE action which the Times is bringing against Mr. John Lane, as publisher of Lord Rosebery's collected Appreciations and Addresses, is, we understand, in the nature of a test case, the object being to obtain an authoritative judgment, once for all, on the vexed question to what extent it is permissible to quote reports, telegrams, or articles that have been published in a newspaper. We are informed that only a portion of the speeches in the volume were set up from the Times' reports, and that all the proof-sheets were revised by Lord Rosebery's secretary, before publication, from the original manuscripts.

THE author of the poem which we quoted last week from the Pall Mall Gazette—beginning

So I have harvested my womanhood
Into one tall green bush of southernwood

—is, we understand, Miss Nora Hopper. Indeed, some of the best poetry that is now lightening journalism is from Miss Hopper's pen.

PREBENDARY WARNER writes concerning a recent comment in our "Notes on Novels": "In the ACADEMY, July 1, p. 16, the reviewer of The Untold Half, by 'Alien,' speaks of the glowing colours in the second sentence as 'more suggestive of an artist's colourman than of landscape. The description vividly recalled a sunset effect of surpassing grandeur which I witnessed in passing through the Straits of Bonifazio, November 20, 1895. The colours are noticed in my diary in identically the same terms:

The Untold Half.

DIARY.

The mighty mountains flanking the lake touched the crimson sky, and the blood-red west poured its colour into the silver of cascades tumbling from indigo rocks to meet the purple and russet waters below.

5. Dioramic View of Mountains of Sardinia: sun, like crimson ball of fire, broke through black clouds; grand appearance of black mountains against blood-red sky. 7 o'clock. Pathway of silver moonlight on black waters; phosphorescent lights.

It may be thought that I, like "Alien," laid on the pigments rather thickly, but they describe the landscape as seen by me."

THIS verification of the accuracy of the colours noted by the author of The Untold Half is very interesting; but the point at issue is not touched by it. That point is that in literature a catalogue of colours is not enough. An impression must be given. The passage quoted from the novel in question conveys to our mind no sudden picture of the scene; and, failing to do so, is therefore unjustified. The author has still his work to do. To remember the scene himself and record it for the satisfaction of his own memory is not enough: he must now pass it on. It is this passing on which constitutes descriptive literature.

WITH the object of giving to unknown play-writers and actors a chance of showing their quality, a project is afoot to establish a Play-Writers' Theatre. The circular which has been distributed gives various other reasons for the existence of the proposed theatre, one being that there are many plays relegated to the shelves admittedly through no fault of their own, but because there is no room for them in the actor-manager's system. It is proposed to produce four plays during the first year, provided that the scheme meets with support. The principal mover is Mr. Charles Hoppe, from whom full particulars can be obtained.

COLONEL THEODORE ROOSEVELT's history of his Rough Riders and their prowess against Spain has now reached this country. With what intrepidity the Rough Riders faced the camera's mouth! The gallant Colonel, hand on hip, frowns at us from the frontispiece. We find him again at page 8, on horseback; at page 38, full face; his War Horse figures at page 128; the Colonel himself and his men group themselves at page 168; at page 196 he visits Colonel Turner; at page 234 he bids his Rough Riders farewell; and nothing but the fact that the rest of the book is needed for appendices saves us from moving incidents on his return to the irksome privacy of peace.

WHAT they went through, those Rough Riders! At page 120 there is a photograph of the devoted fellows fording a river, the water quite up to their ankles. Now they are at rest in the vicinity of Muscogee, Ind. Ter. For on the last page is a letter from a lady at Muscogee, Ind. Ter.: "I am planning to entertain all the Rough Riders in this vicinity some evening during my holiday vacation. I mean to have no other guests, but only give them an opportunity for reminiscences."

THE life of George Sand is being written on a scale of magnitude to which English authors are unfamiliar. Her biographer, M. Wladimir Karenine, has just produced, through the firm of Ollendorff, the first two volumes. They are very bulky, but carry the story only as far as 1838. Considering that George Sand lived until 1876 the prospect is somewhat disquieting.

THE project for the School of Booksellers, which the Paris Cercle de la Librairie is now considering, gains in distinctness. The proposals include a three years' course at the School; and the budding bookseller is to be turned out with a thorough grounding in French literature; mastery of one or two foreign languages; and a thorough knowledge of practical book production, commercial law, and so forth. We do not ourselves see how a man, equipped by this training, will sell one a book any better than a man who has had it not. But he might certainly be more interesting to chat with.

THE quotation chosen for the back of the title-page of the new volume on Insects in the Cambridge Natural History is happy: "'Men are poor things; I don't know why the world thinks so much of them.'—Mrs. Bee. By L. & M. Wintle."

THE July number of the North American Review, which is now under new control and ownership, is remarkable for a long poem of the sea, his ancient love, by Mr. Swinburne. In 1855, it seems, in crossing the Channel at night, his vessel encountered a tremendous thunderstorm. It is this storm which Mr. Swinburne describes—a subject directly to his hand. We detach two stanzas:

And the night was alive and anhungered of life, as a tiger from toils cast free:
And a rapture of rage made joyous the spirit and strength of the soul of the sea.
All the weight of the wind bore down on it, freighted with death for fraught:
And the keen waves kindled and quickened, as things
transfigured or things distraught.
And madness fell on them laughing and leaping; and madness came on the wind:
And the might and the light and the darkness of storm were as storm in the heart of Ind.

The leaping and luminous blossoms of live sheet lightning that laugh as they fade
From the cloud's black base to the black wave's brim rejoiced in the light they made.
Far westward, throned in a silent sky, where life was in lustrous tune,
Shone, sweeter and surer than morning or evening, the steadfast smile of the moon.
The limitless heaven that enshrined them was lovelier than dreams may behold, and deep
As life or as death, revealed and transfigured, may shine on the soul through sleep.

FROM Mr. Lang's article on "Golf at St. Andrews" in the same review:

In Scotland, Prince Charlie had little time for golf, but, before 1745, he had introduced the game into Italy, and played in the Borghese Gardens. This showed that his heart was in the right place. Golf is now established in and near Rome, and the learned archaeologist, Signor Lanciani, is a golfer. With the purpose of improving his style, he means to take lessons, at St. Andrews, from old Tom, or Auchterlonie, in winter (I cannot wish him better or more courteous and agreeable instructors), and, incidentally, he will deliver the St. Andrews Gifford Lectures on Natural Religion. If he could introduce a lecture on the old Roman game of Cambuca, and its relations to golf, I dare say Tom Morris would attend the lectures. As a rule, Tom is content with revealed religion, and gives the lectures a wide berth.

Heresies, of course, began to abound. The English count their strokes! . . . They brought in women. Here I am not wholly guiltless. The day before I and a reading party left St. Andrews, about 1873, we played the first foursome with ladies recorded since Queen Mary and Lord Lindsay played Mary Seaton and Maitland of Lethington; against which Knox (probably) thundered from the pulpit. Next morning early, I fled into the wilds of Atholl, with a price on my head; while my male opponent (English) put Tweed between himself and mischief. We only retreated just in time; our partners were left to the female tongues of St. Andrews. I was much the oldest of this nefarious foursome, and ought to have known better; anyway, my side lost, and I had to pay the stakes.

I do not, for my part, regard women as nearly so objectionable as small school-boys. My friend, Mr. —, offered half a sovereign for the head of a small golfing school-boy. The reward (like the thirty thousand pounds for Prince Charlie) was unclaimed, but the proclamation had some effect.

AMONG the unpublished novelists, it seems, is Mr. Bryce, M.P. In his speech at the Authors' Club on Monday he owned to having begun to write a novel. He was sorry to say that he had never finished it. He had got a good plot and a good title, which had never been thought of before. He had reason for not publishing that novel now, because the writing of fiction has gone through so many changes since he began it. The novels which seemed to be most in vogue now were those of pure—that was to say, of highly improbable—adventure; and he should wait, Mr. Bryce added, until the wheel of fortune came round and brought again the particular phase in which his novel was conceived, and then he should finish it, but anonymously.

AN article by Mr. Stephen Gwynn in the Cornhill, on "The Decay of Sensibility," has met with very prompt rejoinders from other critics. Mr. Gwynn dared to treat Miss Austen with less respect than she is accustomed to, and even to remark that he does not want to meet her in Paradise. A few days elapsed, and then down upon him, like a thousand of bricks, as the threadbare simile has it, came Mr. Lang in the Daily News and Mr. Walkley in the Daily Chronicle. Mr. Lang, in the interests of Miss Austen, is almost rude. He says, apropos of Louisa Musgrove's fall at Lyme Regis and Mr. Gwynn's treatment of it: "Mr. Gwynn may try taking a header from the Cobb on to the hard stones (which was what Louisa did, in effect) and then estimate the results. A very dull priest once fell out of a window, lit on his head, became a clever man, and ended as a Pope. Mr. Gwynn's experiment may have a similar and salutary effect on his brain." This is hard hitting, but in the defence of Jane Austen from even the lightest aspersion all is, perhaps, fair.

MR. WALKLEY, except for the fact that he calls Miss Austen Jane, is an even keener champion of her infallibility. Mr. Gwynn declares that Miss Austen was unlovable. Says Mr. Walkley: "The gentle Jane unlovable! How could an unlovable woman create those lovable women, Emma and Anne and Elizabeth and Catherine?" Mr. Gwynn writes of Emma: "Emma, the unreformed, undisciplined Emma, is a nice, cheerful, pretty girl, but after she subsided into being Mrs. Knightly [Knightley] I fear she fell away sadly into conformity with the discreet and dull ideals of her creator." Says Mr. Walkley: "This 'I fear' is dastardly. Unable to pick holes in the lady as he knows her, and we all know her, our discontented gentleman is driven to hint that she 'fell away' in the condition in which he doesn't know her and nobody knows her. This is exactly the insinuation which the Rev. Mr. Elton would have made." And so the battle rages. Such wariness on the part of Miss Austen's friends is pleasant indeed to watch.

WE find the following story of Matthew Arnold as sportsman, in "S. G.'s" notes in the Pall Mall Gazette: "Within almost the last year of his life, Matthew Arnold went down to stay with a friend on the Wye, and expressed his desire to catch a salmon. There was some doubt as to whether he had thrown a line before; but he had bought a rod, reel, and some rudimentary tackle. A visitor in the house—for his host did not fish—set him up with a fly, and undertook the charge of his efforts. The keeper was summoned, and, having been consulted, indicated a pool with a lawn sloping to it where no chance of fouling trees interposed and where a salmon had been lying in the low water for a considerable time. By all reasonable probabilities the fish was certain not to rise, so the mentor sat down and smoked peaceably. To his utter amazement the miracle happened; he saw the fish come for the fly, seize it before the poet could snatch it away, and immediately the fight began. Arnold was adjured to 'give him the butt,' and the salmon, as luck directed, ran down by the bank. The friend looking on thought no chance should be wasted, made a wild dive with the landing-net, and in a moment the salmon was on the bank. It was summary, but sufficient. The poet was so excited that he actually wept; and his friend persuaded him that, as Providence had specially intervened to let him know for once the joys of the barbarian, he had better let well alone and go home with his prize. That was Arnold's first and only salmon."

A CURIOUS circular reaches us from Mr. Herbert Haes. He has, it seems, written a book, entitled The Past Shower, describing an imaginary invention for bringing the past in the form of a panorama before one's eyes. The book has just been published, but, for some reason not made clear, he declines to send out the work for review. Instead, he distributes a portentous circular. We have not read the book, but we have read the circular; and of the two we prefer the book.

In the confident expectation that admirers of Dr. Nikola Across the World for a Wife, and Pharos the Egyptian will like to see how Mr. Boothby works, we reproduce the accompanying photograph. It is difficult to look upon the

MR. GUY BOOTHBY DICTATING A NOVEL INTO THE PHONOGRAPH.

Photograph by T. Fall.

luxurious parlour here depicted, and refrain from giving a thought to Goldsmith's "Description of an Author's Bed-chamber." But then, Goldsmith's author had no opportunity of taking Mr. Kipling's advice to Mr. Boothby and "putting his trust in Watt."

THE editor of a new magazine for Italian book-lovers, La Bibliofilia, writes asking us "with benevolence" to speak about it. The work is interesting and curious. One number is remarkable for an illustrated article on Durer, and many quaint old cuts are reproduced. The publisher editor is Signor Leo S. Olschki, Florence and Venice.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK is engaged in producing a facsimile of the Germ, the magazine of the P. R. B. All the topographical details of the periodical, including its errors, will be preserved. Mr. W. M. Rossetti has written an extended introduction to the facsimile, which, while incidentally touching on the Brotherhood, will be devoted mainly to the history of the Germ itself. Many little known and interesting details concerning its conception, starting, and management, are given in it, and some particulars concerning the authorship of the various articles that appeared in the Germ occur which have not been published before.

THE papers have printed this week the literal translation of a quaintly simple letter from a Uganda chief to Sir H. M. Stanley, the explorer. Is not this pretty?—

To my much beloved of great honour, and, Sir, my father in much love. Chief Stanley, who has honour, thanks for my letter which you wrote to me on December 17, 1898, as you had just got off your bed. Sir, that—to rise from your bed on two occasions to write to me—makes your love to me apparent. Well, Sir, thanks for telling me the many works which you do. Sir, well done, "because it is the trouble taken by the parent that makes the child fat." Because it is the care taken by England which delivers us Baganda, and the other lands guarded by England.

And this is the expansive but childlike conclusion:

Well, then, my great friend, and father in very much love, salute for me Mrs. Stanley, my mother, and my little brother, Denzil, and the other children. My wife, Elizabeth Kizito, and the children of my brother, and my people salute you. Salute your wife and children for us. Well may the Lord make the light of his countenance shine on you. Again, Sir, Farewell, I, your favourite child, Zakaria Kizito, Kangao, Regent, Uganda.

THE first two volumes of the new uniform edition of Mr. Kipling's works are now ready. A plain and attractive red cloth has been chosen, and on the front cover, embossed in gold, is an elephant's head from a design by Mr. Lockwood Kipling. The title-page is in red and black, and bibliographical information is printed on a fly-leaf of each volume. We do not prefer it to the blue edition, but probably that is because of the power of association. We are tempted to quote once again, from the preface to Life's Handicap, Mr. Kipling's account of the origin of his stories: "These tales have been collected from all places, and all sorts of people, from priests in the Chubára, from Ala Yar the carver, Jiwun Singh the carpenter, nameless men on steamers and trains round the world, women spinning outside their cottages in the twilight, officers and gentlemen now dead and buried, and a few, but these are the very best, my father gave me."

MR. CHARLES JOHNSTON, in a thoughtful article in the Atlantic Monthly on "The True American Spirit in Literature," subjects Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Miss Wilkins, and Mr. Cable to examination in order to arrive at the constituents of this spirit. We quote some of the results:

I think I have found at least a tentative expression for the American spirit, though no one will suppose it is in any way final, or more than a mere indicative word for the future. It falls into two parts—one positive, the other negative. The negative characteristic of American literature is a total absence of atmosphere; the positive characteristic is the presence of power.

The charge of possessing no colour sense is brought against the four authors named, who may be considered typical. Mr. Johnston thus writes of Bret Harte:

What floods of sunlight are everywhere through his books—the "staring sunlight," as he himself calls it. Yet, at the same time, what a poverty of colour!

Of G. W. Cable:

There are white roads lined with dusty willows, sunlit plantations bordered by sunbleached swamp, streets that glare and blink at you in the brightness, but of broad and definite colouring very little.

Of Mark Twain:

If we leave New Orleans, and go up the river, piloted by the greatest writer of them all, the greatest that this New World has yet seen, we shall still find ourselves sailing on through abundant sunlight.

And of Miss Wilkins:

Floods of light that bring the whole landscape close up to one's eyes, making every detail stand forth strong and definite, with no great richness of colour, and no atmosphere at all.

THE next point is the presence of power, of self-sufficiency. Mr. Johnston finds neither the religious nor aristocratic spirit in American literature:

It is enough to speak of the religious sentiment, the great tradition and mystery of the Church, to make evident how wholly these elements of moral atmosphere are absent from the American spirit, and therefore from all genuine American books; and to try to import them is like importing Strassburg Cathedral.

We shall still have writers like Marion Crawford, who cannot get away from the Vatican and the Quirinal, with their cardinals and their princes, whether black or white or gray; or writers like Henry James, with his Princess Casamassimas. But these are merely pathetic attempts to fight against fate. The aristocratic atmosphere has no place in American literature, and writers who cling to it are cutting themselves off from their nation.

And this is the writer's forecast:

The writers of the future must give up everything which depends on the atmosphere of the Church, with its mystery and tradition, and the atmosphere of the palace, the castle, and the court. All these things will be stripped off, as the mist vanishes before the noonday sun; and we shall have plain humanity, standing in the daylight, talking prose.

That is to say, the American novel of the future will, to a very large extent, resemble the novel of Mr. Howells's to-day—Mr. Howells, of whom Mr. Johnston says nothing.

To a new work on The Message and Position of the Church of England, by Mr. Arthur Galton, Mr. J. H. Shorthouse, the author of John Inglesant, contributes an introduction. This is the conclusion thereof:

Viewed in the light of history, of the too obvious state of personal religion in Italy and France and Spain, that proud boast of Rome "everywhere and by all people and through all time" would seem to be more truly expressed by "believed nowhere, is believed by none, never was believed." Springing from the worst traditions of decadent Pagan Rome, the Papal system never was a Church. It never was anything but a propagandist machine for extracting forced obedience and alms from an ignorant, a deceived, and a terrified world. The Papal Curia is founded upon falsehood, and falsehood enters, consciously or unconsciously, willingly or unwillingly, into the soul of every human creature that comes under its influence. It has poisoned the wells of religious life. Its story is one of horror, and of crime, and of cruelty. As I have said elsewhere, it always has been, and is now, the enemy of the Human Race.

The defence of creed is not within our province; but we must say that it seems a pity that a writer like Mr. Shorthouse should let himself be thus carried away. If he would let his fervour carry him instead in the direction of another romance, spiritual or otherwise, how much better!

THE most popular of the regular features of the ACADEMY is undoubtedly "Things Seen," as we gather not only from statements to that effect which have been made to us, but also from the number of "Things Seen" submitted. Among these are many which are not what we want. For example, in the ordinary way the attempt which follows would have been returned, but thinking that it may interest other contributors to see something that is not suitable, we print it below:

ADORATION.

It was near the middle of the afternoon, and the drowsy thoroughfare was deserted, except for two ragged little gutter boys looking at the photographs hanging outside the theatre. I stopped and watched them moving from one frame to another, intent in their criticism of the charms of the various actresses.

Suddenly one of them stopped in front of a large portrait of the leading lady, and beckoned his companion to him. He stood for a moment or two with his arm round the other's neck, their bare heads together, absorbed in silent worship, and then, leaning forward, he kissed her gently on the lips.

Bibliographical.

WHAT is likely to be the literary future of Mortimer Collins? An essay in his praise has just been printed, and its appearance gives one a mild sort of shock. I had thought Collins practically forgotten. I find that during the last decade only one of his works was reprinted, and that was Who is the Heir? During the same period there was no reprint of any of his verse. What does this imply? The moral seems only too obvious. Yet a book containing not only a selection from Collins's lyric output, but the whole of The British Birds, a satirical poem, semi-lyric, semi-dramatic, into which the author put some of his best work, might still find readers. It was in The British Birds that the skits on Tyndall and the Positivists originally appeared. A good many pretty stanzas could be gleaned from Collins's novels, which, however, were the merest syllabub, and could not be expected to live until, or through, such strenuous days as these.

Mr. Robert Buchanan's publisher announces a book entitled The New Don Quixote; but whether it is to be a poem, or a novel, or a collection of essays, or perchance a drama, we are not informed. How indestructible, how unfailingly fresh, is the idea inherent in Cervantes' creation! It has caught the imagination of mankind, and one cannot get away from it. Already it has suggested several books—for example, The Spiritual Quixote, by Richard Graves; The Female Quixote, by Mrs. Lennox; The Amiable Quixote, by an anonymous writer of last century; and the Donna Quixote of Mr. Justin McCarthy. Early in this century, too, there was issued in England a literary miscellany called The Knight-Errant, supposed to be edited by a Sir Hercules Quixote, who, "following the example of his illustrious namesake and ancestor of La Mancha, has, with the assistance of his friends, commenced an era of Civil Knight-Errantry, and zealously devoted himself to the comforting of Distressed Damsels and Disconsolate Widows, the fathoming of wronged and destitute orphans, the promotion of Virtue and chivalrous feeling generally."

So there is now a sixth edition of Helen Faucit's Some of Shakespeare's Female Characters. The first appears to date from 1885, when the price was one guinea; then came editions at nine shillings and seven-and-sixpence respectively, followed by editions (at the latter price) in 1891 and 1893. I am not surprised at the popularity of the book, for much interest must inevitably attach to a famous actress's comments upon rôles which she has herself enacted and in which she has made remarkable successes. It must be remembered, too, that Lady Martin's book is to a considerable extent autobiographic. It is no mere work of exposition. It has a large personal element, and that, I think, is why we find it arriving, after all these years, at a sixth edition.

Mr. J. H. Shorthouse, to whose remarks on the Church of Rome we refer elsewhere, has been silent, till now, for the best part of ten years, his latest story—Blanche Lady Falaise—having been brought out in 1891, a year which saw the issue of new editions of John Inglesant, Sir Percival, and Countess Eva. Has Mr. Shorthouse fallen out of fashion? His record is not a long one: to the four tales above-named one has to add only his Little Schoolmaster Mark (1883) and The Teacher of the Violin, &c. (1888). He will not take much baggage with him down to posterity.

I have seen scarcely any reference to those books by the late Victor Cherbuliez which arrived at the distinction of an English translation. Let me name a few of them. Thus in 1881 we had The Low-Born Lover's Peerage, Meta Holdensis, and A Stroke of Diplomacy; in 1886, The Trials of Jetta Malaubret; in 1893, The Tutor's Secret; in 1894, A Phidian Horse; and in 1897, With Fortune Made.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Pepys Pigeon-holed.

The Diary of Samuel Pepys, M.A., F.R.S. Edited by Henry B. Wheatley, F.S.A. Pepysiana. Index. (Bell.)

THESE two volumes bring to a close Mr. Wheatley's monumental edition of Pepys's Diary, although the editor expresses a hope, which his readers will certainly share, that he "may still have some other occasions to place his name upon the same title-page with that of Samuel Pepys,"

SAMUEL PEPYS.

From a Painting at the Admiralty, Whitehall.

in the publication of the Tangian Diary and a batch of unedited letters. In any case Mr. Wheatley has full reason to be proud of his achievement, which makes a third with Dr. Birkbeck Hill's Boswell, and Prof. Bury's Gibbon, in the list of really great modern editions of post-Restoration classics.

The diary proper is complete in the eight volumes previously published. The ninth volume is the index. The tenth, Pepysiana, contains a vast olla podrida of jottings on more interesting topics of the diary, and of other miscellaneous matter illustrative of the life and writings of Pepys. It is all learned, and much of it entertaining, though one could wish that Mr. Wheatley had thrown some of it into the form of a "study" of the Diary, and kept this apart from the documents and other extrinsic comment. It will be fair to give readers a general idea of what they may expect to find in this supplementary volume, and we therefore extract the following from Mr. Wheatley's introductory chapter:

The second chapter contains pedigrees and notes as to Samuel's relations and to Mr. Pepys's family, and some information respecting their constantly changing servants. The third chapter is devoted to some personal notes of Samuel at school and college, and in business, and an account of his book-plates, portraits, &c. In the fourth chapter, various points relating to the Diary are dealt with, and additional illustrations of some of the words used by Pepys are added. The fifth chapter contains notes on friends and acquaintances. The sixth chapter is devoted to the Navy, the seventh to London and local allusions, the eighth to folk-lore, and the ninth contains an appreciation of the man. Nine appendices complete the volume.

We can only touch here upon one or two of the multifarious topics always sensibly and exhaustively treated by Mr. Wheatley, and frequently, as when he touches upon book-plates or London topography, with the knowledge of an expert. A good deal of light is thrown by the Diary upon London tavern life in the seventeenth century. Mr. Wheatley gives an astonishing list of no fewer than a hundred and twenty-four inns, which, with a few places of more disreputable resort, are named as visited by Pepys. A number of these, including the "Dog" and the "Sun," mentioned in Herrick's famous lines to Ben Jonson—

Where we such clusters had,
As made us nobly wild, not mad
And yet such verse of thine
Outdid the meat, outdid the frolic wine —were situated in King-street, Westminster, formerly the great highway to the Abbey, of which the last houses are to-day in the hands of the housebreaker. At such taverns the Admiralty clerks used to take the chief meal of the day, a twelve o'clock dinner. A good deal of wine was drunk, and not much government was got through in the afternoon. Indeed, our Restoration ancestors were apt to "sell sobriety a sacrifice," not only oftener, but earlier in the day than we do. Pepys notes that on September 9, 1661, he was taken into the king's privy kitchen, where Mr. Sayres, the master cook, gave him a slice or two of beef for his breakfast, and then took him into the wine-cellar, where, he adds, "we were very merry, and I drank too much wine, and all along had great and particular kindness from Mr. Sayres, but I drank so much wine that I was not fit for business, and, therefore, at noon I went and walked in Westminster Hall a while." On festive occasions a tavern dinner was expensive, but not necessarily so at other times. In Threadneedle-street there was the "Cock," next door to a butcher's. Here you might buy your chop or steak, and bring it to the tavern to be cooked. For this you were charged one penny. An eccentric Duke of Norfolk used to frequent this house. At last a chance customer told the innkeeper the rank of his guest. Next day a silver knife and fork were placed for him; and after that he came no more.

Naturally we turn to the pages in which Mr. Wheatley sums up the character of the man with whom, for so many years, he has been intimate. It is not perhaps a very elaborate or subtle appreciation. Like a preacher of an extinct type, Mr. Wheatley finds it "necessary to catalogue Pepys's character under the following heads: (1) husband and friend; (2) official; (3) patriot; (4) curioso or dilettante; (5) collector; (6) philanthropist." This is not very promising, and the entry under head (6), "Pepys was a philanthropist, although it was not until his later years that he had the time to spare for the active pursuit of philanthropy," is lacking in humour. Nor does Mr. Wheatley tackle the difficult psychological question of how the Diary came to be written at all; and if so, why in cipher; and if in cipher, why it was preserved. On the other hand Mr. Wheatley rightly claims for Pepys that against his follies and frailties, and even against his imperfect morality on the subject of bribes, should be set the sound official work which he did at the Admiralty, and his unwearying efforts to give England a navy worthy of the name.

Among the new illustrations of Pepys's life brought together by Mr. Wheatley, perhaps the most interesting is an account of how the diarist fell into the hands of highwaymen. The facts are recorded in the Sessions Papers of the Old Bailey:

Mr. Pepys gave evidence. That as he was Riding to Chelsey in his Coach, accompanied with Mr. Jackson and his Lady, and some other Ladies, on the 29th of September last, in the dusk of the Evening, three Persons (having their Faces covered with Vizard Masks) met his Coach (being all on Horseback) and holding a Pistol to the Coachman's breast, and another against Mr. Pepys, commanded the coach to stand, demanded what they had, which Mr. Pepys readily gave them; which was a Silver Ruler, val. 30.s. a Gold Pencil val. 8.l. Five Mathematical Instruments, val. 3.l. a Magnifying Glass, value 20.s. a Gold and Silver Purse val. 10.s. Two Guineas and 20.s. in Money, these were Mr. Pepys Goods and Money. The things they took from Mr. Jackson were, a Silver Hilted Sword, val. 50.s. a Hatband val. 2s. 3d. Mr. Pepys and Mr. Jackson could not Swear the Prisoners were the men that Robbed them, because they were Masked; Mr. Pepys conjured them to be Civil to the Ladies, and not to Affright them, which they were; and by their demeanour of themselves, my Lady Pepys [? Jackson—Mrs. Pepys was dead] saved a Bag of Money that she had about her: Mr. Pepys desired them to give him a particular Instrument that was of great use to him: and one of them told him, Sir, you are a Gentleman, and so are we; if you will send to the Rummer Tavern at Charing Cross to Morrow, you shall have it there. Mr. Pepys did send, but there was nothing left.

The highwaymen received sentence of death.

Needless to say, the vain Pepys was always having his portrait done. Mr. Wheatley reproduces as a frontispiece to the Pepysiana an interesting and little known picture which hangs in the dining-room of the First Lord of the Admiralty at Whitehall. It was painted by an unknown artist in 1687, and is probably the latest Pepys portrait in existence. Pepys as a young man by Lely is at Magdalene College, Cambridge, and several Sir Godfrey Knellers are known to exist. One of these was engraved for a book-plate, and appears as a frontispiece to Mr. Wheatley's Index. Indexing, like book-plates and like London, is one of the topics on which Mr. Wheatley is an acknowledged authority; and the Index prepared under his supervision for the Diary is a fine specimen of the art. It is very full, and the entries under each head are carefully classified so as to give every possible assistance to the student. The singularly multifarious contents of the book make a good Index a matter of the first importance. Consulting Mr. Pepys on any topic of Restoration life will in future become no trouble, but a pleasure.

A Colourist in Poetry.

The City of the Soul. (Grant Richards. 5s.)

IF we may use the oft-abused, but sometimes illustrative, expedient of comparing one art with another, the anonymous author of The City of the Soul is a decided colourist in song—that is to say, he belongs to the school of Keats and the early Tennyson and Rossetti. Thought he has not, and does not attempt. He would, we may safely say, disdain it as an outrage on poetry pure and simple. Most young lovers of poetry at the present day pass through that stage, which is natural to all young poets. To begin with, the beauty of the world seems all-sufficing, and therefore the beauty of poetry. Why should you ask its meaning of a world so lovely?

Beauty is truth, truth beauty, that is all
Ye know on earth, or that ye need to know.

So you are inclined to say with the young Keats. Consequently you regard quintessential poetry as just quintessential beauty. Shakespeare passed through this stage when he wrote "Venus and Adonis," "Romeo and Juliet," and "A Midsummer's Night's Dream." He had grown beyond it when he wrote "Hamlet" and "The Tempest." At such a stage we love not only Keats (as he is most worthy to be loved), but also Coleridge and Shelley, for their pure beauty, not discerning that both had ideals beyond mere beauty. Indeed, Shelley's ideals were not very sound. Nevertheless, his beauty was the product of his ideals. As we grow older, if we grow wiser, we begin to seek a meaning in this beautiful life, and to ask a meaning in the beauty of poetry. We are still grateful enough for mere beauty in song, as in existence. But we are more grateful for song which has both beauty and conscious significance. In truth, no verse which has deep meaning can be destitute of beauty, if it be poetry; whereas verse which has beauty of an external kind may be devoid of much significance. For beauty is the handmaiden of truth; truth not always the handmaiden of outward beauty.

But in a young poet mere external beauty is most natural, and a thing to be accepted with hearty thanks. For it is a great gift, though not the greatest gift. And of such beauty this anonymous author is lavish. In imagery he is not remarkably affluent; but he has a rich sense of language, a true gift of mellifluous versification. Few poems are without cunning and iridescent diction; and all have a rich youthful passion for beauty which is itself an inspiration. Nothing could be a more remarkable proof of his instinct for pictorial diction than the ballad of "Perkin Warbeck." Anything barer, less of an incentive to a luxuriant young imagination, than the meagre historical account of that hapless young pretender could not be conceived. We do not say the ballad is one of the author's best achievements; but the amount of colour and life he has contrived to infuse into it is remarkable, and it is mainly the result of diction. Then, even his imagery is sometimes fresh and felicitous to a degree. "Jonquil and Fleur-de-Lys" has next to no story, and therefore cannot be considered a successful poem. But it contains some of the author's most jewelled description, and such imagery as this:

Jonquil was a shepherd lad,
White he was as the curded cream,
Hair like the buttercup he had,
And wet green eyes like a full chalk-stream.
His teeth were as white as the stones that lie
Down in the depths of the sun-bright river,
And his lashes danced like a dragon-fly
With drops on the gauzy wings that quiver.

The liking for green eyes we do not share; but the rain-like freshness of the image is excellent. And the "lashes danced like a dragon-fly" is original and felicitous in the most poetic way. No poem at once complete and brief enough for quotation will exhibit altogether the glow of his diction, the luxuriance of his fancy, and the melodious quality of his verse. But we may quote two: one characteristic, the other a sonnet conspicuous for true sentiment and happy criticism, not paralleled elsewhere in the book. The first poem is a very fine impression of London by night, striking to all who know the brilliant mystery of the lamp-lit West.

See what a mass of gems the city wears
Upon her broad live bosom! row on row
Rubies and emeralds and amethysts glow.
See! that huge circle like a necklace, stares
With thousands of bold eyes to heaven, and dares
The golden stars to dim the lamps below.
And in the mirror of the mire I know
The moon has left her image unawares.

That's the great town at night: I see her breasts,
Pricked out with lamps they stand like huge black towers,
I think they move! I hear her panting breath.
And that's her head where the tiara rests.
And in her brain, through lanes as dark as death.
Men creep like thoughts . . . The lamps are like pale flowers.

What a fine image is that in the last two lines—"Men creep like thoughts!" The poem ought to adorn the next edition of Mr. Whitten's London anthology. Dignified, and excellent in craftsmanship is the sonnet "To Shakespeare."

Most tuneful singer, lover tenderest,
Most sad, most piteous, and most musical,
Thine is the shrine more pilgrim-worn than all
The shrines of singers; high above the rest
Thy trumpet sounds most loud, most manifest.
Yet better were it if a lonely call
Of woodland birds, a song, a madrigal,
Were all the jetsam of thy sea's unrest.

For now thy praises have become too loud
On vulgar lips, and every yelping cur
Yaps thee a psalm; the whiles little men,
Not tall enough to worship in a crowd,
Spit their small wits at thee. Ah! better then
The broken shrine, the lonely worshipper.

Imaginative and new, that concluding image of the octave; fine, terse, and reticent, the scorn of the sestet; just in judgment and balanced in utterance, the entire sonnet. Admirable also is the author in his two versions of Baudelaire, which are just what metrical translations ought to be—transfusing the spirit of the original; or, rather, catching in it something sympathetic to the spirit of the translator, and making the poem verily his own. The weakness of the book lies in want of substance, of backbone. The robes are rich, but they lack a man to fill them. Of the poet's spirit, the poet's art, there is no lack.

Wild Life in Southern England.

Wild Life in Hampshire Highlands. By George A. B. Dewar. (Dent.)

Bird Life in a Southern County. By Charles Dixon. (Walter Scott.)

BOTH of these books appear to have taken their inspiration from Wild Life in a Southern County, and it would almost seem as if the respective authors experienced some difficulty in getting away from the title of Jefferies' book. Each uses half of it. There the resemblance between the two ends. They form a contrast in externals which is not greater than the contrast in substance. The co-editor of the "Haddon Hall" series has had the luck to have his book printed and illustrated in the best style of the Constables. It is equally agreeable to sight and touch—light to handle, restful to look upon. Mr. Dewar's work is not unworthy of its setting. "Homely Hampshire," though not one of the most picturesque of English counties, has many features that endear it to the naturalist and sportsman. It was the home of Gilbert White, who is often cited here; and of a scarcely less famous personage, Colonel Peter Hawker, who is never mentioned, though the author seems familiar with Longparish. Hawker caught hundreds of trout in the Test before the dry-fly was invented.

There are some other curious omissions in Mr. Dewar's book. For instance, he devotes considerable space to the apparent object of discrediting Dr. Jenner's account of the manner in which the young cuckoo ejects its foster-chicks from the nest. He quotes, as if to revive, the doubt thrown on it by Waterton (a very jealous naturalist, as is shown by his life-long hatred of Audubon); but he makes no mention of the confirmatory evidence of Mrs. Hugh Blackburn, which was strong enough to convince so cautious a naturalist as Charles Darwin. He does not venture so far as to insinuate that Jenner was romancing, but as an alternative suggests that "he was mistaken or misinformed as to the age" of the young cuckoo. Mr. Dewar's point is exactly that of Waterton's—viz., that the newly hatched chick could not possibly accomplish this feat. But Darwin's words are very definite. He describes the young cuckoo in the act of ejection as "still blind and not even able to hold up its head." Mrs. Blackburn herself asserted that it was "newly hatched." Another very well-known observer, the late Mr. John Hancock, witnessed the act of ejection on June 28, 1884, the young cuckoo having been hatched out on the 27th. These facts seem to be decisive.

Another omission is that Mr. Dewar has nothing to say about truffles. He describes minutely a great number of eggs, birds, and insects that are common all over England; but the truffle is found only in a very few Southern counties, of which Hampshire is one. He does, indeed, remind us that Gilbert White was interested in these curious underground fungi, but has nothing further to say. One would have fancied that a day with the truffle-hunter would have been an agreeable means of introducing some of the autumn landscapes of that delightful county, since it is when leaves are discolouring in wood and spinney, when stackyards are full and corn-lands bare, when partridge shooters are on the turnips but the pheasants are still being fed in cover, that this pastime or occupation begins.

Partly, no doubt, the neglect is due to our author's predominant love of spring and early summer. "Of all the months for the wood or for the riverside," he says, "give me June, and of all times the first week or ten days of that month." Out of 296 pp., he devotes no fewer than 221 to this season of the year. And undoubtedly he has caught something of its freshness and charm. Some of us, as George Eliot did, love the softness and melancholy of autumn, the coloured and falling leaf, the quiet and rest that seem to brood over "the happy autumn fields" when the year's labour is ended and all things are beginning to turn towards decay. It is a matter of temperament purely and simply, though the pursuits one likes best must also create associations of their own. Mr. Dewar is an adept at dry-fly fishing, which means that he frequents the chalk-streams at the time of the nightingale and wild rose. He is keen on oology, and therefore haunts wood and lane when wild blossoms are out and leaves expanding; an entomologist, and therefore familiar with down and field when they lie under the summer sun. There is nothing better in the book than the chapters on butterflies and birds-nesting. In regard to collecting, he delivers a sensible protest against the overdone sentimentality of the present time. Recognising to the full the value of the movement in favour of kindness to wild animals and against the practice of women who decorate themselves with the feathers of rare birds, he has the courage to add:

A lad who devotes his whole or half-holiday to a birds-nesting or butterfly-hunting expedition in the woods, fields, or downs is not in the way of turning out a very bad man, and he is often learning a love of nature which will prove a constant joy and a never-failing interest through life. I would not lift up my hands and eyes in too pious horror if he did now and then rifle a coveted nest instead of taking one or two eggs.

For purposes of study—to investigate the baffling question of colouration, for example—it is mere hypocrisy to assert that the collector should not take whole clutches and many of them. On the other hand, Mr. Dewar does not hesitate to censure those sportsmen who make a boast of their large bags. When it comes to be a matter of over four thousand birds killed in four days, sport no longer has the excuse of affording stimulating exercise and recreation—it has degenerated into mere butchery.

In regard to butterflies, it is extremely doubtful whether or not the collector does anything like the harm usually attributed to him. Species appear and disappear and the causes never have yet been satisfactorily ascertained. Pleasanter than Mr. Dewar's talk of rarities is his enthusiastic eulogy of the purple emperor: "You do not know the wild life of the summer oakwoods until you have watched the emperor with wings shot over with a changing gloss of intense purple soaring and towering in the sunshine of a perfect July day." Is the sight really more beautiful than that of two common whites fluttering their love flight above one of these quiet downs where the tumuli hold all that is left of men whose eyes a thousand years ago witnessed exactly the same sight?

We hope there is no need to tell the reader that though we have found some fault with this book, and could find very much more, it makes very pleasant reading. The sins of commission and of omission alike are incidental to its merits—that is, they are such as are likely to be made by one who tries to convey his own direct impressions and is not too solicitous to learn what others have said and done. It will be heartily welcomed by all lovers of the open air.

Mr. Dixon's book is of another cast. Here we have a naturalist whose literary power never does credit to his knowledge and industry. He has written and written about birds; he has gone on scientific expeditions; he has enjoyed the friendship of great ornithologists; he is saturated with bird lore, and yet he never seems quite to "come off." One wishes it were otherwise. There are purely museum naturalists who write learned books about birds, and show on every page that their knowledge is derived solely from the museum, the dissecting room, and the text-book. With these Mr. Dixon is not to be numbered. His books all come direct from the fields; he has listened to the songs of the birds and seen their nests and observed their habits, and his books ought to be absolutely delightful, but they are not. What he lacks is literary inspiration: that want is strikingly exemplified in this Devonshire book. A born writer could not possibly have tried to describe its scenery, its coast and rivers and hills, its trim fields and snug farms, without his enthusiasm catching fire. It is a county of counties, full of history, full of tradition, full of poetry and romance—it is Mr. Blackmore's county; but you cannot feel that in Mr. Dixon's page: he lived, he says, eight years in Devonshire, and you feel that eight or eighty it makes no difference, the genius loci is absent. If his book were offered as a mere contribution to science that would not matter, a kestrel in one place is the same as a kestrel in another; but this is not a county bird-book in the ordinary sense, it does not give a single list of any kind, and is avowedly intended for the general reader. Every county in England has its own special charm, and whoever can find that has a spell to conjure with. Let a Moonraker praise Wilts, let a Tyke glorify Yorkshire, let a Cornishman praise his Cornwall, let the Devonian wax eloquent over Devon, and each is interesting; he sees his native place in a magical light. And this is where Mr. Dixon fails: he is a capital ornithologist, but only a middling writer; his work has no magic in it. His smug phrases about "this favoured South-Western county" may be quite right and exact, but they deprive Devon of that halo of romance with which poetry and tradition have invested it: he presents us with a Devonshire of prose. Nor can we honestly say that his book has any scientific importance; its sketches of bird-life are exactly such as Mr. Dixon has presented in several of his other books, and ninety-nine out of a hundred of them might have been written in any other shire as easily as in Devonshire. The value of the book lies in its illustrations. Mr. Charles Whympster has seldom done anything better.

The Man in the Iron Mask?

Nicolas Fouquet. By Alan B. Cheales, M.A. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

THE career of Nicolas Fouquet is a striking instance of the Nemesis that waits on courtiers. When Louis Quatorze began his reign Fouquet was Surintendant de Finance, and practically ruler of France. But he had bitter enemies, notably Colbert, on the look-out to effect his ruin. Fouquet's own overweening ambition gave them their chance. Mr. Cheales gives many illustrations from old prints of the great château of Vaux, near Melun, the precursor of, and model for, Louis's own Versailles. This was built by Fouquet. The King had no palace to equal it; and Nicolas, in the loftiness of his heart, invited his royal master to a sumptuous banquet, or house-warming. Colbert was there, and discreetly pointed out to Mlle. de la Vallière, who was on the King's arm, how the Fouquet arms—a squirrel springing up a tree with a snake in pursuit—and the motto—"Quo non ascendam"—were worked into the decorations of the salon. "It signifies, 'To what height may I not attain?'" Madam; and it is easily understood by those who know the boldness of the squirrel, or that of his master!" sneered Colbert. At that moment Fouquet's secretary, Pélisson, passed by. "Your Majesty has probably not remarked," he hinted, "that in every instance the squirrel is pursued by an adder." An adder formed the arms of Colbert himself, who obviously, therefore, did not come off the better in the exchange of wits. From that day, however, dated the fall of Fouquet. Either the splendours of Vaux had excited the envy of Louis, or, as Mr. Cheales suggests, the minister had attempted not only to outbuild the King, but also to outbuy him in the affections of the mistress of the day. A fortnight later Fouquet was arrested at Nantes, and hurried from prison to prison until he finally died in the Bastille. The exact date of his death is not known, and Mr. Cheales will have it that he was the famous and enigmatic "Man in the Iron Mask," whose identity, like that of Junius, is one of the puzzles of history. He builds his theory upon a card, said to have been found a century later at the fall of the Bastille, on which was written: "4,389,000: Fouquet arrivant des Iles de Ste. Marguerite avec un Masque de Fer."

While imprisoned at Pignerol Fouquet wrote a volume of meditations, entitled Les Conseils de la Sagesse, which was "done into English by a gent" in 1736. From this Mr. Cheales has made some not uninteresting extracts. His own comment upon the book is, that it is "a wonderful production for one brought up a member of the Gallican Church, one living all his life among the errors of Romanism!" and that "you will hardly find trace, in the thick volume, of any one of the erroneous doctrines of that spurious form of Christianity." We do not know how this may be. The fault of the "conseils," or "pensées," is, that they lean a little too much towards the copy-book or platitude type; and that, apparently, Fouquet only thought of them when it was already too late to put them into practice. Here are some samples:

Make a good choice before you carry your spouse to church. When you have her sure, neither adore nor neglect her.

Take great care not to provoke her, or indiscreetly to raise her anger by unjust or outrageous severities; neither make her proud by too much complaisance, or ill-timed civilities.

Live in your family as would an angel; but if that exceed your power, live as a sociable creature.

The wise man is steady and constant. His soul is unchangeable and immortal, but his determinations are not so. 'Tis the business and excellency of the gnomon, the index-pointer of a sun-dial, to continue fixed and never change place; but it would cause great confusion if its shadow were to do so too.

The ladies who have made themselves most renowned, and have been best beloved in the world, are not those who have been the most beautiful, the most witty, or the most knowing. The perfect woman of Solomon was perfect mistress of three sorts of knowledge:

1. She understood how to ask proper questions, and to give others happy and proper occasions for telling what they knew.
2. She had capacity enough to conceive readily and clearly the answers they gave her.
3. She knew when to admire, and express her admiration in such terms as testified to all the strength and sincerity of her mind.

Mr. Cheales has illustrated his monograph with some good photographs, but we could wish that he had refrained from putting his relatives in the foreground of every vista of Vaux.

Napoleon's Invasion of Russia.

Napoleon's Invasion of Russia. By Hereford B. George. (Fisher Unwin.)

A GOOD many books deal with that expedition to Russia which was the beginning of the end of Napoleon's power, but it has been Mr. George's good fortune that there is no one work which deals satisfactorily and impartially with that turning-point in history. An enormous mass of material lies ready to the hand of the historian—Napoleon's correspondence, State papers, memoirs of those who took part in the expedition, and military histories—but it all needed to be sifted and digested and reduced to an intelligible and coherent story. This Mr. George has done, and with excellent results. He has especially explored the archives of the British and Austrian Foreign Offices, and has thus been enabled to throw light on many of the tortuous intrigues which obscured the inception and the carrying out of the campaign.

The idea of invading Russia seems to us now like the scheme of a madman, but in 1812 Napoleon was the master of Europe with the exception of England and Russia, and he expected that the Czar would sue for peace after a battle somewhere near the frontier. The Emperor did not imagine that he would be lured on to Moscow. It was at England that he intended to strike through Russia, for when the Czar refused to adhere any longer to the Continental System, which, though aimed at England, meant material ruin to him, Napoleon had either to confess himself powerless to enforce his system or to attack Russia. The road to Moscow was the Chemin d'Angleterre dreamed of so long. The Continental System, which was designed to crush England's trade, was only possible if every nation in Europe concurred; but none of them had any motive for suffering serious privations in order to please the conqueror who had already trampled on them, and to injure a nation which only desired peacefully to supply their wants. Russia alone was in a position to venture to repudiate it, and the Czar came gradually to the conclusion that the risks of war were more endurable than slow strangulation by the stoppage of all external trade.

But to reach Russia Napoleon had to settle with Prussia and Austria. He could not attain his object without crushing the two central European states or having their co-operation, and this, though grudgingly, he obtained from Prussia because she was helpless to resist, and from Austria because she calculated that submission would be safer than resistance, as the Czar was not to be depended upon to fight outside his own borders. Still both Prussia and Austria hated their oppressor and had secret understandings behind his back with one another, and even with Russia. But much as the three Powers hated Napoleon they also mistrusted one another, and so Napoleon by dextrously taking advantage of this situation was able to march his huge army across the frontier.

The story of the campaign and retreat is well told, with, perhaps, too great a luxuriance of detail in some parts. But Mr. George makes it clear that the story of the failure of the invasion being due to the cold was a mere fiction. The cold did no more than convert defeat into destruction, and ruin whatever faint chance may have been left of partially redeeming the failure at the last moment. Before he started Napoleon's power was beginning to totter. England, which he could never subdue, had followed up Trafalgar with the Peninsular War, and France was wearying of the drain on her resources. Napoleon's management of the campaign was not faultless, but his enemies made more and greater mistakes. He achieved a considerable measure of success, perhaps greater than any other man could have obtained, but he could not overcome time and space. He made his commissariat arrangements with consummate skill, but it was impossible to bring the supplies to his troops unless they had moved too slowly to be able to achieve anything. He was beaten before the first snow-flake fell.

The book is supplied with excellent maps and plans, which make the course of events perfectly clear. There is also a good index, which renders the book all the more valuable as a work of reference. As to its relation to current politics, Mr. George's book shows clearly that if Russia keeps up an enormous army, it is not because she needs it for defence. Her natural position makes her invulnerable.

“Johnny Cope.”

Sir John Cope and the Rebellion of 1745. By the late General Sir Robert Cadell, K.C.B. (Blackwood.)

In the mind of the ordinary reader every circumstance connected with the movements in favour of the Stuarts remains invested with a quite disproportionate interest. The natural sympathy of generous hearts for the unfortunate has gone out to the infatuated advocates of a romantic cause. It is certain that some of the upholders of the reigning dynasty have met with less than their due meed of praise. A distinguished Indian officer whose home was in the Lowlands has recently made an attempt to rescue the memory of one such upholder from the obloquy heaped upon him by the writers of memoirs, songs, and histories. To nothing do historians so much attribute the proportions attained by the '45 as to the bungling incompetence of the commander in Scotland, the “Johnny Cope” of satirical song. Yet even Scott does not deny him some virtues. He “was by no means a poltroon, as has been supposed; but he was one of those second-rate men who are afraid of responsibility, and form their plan of a campaign more with reference to the indication of their own character than the success of their enterprise” (Tales of a Grandfather). It is the truth of such a judgment as this that Sir Robert Cadell has set out to arraign before the bar of historical fact. The result is a carefully written account of the course of the rebellion of 1745 until the defeat of Sir John Cope's force at Preston Pans. It is so interesting that we should not have been sorry to see the narrative continued to the end of the whole movement. With a self-restraint that cannot be too much commended, General Cadell never seeks to make a hero of his chief character; indeed, he so little obtrudes the unfortunate commander upon our notice that we are happily able to forget, for the greater part of the book, the special object of vindicating a somewhat uninteresting historical personality which the author has set before himself. We are given good military and political reasons not only for the march of the small English force at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief into the Highlands for the security of Fort Augustus, but also for the much condemned deflection of its course to Inverness when it was discovered that the Jacobites had secured the important road up Corryarrick mountain. The careful military disposition of his troops is pointed out both on this trying march and subsequently in the important movements which preceded the battle at Preston Pans. If Sir John Cope was blameworthy in the matter of the northern expedition, it is a blame which the other members of the Regency charged with the management of Scotch affairs must share with him. The onset of the Highlanders at Preston Pans would probably have disconcerted the most able general with the most reliable force; but, in justice to Sir John Cope, it must be remembered that his force was less than half that of his opponents, and that—of the two elements in it which, despite the disparagement in numbers, would have given him the military superiority—the artillery was wholly inadequately served through the jealousy, if not treachery, of the military authorities in Edinburgh, while the cavalry missed chance after chance of damaging the enemy both at the passage of the Forth and during the Jacobite advance on the Scotch capital. After this it did not much matter that the two responsible officers next after Sir John Cope were both eighty-five years of age, whose mutual jealousy prevented any concerted action on behalf of the Government in Edinburgh; and that the Lord Provost could play into the hands of the Jacobites, to whose party he belonged. Finally, Col. Gardiner, who commanded the cavalry—Scott's “good Christian and gallant man”—appears in his true colours as a gloomy fanatic, whose fatalism was increased at the critical moment by ill-health, and whose indecision was in no small measure responsible for Cope's difficulties and ultimate defeat. The garbled narrative of Murray of Broughton on the one side, and Dr. Doddridge's pious memoir of Col. Gardiner on the other, have unduly influenced the current historical treatment of the characters and actions of the early part of this rebellion. As an antidote, Sir R. Cadell refers us to the evidence taken at the trial which at his own request was granted to Cope. This was subsequently published by an anonymous gentleman, who had begun his attendance at the trial prejudiced against the unsuccessful commander, but who was converted to his side by the testimony of those who had served under Cope throughout the campaign in Scotland. It is to be regretted that our author has not reprinted in an appendix the whole or some portions of that evidence.

Other New Books.

THE ARCADIAN.

BY H. C. MINCHIN.

A bright and amusing series of sketches of gay and happy people. No one is very serious, no one is too witty, no one is poor. And they propose to each other, and jest with each other, and read and write poetry, and a cheery spirit of Anthony Hopefulness is over all. The author writes sufficiently neatly, both prose and verse, to make us sorry that his beginnings are derivative. But the time seems to have gone by for young men to be themselves. We quote a passage. The hero and Candida are seated by the river. Says he :

"There are republics in South America that I would like to see, for their natural beauties : and I would like to see Vesuvius—but I wouldn't choose to live in one of those republics, nor on the slopes of Vesuvius. No, I would conjugate the verb of my life in a very different clime !"

"The verb again !" said Candida.

"In a clime that is to me the most genial of all—that is the only one where I can thrive—you know its latitude as well as I do. Present tense, 'I love —'"

"Won't some other verb do as well ?" said Candida.

"Perfect, 'I have loved' ; future, 'I always shall —'"

"Stop !" said Candida, "it is a defective verb !"

"I know it," I said ; "it has no imperative mood. But it has a conditional mood, Candida ; and if I only thought that some day, some day 'you might —'"

The chapters, as they were published serially, have already had some vogue in Oxford, where they were written. (Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)

FOREST NOTES.

BY E. AND H. LEE-HAMILTON.

Mr. and Mrs. Lee Hamilton, who write this little book together and dedicate it to each other, are authors independently too. Mrs. Lee-Hamilton, under the name of Annie Holdsworth, is known for her novels, and her husband recently translated the Inferno afresh. The pretty book before us contains a number of brief lyrics of the open air, neat and scholarly in form and happy in sentiment. We may quote this, by Mrs. Lee-Hamilton :

SUMMER'S LIFE.

When buds are green, and June is won,
The Summer's life is just begun ;
Her dimpling fingers press at will
The swelling breasts of meed and hill.

When flash the scythes and grass is mown
The Summer comes into her own,
And roams the meadows free of care ;
A maid with poppies in her hair.

When every copse for song is made
The Summer queens it through the glade,
With sceptre of the bulrush green,
And radiant challenge in her mien.

When reapers sing and stooks arise
The Summer in the cornfield lies,
And yields her body up to Death
Browned with the Autumn's reddening wreath.

And this by Mr. Lee-Hamilton :

THE SQUIRREL.

Among the English oaks, where great boughs spread,
My wee friend wore a coat of foxy red,
And with his brush held high, from overhead
He watched us, peeping.

In Kansas woods, a year ago to-day,
His little coat was unfamiliar grey,
And like a silver flash he crossed the way
Up maple leaping.

And here amid these dark Bavarian firs
His coat is black ; a mourning garb he wears
Munching a fir-cone, from the boughs he peers,
While noon is creeping.

The book is altogether a pretty specimen of amateur poesy. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

SONGS TO MORRIS.

BY HORACE DELUSCAR.

The name Horace Deluscar is, we are informed, a pseudonym. The author is Glasgow-born, Berwickshire-bred, and of Midlothian and Fife extraction. Also he warns us that in his book the deep, full-mouthed words of the Elizabethan days must not be looked for. We find, however, a number of sonnets of a more or less emphatic nature, a few songs and ditties, and certain epigrams upon, we conjecture, local acquaintances of the poet : D—— and Joe V——, and so forth. The author's quality is not of the highest, but he has more vigour than forty-nine out of fifty of the minor poets who publish their verses, and there is never any doubt as to his meaning. Here is a sentiment from one of the sonnets :

And after all, what is the crux of life ?
Not to be rich and die at thirty-five,
But to live long, clean-handed in the strife,
A pure straight filler in the national hive.
There is no gain nor sense in undue haste—
The best of life comes to the even-paced.

Here is a piece of literary criticism from another sonnet :

The greatest, and the most worth reading now,
Of our belauded poets lately dead,
Are Matthew Arnold and eccentric Clough,
Who in their lifetime were but little read.
The ramping, millioned mob, beyond redress,
Prefer to Shakespeare's works a bunch of cress.

And here is an epigram :

REPLY TO SYDNEY SMITH.

You need it—bring your keenest chisel,
Our heads, not hearts, are hard as Twizel,
Impervious to your pointless wit,
Which is but slattery mental spit—
But as for hearts, yours might be golfed
From star to star, and ne'er get soft !

The book has a personality behind it, at any rate, and that is something. (Gay & Bird.)

FLOWERS OF THE WIND.

BY CHARLOTTE MANSFIELD.

The poets just now are in love with the wind. Mr. Yeats has given us The Wind among the Reeds (a title, by the way, previously used by Hawker, of Morwenstow) ; Mrs. Hinkson called a charming collection of lyrics The Wind in the Trees ; and now comes the volume before us. Miss (or Mrs.) Mansfield is a modest poet, with a few gentle thoughts on life and beauty. We quote a poem on "Friendship" :

To moisten with one's tears the other's brow,
If needs be.

To turn one's back on pleasure, maybe life,
To take and hold all troubles, burdens, strife,
If needs be.

To bind oneself with an unwritten vow,
If needs be.

To ever yield a sympathetic ear,
If needs be.

To laugh when laughter onward flies,
To laugh, though for us mirth but cries,
If needs be.

To bravely face, and show no cowardly fear,
If needs be.

To be stone deaf when censure's in the air,
If needs be.

To lose one's wit and give no apt reply,
To seem a fool, rather than draw a sigh,
If needs be.

To yield in all thy dealings double share,
If needs be.

The little book is so small that it may be slipped in the most shapely coat and not injure its "set." (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d.)

Fiction.

The Market-Place. By Harold Frederic.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

THIS is the last of Harold Frederic's work. It marks the premature close of a career of which one can only say with certainty that it had begun. Mr. Frederic's quick and universal sympathy with life, his original and witty observation, his iconoclastic humour, gave to his novels, especially the later ones, a charm and a real vitality which it was impossible to withstand. One approached them with zest, confident that, whatever else they were, they would be neither perfunctory nor insincere. They had faults. The style was sometimes undignified, and it lacked that last finish which one would have expected from such a talent. The construction was liable to be loose, ex-crescent in parts; and there were usually passages where imagination had obviously failed. Yet, with all this, how good they were!

The Market-Place is good. It may be a little inferior to both Illumination and Gloria Mundi, but it is good. It is alive. It has spontaneity, force, freshness, and all the old charm. The theme is "the City," and the hero, Joel Thorpe, is a man who, after being a failure on the face of the earth for just forty years, suddenly found the Napoleon concealed within himself, and in a few months scooped out of a Jewish ring of "operators" a fortune yielding eighty thousand a year. The wolves had thought to gobble him up, but this "surprising and bloody-minded lamb" turned upon them and "bled them white." The scheme by which he did so is narrated with singular dramatic power. The colossal episode—the whole book is an episode—genuinely thrills, and one does not breathe freely till Thorpe has withdrawn his vast winnings from the kingdom of speculation and invested them in tame securities. The tale is full of curious financial lore and colour, and the writing of it must have been preceded by much research. But Frederic was one of those who can breathe into the dry bones of documentary material the breath of life.

The book contains a good deal besides Thorpe's grand coup and the complicated psychology of Thorpe. It contains, for example, his sister, Mrs. Dabney, the admirable and intrepid woman who never believed in her brother, and who, secure in the competence of a bookselling business, consistently refused his patronage. It also contains Celia Madden, out of Illumination. Celia here consorts with the English aristocracy, and her views upon the feminine part of it are rendered with rare verve. She was intimately candid with Lady Cressage, the most "beautiful woman in England," and afterwards Thorpe's wife:

"Oh, I never wholly know what you're thinking," Miss Madden declared. . . . "It is not you alone, Edith—don't think that—but it is ingrained in your countrywomen. You can't help it: it's in your blood to keep things back. I've met numbers of English ladies who, I'm ready to believe, would be incapable of telling an untruth; but I've never met one of whom I could be sure that she would tell me the whole truth. Don't you see this is a case in point?" she pursued with a little laugh. "I could not drag it out of you that you disliked the Simplon idea, so long as there was a chance of our going. Immediately we find that we can't go, you admit that you hated it. . . . I never can find out what you do want, what really will please you! You never will propose anything; you never will be entirely frank about the things I propose. It's only by watching you out of the corner of my eye that I can ever guess whether anything is altogether to your liking or not."

This is American and acute.

As for the faults, each by itself is unimportant. There are incidents here and there insufficiently motivated, one or two characters not realised or realised only at intervals, and the style is marred by clumsy locutions, an occasional divided infinitive. . . . But what of these? The Market-Place is a book to be thankful for, a book to shake hands with.

An Obstinate Parish. By M. L. Lord ("Sydney Christian.") (Unwin. 6s.)

Mrs. LORD has sought and found her material in the trifling quarrels of a village parish over questions of ritual and the limit of ecclesiastical authority. It is usual to say that an author must have had difficulty in making agreeable fiction out of such a theme. But we do not think so. We are not surprised that Mrs. Lord's book is agreeable. The theme was admirably chosen, and it has been treated with a full appreciation of its merits as a vehicle for displaying character. The animosity between two extremes of a creed is only a fleeting expression of something absolutely eternal, and we like the way in which Mrs. Lord has darkly implied this throughout. Yet, curiously, she is one-sided, superbly one-sided. She gives the ritualistic party no tittle of a fair chance. Her vicar, Cyril Robertson, the standard-bearer of that party in the village of Hurstwell, is accurately studied, powerfully drawn, but quite without sympathy. One cannot fail to recognise him, with his handsome face of brass, his gorgeous conceit, his heart of cast-iron, and his perfect unhumanity. He is the most life-like figure in the book. And the reader who does not end by despising him and all that he stands for must be singularly impervious to the persuasion of Mrs. Lord's talent. The two heroines, Sylvia and Nellie, alike only in their extreme beauty, and both malignly influenced, though in totally different ways, by the imposing Cyril, are distinct creations; but each seems somehow to fall short of that impressiveness which the author intended. It is Mr. Aske, the Evangelical parson of a neighbouring parish, who impresses. In drawing Mr. Aske Mrs. Lord's skill has been at the service of her sympathy; he is indeed lovable, and at once pathetic and dignified. He is, as Nellie's father said, "a man."

The old Adam leapt up in Henry Aske. "There, I am glad you have said it; it has always been expressed in your manner towards me, and in your daughter's, and in that of many other people. There is a whole set of you, who think that because a man lives in an ugly house, and pursues commonplace duties, and has plainly dressed relatives, or wife and children, that he has no love of art or beauty, of which you have a monopoly. More especially you think so in the case of us parsons. Not if we are great dignitaries, with a commanding presence, and a taste in wine and women, and care to spice our conversation with a joke, whose only point lies in its irreverence, or with an apt quotation from the Scriptures at our own expense. No, you can get on with a parson of that sort. You say, 'Give him a bishopric, make him a dean—he will look the part.' But for us common herd there is the smile of contempt. . . ."

Unassuming and full of quiet excellence, An Obstinate Parish is one of those novels which do not make the critic vocal. The author knows her power exactly. She also knows her aim, and reaches it with precision. That aim, imaginatively, is not a high one. The reader is never deeply stirred. The critic therefore cannot passionately laud. And he certainly cannot blame, for—accepting the plane on which it moves—An Obstinate Parish is entitled to be called faultless. And so the critic just says: This is good.

On the Edge of the Empire. By Edgar Jepson and Captain D. Beames. (Heinemann. 6s.)

ONE naturally assumes from the title-page that Captain Beames has supplied the material for this volume of Indian sketches, while Mr. Jepson, in his capacity of literary craftsman, has settled details of form and contrived the nice flow of sentences. A perusal of the book supports such an assumption. It is a good book, well done, dignified, fairly effective. What it lacks is spontaneity and freshness of impression; at times one is conscious of a certain heaviness. The authors have got hold of a number of excellent subjects—subjects similar to those which you will find in Plain Tales, in Life's Handicap, and in Soldiers Three. Let us mention, by way of example, "The Feud and the Regiment," "Calling the Camels Home," "Cagliostro," "The Humour of Bibi Jan," "The Storming of Chandarnagore," and "The Tribute to the Elements," which are all of them Kiplingesque themes, precisely, exactly. Mr. Jepson and Captain Beames have been too sensible to attempt any rivalry of Mr. Kipling's treatment. They have chosen quieter methods, relying for effect chiefly upon the inherent strength of their subjects. Their success varies. "The Feud and the Regiment" might have become epic in the hands of Mr. Kipling; as it stands, it is dull. On the other hand "The Humour of Bibi Jan" and "The Tribute to the Elements" are entirely admirable. These two sinister and terrible narratives, in the mind of Captain Beames, must have called aloud to be set down plainly, without decorations, without tours de force of technique; just told and nothing more. And certainly they are here handled with all imaginable discretion.

Throughout the volume there is a great deal of carefully wrought description. Here is a good passage describing the pursuit of some camel-thieves:

The path was a succession of boulders over which goats might jump or a man scramble, with a sheer drop of two hundred feet on one side, terrible going for horses sure-footed though theirs were. The men dismounted and led them down, walking in front with the reins behind their back; but they showed weaker nerves than their masters. An agony of fear brought out the sweat on them as the galloping had not done; their fear-distended nostrils and glaring eyes were horrible to see; their snorts grew veritable groans; and the clash of the hoofs and the ominous slide, when the hard iron struck the unrelenting boulder, thrilled man and horse alike with dread. Nothing but the lust of blood, when man hunts man, could have steeled the heart of the pursuers; nothing but blind long-founded trust in their masters could have enabled the horses to compass that climb. It is likely that no human suffering could have touched the heart of Bakahan Khan, but at the agony of his beloved mare his lips were twitching, and he and his white brother were venting their feelings in an undertone of cursing.

Without Mr. Kipling, On the Edge of Empire would never have existed. Nevertheless, though in a sense derived, it perfectly justifies itself.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

GILES INGLEBY.

By W. E. NORRIS.

The first new "Norris" for some time. We meet with Giles Ingleby lying on his stomach, with a rook rifle in his hand, soliloquising thus: "The conies may be a feeble folk, but their diabolical cunning and miraculous intuitions make them what the hymn-book calls 'stronger than the strong,'" and so forth. Giles was a poet, in spite of the fact that his mother considered the average rhymester godless, sensuous, and self-indulgent. The literary life may be studied in this novel. (Methuen. 6s.)

LIKE ANOTHER HELEN.

By SYDNEY C. GRIER.

The full title is "Like Another Helen: The History of the Cruel Misfortunes and undeserved Distresses of a Young Lady of Virtue and Sensibility, resident at Bengall during the Years 1755-57, which is contained in her Letters, written to a Friend of her own Sex, and carefully preserved by the Lady to whom they were addressed. Edited by Sydney C. Grier (who has added one or two Letters from other Sources for the better Elucidation of the Narrative)." To this we may add that Sydney C. Grier is the lady who wrote An Uncrowned King. (Blackwood. 6s.)

IONE MARCH.

By S. R. CROCKETT.

This is a revision and extension of the story which, under the title "The Woman of Fortune," has been appearing in The Woman at Home. Herein Mr. Crockett makes a departure, and writes about Americans. Ione March is American, and Marcus Hardy is an undergraduate from Trinity Hall, and after many high-spirited pages, and much pleasant, if rather superficial, humour, they become man and wife. A holiday book. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

THAT FORTUNE.

By CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER.

A novel by the author of My Summer in a Garden. That fortune was Evelyn Mavick's. Evelyn was the "biggest heiress in America and a raving beauty, the only child. She has been brought up like the Kohinoor, never out of somebody's sight." A quiet American story, urbane and lightly humorous, of love and authorship and other matters. (Harpers. 6s.)

DEAD OPPRESSORS.

By T. A. PINKERTON.

The curse of heredity is the subject of this new novel by the author of John Newbold's Ordeal. Hence it is not another exercise in comedy, such as we look for from his pen, but something graver. The story has indeed an Ibsenitish flavour. (Sonnenschein. 6s.)

ON ACCOUNT OF SARAH.

By EYRE HUSSEY.

"Did you ever read a Greek play?" is the question with which this book opens. "If not," the author adds, "I humbly opine that you have lost very little fun." Mr. Hussey then explains the nature of the chorus, in order that he may have recourse to it later. The story is a comedy, played on a somewhat crowded stage, but amusing and skilful, with pleasant character studies. (Macquenn. 6s.)

THE PERILS OF JOSEPHINE. By LORD ERNEST HAMILTON.

Josephine herself tells the story. She dwelt at the beginning in Chelmsford, with two aunts, who wore mittens and had genteel coughs. Afterwards we come to melodrama, mystery, and love, and a kind of "Uncle Silas" flavour. "Suddenly he drew the knife from his teeth, and flourished it within an inch of my face. 'Gurrr!' he yelled, mouthing at me hideously, like a maniac." (Unwin. 6s.)

THE CRAZE OF CHRISTINA.

By MRS. LOVETT CAMERON.

Another society story by this brisk and busy novelist. It tells of Mark Clifford, a young journalist starving in the Tottenham Court-road until he suddenly inherits a mansion, £8,000 a year, and a family butler. At this juncture enter women, and the story is launched. (Long. 6s.)

THREE BACHELOR WOMEN.

By E. COSBY.

A volume of stories and sketches. Among them is "The Blue Chrysanthemum," a parody of The Yellow Aster. "Unappropriated Womanhood," says the author, "may, roughly speaking, be divided into three great classes: the Romantic, the Antagonistic, and the Unappreciated." (Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.)

THE BLACK TERROR.

By JOHN K. LEYS.

A romance of Russia. "I am not prepared to deny," says Von Mitschka, "that our principles, our aims, and to some extent our methods, are similar to those of the Nihilists, whom we have succeeded." (Sampson Low. 6s.)

WHEN KNIGHTHOOD WAS IN FLOWER. By E. CASKODEN.

This is one of the books which all America is reading. It tells the love story of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, and Mary Tudor. The period "when knighthood was in flower" is thus the reign of Henry VIII.; which may be a surprise to some students. The historian purports to be Sir Edwin Caskoden, Master of the Dance. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Roots of Language and Professor Skeat.

THE kindness of the Rev. Prof. W. W. Skeat, of Cambridge, is, perhaps, as much trespassed upon as that of any scholar of eminence in the country. As though it were not enough to be Elrington and Bosworth Professor of Anglo-Saxon, the author of an Etymological Dictionary of the English language now in a third edition, and a voluminous and always illuminating author, he must needs be constantly asked to assist some one out of the thickets of investigation. It was not, however, even as a flounderer in investigation—being merely a stroller by the wayside—that I first ventured to draw upon his known good-nature. It was simply to ask him, as the editor of Chatterton, in the "Aldine" series, if he knew what had become of the famous picture, "The Death of Chatterton," which, with another, "The Three Marys," are the best remembered of the paintings in the Manchester Art Treasures Exhibition of 1857. It is forty-two years since then, and Mr. Skeat had not taken his degree; nor had he even dreamt of those studies, which were the resources of his leisure, becoming the serious studies of his life. His chosen career was that of a country clergyman, but severe illness intervening rendered a long rest necessary, also a change in his pursuits. Yes, Prof. Skeat told me, he had seen the picture, "The Death of Chatterton"; he had seen it at Manchester, and his recollection of it was the same as mine. But into whose possession it had passed he could not say. Speaking of Chatterton, while regarding the Rowley Poems as the best, he thought a few of the "modern" poems remarkable. "I rather wish," he added, "that there were more of them. Had Chatterton taken as much trouble with these as with the other, and had he lived, he might have done well. Some think one of his best pieces is 'The Bristowe Tragedie,' which, although he placed it among his Rowley Poems, is practically in modern English and a modern ballad."

Although Mr. Skeat had to shape a new course for himself at twenty-eight, it is evident that the bent of his inclinations was, very early in his life, towards English scholarship. Indeed, he confesses that he imbibed his first notion of scholarship at King's College School, in the Strand, his class master, the Rev. Oswald Cockayne, being an excellent Anglo-Saxon scholar. And it is not without interest to find the pupil become a professor after finishing his edition in Anglo-Saxon, with a literal translation, of Ælfric's Lives of the Saints—a work he had in hand seventeen years—acknowledging in the handsomest way the usefulness of a transcript, by his old class master, of

PROFESSOR SKEAT.

From the Copyright Series of Portraits of Contributors to the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

Ælfric's Lives. So that, though under the impression that his lines were to be cast in some country parish for which his serious studies, especially theology, would provide the best equipment, he appears quite early—at any rate, from the time he could read the quotations from Chaucer and Langland in Mrs. Markham's History of England—to have begun to get together his outfit for his own proper work—that of editor of Early English literature. So much may be inferred from his answer to the question often asked, how he came to think of studying English. And it is significant of the fulness of his information that, in answering this or any other question, he always gives over-measure, especially if it be of something which, having found useful himself, he may think would be useful to you. Ask him, for example, how English may be best studied. He will tell you that as English grammar is dependent almost wholly upon that of Anglo-Saxon, instead of one's having recourse to, or rummaging through, dictionaries or grammars, the better way of studying English is to read some good standard author of the Elizabethan period, such as Shakespeare or Spenser or Bacon. "All peculiar phrases should be carefully noted," he tells you, "and, if possible, remembered; after a while the reader will find himself gradually enabled to account for, and explain, some of them; and then he will have made a considerable advance." The value of hints such as these is obviously this: that instead of having to spend the freshest years of your life in drudgery to acquire a knowledge of older English, you have opened for you the floweriest paths to knowledge and to its purest springs. It occurs to one that, although it would seem that Prof. Skeat had drawn from those springs without the slightest exertion, and in the happiest mood—as if, indeed, it had only been child's play to him—he must have done a tremendous amount of hard work in making work easy and pleasant for others. This is indicated, surely, in the account of his books and papers, the research manifestly involved in their preparation being prodigious. To take only one from the long list entered in the British Museum catalogue—that of his Mæso-Gothic glossary—it will be seen that he must have trained himself to exact the uttermost moment of his leisure to gather the materials for such a work, to say nothing of the vast labour and penetrating diligence required in turning those materials into a work of reference valuable to scholars. And this, too, with the certain knowledge that his glossary, except to philologists, would be a sealed book. There could be no popular edition of a work with the title Mæso-Gothic. Yet within the space of Prof. Skeat's small quarto he sounds the depths of the language of Ulfilas—that which, according to Sir Francis Palgrave, affords the best materials for an investigation of the origin and structure of the English language. It is a curious thing that this old language—Mæso-Gothic—invaluable as it is declared to be in any adequate study of English, lies so far aside from the familiar highways of literature that not even the labours of the late Dr. Bosworth, Prof. Max Müller, and Prof. Skeat himself have made it quite clear to readers outside the philological circle what Mæso-Gothic is. Perhaps a rough-and-ready answer, though it may horrify the fastidious, may be given, that it was the language of Mæsia, and that Ulfilas was its bishop; not that this makes one any wiser until it is found that Mæsia is the ancient geography name for the Servia and Bulgaria of the modern map. This brings us to familiar ground, and, Ulfilas being known to scholars as a most learned bishop, and a presumably pious man, he having translated the Scriptures into Mæso-Gothic, it will be felt, though the extent of the debt may be difficult to appraise, that Prof. Skeat's glossary is a gift to English literature of great value.

It was while regaining strength, after the illness which had prostrated him in his Godalming curacy, and later withdrew him permanently from clerical work, that it occurred to Prof. Skeat to take up the study of Anglo-

Saxon seriously. He had returned to Cambridge, where he was appointed mathematical lecturer at Christ's College with a good deal of spare time. And finding no one with anything like a competent knowledge of Anglo-Saxon, it seemed to him that he had found the proper field within which to cultivate it himself. It so happened that in the same year, 1864, Dr. Furnivall had started the Early English Text Society, and acting on the suggestion of a friend that he would find in Mr. Skeat, if not as yet experience as an editor of the Older English, at any rate an exceeding fondness for the work, he entrusted him with the re-editing of one of the Society's publications, the poem Lancelot of the Laik. Being urged to take up more important work, Mr. Skeat entered upon an examination of the available MSS. for a new edition of Piers Plowman, completing the edition of the three principal texts of Langland's poem, with a reproduction of the notes and glossary in 1885.

His work in Middle English includes the re-editing of Barbour's important poem "The Bruce," or, to give it its quaint title, Robert-de-Broyes, King of Scots, which, one need hardly say, took many years to complete. Needless to add that Chaucer is the third of the great authors of the fourteenth century edited by Prof. Skeat. "Future editors may do better," he says, "but my work will never (I hope) become quite superfluous." This is his simple way of putting it. His other works, as well as those mentioned, lovers of English literature greatly admire. We may name one specially—his complete edition of all the MSS. of the Anglo-Saxon and Northumbrian Gospels. But his best and most enduring title to the respect of his countrymen is that he has given them interpretations, in the truest spirit, of the poems of Barbour, Langland, and Chaucer. As one of the editors of the Early English Text Society, Prof. Skeat can tell the world, as well as any one of the living group of English scholars, how the New English Dictionary was first conceived, and what the difficulties were which the first promoters had to face. But it is an old story now. And although there are incidents in connexion with the undertaking which can never be without interest, as, for example, the death of Mr. Herbert Coleridge, one of the first two editors—who died with slips of the Dictionary in his hands—or the first reception of the good news that at last, after some twenty years of unrealised expectation, publishers had been found willing to undertake the work, the time has not yet come for the retelling of the story, as it will be told some day, from the beginning to the finish. While the promoters were without a glimpse even of the stocks on which the frame of the work was ultimately to be laid, and had barely more comfort in their reflections than that they were engaged in a most noble pursuit—on a work it was hardly likely they would ever see in print!—they were aided with almost incredible enthusiasm and industry by scholars in all parts of the country. Of that band Prof. Skeat was one. He practically formed the English Dialect Society in order that an adequate collection of provincial words might be made available for the needs of the New English Dictionary. In many other ways, indirectly, he has helped it forward; and in his latest service, in his tribute to the courage of Dr. J. A. H. Murray, in the Modern Quarterly, he administers a severe slating to those reviewers who have girded at the slow progress. For so mild a mannered man it is a revelation. Prof. Skeat claims, and claims fairly, to have made it his particular endeavour to promote English studies from a sincere wish to see the great name of England held in due respect by scholars—not that he wishes to reserve to himself any credit for this, but only as one of many other scholars animated with the same desire.

R. S.

Things Seen.

Saluting the Conqueror.

At the fag end of the Rue de Rivoli, close to the Hôtel de Ville, I saw a crowd on the pavement. In the roadway a simple hearse waited. The funeral was a humble one, but the undertaker wore a splendid sash, and his men attached the wreaths of the mourners to the coffin with speed and circumstance. Almost before I knew, the little procession had set out. The young widow, with only a girl—a sister, perhaps—to support her, walked first. Her grief was too pitiful in the harsh daylight. The neighbours followed by twos, and I thought a real current of feeling flowed along the line to the chief mourner, whose thoughts seemed to be now before her and now behind, and her reason at fault between them.

To Montparnasse! The little line had straightened itself, and the severance from the Rue de Rivoli had been made: there seemed no more to the picture. But at the moment when the funeral was set in the broad, empty Place de l'Hôtel de Ville the soldier on guard under the great building stayed his march to and fro and presented arms to the dead. . . . Ah, that uplifted rifle, and that natty, rigid figure in which the Army of France lived! A great idea hung over me. Then the sentry resumed his march, the poor funeral went wavering over the Pont d'Arcole, and I remembered that in my country they salute nobody below the rank of a fiery officer.

The White Man's Burden.

In the afternoon a white man came aboard, and he was followed closely by a Moor, who carried two battered leather kit-bags. A passenger, and from Hassi Moul el Bab! The new arrival caused quite a sensation. But he paid his fare to London, a stiff one, in English gold, he spoke as a gentleman speaks, and the purser could find no reason for refusing a cabin, though he looked askance at the passenger's cracked brown riding boots and ancient suit of kakhi, torn and worn.

That the Lorelei should have called at Hassi Moul el Bab at all was odd. The visit did not appear in the advertised itinerary, and big pleasure steamers do not make a practice of dropping haphazard into tiny Moorish ports, much as worthy Riffians and other good pirates would enjoy meeting them there.

No. 94 was the cabin allotted. "Just to the left of the companion," said Mr. Purser, with explanatory condescension. The stranger moved towards the saloon entrance, beckoning his stately Moor to follow him. The ship was as fine as a lady's-maid at a theatre; all a-glitter with bright-work and brass, as a pleasure yacht should be.

"Hi, there! Where's that darky going?"

It was the spruce and gallant chief officer who spoke; and, speaking, he stepped forward and laid one hand, brusquely, upon the dust-encrusted but finely-embroidered djellab of Haj Absalaam Eshun, Arab Halal, the mountain-bred Moor who followed the new passenger. Haj Absalaam dropped the Englishman's two kit-bags, as a man might who had been shot in the back; a toss of his fine head threw the djellab-hood flat on one shoulder; his two sinewy brown hands were clenched at rigid arms' ends, and his black eyes appeared to break through smouldering to blaze; it almost seemed they started flames a playing about the popular officer's forehead. The Moor did not speak in words, but—. However, at that moment the white man in the companion way turned, and pushed past Absalaam, with three muttered words, which sounded soothing and apologetic.

"What's the matter?" he asked. The first officer smiled with bland dignity, and, assuming then the tone he kept for passengers, "Oh, nothing!" he said. "But we don't allow these beggars past the companion way, you know."

The Moor's right hand moved, as a leopard pounces, to the girth opening in his djellab, where showed the gleam of a chased silver hilt. He had some English, the mountain man. The new passenger twisted one end of a ragged, corn-coloured moustache into his mouth. His blue eyes suggested the shining desert—sand, sun-glare, a limitless outlook.

"Ah," he said, very gently. "So you don't allow these beggars below?"

Then this wiry, thin-flanked man turned on his heel, showing a fine breadth of thinly clad shoulder to the officer, and to the Moor a half-tired, half-amused brown face.

"Pick up the bags, Absalaam—my friend. The mules must take me as far as Tangier, after all."

They walked down the Lorelei's gangway, these two, without another word, and the assembled passengers watched their little boat pitching shorewards in the swell outside Hassi Moul el Bab. The Lorelei made a clear fifteen sovereigns by that transaction, and I noticed an odd thing about it, which I subsequently described at some length to the chief officer. As the white man preceded his Moor down the ship's side he wiped his moustache with a handkerchief. In one corner of that handkerchief, delicately worked, was a tiny coronet. The chief officer seemed annoyed when he looked up in Debrett the name given by the man from Hassi Moul el Bab. Which was what I expected from that gallant seaman.

The 500 Necessary Words.

AMERICA has just revived an old pastime. Mr. Charles Demery-Robinson, professor of languages, has been compiling a list of five hundred words for the New York Times, to illustrate the conversational needs of the ordinary child or "uncivilised man or woman." He claims to have brought to the construction of his vocabulary the experience of twenty years. This is the result:

THE ELEMENTS OF CONVERSATION.

10. House, roof, cellar, residence, ceiling, workshop, way, place, curtain, floor.
20. Wall, window, pane, door, corner, blind, shutter, staircase, ladder, room.
30. Mantelpiece, mirror, library, clock, stove, cookstove, chest of drawers, money, flower-pot, bell.
40. Watch, table, chair, rocking-chair, arm-chair, sofa, clock, picture, water-pitcher, stool.
50. Chandelier, parlor, pillar, fire, carpet, bedroom, bed, dining-room, bath-room, soap.
60. Wash-bowl, towel, comb, water, wash, sponge, brush, bath, bath-tub, drawer.
70. Cradle, kitchen, room, closet, key, lock, bench, shelf, stable, desk.
80. Pen, pencil, ink, inkstand, book, blotter, penknife, ruler, ticket, letter.
90. Stamp, envelope, eraser, newspaper, basket, scissors, match, lamp, candle, tooth-powder.
100. Suit, coat, waistcoat, trousers, pocket-book, shoe, stocking, needle, pin, suspenders.
110. Thread, button, collar, cuffs, necktie, shirt, drawers, cloak, chain, ribbon.
120. Pocket, slipper, laces, hat, overcoat, shawl, handkerchief, dress, skirt, petticoat.
130. Corset, belt, apron, ring, glove, rubber, wrapper, umbrella, cane, eyeglasses.
140. Wood, glass, silk, paper, leather, stone, iron, copper, silver, gold.
150. Tin, linen, wool, cotton, china, straw, velvet, steel, cloth, fur.
160. Food, appetite, hunger, thirst, meal, breakfast, dinner, supper, lunch, toothpick.
170. Drink, bread, butter, cheese, meat, ham, roast, veal, chicken, duck.
180. Beef, pork, saltcellar, salt, pepper, egg, milk, cake, vegetable, soup.

190. Potatoes, peas, beans, nut, water, brandy, whisky, oil, vinegar, knife.
200. Fork, spoon, coffee, tea, chocolate, cup, saucer, plate, dish, fruit.
210. Wine, apple, pear, lemon, cherries, beer, bottle, cork, oyster, sauce.
220. Sausage, tablecloth, decanter, fish, ice, glass, sugar, flour, corkscrew, cucumber.
230. Young, old, pretty, ugly, thin, thick, miserly, polite, sorry, glad.
240. Quiet, fresh, funny, happy, unhappy, lazy, fat, lean, sick, well.
250. Sad, gay, small, large, low, high, short, long, bad, good.
260. Old, new, square, round, sour, light, heavy, sweet, bitter, wet.
270. Dry, beautiful, tired, sharp, clean, dirty, married, single, narrow, broad.
280. Necessary, possible, honest, poor, rich, careful, warm, cold, deep, hard.
290. Soft, useful, proud, cheap, dear, false, true, full, empty, white.
300. Black, gray, dark, light, red, blue, yellow, green, intelligent, foolish.
310. And, also, almost, during, because, of, why, except, however, once.
320. Sure, soon, ordinary, such, since, perhaps, very, finally, until, especially.
330. Suddenly, accidentally, little, much, too much, here, there, elsewhere, thus, then.
340. Certainly, loud, nevertheless, at, in, on, under, between, everybody, nobody.
350. How much, how many, more, together, but, in spite of, through, several, who, how.
360. Where, although, with, without, near, far, everywhere, nowhere, to the right, to the left.
370. Enough, upstairs, downstairs, sometimes, never, often, only, the same thing, something, nothing.
380. This, that, my, thy, his, our, your, their, badly, well.
390. Slowly, quickly, already, not yet, together, about, right away, behind, even, alone.
400. Before, yesterday, to-day, to-morrow, now, long ago, early, late, opposite, in vain.
410. Man, woman, father, mother, husband, wife, uncle, aunt, brother, sister.
420. Son, daughter, friend, neighbour, boy, girl, niece, nephew, child, cousin.
430. Workingman, letter-carrier, messenger, physician, merchant, driver, servant, joiner, stationer.
440. Watchmaker, blacksmith, grocer, jeweller, druggist, landlord, printer, baker, cook, tailor.
450. Carpenter, shoemaker, milliner, dressmaker, hatter, rain, snow, storm, light, time.
460. Cloud, weather, spring, summer, autumn, winter, minute, hour, day, night.
470. Week, month, year, morning, evening, river, sea, sun, moon, star.
480. City, home, world, street, garden, bridge, tree, flower, forest, air.
490. Head, hair, ear, nose, mouth, beard, moustache, tooth, tongue, eye.
500. Throat, face, knee, lip, heart, finger, hand, foot, arm, leg.

It must be remembered that the list was compiled for Americans. The English man or English child in the same position would be able very easily to do without some of the words given: for instance, residence, pane, cookstove, bench, ruler, eraser, suspenders, rubber, tin, nest, oysters, miserly, joiner, and jeweller.

We should understand the present situation better if we understood what the professor means by "uncivilised." What is "an uncivilised man"? Apparently it does not mean an uneducated man, because for the needs of the uneducated man the professor says we must add another five hundred words. But what has an uncivilised man to do with handkerchiefs and saltcellars, decanters and stationers? In the direction of civilisation the list is surely too strong. On the other hand, suppose the uncivilised man takes an interest in politics or wishes to abuse his employer, what does the list do for him then? But such list-making is, of course, only a game.

Burns's Kilmarnock Editions.

Is Their Market Value Falling?

THE sale of a Kilmarnock (1786) edition of Burns's poems at Sotheby's the other week for £96 has, oddly enough, aroused little or no public comment; yet Mr. Sabin could not, we suppose, even in his most sanguine moments, have anticipated the capture of this volume at a figure under £200. It was, of course, by no means a perfect copy—one of the covers was damaged, several injured pages had been repaired, and pp. 234 and 235 were thought by experts to be insertions from the reprint. In spite of these defects, however, the copy was a good one, and the lack of competitors at the sale must be taken to indicate a falling-off in the market value of Burns. After the exciting contest at Dowell's Rooms, Edinburgh, in February, 1898, when the irrepressible Mr. Sabin carried off the late Mr. A. C. Lamb's copy at the record price of 545 guineas, it was anticipated that this latest Kilmarnock edition, imperfect as it was, would have thronged Sotheby's auction-room with eager Burns's collectors or their agents. But it did nothing of the kind. The competition was sluggish from the first, and Mr. Sabin's leisurely bid of £96 brought down the hammer.

Here is a list of prices fetched during the last twenty-five years for the original edition of Poems, Chiefly in the Scottish Dialect, by Robert Burns. Kilmarnock: Printed by John Wilson. 1786:

Name of Copy	Condition.	Place of Sale.	Date.	Price.
Unnamed ...	"Sound" ...	Edinburgh	1874	£ 19 0
Unnamed ...	"Sound" ...	London	1875	34 0
Laing's ...	Good. Lines in poet's writing, and letter from J. G. Lockhart inserted ...	Sotheby's	1879	90 0
Mayrick's ...	Last leaf of glossary wanting ...	Sotheby's	1887	18 0
Shaw's ...	Good ...	Sotheby's	1887	66 0
Craig's ...	Some uncut leaves ...	Sotheby's	1888	111 0
Duff's ...	Good. Burns's autograph on title-page...	Sotheby's	1888	86 0
Unnamed ...	Two leaves stained ...	Pattick's	1889	71 0
Streetfield's...	Title in facsimile. Several defects repaired ...	Sotheby's	1889	46 0
English Amateur's	Very good ...	Sotheby's	1890	107 0
Gaisford's ...	Very good ...	Sotheby's	1890	120 0
Young's ...	Spotless condition ...	Sotheby's	1890	100 0
Country Gentleman's	Dedication, title, and first leaf of preface wanting. With all faults ...	Puttick's	1891	27 0
Brayton Eves'	Good ...	New York	1891	86 0
Lakeland's ...	Preface and last leaf of glossary reprinted. With all faults ...	Sotheby's	1891	21 0
Unnamed ...	Portion of title, preface, and last leaf in facsimile. All faults ...	Sotheby's	1891	16 10
Auchinleck ...	Ink cross opposite some of poems in contents ...	Sotheby's	1893	102 0
Baronet's ...	Very good ...	Sotheby's	1896	121 0
Unnamed ...	Good ...	Sotheby's	1897	80 0
Burra's ...	In original publisher's sheep. Two leaves with jagged edges ...	Sotheby's	1897	86 0
Lamb's, No. 1	Original paper covers as issued. Uncut. Last page not cut open. In crimson morocco case ...	Edinburgh	1898	572 5
Lamb's, No. 2	Pp. 11-238 (pp 223-4 and 233-4 wanting), loose in morocco case	Edinburgh (same sale)	1898	13 0

All these copies, with the single exception of Mr.

Lamb's, were neatly bound in calf or half-calf, with gilt edges, and all the rest of it, and with the original broad margins cut down in many cases to the smallest compass. This edition of Burns's poems was one of the most elegant books Wilson, of Kilmarnock, ever turned out. It was beautifully printed, bound in blue paper boards, with white backing, and had very wide margins, making an octavo volume (9 in. by 5½ in.). Many of the copies now in existence have been cut down by the binders, into whose hands they fell, to 8 inches and even 7½ inches in height, thus disfiguring the book entirely. The tallest cut copy is that presented to the Kilmarnock Museum by Dr. McLaren. It measured 8½ inches in height. Those in the British Museum measure 8 and 8½ inches respectively, the former, purchased in 1850, having certain blanks filled in and misprints corrected by the poet.

Mr. Lamb's No. 1. copy, which brought the phenomenal price of £572 5s., was, however, unique. It was in every sense a perfect copy. It was uncut and in the original paper covers as issued from the printers, and the bidding at Dowell's was altogether sensational. The copy had, moreover, quite a romantic history. During the first half of the century it was owned by a Glasgow family named Drummond, who seem to have set little store upon it, for at the Drummond sale in 1850 it went "for a song" to Dr. Burns, of Rochester, among a lot of odd volumes. Twenty years later Dr. Burns, who was a native of Forfar, offered the volume for sale as a contribution towards the Free Public Library of his native town, when it was purchased by Mr. Simpson, Broughty-Ferry, for £6 6s., which was then considered a very big price for a Kilmarnock edition. The advertisement of the sale published in the Dundee Advertiser of the time stated that "about a dozen years ago a similar copy was sold by auction in London for £3 10s." In 1879 Mr. Simpson offered to sell his copy along with several other volumes to Mr. A. C. Lamb, Dundee, who became their purchaser at £124, of which he allowed £100 as the price of the Kilmarnock "Burns." This is the copy which nineteen years later fetched £572 5s. at the Edinburgh sale—nearly eighteen times as much as Burns paid Wilson for the whole edition of 600 copies!

Since this fabulous price was obtained last year the copy disposed of at Sotheby's on the 4th inst. was the only one that has come into the market, and that it should pass into Mr. Sabin's hands, almost without competition, for £96 is not without significance.

Drama.

"The Weather-Hen."

WHEN "The Weather-Hen" was produced at an experimental matinee at Terry's a couple of weeks ago, it was generally recognised to be an extremely clever piece of work. Now that it has been put into the evening bill at the Comedy, a second visit more than confirms the favourable impression created by the first.

"The Weather-Hen" is something more than merely clever—it is also extremely bold. Its authors, Messrs. Berte Thomas and Granville Barker, have chosen their subject courageously, handled it in a manner almost audacious in its originality, and faced the issues it raises with a sincerity and a directness very rare on the English stage. They have set themselves resolutely to draw from the life; to see things and people as they are, and not as they are conventionally represented to be. They have not sacrificed truth to stage effect. On the contrary, at times they have boldly sacrificed stage effect to truth, and thereby secured a higher effectiveness, which the mere accomplished craftsman of the stage usually misses.

How is it that these two young men, who have never, to my knowledge, written for the stage before, have succeeded where so many more experienced playwrights fail? I am inclined to think that it is to this very inexperience of theirs that they owe their success. They have had the courage of inexperience, the rashness of the beginner. They have not flinched from difficult situations, or fallen back upon old or threadbare devices for winning applause or bringing down a curtain. They have set themselves to write a play which shall be sincere, which shall mirror life as it is. They have not been content merely to copy other men's successes, and they have not been exposed to that great temptation of the skilled dramatist—to repeat their own. The experienced dramatist is so terribly handicapped when he wishes to give us original or sincere work. He knows exactly what will "go" on the stage, and he is naturally chary of trying experiments. He has a recipe for a drama—sound, time-worn, well established. It is a great temptation to go on turning out the old dish. As long as he sticks to his recipe success is fairly certain. If he varies it, failure is, at least, possible. He has his reputation to consider—and he does not vary the recipe. The authors of "The Weather-Hen" were fortunate in having a reputation to make, not a reputation to keep. In their case courage was the truest prudence, and I hope the result will justify them financially and otherwise.

Will it justify them? It is dangerous to prophesy. It is possible to be too clever for the London stage and it is very easy to be too original. "The Weather-Hen" is so fresh, so startling even in the novelty of its treatment, that I am afraid it may puzzle more people than it will charm. I am afraid that its audiences may not understand what its authors are doing. What they are doing (as it seems to me) is this—they have tried to put upon the stage certain characters and certain incidents such as, given certain conditions, might be met with in ordinary life. They are realists, in fact. But they are realists with a sense of humour. They have taken for their principal characters an unhappy wife, an unfaithful husband, and a chivalrous but callow youth who wishes to rescue the wife from her husband's ill-treatment. Here is an excellent subject for "serious" drama, for reproaches, recriminations, for the business of the ordinary kind. But in ordinary life these momentous events settle themselves more quietly than you might suppose. A youth goes off with another man's wife. Tragic, no doubt, but also slightly ridiculous. The youth's parents start in pursuit. Decidedly ridiculous. The youth's conduct is chivalrous and well-intentioned, but he will not improbably look rather silly. Here is our authors' opportunity in "The Weather-Hen." They have drawn their play and their persons from the life, and they have retained their sense of humour. We feel intensely for the wife; but this does not prevent us from seeing that she is rather a vulgar little person. We sympathise with the chivalrous youth; but when he takes too much champagne, and otherwise makes himself ridiculous, our sympathy does not prevent us from laughing at him. We sympathise with his parents; but when his mother falls asleep in her chair, and his father has his encounter with the faithful manservant, we relish the humour of the situation keenly.

And so all through "The Weather-Hen" we are permitted to see both sides of the question, and the serious issues do not prevent us from laughing, nor does the laughter prevent our taking a poignant interest in the serious issues. It is wonderfully clever and wonderfully stimulating to those who like this sort of thing; but the Public —?

Well, time will show. The play is admirably acted, not merely by Miss McIntosh and Mr. Graham Browne, but by the whole company. It deserves success: I hope it will achieve it.

St. J. H.

Memoirs of the Moment.

It is a pity that Dr. Congreve has been denied the not altogether unique experience of being a reader of his own obituary notice in the Times. Nobody would have appreciated more than he the points of the leading article in which his epitaph is summed up in every sentence as "Failure." A fighting-man the writer in question rather picturesquely than truly sketches him; but he would not have sought to set aside the Times verdict. Nor need anybody seek to do so on his account; though the thought arises that with Congreve, as with many others, success may come in other ways than from the path in which a man set out to win it. It is true that Congreve had no great congregation; he did not head a visible church, or add to the number of powers upon whom a Parliamentary candidate must call at election times. But the work he did was a work of leavening others; and nobody will deny that his general principles—all tending to the elevation of Man—are those which have triumphed all along the line, in politics, in the pulpit, in literature. On that point the writer in the Times strikes a strangely discordant note when he proclaims over the grave of Congreve that "the great teachers of physical science are in no mood to put humanity in a false position of overwhelming importance. Some tenants of the nearest ant-heap," the leader-writer adds, "may hold that the individual ant should worship the corporate ant-heap. It is not the tendency of modern science. There is no sign that it will ever be such." The Worshipers of Humanity, on the strict lines of Congreve, may be few in number, as the Times writer says, and says again; but, if numbers are really to be the test, where, after all, will this frank Worship of Inhumanity find its place?

The death of the Duchess of Rutland was quite unexpected, the visit of the Duke and Duchess to German waters being made on his account rather than on hers. The Duke early lost his first beautiful wife; and, after a widowhood of eight years, in which he made politics his distraction, he found his second wife in a lady of most amiable disposition and with tastes and aims similar to his own. The Duchess, now dead, must rank among the many wives whose devotion makes memorable an age which also saw the passing of the Divorce Acts—opposed with fiery ardour by Lord John Manners, as he then was, from his place in Parliament. She loved public life, so far as it affected her husband's interests; she knew the story of the Young England movement by heart; preferred Coningsby among the novels of Disraeli; and, while a deeply pious woman (of High Church sympathies), did her best to enter into many mundane interests, particularly those connected with art, as expounded to her by Lady Granby. Of her face, the best records are those made by the delicate pencil of her daughter-in-law.

The Duchess of Rutland was, however, a woman of domestic affairs first, and a votary of the arts afterwards. Her music was mediocre, and her few contributions to magazines and newspapers were frankly evidences not so much of any literary ability as of her good-natured acquiescence in editorial requests. Her simple dressing was done so unostentatiously that it was imitated, not reacted from, by her daughters. The Duke has lost not only an excellent wife, but a most able assistant in the management of his estates, and an accountant on the hearth.

The friends of Canon and Mrs. Basil Wilberforce were entertained this week with that unique sequel to tea and strawberries in Dean's Yard—music in Westminster Abbey; and, given the venue, the prelude to "Parsifal," and the voice of Miss Clara Butt, this must be pronounced the queen of the afternoon parties of the present season. The cloisters, and then the stalls and transept of the Abbey, bloomed with an audience that stirred softly at the close of music it might not applaud. Miss Butt's voice acquired almost startling force and splendour under the roof of that high nave; and as to the prelude to "Parsifal," Sir Frederick Bridge at the organ renewed one's conviction that of all phrases of music, the "Take ye and eat" and the "I shall drink no more of the fruit of the vine," from Bach's "Passion," and these twelve or so notes that begin Wagner's mystic opera, are the most wonderful yet uttered.

THE sale of Arab horses at Crabbet Park last Saturday afternoon brought together a very cosmopolitan crowd. One buyer of horses arrived after a journey of six days and six nights; but a large portion of the company present were neighbours, who came as to a garden party. The literary interest, either by achievement or inheritance, could not be absent where Mr. Wilfrid and Lady Anne Blunt were host and hostess. Lord Lytton, too, was there, and two of his sisters; so was Mr. Evelyn, of Wotton. Two publishers looked on. Life in a tent, with Arabs at hand, was considered very pleasant at luncheon, and especially while Mr. Wilfrid Blunt was speaking. "Once," he said, "he was in diplomacy; but he had now a serious career: that of a horse-breeder." The point was prettily made, particularly as Mr. Blunt had on either hand Lady Lytton and Lady Dufferin, both of them ex-ambassadors, and had just had his health proposed by Sir Hugh Wyndham, freshly settled in his own Sussex after a life spent in Eastern embassies. Mr. Wilfrid Blunt has his own "ideas about India"; and three of its Vice-Queens were of the Crabbet company.

If reporting in the House of Commons is a decaying art, the reporting of daily events does not seem to fare much better. Take the case of a horse sale at Crabbet, and you will find that two leading morning papers make Lord Hampton deliver the little speech that was Sir Hugh Wyndham's. You will find an allusion to "Mr. Evelyn of Woolton," and, what will seem of more consequence to the people who are "in no mood to put humanity in a false position of overwhelming importance," a famous horse mentioned by name as having been offered for sale at the reserve price of one hundred guineas, which was not offered for sale at all, and never would be without a reserve of many times that sum. The man who devotes his life to searching for contemporary proof that the Battle of Agincourt was really fought on a Friday, and not on a Thursday, may well, one supposes, be daunted in his momentous career when he finds the inevitable discrepancy between fact and report in the chronicles of his own day.

To Mrs. Coningsby Disraeli has been devised by her father, Mr. Edward Silva, a fortune of £150,000, subject to the life-interest of her mother. The landed property in Hants, however, which this estimate includes, will not go to Mrs. Coningsby Disraeli's eldest son, who succeeds to Hughenden, should there be another son to inherit it. That division is a very just one, but it may, perhaps, keep the Disraelis as commoners. It has always been understood that if any considerable wealth came to the head of the family during the present reign a peerage would be placed at his disposal, though the title would not again be Beaconsfield—the Queen being the jealous guardian of the uniqueness of her favourite minister—but probably Hughenden.

Correspondence.

An Author's Complaint.

SIR,—Allow me to correct the statements made concerning me by Mr. Mullett Ellis in your issue of July 8 under the heading "An Author's Complaint."

I am unconscious of any previous challenge to me personally, and all I have seen of the case appeared to me to be merely advertising matter of an unusual character; but now I wish to say that the words attributed to me are not accurate, but misleading.

Mr. Ellis's book was subscribed here in the usual way on Tuesday, October 4, 1898, and a record was made of it, in case it should be inquired for, as we do with many hundred books every year. There was no apparent reason why we should take it into stock. A few days later Mr. Ellis sought an interview with me to persuade me to put his book on the stalls. I did not know Mr. Ellis, had never heard of him, and I might wisely have limited my answer to the usual one, that we would await a demand for it; but, as the controversy over his book proves, I was over frank when I told him that, in my judgment, the title of his book was open to objection, and was likely to give offence to many of our customers.

The conversation was unduly prolonged, taking time I could ill spare on Saturday morning (if I remember aright), so I closed it by a decisive statement that "I might be overruled, but if it rested with me the book would not be put on the bookstalls for chance sale. All demand for it would, of course, be met as usual." This is the sole ground Mr. Ellis has for his complaint of "literary censorship." He appealed at once to the firm, and received an answer which Sir Martin Conway, and probably most other readers of the correspondence, accept as conclusive of the point.

It is an extraordinary feature of the case that, though the book has been so vigorously and ingeniously advertised by Mr. Ellis, the demand for it, so far as our trade is concerned, has been met by a dozen copies.—I am, &c.,

WM. FRED. KINGDON.

186, Strand, W.C.: July 10, 1899.

[This correspondence must now cease.—ED.]

"Gaelic Names of Plants."

SIR,—In reply to your correspondent who inquires regarding the above very scarce work, I may say that the author and myself have at present a new, revised, and greatly enlarged edition of the volume in the press, and hope to publish it by the end of this month. It is issued to subscribers at 7s. 6d., and if your correspondent cares to communicate with me I will gladly supply him with prospectus and other particulars.—I am, &c.,

JOHN MACKAY.

9, Blythswood-drive, Glasgow: July 4, 1899.

Old Wykehamists.

SIR,—Allow me to say that your correspondent Mr. Mercer is in error in saying that T. A. Trollope was omitted from my History of Winchester College. He and his book are mentioned on p. 432 and in the Index.

Will you let me at the same time say that I purposely omitted claiming Anthony Trollope as a Wykehamist, because he was a Harrovian, not a Wykehamist. It appears to me ridiculous to claim a man as a product of a school at which he spent a year, which he thought a year of misery, before going to another school at which, though he disliked it, he spent several years. For Winchester to claim Anthony Trollope or Matthew Arnold, or Coryat, as your reviewer did, is as absurd as for Rugby to claim (as it affects to do) Lord Selborne.

But I may be content to be attacked for omissions when one of them is "the fact that Cardinal Newman nearly became a Wykehamist." If one had to mention not only every one who spent a year at Winchester, but also every one who might have spent a year there, if they had not spent it elsewhere, I fear that the History of Winchester would resolve itself into a catalogue of names, and if I were to obey your reviewer, a Catalogus Obscurorum Virorum.—I am, &c., 34, Elm-park-gardens:

ARTHUR F. LEACH.

July 8, 1899.

Mr. Silas Hocking's Popularity.

SIR,—Mr. Hocking's observations on my article call for a short reply.

He has misapprehended me, and if he reads the article again he will admit it. My statements were not applied "without qualification" to "the great body of Nonconformists." They were definitely limited to Dissenters "of the trading and industrial classes"—the "multitude" at which Mr. Hocking himself says he has aimed.

I am as well aware as Mr. Hocking that there is just as much artistic culture in Nonconformity as elsewhere. My acquaintance with Nonconformity is complete. I know it, as Mr. Hocking does, from the inside. I have lived in the very core of it during the most impressionable years of my life. Its traditions are part of me. I belong to the old Dissenting stock. The idea of Mr. Hocking, or even the President of the Wesleyan Conference, teaching me not to "misunderstand" Nonconformity is grotesque.

I quite agree with the author of Her Benny that "literature and the arts should know nothing of Episcopacy or Dissent." They should not; only they do. Mr. Hocking will not deny that the bulk of his public is a Dissenting public. To ignore that fact in analysing his position would therefore be absurd.—I am, &c.,

E. A. B.

Letters in Prison.

SIR,—Your reference last week to the prize poets of the Ohio State Penitentiary reminds me that among our own gaol-birds we have here and there a songster. Prison is a home of many talents, and it might be wished that the best of them had better cultivation. At the time that I was helping in the conduct of St. Paul's, a friend on the staff of a London prison sent me a selection of verses, grave and gay, written on their slates by convicts, and copied by a warder. I printed ten or twelve, which, if I may trust my memory, would compare not unfavourably with the ACADEMY's American specimens. To one of them a rather curious interest attached. The Home Secretary does not allow ladies to visit the "male side" of a prison, but at about this time exception was made in favour of a certain beautiful princess. The occupant of one of the cells she was shown into either knew or guessed at her identity, and the moment the lock was turned on him again, he left his loom, and wrote the princess a sonnet on his slate. I believe it was handed to her, on the slate, at the prison-gate. If it were not, I am pretty sure it is entombed in a back number of St. Paul's. You are, unhappily, right in saying that "the cultivation of letters is rare" in prison; but there are always exceptions. The last time I visited Wormwood Scrubs Prison, the chaplain, who is also the librarian, took me through the library, and I was surprised at the variety and the general excellence of its contents—fiction, poetry, history, science, travels, essays, and no tracts worth speaking of. I found even French and Spanish grammars and dictionaries, and some Pitman shorthand books. "Was there any demand for these?" I asked the chaplain. He assured me that two or three of his flock had, quite unassisted, mastered the rudiments of French and Spanish, that works on history and science were always more or less in use, and that a few of the prisoners had made themselves very fairly proficient in shorthand. I have always believed that in our English prisons the life of the intellect is under the saddest neglect. The Home Office, I fancy, is not unsympathetic on the subject; but it makes no appeal to the average prison governor, whom I have found the most courteous and the most unblushingly conservative official in any service in Europe.—I am, &c., TIGHE HOPKINS.

Maycot, Herne Bay: July 3, 1899.

Charles Darwin.

SIR,—I feel sure I may rely on your courtesy to allow me a brief reply to Dr. Walker's letter, since the point at issue between us appears to be rather in my use of the word "demonstration" than in any difference of scientific opinion.

Turning to Prof. Skeat's Etymological Dictionary I find the meaning of "demonstrate" is given as "to show, to explain fully." Had I put "memorable for the demonstration," &c., Dr. Walker's criticism would be upheld by many, if by no means all, exponents of scientific opinion.

In order to avoid raising in an epitaph this still debated question, I wrote instead, "memorable for his (i.e., Charles Darwin's) demonstration of the law of evolution"—there may be any number of others.

I may add, in conclusion, that, without my knowledge, the editor of Nature has seen fit to reprint my inscription from the ACADEMY in his notes of last week, which could hardly have occurred were the scientific phraseology unsound.—I am, &c.,

EDWIN CARDROSS.

22, Seymour-street, Portman-square, W.:

July 10, 1899.

"Man, Past and Present."

SIR,—May I ask for a little space in reply to the Reviewer, who now endeavours to fasten on me a charge of "vagueness and inconsistency" by a quotation in which the important words are omitted? Here is what I wrote, omissions now underlined: "Europe would appear to have been reached by two routes, first, in the Stone Ages, across the Mediterranean at several points, then round by Asia Minor and the Eurasian steppe, mainly in the early Metal Age, or in the period intermediate between the Neolithic and the Bronze Age, the Enolithic Period of Italian archaeologists. Both routes were followed by both types," &c. Where now is the "inconsistency"? The two routes here in question are those from North Africa in the early Stone Ages into Europe and into Asia. Then these primeval movements of the proto-Caucasians were followed after an immense interval—in the early Metal Age—by the comparatively recent migrations of the Teutons from the Eurasian steppe, and of the Kelts from Asia Minor, both being of Aryan speech before their appearance in Europe, but of two types, the former long-headed, the latter round-headed. This is the problem which I desire merely to have correctly stated, not discussed, in your columns.—I am, &c.,

A. H. KEANE.

Hampstead: July 10, 1899.

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 40.

THE late R. L. Stevenson, in one of his letters, thus drafted the opening of an imaginary story:

The notary, Jean Rossignol, had been summoned to the top of a great house in the Isle St. Louis to make a will; and now, his duties finished, wrapped in a warm roquelaure and with a lantern swinging from one hand, he issued from the mansion on his homeward way. Little did he think what strange adventures were to befall him!—

At this point it broke off. We asked our readers, last week, to narrate one of Rossignol's adventures.

The result has not been so exciting or interesting as we could have wished, and no romancers of high attainments have come to light. The most promising contribution is that of W. M. Ardagh, 23, Inverness-terrace, London, W., which runs as follows:

JEAN ROSSIGNOL'S ADVENTURE.

He is accosted by a man as M. le Notaire, and told he is awaited. He is taken to a house unknown to him. His companion gives a password, and he is shown into a room with two priests. From their exclamations of annoyance he gathers that he has been brought by mistake. On his declaring himself a notary, the elder priest suggests that he can do the required work. This is to draw up a deed of gift of Mlle. Marie Vallence in favour of the brotherhood of S. Jacques, on her taking the veil. Mlle. Marie is called to sign. Rossignol insists on explaining to her the technical language of the document. She refuses to sign and demands to see him alone. He affirms her legal right to do so. Marie confesses that she is in love, and asks Rossignol to help her escape. He denies that it is part of his legal duties. She scorns him and tells him that the wine on the table is drugged and intended for him. One priest returns. Marie forces him to drink. He becomes insensible. She takes his cloak and escapes, followed by Rossignol. He knows the password, and they reach the street. They are followed. Rossignol wounds the first pursuer, who has insulted Marie. They reach the quay and take refuge in the hold of a vessel. They are traced, and after an altercation with the captain the hold is searched, but a rat upsetting the lantern the party see nothing. The captain refuses to waste more time as he starts with the tide. The pursuers are turned off, and the fugitives are safe.

Among others are these:

SUMMARY OF JEAN ROSSIGNOL'S ADVENTURE.

A woman from a window above tells him that he will be stopped and questioned about the will. She asks if she is right in saying that in it M. D'Aubriot has left everything to Mlle. Germaine D'Aubriot, and that his sons, Michael and Paul, are only mentioned in the entail. He answers in the affirmative, on which she begs him when questioned to divide the fortune between the two brothers, giving Michael the larger sum on account of "the autumn of 1780." He is attacked as predicted, and answers as directed, upon which his capturer, who is Michael D'Aubriot, a notorious scoundrel, persists on his returning to drink to his success. He signals; Paul and other men appear, and all enter the house. The news is told. A lovely girl enters, and Rossignol recognises her as his instructress. She informs Michael that D'Aubriot is dead, and a tumult arises. Paul wishes the will immediately; but Michael, objecting to dead men's rooms at midnight, suggests that Rossignol shall repeat it. Overpowered by wine, Jean confuses names and sums and Michael detects treachery. Paul's terror betrays him. They rush at him. Germaine deluges the lamp with ale [!] and manages to escape with him; she lets him out at a side door, entrusting him with a scrap of paper to Count Keroova. He reads it by a lamp, as follows: "The gold is mine. Arnault is back. Save me. They will make me marry him.—GERMAINE." [G. M. W., Hull.]

THE NOTARY.

Summary.—The testator has four nephews: (1) François, (2) Gaspard, (3) Roger, (4) Fernand, married to Rossignol's daughter. Testator leaves all to his "second surviving nephew," so as to exclude François, and keep property together. François waylays Rossignol, compels him to divulge nature of will; Gaspard appears, brothers quarrel, François kills Gaspard, and is shot by police officer in self-defence.

"Mon Dieu!" ejaculated Rossignol, "how wonderful, how deeply interesting, and, ah, how beautifully complicated are the arrangements of Providence. François, Gaspard are alike its tools; my heart bleeds for the worthy Roger, who will do well, however, to submit to its decrees. All goes admirably well; still the old man's constitution is absurdly good, and the thing that happens is the unforeseen; if Providence had seen fit to give me earlier and fuller instructions as to its method of procedure, Marie need not have received so large a dot." Thus musing, our worthy Rossignol picked his steps gingerly across the Camargue with the air of a man who knew perfectly well that if he only succeeded in keeping his shoes clean, his hands, heart, brain, and conscience might be trusted to take care of themselves. Suddenly he stopped short. "Ah," he chuckled, "heaven is kind, my lantern is still alight, and—yes—I hear it—I hear the passing bell." [T. C., Buxted.]

JEAN ROSSIGNOL'S ADVENTURE.

He walked briskly for a few moments, then paused. The moon shone out suddenly, and in the shadow of the great Hôtel Lambert he saw a man crouching.

In those lawless days the Isle St. Louis and its neighbour, the Isle de la Cité, were dangerous places at night. Jean Rossignol knew that one reckless man would risk anything could he possess himself of the will just drawn up.

He looked behind him from time to time, and his stout heart quailed. He did not carry the will on his person, but he had a far more important document in a secret pocket next his heart.

He listened. There were footsteps—stealthy, hurried; he was followed.

His precious letter was worth more than life to him, and to the brightest star of the Court of France, the lady he worshipped from afar; in the hands of her enemies it meant ruin.

He hastily took the paper from his pouch, kissed it, tore it to atoms. Some he swallowed, the others he threw into the gutter and trampled them in the mire.

He was only just in time. Four ruffians fell upon him. He was bound hand and foot, gagged—helpless.

Next morning what was once the trim notary lay blood-stained and dazed on the Parvis Notre Dame, murmuring, "She is safe."

Jean Rossignol bore all his life the traces of his adventure on this terrible night.

[Mrs. F., Windlesham.]

Heavy hand on shoulder. "Follow me!" Rossignol led as though hypnotised to dark rock chamber. Dim figures seated round a flat stone. "We know contents of will. Dead man was one of us. To administer the trust properly you must also become a Vaurien." Horrible oaths. Notary stripped to waist. Branded with crossed daggers. "Now read the will!" "Messieurs, there is some mistake; the defunct left his fortune to the Bonnes Sœurs without let or hindrance." Upstart! "Traitor! he has deceived us! We cannot absolve you from your oath. You are now a Vaurien. All your goods and chattels are forfeit to the cause." Rossignol is despatched to the convent to cajole the Sisters to surrender half the dead man's fortune to fictitious relatives, supposed to be starving. Communion at convent. Old garden. White frocks. Lady Abbess is former friend of notary and dead man. Rossignol, having found legal flaw in oaths administered to him, tells her the "true truth." She affects compliance with wishes of Vaurien band. They proceed to allot money, prospectively, to propagation of dark secrets in which they are engaged. Rossignol employed continually as go-between. Brings dead man's strong-box to rock chamber. Opens it in presence of all the Vauriens. Terrible explosion! Bomb concealed in lock! All the Vauriens are killed. Rossignol escapes by a miracle and joins Lady Abbess, who has received from strange hand all the documents entitling convent to property.

[F. S., London.]

Replies received also from G. C. P., London; E. H., Ledbury; L. K., Highgate; J. F. H., London; H. G. H., Aldeburgh; J. D. A., Ealing.

Competition No. 41.

No really satisfactory poem on the strawberry exists. The present time gives such excellent opportunity for collecting material for such a poem that we make it the subject of this week's competition. For the best eulogy of the strawberry we offer a prize of one guinea. The poem must not exceed twenty-four lines in length; and if strawberries and cream are mentioned they must not be called "a dream."

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, July 18. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the second column of p. 72 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names—both Christian name and surname—and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon, or stamps for the same; otherwise the first to be looked at will alone be considered.

In a London Alley.

THE gay, strong flare and the long, loud laugh
Make the dingy street forlorn;
Blue-eyed, red-lipped, comes six-and-a-half
With empty jug round the corner.

The little bare shoulder gleams so bright,
While the red ragged petticoat flutters.
Ah! how shall the poor little soul keep white,
Dragged through these London gutters?

ADA B. BAKER.

Books Received.

Week ending Thursday, July 13.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- Galton (A.), The Message and Position of the Church of England (Kegan Paul) 3/6
 Pennington (Canon), The Counter-Reformation in Europe (Elphinstock) 2/6
 Field (the late F.), Notes on the Translation of the New Testament (University Press, Cambridge)
 Moulton (E. G.), Bible Stories (New Testament). The Modern Readers' Bible (Macmillan)
Beaurodige Woorden. Voorlezingen Voor De Vastenweken (S.P.C.K.)
Chilid Takwah Tshah Zit. Hymns in Takudh Language (S.P.C.K.)
Adas Lazi Be Lorn. Common Prayer in Nupé Language (S.P.C.K.)

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES-LETTRES.

- Longstaff (W. L.), Weeds and Flowers (Greening) 2/6
 Neilson (F.), Manabozo (Macquoen) 2/6
 Crowley (A.), Jephthah, and Other Mysteries (Kegan Paul) 7/6
 Campbell (Edited by J. Dykes), Coleridge's Poems. Facsimile Reproduction (A. Constable & Co.)
 Windle (B. C. A.), Shakespeare's Country (Methuen) 3/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- Cleminson (Emily), Passages from the Diaries of Mrs. Philip Lybbe Powys (Longmans) 18/0
 Lucas (Herbert), Fra Girolamo Savonarola (Sands)
 Roosevelt (Theodore), The Rough Riders (Kegan Paul)

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- Sharp (David), Insects. Part II. The Cambridge Natural History (Macmillan) net 17/0

EDUCATIONAL.

- Hall (H. S.), Stevens (F. H.), Elementary Course of Mathematics (Macmillan) 2/6
 Marchant (Edited by E. C.), Thucydides. Book VII. (Macmillan)
 Barnett (P. A.), Common Sense in Education and Teaching (Longmans) 6/0
 Byrde (Rev. R. A.), High Aims at School (Stock)
 More (P. E.), The Prometheus Bound of Æschylus (Boston: Houghton & Co.) 4/0
 Hill (Leonard), Manual of Human Physiology (Arnold)
 Briggs (W.), The Preceptors' Trigonometry (Clive) 2/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Chapman (S. J.), Local Government and State Aid (Swan Sonnenschein) 2/6
 Chance (W.), Our Treatment of the Poor (P. S. King) 2/6
 Garnett (Richard), Essays in Librarianship and Bibliography (Allen) 6/0
 Stuart (Alex.), Mr. Miggs (Sampson Low)
 Cundall (J. W.), London: a Guide (Greening) 7/6
The Book of Bands. A Scripture-form Story of Past and Present Times (Williams & Norgate) 3/6
Bulace, Ruedok, and the Valley of the Welsh Dee (Pewtress & Co.) 2/6

NEW EDITIONS.

- Kipling (Rudyard), Plain Tales from the Hills (Macmillan) 6/0
Life's Handicap (Macmillan) 6/0
 Welsh (R. E.), In Relief of Doubt (Bowden) 2/6
 Lyte (Sir H. C. Maxwell), History of Eton College (Macmillan)
The Roman Emperors. From the French of De Service (The Walpole Press)

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

Announcements.

THE next volume in Messrs. Gay & Bird's "Bibelots" will be The World of Books, by Leigh Hunt.

MESSRS. E. & H. LUMLEY will shortly sell by auction a selection of valuable documents from Bedgebury Mansion House. Among them are letters from Thackeray, Rogers, Hugo, Scott, Beaconsfield, and Gladstone.

* * * Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
4, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.<sup>11</sup>
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class
Printers and Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet
Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines
for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built
Machines for fast folding and covering 4, 16, 32, or 64-page
Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence
New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 6512. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS WANTED, at Prices affixed.—
"Snob and Gownsmen," 1829-30, £5.—"The Germ,"
1850, £2.—"Old Paris," 1878, £2.—"The Lover's Tale," 1833, £5.
—Borrow's "Wild Wales," 1862, £1.—Moore's "Alps in 1864," £2.
—Titmarsh's "Comic Tales," 1841, £5.—"Queen Mab," 1813, £7.
—"Alice in Wonderland," 1865, £2.—"Pauline: a Fragment,"
1838, £20. 2,000 Books Wanted at fancy prices. List free.
EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeking Work through the Press. Translation undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish. Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.,
68, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing in foreign languages.

MR. HENRY J. DRANE, Publisher,
Salisbury House, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, is prepared to consider MSS. for the coming season. Authors desirous of publishing on their own account can, by applying to
Mr. DRANE, receive fair treatment, and avoid all middlemen's profits and commissions. No fees charged for reading, &c.
Magazines and Periodicals published on a low commission.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY"

Can still be obtained separately, or the Complete
Set for 3s. 6d.

BEN JONSON.	JOHN MILTON.
JOHN KEATS.	WILLIAM COWPER.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.	CHARLES DARWIN.
TOM HOOD.	ALFRED, LORD
THOMAS GRAY.	TENNYSON.
ROBERT L. STEVENSON.	HENRY W. LONGFELLOW
SIR WALTER SCOTT.	ANDREW MARVELL.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.	ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.	THOMAS CARLYLE.
LEIGH HUNT.	PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.
LORD MACAULAY.	CHARLES DICKENS.
ROBERT SOUTHLEY.	JONATHAN SWIFT.
S. T. COLERIDGE.	WM. M. THACKERAY.
CHARLES LAMB.	WILLIAM B. AKE.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.	SIR RICHARD STEELE.
WALTER S. LANDOR.	ALEXANDER POPE.
SAMUEL PEPEY.	DOUGLAS JERROLD.
EDMUND WALLER.	FRANCIS BACON.
WILKIE COLLINS.	HENRIK IBSEN.

The Old Series of THE ACADEMY, which ended on October 1st, completed a volume.
The Index can be obtained gratis on application to the Publisher.

THE BEDGEBURY PAPERS.

Notice of an interesting Sale by Auction of a selection of Letters, Autographs, and Documents of a literary and historical character found in the mumnet chests removed from Bedgely Mansion House consequent on the disposal of the Estate by Mr. Philip Beresford Beresford-Hope.

MESSES. E. & H. LUMLEY beg to announce that they will hold a SALE by AUCTION at their ROOMS in ST. JAMES'S HOUSE, 22, St. James's Street, at an early date, of a quantity of Valuable and Interesting LITERARY and HISTORICAL PAPERS, including unpublished Letters of the Duke of Wellington and other Generals of the Peninsular War. Similar valuable Letters from Cabinet Ministers and other Political Personages, and from Thackeray, Crabbe, Rogers, Victor Hugo, Sir Walter Scott, and others.
Letters of Lord Palmerston, Geo. Canning, Lord Castlereagh, the Earl of Beaconsfield, W. E. Gladstone, Jefferson Davis, General Lee, and many other distinguished persons in the Political, Clerical, Literary, and Social ranks of a period early in the century up to 1860, a careful exclusion having been exercised of all Letters of living persons.

To be viewed two days before the Sale. The Catalogue may be had of Messrs. LUMLEY, the Auctioneers, of St. James's House, 22, St. James's Street, S.W.

ROYAL VICTORIA COLLEGE
(McGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL).

APPLICATIONS are invited for the position of WARDEN, or LADY PRINCIPAL in this Institution, which is to be opened in September as a Residential College for Women Students. Applicants should state experience, and also in what branch of University Study, if any, they would be prepared to Lecture or Teach.—For further information apply to the PRINCIPAL, McGill University, Montreal, Canada.

BOROUGH of DERBY.

MUNICIPAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the appointment of PRINCIPAL to the above College. Salary £500 per annum.
Further particulars can be obtained on application to the undesignated.

Applications must be sent in not later than Tuesday,
July 25th.

Cavassing in any form will be a disqualification.

WILLIAM COOPER, Honorary Secretary.

Derby, June 29th, 1899.

THE MARIA GREY TRAINING COL-
LEGE, Salisbury Road, Brondesbury, London, N.W.

A FULL COURSE OF TRAINING in preparation for the CAMBRIDGE TEACHERS' CERTIFICATE in the Theory
and Practice of Teaching is offered to Ladies who desire to become Teachers.
Kindergarten Teachers are also prepared for the Higher Certificate of the National Froebel Union. Junior Students are prepared for the Cambridge Higher Local Examinations.
Scholarships offered in all Divisions.

COLLEGE YEAR BEGINS SEPTEMBER 12th, 1899.

The Winkworth Hall of Residence for Twenty-one Students will be opened opposite the College in September, 1899.
Address Miss ALICE WOODS, Principal, The Maria Grey
Training College, Salisbury Road, Brondesbury, N.W.

DARWIN ON TRIAL at the OLD BAILEY.

By DEMOCRITUS. With an Appendix, JUDICIAL SCANDALS, showing Mrs. Grundy's Attempt to interfere with the Publication of Scientific Works at the end of the Nineteenth Century. Dedicated to the Right Honble.
the Home Secretary. Bound in cloth, post free, 3s.

THE UNIVERSAL ILLUSION of FREE-WILL and CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY. By

A. HAMON, Professor in the New University of Brussels. A most valuable Contribution to the Literature on the all-absorbing Question of Determinism and Free-Will. Post free, 3s. 6d.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, Limited, Watford, London.

JUST READY,

THE AMBITIONS OF ST. PAUL. By Rev.

W. GARRETT HORDER.

CONTENTS: Concerning Ambition—Three, not One
—The First Ambition—The Second Ambition—The Third Ambition.

"This little book is laden with many a precious thought."—Christian Age.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d., post free.

CONVICTED OF HEROISM. A Tale of

John Penry, Martyr, 1559—1593. By HERBERT
M. WHITE, B.A. Illustrated by Frank H.
Simpson.

"Ought to have a large sale in our schools and churches."—A. E. HUTTON, Esq., M.P.

London: 21 & 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, E.C.

"THE ACADEMY"

LITERARY COMPETITIONS.

No. 41.

All readers attempting this week's Competition (described fully on page
71) must cut out this Coupon
and enclose it with their reply.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months,
and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS
of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON (Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING
PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

LONDON LIBRARY,
ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P., the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON, HERBERT
SPENCER, Esq.; the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.K., D.C.L.

TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon.
Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year: Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room Open from 10 till half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

O. T. HAGERBERG WRIGHT, LTD.,

Secretary and Librarian.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on
DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. ON CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £1.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows Interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

A THIN COCOA.

EPPS'S

The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.
Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it trade-man, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.
Erss & Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.

COCOA
ESSENCE

CATALOGUES.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT
of LITERATURE.

No. 587, just published.

CONTAINING THE USUAL GOOD SELECTION OF

SECOND-HAND BOOKS, MANY IN CHOICE LIBRARY
BINDINGS.Sent post free from HENRY SOTHERAN & Co., Booksellers, 140, Strand, W.C.: or 37, Piccadilly, W.WILLIAMS & NOBGEATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.
4, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application

DULAU &amp; CO., 37, BOND SQUARE, LONDON, W.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class
Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet
Street, E.C.4, have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines
for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built
Machines for fast folding and covering 3, 16, 24, or 32-page
Journals at one operation.Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence
New Journals.Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 6512. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS OUT-OF-PRINT SUPPLIED

—Please state wants. Catalogues free. We offer
"CASSELL'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA DICTIONARY," 14 Vols.,
New, 30s. pub. 27s. WANTED, "SOLDIERS THREE,"
1888. HOLLAND Co., Book Merchants, Birmingham.BOOKS WANTED, & Prices affixed.
—"Snob and Gossamer," 1839-30, £5.—"The Germ,"
1850, £2.—"Old Paris," 1878, £2.—"The Lover's Tale," 1833, £5.
—"Borrows' Wild Wales," 1862, £1.—"Moore's Alps in 1864," £3.
—"Titmarsh's Comic Tales," 1841, £5.—"Queen Mab," 1813, £7.
—"Alice in Wonderland," 1865, £2.—"Pauline: a Fragment,"
1833, £20. 2,000 Books Wanted at fancy prices. List free.
EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.AMATEUR AUTHORS, and all Literary People, desiring to REACH THE PUBLIC in the best possible way, should write to "MAGAZINE," L. H. Woods & Co., 11, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish. Apply, by letter, to D. O. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street, London, E.C.TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO., 68a, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing in foreign languages.THE LONDON COMMERCIAL OFFICES of SHORTHAND and TYPE-WRITING.—Special terms for large quantities. MSS. carefully typed. Translations, Legal and General Copying. Lady Clerks received and trained for office routine. Appointments obtained for same.— Address 116 and 117, Holborn, E.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

"THE ACADEMY"

LITERARY COMPETITIONS.

No. 42.

*All readers attempting this week's Competition (described fully on page
95) must cut out this Coupon
and enclose it with their reply.*ROYAL VICTORIA COLLEGE (McGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL).APPLICATIONS are invited for the position of WARDEN, or LADY PRINCIPAL, in this Institution, which is to be opened in September as a Residential College for Women Students. Applicants should state experience, and also in what branch of University Study, if any, they would be prepared to Lecture or Teach.—For further information apply to the PRINCIPAL, McGill University, Montreal, Canada.TECHNICAL COLLEGE, HUDDERSFIELD.

PRINCIPAL—S. Q. RAWSON, D.Sc.

The LECTURESHIP in ART is VACANT. Salary, £250 per annum. Applications must be sent in not later than August 31st, to the PRINCIPAL. Statement of duties will be forwarded on application.

T. THORP, Secretary.

SUNDERLAND SCHOOL OF ART.
WANTED, on September 4th, a FIRST ASSISTANT MASTER for DESIGN and GENERAL WORK. Opportunities for study. Salary, £80 per annum.—Particulars from HEAD MASTER.

UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW.

CHAIR OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

The University Court of the University of Glasgow will in the month of October proceed to APPOINT a PROFESSOR to occupy the above Chair in this University, recently rendered vacant.The Professor will be required to enter on his duties from 1st October next, from which date the appointment will take effect.The normal salary of the Chair is £1,000, subject to §VIII. (2) and (3) of Ordinance 25. The Chair has an official residence attached to it.The appointment is made ad vitam et culmen, and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, who will furnish any further information desired, twenty copies of his application and twenty copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit, on or before 15th September next.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,

Secretary to the Glasgow University Court.

91, West Regent Street, Glasgow.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—An EXAMINA-TION for FILLING-UP about THIRTY VACANCIES
on the Foundation will be held on the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 11th SEPTEMBER NEXT.
For information apply to the Bursar of St. Paul's School,
West Kensington.ENGINEERING AND CHEMISTRY.
CITY and GUILDS OF LONDON
INSTITUTE.

SESSION, 1899-1900.

The Courses of Instruction at the Institute's CENTRAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE (Exhibition Road) are for Students not under 16 years of age; those at the Institute's TECHNICAL COLLEGE, FINSBURY, for Students not under 14 years of age. The Entrance Examinations to both Colleges are held in September, and the Sessions commence in October. Particulars of the Entrance Examinations, Scholarships, Fees, and Courses of Study, may be obtained from the respective Colleges, or from the Head Office of the Institute, Gresham College, Basinghall Street, E.C.CITY and GUILDS CENTRAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE.

(EXHIBITION ROAD, S.W.)

A College for higher Technical Instruction for Students not under 16 preparing to become Civil, Mechanical, or Electrical Engineers, Chemical and other Manufacturers, and Teachers. Fees for a full Associatehip Course, £25 per Session. Professors:—
Civil and Mechanical Engineering.—W. C. UNWIN,
F.R.S., M.Inst.C.E.Electrical Engineering.—W. E. AYTON, F.R.S., Past Pres. Inst. E.E.Chemistry.—H. E. ARMSTRONG, Ph.D., LL.D., F.R.S.,
Dean of the College for the Session.Mechanics and Mathematics.—O. HERBERT, Ph.D., LL.D., F.R.S.CITY and GUILDS TECHNICAL COLLEGE, FINSBURY.

(LEONARD STREET, CITY ROAD, E.C.)

Provides Courses of Intermediate Instruction for Day
Students not under 14 years of age, preparing to enter Engineering and Chemical Industries. Fees, £15 per Session. Professors:—Physics and Electrical Engineering.—S. P. THOMP-SON, D.Sc., F.R.S. (Principal of the College).Mechanical Engineering and Mathematics.—W. E.
DALBY, M.A., B.Sc., M.I.M.E.

Chemistry.—R. MELDOLA, F.R.S., F.I.C.

JOHN WATNEY, Hon. Secretary.

City and Guilds of London Institute,
Gresham College, Basinghall Street, E.C.CITY and GUILDS OF LONDON INSTITUTE.

ASSISTANT PROFESSOR IN ENGINEERING.

The Committee of the Institute are prepared to receive Applications for the Appointment of ASSIST-ANT PROFESSOR in the Department of Civil and
Mechanical Engineering at the City and Guilds Central Technical College. Salary, £500 per annum.Particulars and terms of the Appointment may be had on application to the HONORARY SECRETARY, City
and Guilds of London Institute, Gresham College, Basinghall Street, London, E.C.BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

BURLINGTON HOUSE, LONDON, W.

The NEXT ANNUAL MEETING of the ASSO-CIATION will be held at DOVER, commencing on WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1899.

PRESIDENT-ELECT:

Prof. SIR MICHAEL FOSTER, K.C.B., M.D., D.C.L., LL.D., Sec.R.S.Notice of Papers proposed to be read should be sent to the Office, Burlington House, W.Information about local arrangements may be obtained from the Local Secretaries, Castle Hill House, Dover.

G. GRIFFITH, Assistant General Secretary.

THE DAVY FARADAY RESEARCH LABORATORY OF THE ROYAL INSTI-TUTION.

DIRECTORS:

The Right Hon. LORD RAYLEIGH, M.A., D.C.L.,
LL.D., F.R.S.

Professor DEWAR, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S.

SUPERINTENDENT OF THE LABORATORY:

Dr. ALEXANDER SCOTT, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S.

This Laboratory, founded by Dr. Ludwig Mond F.R.S., as a Memorial of Davy and Faraday for the purpose of promoting original research in Pure and Physical Chemistry, will be open during the following Terms:—Michaelmas Term.—Monday, October 2, to Saturday, December 16. Leam Term.—Monday, January 8, to Saturday, April 7. Easter Term.—Monday, April 30, to Saturday, July 28.Under the Deed of Trust, workers in the Laboratory are entitled, free of charge, to Gas, Electricity, and Water, as far as available, and, at the discretion of the Directors, to the use of the apparatus belonging to the Laboratory, together with such materials and chemicals as may be authorised.All persons desiring to be admitted as workers, must send evidence of scientific training, qualification, and previous experience in original research, along with a statement of the nature of the investigation they propose to undertake.(Candidates must apply for admission during the course of the preceding term.)Forms of application can be had from the ASSISTANT SECRETARY, Royal Institution, Albemarle Street, W.UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF NORTH WALES (BANGOR).

SESSION 1899-1900 will open on TUESDAY,

OCTOBER 3.

DEPARTMENTS OF PHYSICS, CHEMISTRY, and BIOLOGY.

PHYSICS	Prof. A. GRAY, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S. Assistant Lecturers and Demonstra- tors:—T. C. BAILEY, M.A., B.Sc., and E. TAYLOR JONES, D.Sc.
CHEMISTRY	Prof. J. J. DOBBIE, M.A., D.Sc. Assistant Lecturer and Demonstrator, F. MARSDEN, M.Sc., Ph.D. (Heidel- berg).
BIOLOGY	Botany—Prof. R. W. PHILLIPS, M.A., D.Sc. Assistant Lecturer and Demon- strator, J. LLOYD WILLIAMS. Zoology—Prof. PHILIP J. WHITE, M.B., F.R.S.E.

The Classes and Laboratory Courses of this College are arranged to suit the requirements of Students of Practical Science, as well as of Students preparing for University and other Examinations. The Lectures in Chemistry, Physics, Botany, and Zoology are recognised by the Universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow as qualifying for the Medical Degrees of those Universities. One Annuus Medicus may be taken at this College.The extensive Laboratories (Physical, Chemical, and Biological) are fully equipped for Study and Research, and in the Physical Department special provision has been made for the teaching of Electrical Engineering. A Special Course has been arranged in this subject.

Inclusive Tuition Fee, £11 ls.

LABORATORY FEES (per Term)

on the scale of £1 ls. for six hours a week, in each Department.A considerable number of Scholarships and Exhibitions are open for competition at the beginning of each Session, and several are awarded at the close of each Session on the result of the year's work.For full information as to Science and Arts Courses, apply for Prospectus to the Secretary and Registrar,
J. E. LLOYD, M.A.DAUNISEY AGRICULTURAL SCHOOL,
WEST LAVINGTON.

APPOINTMENT OF HEAD MASTER.

The Governors of the School invite applications for the Head Mastership of the Daunisey Agricultural School, which will be vacated by Christmas next, and the new Head Master will be required to commence his duties on the 1st day of January, 1900.In addition to the ordinary qualifications, applicants must be qualified in Science as applied to Agriculture.
Applications will be received up to the 1st day of August next, and all applicants must state their age,
previous experience, and qualifications for the post.

For particulars of duties and emoluments apply to

JOSEPH T. JACKSON,

Clerk to the Governors, Fe-zrs.

30th June, 1899.

SELECTIONS FROM ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 6s. each, post free.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.....full of thought and knowledge and power."

British Weekly.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

"Forceful, clear, gracious, and suggestive."

Presbyterian.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."

New York Observer.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."

Methodist Times.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."

North British Daily Mail.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d., post free.

ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN. Containing over 500 beautiful and suggestive illustrations. With a Textual Index and Alphabetical List of Subjects.

"Gems from a prince of illustrators."—Freeman.

Just Published. Price 4d., or 3s. per dozen.

RELIGIOUS EQUALITY. A Lecture by Dr. MACLAREN.

Just Published. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Royton.

The Freeman says: "Preachers and teachers will find in them many helpful suggestions." The Glasgow Herald says: "They will probably interest and instruct many who would an ordinary sermon flee."

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Spiritual Principle of Nonconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.

"Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence."—Manchester Guardian.
"Nothing could be more timely than these learned and suggestive lectures."—Christian World.

Twenty-first Thousand. Limp cloth, price 6d., post free.

OUR PRINCIPLES: a Congregationalist Church Manual. By G. B. JOHNSON.

Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CONDUCT of PUBLIC MEETINGS. By J. HUNT COOKE. A Clear and Concise Manual for all Public Speakers.

Just Published. Post 8vo, cloth, with Portraits, price 6s., post free.

WELSHMEN in ENGLISH PULPITS; or, Sermons by English Congregational Ministers from Wales. With Introduction by Rev. CHARLES A. BERRY, D.D. Edited by Rev. DANIEL WATERS.

The Expository Times says: "And here we have thirty excellent portraits of prominent and eloquent Congregational preachers, with their thirty sermons, and the price is but a few shillings."

London: 21 & 22, Fumival Street Holborn, E.C.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

CHAPTER I.

The Old and the New Mediterranean Trade—The Pioneer Steamship—Arrival at Marseilles—The Cholera—Origin of the Crimean War—French Hilarity succeeded by Disappointment.

CHAPTER II.

The Passage to Constantinople—Reminiscences of Antiquity—Ashore in the Dardanelles—Disinterested Kindness of Suleyman Pasha—Constantinople and its Surroundings—The Passage to the Crimea—The Seaports and the Battlegrounds—Starvation at the English Camp—French Economy and Hospitality.

CHAPTER III.

The Mistake of the Allies in Making their Landing—The Commencement of the Siege and the Misery attending it—Another Passage from Marseilles—Narrow Escape from Foundering in a Gale—Arrival at Kamiesh—The Monastery of St. George.

CHAPTER IV.

The American and the French Cuisine—A Trip to the Sea of Azof—Contrasted Scenes of Peace and War—Vandalism of the Allies at Kertch—Trading with a Pasha—The Unsuccessful Attack on Sebastopol—Panic at Kamiesh and Balaklava—Return to Marseilles—Trip to Algeria.

CHAPTER V.

Return Again to the Crimea—Ravages of Disease in the Camps—French Transport System compared with Ours in the Civil War—The Sisters of Charity—The Capture of the Malakoff and Redan—A View of the Ruins—Bombproof Female Curiosity.

CHAPTER VI.

Entering the Turkish Service—The Turk a Man of his Word—Good Pay and Little Work—Our Philosophic Chief Officer—The Pasha's Bedclothes—His Friendship—No Use for a Propeller.

CHAPTER VII.

Hafiz Effendi and his Harem.

CHAPTER VIII.

Mustapha Pasha Wide Awake—We are Hurried Off to Eupatoria—A Rescue in the Black Sea—A British Frigate comes to our Aid—Arrival at Eupatoria.

CHAPTER IX.

The Blunder of a British General—A Post-Mortem held by Mr. Sears and Some of his Religious Ideas—The End of the War and Comments on its Results.

By Capt. CODMAN.

Frontispiece. 198 p.p. Price 3s. 6d.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW BOOK.

Now ready, in paper cover, illustrated, price 1s.

THE BINKS FAMILY.

"Described with all the skill to which we are accustomed in her pen."—Daily Telegraph.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

NOW READY.

A RATIONAL MARRIAGE. By FLORENCE MARRYAT.

BONNIE MAGGIE LAUDER. By

ALAN ST. AUBYN, Author of "A Fellow of Trinity," &c.

SAROLTA'S VERDICT: a Romance.

By E. YOLLAND, Author of "In Days of Strife," &c.

HENRY MASSINGER. By Mrs.

ROBERT JOCELYN (the Hon. Mrs. JOCELYN), Author of "Lady Mary's Experience," "Only a Horse Dealer," &c.

THE GODS SAW OTHERWISE.

By F. H. MELL.

BELLING the CAT. By Perrington PRIMM.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW,

No. 379—JULY, 1899.—8vo, 6s.

CONTENTS.

I. INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION in IRELAND.—II. THE NOVELS of FERDINAND FABRE.—III. MONTESQUIEU in ITALY.—IV. THE ART of DINING.—V. MODERN MYSTICISM.—VI. THE HOLY SEPULCHRE.—VII. BANKING.—VIII. THE RIFLE.—IX. THE SCOTTISH CHURCHES.—X. THE PHILIPPINES and their FUTURE.—XI. THE AMERICAN COLONIES in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.—XII. MRS. OLIPHANT'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.—XIII. CLIMATE and COLONISATION.

London: JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

DARWIN on TRIAL at the OLD BAILEY.

By DEMOCRITUS. With an Appendix, JUDICIAL SCANDALS and ERRORS, showing Mrs. Grundy's Attempt to interfere with the Publication of Scientific Work at the end of the Nineteenth Century. Dedicated to the Right Hon. the Home Secretary. Bound in cloth, post free, 2s.

THE UNIVERSAL ILLUSION of FREE-WILL and CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY. By A. HAMON, Professor in the New University of Brussels. A most valuable Contribution to the Literature on the all-absorbing Question of Determinism and Free-Will. Post free, 3s. 6d.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, Limited, Watford, London.

JUST READY,

THE AMBITIONS of ST. PAUL. By Rev. W. GARRETT HORDER.

CONTENTS: Concerning Ambition—Three, not One—The First Ambition—The Second Ambition—The Third Ambition.

"This little book is laden with many a precious thought."—Christian Age.

"It is full of freshness and suggestion."

Sunday School Chronicle.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d., post free.

CONVICTED OF HEROISM. A Tale of John Penry, Martyr, 1559—1593. By HERBERT M. WHITE, B.A. Illustrated by Frank H. Simpson.

"Excellent, unusual grasp of events, nobility of ideal, vividness, and grace of style."

Rev. ARCHIBALD DUFF, D.D.

"Ought to have a large sale in our schools and churches."—A. E. HUTTON, Esq., M.P.

London: 21 & 22, Fumival Street, Holborn, E.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1420. Established 1869.

22 July, 1899.

Price Threepence
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE statement that Mr. George Alexander was unwilling to risk the loss that so often follows the production of blank verse drama, and had, therefore, indefinitely shelved Mr. Stephen Phillips's play "Paolo and Francesca," has quickly been denied. Mr. Alexander declares himself a believer in the dramatic success of Mr. Phillips's tragedy, and states his intention of performing it as soon as other arrangements make it possible. Mr. Phillips, we may add, is still at work in adding touches here and there; but, as it stands, the drama is pronounced by good judges to be very noteworthy.

EVERY copy of the new edition of Mr. Kipling's Prose Works which Messrs. Macmillan are now issuing bears the little "trade mark" which we reproduce. The swastika, or fylfot, over the signature, is an emblem of good fortune, and is one of the oldest forms of ornament.

ARRANGEMENTS for a new London daily paper at a penny are now in active preparation. It is to be Liberal in politics, there is much money at its back, and illustrations are to be a regular feature.

THE latest little Irish book to appear—and during the present "revival" there have been many—is Idyls of Killowen, or "A Soggarth's Secular Verses," by the Rev. Matthew Russell, brother of Lord Russell of Killowen, the Lord Chief Justice, to whom the book is dedicated. A soggarth, it must, perhaps, be explained, is a priest. Subsequently Father Russell will reprint his serious poems under the title Vespers and Complines. To defend his spelling of "Idyl," Father Russell claims that the analogy of "label" from labellum, "libel" from libellus, "metal" from metallum, and "pupil" from pupillus, should be sufficient.

At the end of Father Russell's book, which is issued by Mr. Bowden, we find a pamphlet containing particulars of other of Mr. Bowden's publications, together with portraits of their authors and biographical information. That is nothing new; the novelty in this compilation is the analysis of readers likely to be interested in each of Mr. Bowden's books. Thus one book must be shunned by readers who dislike levity; another will appeal to readers of Drummond's Natural Law in the Spiritual World; a third (by Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne) calls for perusal from "every lover of Stevenson and Mr. Kipling"; a fourth is for the general reader; a fifth must not be touched by members of the Society of Friends and the Peace Society; a sixth (by Mr. Joseph Hocking) will be voted by school-boys "as good as Stanley Weyman or Conan Doyle." Mr. Bowden has clearly been at much pains to classify his works, but he has yet to learn that comparisons are odious.

ON page 94 of this issue will be found several poems in praise of the strawberry, written in connexion with our prize competition. Hitherto the fruit has been neglected by the poets: possibly they think it is poem enough in itself. But, as one of the competitors reminds us, Mr. Henley has sung its praises, although only incidentally. In his ballade, "Made in the Hot Weather" (that wonderful catalogue of coolnesses), he writes:

Of ice and glass the tinkle,
Pellucid, silver-shrill;
Peaches without a wrinkle;
Cherries and snow at will
From china bowls that fill
The senses with a sweet
Incuriousness of heat;
A melon's dripping shreds;
Cream-clotted strawberries;
Dusk dairies set with curds—
To live, I think of these!

And he has a strawberry rondeau too.

THE portrait below is the latest that has been taken of M. Jules Verne. Had we appended no name, how many of our readers, we wonder, could have identified the likeness? Indeed, there are many persons who are unaware that Jules Verne still lives. The romancist is now seventy-one. But a life of almost Spartan simplicity has ensured him an old age of extraordinary vigour and faculties undimmed. He still produces his one or two stories a year, which boys are reading both in France and England with the avidity that we ourselves, when at school, kept for them. At the present moment the Boys' Own Paper is printing a new Jules Verne serial. May it have many successors!

M. JULES VERNE.

APPROPOS of the picture of Mr. Guy Boothby, seated in his armchair, dictating a new novel to a phonograph, which we printed last week, we have received the following lines from a correspondent, R. M. :

The old order passes, the new order comes,
And Fiction to-day as a trade simply "hums,"
So that Grub Street's inhabitants, once on the rates,
Are now to be found at their country estates.
The public, who pay, name the tunes of their choice,
And the novelist-merchant, by heeding their voice,
By pouring his tales in the phonograph's ear
At the rate of four six-shilling thrillers a year,
And by trusting to Watt (who is Muse number ten)
Attains the ideal of good business men :
A mansion (by Maple) with everything fitting,
And once every week a photographer's sitting.
Meanwhile, from the humanist's studious work
The public turn off with intolerant smirk.

Do I blame? Not a morsel. These impotent rhymes
Are merely to notice a sign of the times.
Nor do I presume to suggest which is greater :
George Meredith—King, or Guy Boothby—Dictator.

THE fashion for buying books in hundreds is spreading. Messrs. Bell & Sons are now offering the public the privilege of picking one hundred volumes from the catalogue of Bohn's Libraries in return for twelve monthly payments of a guinea each; or fifty volumes for seven monthly payments of a guinea each. In addition to the Bohns they present a copy of Webster's Dictionary.

It looks as though the Cowper Centenary may be a failure. The people of Olney, it seems, view its celebration entirely without enthusiasm, and decline to consider the proposal to acquire the poet's house. Mr. Thomas Wright, of Olney, Cowper's biographer, who is the chief mover in the matter, has been trying to convince his fellow townsmen that their duty is to purchase the house, and, letting the rest of it, keep the poet's parlour sacred to his memory. With the house should be preserved the garden and Cowper's summer-house, and all this should be accomplished by April 25, 1900, the hundredth anniversary of Cowper's death. We quite agree, but the word is largely with Olney.

M. JULES CLARETIE's paper on Shakespeare and Molière, which he read at the Lyceum last week, has, we are glad to note, been secured for the Fortnightly Review. It was too good to be heard once imperfectly in a theatre, and then no more. Among M. Claretie's obiter dicta were these :

Shakespeare is far more difficult to appreciate in France than Molière in England.

Cassio's speech on drink is the greatest temperance oration ever delivered. Shakespeare ought to be made honorary president of every teetotaler's association.

The women of Shakespeare are models of grace and beauty. The shrewd, practical, clever women of Molière are made to be married.

When Voltaire said that Hamlet was the dream of a drunken savage, that only showed how foolish clever people are. But Voltaire's attack directed attention to Shakespeare's works. Gounod once said, when he heard one of his pieces being played on a barrel-organ : "One can only reach popularity through calumny."

Amid all the inquietudes ranging on the horizon, the eternal Shakespeare is associating, by his masterpieces, the public of England and France. Shakespeare, though long dead, mobilises the soldiers of art who are moving forward to fight for his glory. Nothing is greater, more beautiful, or noble than the art which brings nations together, and stretches its majesty over all quarrels as the sun shines over the conflicts of every day; and as the sun shines for all men, so is art the same for all nations, and a man's genius the great reservoir of human peace.

THIS is the Introduction to Zola's new novel, "Fécondité," prefixed to the opening chapters in L'Aurore, where the story is now running :

"Fécondité" is a study, drama, and poem at the same time. It celebrates and glorifies the achievements of a numerous family. Around the central character, who knows how to love and to will, to work and to create, in the midst of a constantly growing family, Zola has grouped more than fifty subordinate personages of the opposite kind, bad and decadent representatives of the modern social-economic order—men and women who carry death and dissolution with them in the lives of Malthusianism, in the terrible mortality of children.

"Fécondité" is the history of the dissolution of the capitalistic industrial system, the history of fatal and deadly poverty; it is the picture of social hell, the result of social injustice, which inevitably entails the ruin of country and humanity.

It is impossible to create a more impressive and striking drama than that contained in Zola's tale of two deliberate murderers, who are depicted in a series of marvellous scenes. At the same time it is difficult to conceive of a more reassuring, more inspiring, and elevating poem than is given here. In the pages of this novel, full of joy and charm, there is the triumphant song of the all-conquering family—the family which conquers by virtue of its numbers, which brings to the country and humanity the hope of to-morrow, health, joy, indomitable energy, in the interest of the coming society and for the erection of justice and truth.

It now seems to be a definite rule that two books of a kind shall always be published together. To give a concrete example, The Life and Letters of Sir John Everett Millais, upon which Mr. J. G. Millais has been engaged for a long time, is to be published in September, in two volumes which are likely to cover the ground pretty thoroughly. But none the less we are promised also Sir John Everett Millais: His Art and Influence, by Mr. A. L. Baldry. The two books will differ considerably, of course: one takes the man and his art together, and the other the artist only; and yet some confusion between them is probably inevitable.

AN intermediary between ourselves and posterity has arisen in the person of a country clergyman, who, through the medium of his parish magazine, circulates the following appeal: "The ancient oak chest belonging to the parish has been restored and placed in the schoolroom. It is over 200 years old. If any parishioners have books or articles of public interest which they would like to give to the parish, and hand down to posterity, they will be welcomed by the rector and churchwardens, and deposited in the chest."

ANOTHER unique English collection has passed into the possession of America. Mr. D. C. Heath, the Boston publisher, has purchased the library of children's books and educational works issued by the house of Newbery from 1740 to 1800, which was brought together by Mr. Charles Welsh when he was writing the biography of John Newbery—Oliver Goldsmith's friend and publisher. The collection is now being catalogued and arranged. It contains many unique treasures, and forms an instructive object-lesson in the evolution of children's literature and of the school-book.

BATH has just erected a memorial to the great Beau Nash. It takes the form of a tablet on the wall of "The Garrick's Head," an old inn on the Sawclose, which is supposed to have been the Beau's house.

WE give this week a portrait of Prof. Saintsbury, with whose Monograph on Matthew Arnold the new series of "Modern English Writers" has just begun. Prof.

MR. GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

From the Copyright series of Portraits of Contributors to the "Encyclopædia Britannica"

George Edward Bateman Saintsbury, who is the present holder of the chair of Rhetoric and English Literature at Edinburgh, will be fifty-four this year. Few men can have reviewed more books than he, and for few critics do so many other critics lie in wait. The notices of the Matthew Arnold monograph now appearing in different quarters offer copious illustration to the point. Prof. Saintsbury was one of the stalwarts of the old Saturday Review.

To the penny reprints of Scots classics which the Peterhead Sentinel issues, have now been added selections from the Poems and Songs of Robert Tannahill, the weaver poet. His music is as sweet as ever it was. No one writes like this to-day :

She's modest as ony, and blithe as she's bonny ;
For guileless simplicity marks her its ain ;
And far be the villain divested of feeling,
Wha'd blight in its bloom the sweet flow'r o' Dunblane.
Sing on, thou sweet mavis, thy hymn to the e'ening,
Thou'rt dear to the echoes of Calderwood glen ;
Sae dear to this bosom, sae artless and winning,
Is charming young Jessie, the flow'r o' Dunblane.

And again :

How lost were my days till I met wi' my Jessie,
The sports o' the city seem'd foolish and vain,
I ne'er saw a nymph I would ca' my dear lassie,
Till charmed with sweet Jessie, the flow'r o' Dunblane.
Though mine were the station o' loftiest grandeur,
Amidst its profusion I'd languish in pain ;
And reckon as naething the height o' its splendour,
If wanting sweet Jessie, the flow'r o' Dunblane.

ANOTHER of the week's reprints is Leigh Hunt's World of Books, and Other Essays, in Messrs. Gay & Bird's tiny "Bibelot" series. Leigh Hunt's happy fancy and genial bibliolatriy are as well suited for a pocket volume as anything is. A booklover on a Sunday morning might without sin slip this little tome in his pocket in place of his manual of devotion. Turning its pages we come on good sentiment after good sentiment, all most prettily turned, and this old favourite :

Jenny kissed me when we met,
Jumping from the chair she sat in ;
Time, you thief ! who love to get Sweets into your list, put that in.
Say I'm weary, say I'm sad,
Say that health and wealth have missed me,
Say I'm growing old, but add,
Jenny kissed me.

Jenny was Jane Welsh Carlyle.

WE are still waiting for the new satirist, but meanwhile, for our sustenance until the true censor comes, we are offered Nero ; or, the Trials, Battles, and Adventures of the Sixth Emperor of Rome in Darkest Hades. The work is described as an allegory, a satire, and a moral ; it is in blank verse ; the publishers are Messrs. Downey ; the length is more than 10,000 lines ; and the author is Mr. Horatio Hunt. This gentleman figures in the frontispiece in fancy dress. The poem is supposed to be the work of Nero himself ; but it is a Nero chastened and humiliated by his surroundings. Incidentally Nero visits Mars, and both Sir Robert Ball and Mr. H. G.

Wells should be interested in his comments on that luminary:

'Tis full of huge volcanoes, and contains More water than the earth. The forms of life
Inhabiting this planet chiefly are
Of an amphibious kind, of monstrous size.
All sorts of Saurian reptiles crawl about Upon its banks; whilst here and there I saw
A huge rhinoceros or winged beast
With several heads; but human creatures there
Were none; nor any form akin to man.
The heat was most intense; and though I was Not clothed with flesh, yet I distinctly felt
Th' oppression of the sultry atmosphere.
A flight of vultures now and then would soar
Above our heads, and then on some remote
And lofty cliff would perch. The thundering sound,
Caused by the terrible volcanic fires,
Was louder than the everlasting roar
Of Vulcan's furnace; whilst the constant streams
Of lava, which the mountains belched, one half
The globe did darken! This accounts for that Peculiar reddish colour which doth make
The planet Mars conspicuous. The rays,
That fall directly from the sun upon
That world, are greatly modified in their Intensity of brightness by the fogs,
And smoke, and sultry firmament, with which
It is encompassed.

The industry which went to manufacture this amazing book we cannot sufficiently admire.

A LITTLE while ago we printed an article in which the apparent impossibility of at the same time writing about Dickens and maintaining perfect accuracy was illustrated. And now comes "Pickwickiensis" with a long indictment, in the St. James's Gazette, of Mr. Lang's inaccuracies in his introduction to the Pickwick Papers in the Gadshill Edition. But we cannot take Mr. Lang's critic as seriously as he takes him himself. Indeed, Mr. Lang's humour is at the bottom of the attack, as this extract will denote:

XV. Of the "Bill Stumps" incident, the Editor [Mr. Lang] says that the Brough stone was deciphered as Runic before it was discovered to be Greek—and even part was interpreted: "O Boy, none regretted thee more than those who prematurely buried thee." Incredible as it may seem, the Editor here detects an allusion to the Fat Boy! "as if a natural mistake had been made in the case of the Fat Boy," who was not "lamented" or "prematurely buried," and had nothing to do with the business.

Poor Mr. Lang! And in the Pall Mall Magazine Mr. Henley is also at him, and well home.

Bibliographical.

A WELL-KNOWN writer, it is said, has written for a leading London theatre a comedy in rhymed heroic verse. I doubt very much if this announcement will arouse anything approaching to ecstasy in the bosom of the average playgoer. He gets blank verse in his Shakespeare, of course; but, owing to the way in which it is recited, is scarcely conscious of it. As for rhymed verse (save for its occasional appearances in our acted "Bard") it has dropped out even of the theatrical burlesques—a sphere in which, in the old days, it used to flourish. Of course we shall see what we shall see, but certain it is that the present-day theatregoer is not predisposed favourably to rhymed verse on the stage. Bulwer Lytton made an experiment of this sort in his "Walpole," a three-act comedy which was published in 1869, but has not, I think, been reprinted or publicly performed. For myself, I cannot imagine any audience being satisfied with dialogue of this sort (between Walpole and his "confidant," Veasey, M.P.):

WALPOLE.

George's reign, just begun, your tried worth will distinguish.

VEASEY.

Oh, a true English king!

WALPOLE.

Tho' he cannot speak English.

VEASEY.

You must find that defect a misfortune, I fear.

WALPOLE.

The reverse; for no rivals can get at his ear.

It is something to be the one public man pat in

The new language that now governs England, Dog Latin.

The penultimate couplet in "Walpole" runs as follows:

VEASEY.

How dispersed are the clouds seeming lately so sinister!

WALPOLE.

Yes, I think that the glass stands at Fair—for the Minister.

The well-known writer cannot very well sink below that.

Mr. Arrowsmith, of Bristol, has sent out a little paper-covered book containing a story by Wilkie Collins called The Guilty River. There is, however, nothing whatever in the book, from title-page to "finis," to indicate that Mr. Arrowsmith has published it twice before—in his "Bristol Library" in 1884, and as a "Christmas Annual" in 1886. I ask myself whether a humane publisher ought to set these traps for young reviewers, whose acquaintance with contemporary literature began, perhaps, only the day before yesterday.

The Essays (by Samuel Roffey Maitland) on Subjects Connected with the Reformation in England—of which a new edition is promised—appeared originally in the British Magazine. Thence they were republished, with additions, in 1849. To think that they should be called for again, at the expiration of half a century!

There have been several biographies of Dante since, rather more than a century ago, Penrose devoted a book to him and to Petrarch. In 1876 we had Mrs. Oliphant's sketch in The Makers of Florence, which no doubt suggested (or was suggested by) the monograph on the poet which she wrote for her own series of "Foreign Classics for English Readers." Then we had the memoir by Mr. Oscar Browning in 1891, and that by Mr. A. J. Balfour in 1895. Since then we have had Miss C. M. Phillimore's little work on Dante at Ravenna. All this is pretty fair; yet Dr. Hogan promises us yet another biography of Dante, to be with us next season. And who shall say that it may not supersede all its predecessors?

Mr. Poel's proposal to perform "Hamlet" according to the text of the first quarto (1603) is very characteristic of that industrious enthusiast. No doubt the performance, if it takes place, will cause a demand for copies of the quarto; and the question is, Are there any on the market? Are there any remaining of those published in facsimile in 1880, or of Mr. Timmins's reprint in 1860 of the quartos of 1603 and 1604? The first quarto seems to have been reprinted also in 1825 and 1858, in the latter year by the Duke of Devonshire in a limited edition.

The Hookham Frere correspondence will, of course, be very welcome and acceptable. Frere himself—though I fear few read him nowadays—has had justice done to him in the memoir written, and the collection of Works edited, by Sir Bartle and W. E. Frere. His versions of Aristophanes are, to be sure, classical, and were reprinted so lately as 1894 in the "Hundred Books" series. Still, how many people turn to them? Is it not likely that Frere's name will be better remembered by and by in connexion with the Anti-Jacobin than in association with Aristophanes?

Has Disraeli's Life of Lord George Bentinck been reprinted since 1872, when it came out in an eighth edition, revised? If it has not, there should be a brisk demand for the edition which Mr. Coningsby Disraeli is said to be preparing.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Ibsen the Man.

Henrik Ibsen; Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson: Critical Studies. By George Brandes. With an Introduction by William Archer. (Heinemann.)

In England, France, Germany, and even Denmark—to judge from these Studies—it is the fashion to regard Ibsen as neither a man nor an artist, but rather as an impersonal moral force. Dr. Brandes, though we do not agree with Mr. Archer that he is a great critic, is certainly a fine critic. He knows Ibsen's work thoroughly, and the details of his history. He knows Ibsen himself; has visited him, and corresponded with him for many years. His unsurpassed acquaintance with the literature of modern Europe makes his collations, his comparisons, and his perspectives, of peculiar value. His attitude is essentially sympathetic; and he is not without that magic seeing which alone is criticism. Yet, so pre-occupied is he—in a professorial and tremendously fluent way—with the political, social, and moral causes and tendencies of Ibsen's plays, that he has not found opportunity to emphasise the two facts concerning his subject which, to our view, shine out most clear and most alluringly. These facts are: First, that Ibsen is an artist at the beginning and at the end, and a moralist only incidentally; second, that the psychological interest of his figure as man and artist is probably unique in the century.

THE AUTHOR OF 'GHOSTS.'

Ibsen is now over seventy. In fifty years he has produced about half that number of plays—one every alternate year. During the first fourteen years of this period he lived in Norway and published six plays, "in hideous editions, on bad paper, sold to the number of a few hundred copies." Instead of fame he had gained notoriety; instead of applause "a howl of exasperation." And it was inevitable. (To-day Ibsen must be aware that it was inevitable; the bitterness will long ago have passed from him.) For he happened to be, by temperament, of that class of persons who can regard life and its "real, actual horrors" with steady, unblinking eyes. "Nothing awed or frightened him." He tore off all concealments, and talked calmly, but boldly, of what he saw beneath. He was incapable of compromise, either by silence or by equivocation. The possessor of such a temperament is bound to be either a social reformer or an artist. Ibsen was not a reformer. He never showed more than the average man's dilettante interest in reform. He has beliefs, theories, as his printer and his shoemaker have; and probably he can get as warm as they in supporting them by argument. But as for participating in reform, as for sacrificing a single hour of his time for a Cause—Ibsen, like the printer and the shoemaker, was always far too busy with his work for that. Conscious beyond doubt of his vocation and destiny, he utterly rejected altruism, which is an affair for second-rate imaginations. His imagination was first-rate. He was born to be a great artist, and nothing else. The world, humanity, his own ideals, and the ideals of others: these things were merely material to him.

The fact that his temperament found its outlet in artistic creation made his position, especially in a small country like Norway, much more difficult than if he had happened to lecture from a platform, or personally defy the conventions, or lead a mob against Government uniform. You may throw eggs at a preacher, or ignore a nonconformist, or incarcerate a demagogue; and the action will at once allay your own annoyance and serve to him as a stimulus. But with an artist it is different. You cannot effectively reply to the attack of a great artist. It is unanswerable. He speaks—"in hideous editions, on bad paper"—and your "howl of exasperation" sounds only ridiculous. Then, maddened into a loss of dignity, you descend to the meannesses of your nature and begin to persecute him—and his wife, if he has one. You well know that you are behaving feebly, contemptibly; but you persevere. Now the reformer welcomes persecution: it stimulates him; it almost ceases to be persecution. To the artist persecution is precisely persecution. It interferes with his calling, instead of assisting it, and his calling is sacred. Therefore he will seek an escape at any cost save that of art.

And so Ibsen, when he was thirty-five, came to a momentous and inspired decision. "Love's Comedy" had enraged the whole excellent Fatherland, and in Norway, there was for him "no room to live." Assured of a small regular income, he left his country, and thus purchased his artistic freedom at a price which, its magnitude being obvious, need not be here assessed. From 1864 to 1891 he existed in furnished lodgings, passing at intervals of years from Rome to Dresden, from Dresden to Munich, from Munich to Rome, backward and forward, restless but imperturbable. He made no attempt to form a home; since he could not have the one he desired, he would have none. When Dr. Brandes asked him if anything in the flat was his, "he pointed to a row of pictures on the wall: they were the only things that were his own." He lived the life of the appartement meublé, like any bourgeois, seeking recreation at the café, where the city could see him daily sipping his particular beer at his particular hour. He may have made acquaintances, but he did not make friends. "Friends," he wrote, "are a costly luxury, and when one invests one's capital in a vocation or a mission in life, one cannot afford to have friends. The expensiveness of friendship does not lie in what one does for one's friends, but in what, out of regard for them, one leaves undone." Marital affection was left, but that meant no more to him than to his printer or his shoemaker; he had no high-flown notions on that subject. "Mill's assertion or confession that he owed much, and that the best, in his writings to his wife, seemed especially ridiculous to Ibsen, with his marked individualism. 'Fancy!' he said, smiling, 'if you had to read Hegel or Krause with the thought that you did not know for certain whether it was Mr. or Mrs. Hegel, Mr. or Mrs. Krause you had before you!'" In this he was more than a little Bismarckian. He declined to connect himself with any magazine, to lend the renown of his name to any controversy, and he only wrote to the newspapers when his rights were threatened—when some absurdity of copyright law touched his pocket.

Look at him as he sits in some Munich square or in his furnished drawing-room—look at this man, short and thick-set, elegantly tailored, gruff, taciturn, lips compressed, slightly embarrassed in manner, content with his beer and his hired sofas, and say whether—apart from his art, his craft, his profession—he is to be distinguished from the ordinary sojourner in Bloomsbury who buys foreign papers and strolls down to the Café Royal of an afternoon for a quinquina and a cigarette. Indeed, he himself would not have thanked you to attempt any distinction. Like many great artists, he has had the ambition to be unusual only in his art. He has sought spiritual solitude, and found it, by losing himself in the crowd. Not for him are fads, peculiarities, cries, causes, aberrations, eccentricities, infractions: such luxuries would distract him from that sublime and inexorable mistress to whom half a century ago he vowed his life.

If you have sufficient detachment of mind to bring to his plays an appreciation purely æsthetic, you cannot fail to perceive that their author is an artist to whom art, in its most exclusive sense, is everything—a man wholly pre-occupied with the opulence of his inspiration and the perfecting of his technique, with the minutiae of means and effects, the contrivance of new strokes and the evocation of new beauty. The early dramas must be considered marvellous, but those of his middle and later periods are more; they are miraculous. It was not by chance that Brand and Peer Gynt came next after his departure from Norway: these were the justification of his self-exile, transcendentally proving the rightness of the choice he had made. Follow the plays one by one, as they regularly issued forth in every alternate year, and you will see in the waxing brilliance of their technique the key to Ibsen's inner history. Other dramatists, though not many, have been more plenteously inspired than he, but none was ever so proudly an artist, none was ever so completely and finally master of his craft. In Hedda Gabler is the very arrogance of incredible skill. Before it can be surpassed a new convention of the theatre will have to arise.

This supreme virtuosity is only to be achieved in one way, and that by men whose whole soul is in the business of achievement. Ibsen got it as (less supremely) Flaubert and de Maupassant got it: he laboured. He laboured daily for forty years, without divergence. One can see him, reserved, resolved, sitting down to his desk morning after morning in that flat of which only the pictures are his, handling pen and turning paper with the intimate familiarity of the workman at work, writing and slowly re-writing with the interminable patience of one who is sure of a prescribed result. Though there is no smile on his face it is not hard to divine his private and secret joy as that result nears and arrives, and he confronts the shades of his greatest predecessors and says, pointing to the opus: "Learn what skill is."

That is his reward.

In 1891 Ibsen went back to Norway. His nostalgia is at last satisfied. His rôle of martyr to an art is over. The finest of his work was produced in the large freedom of exile. Though the three latest plays are beautiful enough, we can detect in them a certain mannerism, a certain restriction and constraint. Just as his genius burgeoned out when he left his native land, so it drooped and contracted when he returned.

Ibsen the Force.

I HAVE read Dr. Brandes's Impressions of Ibsen with a sinking of the heart. Here is a critic—able, fair-minded—who has studied everything Ibsen has written, and who knows Ibsen's self; yet all he gets, or all he is able to give us, are these dry bones of criticism. I who, thank God, am no critic, but merely one of those who have been warmed and lit by Ibsen's fire—I say to myself, What on earth should I make of the man had I no other "Impressions" than those Dr. Brandes gives me? I look these long-considered, separate studies through, and all I find of the Ibsen that I know is set down in the few quotations of the poet's own words. They shine out like lamps above a heap of dusty dissertations. I cannot help wondering what does the old poet himself think of these faint echoes of his music and his thunder; for we have heard, and Mr. Archer reiterates, that Dr. Brandes is a critic of European renown, that he has followed every step of the poet's development, from the moment when his genius attained anything like maturity. "Here, and here only," says Mr. Archer, "has a critical intelligence of the first order been brought to bear in detail upon the poet's creations."

If this is true, then to the lay mind Dr. Brandes's work is a sorry indictment of the critic's function and his value; for do we not read criticism in the same way that we listen to the words of one who, for good or ill, has come into intimate relation with a great man and his work? Do we not feel that the person who publicly and professionally criticises must have got nearer to his subject than those who run as they read? With this belief, and in all docility of spirit, I approached the Three Impressions of the critic who for two-and-thirty years had studied Ibsen and his work. But I realise now that if I had waited for Dr. Brandes to introduce the great Norwegian to me, I should not have pursued my new acquaintance far. I should have heard too much of Ibsen's idiosyncrasy, and not enough of his fascination. I should have been warned that the poem of Brand, the great spiritual drama which had made my heart beat and the tears come, was borrowed from Kierkegaard, and hardly worth the borrowing. I might even have availed myself in the case of Brand of the privilege the critic so generously bestows: "The least poetical reader may here call the poet to account." I should have been on my guard against mistaking Hedda Gabler for a masterpiece of subtlest yet most moving stagecraft. I should have perceived, with the help of Dr. Brandes, that that particular play was an endeavour to show how in the unaristocratic society of Norway "great natural gifts necessarily lead to disaster." It is surely singular that to audiences in Germany, England, and Italy—in Paris, too, as I myself have seen—this supposed endeavour to teach gentility to the Norwegians has held great gatherings spellbound, and made theatres echo with applause. But Dr. Brandes, seemingly impervious to it himself, takes no account of the electrical effect of Ibsen's stagecraft on the public, and is at no pains to give an idea of his power over the emotions. The critic is more concerned to put his readers on their guard against, for instance, the error of making an undesirable acquaintance. This he tries to effect by the amazing irrelevancy: Mr. Lövborg is "no gentleman." Neither would he have us taken in by Lövborg's belief in his own abilities; as though it were not all-sufficient for Ibsen's purpose that Lövborg should convince the persons of the drama. Because Lövborg's treatise deals with the end and aim of all philosophising that aspires to a practical outcome—viz., the social development of the future; because that is Lövborg's subject, he is, in Dr. Brandes's eyes, "no genius" as well as "no gentleman." Does not Ibsen smile to himself to see Dr. Brandes playing the part of the egregious Tesman, and echoing helplessly: "The Future! Dear me! we know nothing whatever about the Future?"

Indeed, this question as to whether Ibsen's exceptional men are really men of genius seems greatly to have exercised the mind of the critic. He is at much pains to prove Borkman's failure to come up to the Brandes standard, although the critic is fair enough to admit that Ibsen has not been as anxious on this point as his commentator. The playwright seems to have contented himself with drawing human beings. But in that he appears as little to have satisfied his critic as he did a certain English actor, also of very refined tastes, who begged that "The Master Builder" might be re-written for our stage, and Solness made into a nice picturesque sculptor who could wear a velvet coat and long hair. Dr. Brandes's contribution to the discussion is a repetition of his haunting fear that "The Master Builder" may not be "actually a genius." This so weighs on his mind, that he offers Ibsen the luminous suggestion, Solness "ought, perhaps, to have introduced a new style of architecture." I would give a great deal to have seen Ibsen's face when he read that.

One turns away from these bald and doctrinaire Impressions with a sense that there may be an advantage in approaching a great poet without the assistance of "a critical intelligence of the first order." One recalls with a flush of gratitude the quick uplifting that came of personal contact with the plays that Dr. Brandes sets himself to dissect. The critic gives no smallest hint, to my sense, of the flashing vitality, the bitter wit, the tenderness so deep and innig that it moves one first to tears and then to feel all tears should be straightway dried in a world where such infinite gentleness had found a voice. If it depended on Dr. Brandes, few would guess that the plays were more than philosophic discussions upon social life. He never hints that the people in them are alive; that if you cut them they bleed; that they are friends or foes, but always neighbours.

Indeed, personally, I got a faithfuller "Impression" of the greatness, the aliveness of Ibsen from the columns of the Daily Telegraph, where, in the fine old fighting days, he was loaded with abuse, but shown, in any case, to be a playwright who, whether you liked it or not, took hold of you and shook you clear of your everyday indifference. Dr. Brandes's Ibsen is as like the Ibsen of the plays as Yorick's skull was to the living face of Yorick. Laying down these skeleton impressions, one says in one's heart: "Alas, poor Ibsen! I knew him a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy. Where be your gibes now?—your hits at human frailty, your balm for aching hearts; your height, your depth, your genius that Dr. Brandes grants, and yet in no word of his own is able to make good." Plainly, the poet's fighting days are not over. He is, at seventy-one, still young, in that he is much loved and much hated, and, even by his friends, both understood and maligned. From that far country where he dwells apart—not Norway, nor any other hedged and bounded—he might quite well to-day send forth the message of forty years ago:

I nerve myself anew
To face the fight of life with steadfast daring—
My countrymen, I send you greeting!—you
Who lent me Fear's winged sandals for my faring,
Who lent me Exile's staff and Sorrow's pack—
Lo! from afar I send you greeting back.

There are those (not critics, perhaps; and yet the poet would not despise them for that) who, from all over the civilised world, bear witness in their hearts that the poet's greeting—his gift once in every four-and-twenty months or so—has meant for them a great awakening, an unmatched joy. If people such as these were to register three Impressions, they would be: a memory of personal exhilaration, a conviction of homage due to the Great Exile, and a sense of pride if they might call themselves his humbler countrymen—countrymen because they want no interpreter between him and them, waiting as they do afar off for him to send them another "greeting back"—another great and living play.

C. E. RAIMOND.

Eighteenth Century Gossip.

Passages from the Diaries of Mrs. Philip Lybbe Powys.
Edited by Emily J. Cleminson. (Longmans. 16s.)

Mrs. Powys (née Girle) was a gentlewoman of the last century. Before her marriage she lived in Lincoln's Inn Fields, and thence made several pleasant journeys about England. After her marriage her home was Hardwicke Hall, in Berkshire, where she lived a busy and happy life as housewife and woman of fashion. From what we can gather from the diaries and letters which compose this volume Mrs. Powys was of a sweet-tempered, amiable, easy-going nature, with no very remarkable qualities, much activity, and a quick eye for externals. Had she lacked that eye this book would be trivial indeed; even as it is, the beer it chronicles is often a fluid of disconcerting pallor.

But to turn these pages lazily, without great expectations, is to be gently amused. They certainly bring back the old leisurely spacious life with some vividness. Here is a Norfolk gentleman of 1756, a Mr. Jackson: "You know how he loves company at home, especially when he can have so good a plea as at present for not having the fuss of dining out, as he styles it. If twenty people came in as we were sitting down to table, his dinners are so good they would need no alteration; but the larder is really quite a sight, and different from any I ever saw. . . . I believe always full of everything in season, and the old gentleman often makes us walk there after breakfast that we may all, as he says, have what we like for dinner. The venison and game now in it is astonishing. The Norfolk mutton, too, you know, is famous; but thoirs particularly so. They kill all their own, and never eat it in the parlour under three weeks." Mrs. Powys makes a note of many things like that; but farther she does not go. For instance, on the next page, she says: "One morning we went to pay a dull visit to see an odd house, of a still odder Mr. Spilman . . . a most strange old bachelor of vast fortune, but, indeed, I'll not fall in love with him. We were introduced to him in the library, where he seemed deep in study (for they say he is really clever), sitting in a jockey-cap and white stiff dog's gloves." And that is all of Mr. Spilman, of whom we want to know everything: the rest is a description of his not very interesting house. Indeed, on the human side Mrs. Powys is sadly weak. However, while at Scarborough in 1757 an opportunity occurred for visiting the Moravian settlement at Pudsey (now more famous as the home of Tunncliffe, the Yorkshire cricketer), and her account of these strange people is excellent. Three houses lodged the sect. In one dwelt the minister and the children; in the others were the single men and the single women. "Those bound by the matrimonial shackles" lived in the neighbourhood, but gave up their children to be educated in the faith. What that was Mrs. Powys had no notion; but she found the minister's sermon "replete with incoherent nonsense." After the sermon the children were admitted, and the minister addressed them for a quarter of an hour, "but on subjects far above the comprehension of their tender years."

The men and boys have nothing unusual in their dress, but that of the women has something in it extremely odd yet pretty, plain to a degree yet pleasing, because accompanied by the utmost neatness, an ornament even adorning to the meanest habit; their gowns white linen, close to the shape, their cap comes over the face like our largest French night-caps, rounding over the cheek and coming down in a peak over the forehead, and sets close to the face, no hair being seen. To distinguish the ladies, all married Sisters tie the cap under the chin with a large bunch of blue ribbons, the widows white, and the single Sisters with pink, but the knots round the caps of all is muslin, broad-hemmed.

In the sleeping room of the women were "eighty beds, each just large enough for one person, all of white dimity. . . . Every night one woman walks up and down this gallery with a lighted taper."

In 1760 Mrs. Powys witnessed the execution of Earl Ferrers at Tyburn. Being an earl he was hanged with a silken rope. He observed that "the apparatus, and being made a spectacle of so vast a multitude, was greatly worse than death itself." She describes the beginnings of the British Museum, opened at Montagu House in 1759. Among other things was "one room of curious things in spirits (but disagreeable)." She was also in the streets when the death of George II. was announced, and was a delighted spectator of the coronation of George III. "At first coming on the platform, as if astonished at sight of such amazing multitudes, he clasped his hands, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, stood for some moments in a profound silence, and I dare say (for great is his humility) he never had a meaner opinion of himself than at that instant, to think that all this bustle was for one poor mortal, an earthly king. . . . 'Twas moving to see the excessive joy of the surrounding throng, when one knew the good young king deserved their every acclamation, not from being born to the crown he was going to receive, but by his own intrinsic merit."

In 1762 Mrs. Powys married. She and her husband met "at an assembly (for assemblies, you know, are often productive of matrimony) . . . and soon after agreed—he to love, I to love and obey for life. . . . As many say who have known him from his infancy, he was never guilty of any vice, and hardly of any fault." Together Mr. and Mrs. Powys enjoyed a happy pilgrimage to the grave, smiled upon by many of the great ones of the earth. Of her children Mrs. Powys writes: "One finds them the most agreeable douceurs when with one." After marriage Mrs. Powys is less interesting, but rather more self-satisfied. In addition to a very busy social life, involving many guests herself and many visits to her friends' houses, with private theatricals and all the other machinery of entertainment, the good lady, says the editor, did many domestic things exceedingly well. She embroidered, worked in cloth, straw plaited, feather worked, made pillow lace, made mosaic lace, dried flowers and ferns, painted on paper and silk, collected shells, fossils, coins, and was a connoisseur in china, and besides this was an excellent housekeeper. Here, for example, is Mrs. Powys's recipe for Lavender Drops:

Six handfuls of lavender flowers stript from stalks, put them in a wide-mouthed glass, and pour on them four quarts of the best spirit of wine, stop the glass very close with a double bladder tied fast down that nothing may breathe out; let it stand in a warm place six weeks, keep it circulating about, then distil it in a limebeck. When all is run off, put to this water sage flowers, rosemary flowers, buglos flowers, betony flowers, burrage flowers, lily of the valley flowers, cowslip flowers, each a handful gathered in their seasons in dry weather; let this stand six weeks, then put to it balm, motherwort, spike flowers; cut some small bay-leaves, and the flowers of each an ounce; distil all these together again, then put in citron peel, lemon peel, dried single piony seed, and cinnamon, of each six drams; nutmeg, mace, candimums, cubels, yellow saunders, of each half an ounce; lignum aloes, one dram: make these into a fine powder and put them into glass, then take junibes, new and good, a pound stoned and cut small, stop all quite close for six weeks more, shaking it often every day; then run it thro' a cotton bag, then put in pre-par'd pearl two drams, ambergrease ditto, of saffron and saunders and yellow saunders each an ounce; put these in a bag and hang them in the water, and close up the glass well; at three weeks end it will be fit to use.

N.B.—When you find any indisposition, or fear of any fit, take a small spoonful with a lump of sugar; it helps all palsies of what kind to cure.

In stories the book is poor; but here is one of Princess Amelia. She asked a remarkably tall young man what he was intended for. "The church," said he. "Oh, sir, you must mistake," said the Princess; "it's certainly for the steeple." Hitherto we have always seen this retort attributed to Curran. The following pun by Pope is perhaps familiar to others, but is new to us: "One day Sir Walter Blunt's father was in Pope's company and talking of punning. Pope said that was a species of wit so triflingly easy that he would answer to make one on any proposed subject offhand, when a lady in the company said: "Well, then, Mr. Pope, make one on keelhauling." He instantly replied: "That, madam, is indeed putting a man under a hard ship."

Mrs. Cleminson, the editor, has done her work of annotation and arrangement with efficiency.

Weeds of Speech.

A New Dictionary of the Terms Ancient and Modern of the Canting Crew. By B. E., Gent. (Facsimile Reprint: Smith, Kay & Co. 21s.)

THIS is a facsimile reprint of the first dictionary of Cant and Slang words published in England—"this it is, and nothing more." No editor comes with obeisance and remarks; no helping word—not even the lost Lenore of the book's date—gives light and direction to the reader. Like the raven that "perched and sat," this dictionary is mute. Who was "B. E., Gent"? It is not known. When was the book issued? It is not stated. However, "B. E.'s" identity can be dispensed with; and the date of his book can, with reason, be put at 1700. Messrs. Henley and Farmer, quoting it in their Slang and its Analogues, make the date 1690. But it happens that the year 1695 is tacked to the definition of the word "Punchable"—i.e., old passable money. Let us then adopt 1700. B. E.'s preface is facile and of little worth. He tells us nothing of his aim or method, and his "historical account of the Beggars and Gypsies" does not suggest that he hob-and-nobbed with either. There was little need for him to do so. For although B. E.'s work is the first formal and self-contained English dictionary of Cant and Slang, it is by no means our first vocabulary of the kind. Such vocabularies were open to B. E. in the works of Thomas Harman, Thomas Dekker, Richard Brome, and other writers. The father of Cant and Slang lexicographers, old Thomas Harman, printed his Caveat or Warening for Common Cursetors in 1573. This book, which was not a formal dictionary, may have been useful to Shakespeare, as it has been to all succeeding students of slang. Many "Canting Dictionaries," "Canting Academies," "Flash Dictionaries," "Triumphs of Wit," and similar works bestrew the three centuries which have elapsed since Harman's book was new; but the works which stand forth in real importance are those of Dekker (his Bellman of London, &c.); Grose's Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue, a most valuable production; the Slang Dictionary published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus; the Argot and Slang of Messrs. Leland and Barrère; and last, Messrs. Henley and Farmer's Slang and its Analogues, which, for some time, has stayed its progress at the letter M. These, and the New English Dictionary and Dr. Wright's Dialect Dictionary, are the students' stand-byes. Nevertheless, great interest attaches to B. E.'s dictionary, and it was worth while to revive it in facsimile. The old wild type and spelling go well with this weed-garden of speech, and the quaint definitions exhale the hot odours of the thieves' kitchens of two hundred years ago.

The title of the collection suggests the distinction between the terms Cant and Slang. These words really mean different things. Cant is the secret language devised by gypsies, beggars, and thieves (the Canting Crew) for carrying on intercourse with each other. Its words have long life. Slang is the tricky, careless, dissipated language which creeps into all walks of life, and is constantly changing. The editor of the Slang Dictionary (1874) illustrates the difference between Cant and Slang thus: "A thief in Cant language would term a horse a 'prancer' or a 'prad,' while in Slang a man of fashion would speak of it as a 'bit of blood,' a 'spanker,' or a 'neat tit.'" Cant was devised for secrecy, whereas Slang is often used as a boast of familiarity with life.

At the same time, this distinction is apt to prove cumbersome. Thieves and beggars did not stop at devising words for secrecy; their ingenuity led them to coin words for all occasions, and thus they were makers and adaptors of vulgar slang. Besides, the degree of secrecy varied, and words which were at first intended to be muttered in the hedge-row were soon shouted on the highway. A few Cant words have even crept up the ladder of speech to lips polite. Filch, which was Cant for steal, is one; and dab, meaning expert, if not good English, survives as respectable slang. Kid, Cant for a child, has enjoyed similar promotion. This Cant dictionary is full of words which were probably never Cant in the strict sense. To "nim" was Cant for steal; but to "cotton," meaning to agree well, had probably a nobler origin. "Dromedary" was Cant for a thief; but "faggots," meaning "Men muster'd for Souldiers, not yet Listed," may be assigned to the Slang division. The blessed light of humour seldom touches thieves' language. Their words are mean, hideous, opaque. To open the door became to "dub the giger"; to lend twopence was to "tip a dace"; to pick a pocket was to "file a cly"; to steal a cloak was to "nim a togeman"; to be expert in any one of these arts was to be its "topping" exponent; while to be accomplished in all was to be a "Dimber-damber"—i.e., "a Top-man or Prince among the Canting Crew; also the chief Rogue of the Gang, or the compleatest Cheat." Some interest attaches to a Cant word like "Abram-cove," meaning a lusty, strong rogue. The word belongs to a group which includes Abram-men, here defined as "the seventeenth Order of the Canting-crew. Beggars antickly trick'd up with Ribbands, Red Tape, Foxtails, Rags, &c., pretending Madness to palliate their Thefts of Poultry, Linen, &c." The name is thought by Nares to date from the dissolution of the monasteries, when numbers of men who had been dependent on the monks' charity turned themselves loose, and became thieving vagabonds. Another explanation connects the Abram-men with the Abraham ward in Bethlehem Hospital. To "sham Abraham," meaning to feign sickness, is still in vogue (Henley and Farmer). "Angler" is an instance of the forcible seizure and degradation by the "canting crew" of a good English word. In their noxious vocabulary an angler is "a petty Thief, who has a Stick with a hook at the end, with which he plucks things out of Windows, Grates, etc., also those that draw in People to be cheated." The word "Ill-fortune" acquired a certain precision in the Canting vocabulary—it meant ninepence.

The number of words signifying a fool or silly fellow is curiously large, and no doubt many of these originally expressed the thief's contempt for his victim. A selection of such words will have interest:

Addle-pate, one full of Whimsies and Projects, and as empty of Wit.

Animal, a Fool. He is a meer Animal, he is a very silly fellow.

Ben, a Fool.

Booby, a dull heavy Lob.

Booberkin, the same.

Bottle-head, void of Wit.

Bully-sop, a Maggot-pated, huffing, silly ratling Fellow.

Clodpate, a heavy dull Fellow.

Clunch, a clumsy Clown, an awkward unhandy Fellow.

Cock-robbin, a soft easy Fellow.

Cod's-head, a Fool.

Corky-brained, silly, foolish.

Country-put, a silly Country Fellow.

Dindy-prat, a little puny Fellow.

Dulpickle, a heavy, dull, stupid Fellow.

Hulver-head, a silly foolish Fellow.

Inspids, Blockheads.

Jack-adam, a Fool.

Jobber-noll, a very silly Fellow.

Nick-ninny, an empty Fellow, a meer Cod's Head.

Nigmenog, a very silly Fellow.

Oaf, a Wise-acre, a Ninny, or Fool.

Paper-skul, foolish, soft, silly.

Purple Dromedary, a bungling Thief.

Sawny, a Fool.

Sup-pate, a Fool.

Sheep's-head, a Fool.

Simkin, a Fool.

Single-ten, a very foolish, silly Fellow.

Souse-crown, a Fool.

Tony, a silly Fellow, or Ninny.

Wise Man of Gotham, a Fool.

Of racy, curious, and startling phrases there are so many in these pages that we can but glance at a dozen, and end. Antidote is defined as "a very homely Woman, also a medicine against Poyson." A Fortune is "a rich maid or wealthy Widdow, an Heiress." A Foreman of the Jury, is one "that engrosses all the talk to himself." A Habber-dasher of Nouns and Pronouns is, of course, Cant for a schoolmaster. Similarly, a dancing master was called a Hop Merchant. Flustered means drunk, and a man may become drunk by imbibing too many "Lines of the old Author," i.e., drams of brandy. What was the origin of the last phrase? Contempt for some weak Government probably inspired the term "his head is full of Proclamations," i.e., taken up with idle matters. Windmills in the Head is an expressive (and surviving) equivalent of idle plans. An extraordinary word was Sun-burnt, "having many (Male) Children." A Conger was "a Set or Knot of Topping Book-sellers of London, who agree among themselves that whoever of them Buys a good Copy, the rest are to take off such a particular number, as (it may be) Fifty, in Quires, on easy Terms. Also they that joyn together to Buy either a Considerable or Dangerous Copy." This is not very clear, but one cannot expect the Canting Crew to understand bookselling. And yet they seem to have had leanings to literature, for apart from their "line from the old Author," we find them using the terms "Hobbist" and "Hide-bound-muse." A Hobbist was "a Disciple and fond Admirer of Thomas Hobbs, the fam'd Philosopher of Malmsbury." Hide-bound-muse is defined as "Stiff, hard of Delivery, Sir J. Suckling call'd Ben. Johnson's so." Cramp-words were difficult or uncommon words; and cramp-words are with us still. Fustian-verse was "Verse in Words of lofty Sound, and humble Sense." Under Crown we have the naïve note: "Where the Earth is raised it is said to be Crown'd with Hills in Poetry." Gapefeed was a good word for puppet shows, &c. The two words Gim-crack and Grass-Widow have had vicissitudes; the first was used for "a spruce Wench" as well as a toy; and a Grass-widow was a much less reputable person than she is now accounted. Dust meant money long before the gold-field lurements of modern times. Lastly, Cathedral could be used as an adjective, meaning "old-fashioned, out of Date, Ancient," but we should blush to say that this book is full of cathedral words.

The "New Thought."

Methods and Problems of Spiritual Healing. By Horatio Dresser. (Putnam's.)

SOME months have passed since the general public in this country was made aware, in a sensational manner, of the existence of the doctrinaire sect of Christian scientists; and though the circumstances of the death of Mr. Harold Frederic were not such as to commend the treatment, to which for a fortnight he submitted himself, its apostles, silenced for the moment, are once more evangelising even as we write.

Mr. Dresser has been a student and observer, he tells us, for fifteen years, and his books on The Power of Silence and kindred subjects have had, at least in America, a considerable vogue. A good many people, therefore, may be expected to read his latest volume with serious attention. We have done so ourselves, and are not disposed to regret the time so spent. It is, indeed, lax and unscientific; its style is diffuse and rhetorical; and, short as it is, it abounds in vain repetitions. But the tone is convinced and kindly; and though the phrase, "the New Thought," as applied to the nebulous theories of his school, may provoke a smile, the document is of real interest as a tentative expression of a novel phase of (say) thoughtfulness.

In dealing with mystics one is constantly at a loss for want of any precise and definite statement of the doctrines which they suppose themselves to hold. They are too apt to gallop off on the back of a half-broke metaphor. So far as we can learn from Mr. Dresser's pages, and elsewhere, the fundamental principle is that, in virtue of the diversity of its nature, mind is independent of matter; that man, therefore, may free himself from bodily evil—he has but, by an effort of the will, to cast out the image of pain which haunts him. Where the will is enfeebled or misguided by habit there is the need and the opportunity of the healer. It is his business to sound in his own heart the note of strength, of courage, of faith, which he desires to set vibrating in his patient. The patient “is requested to assume a comfortable physical attitude and to become as receptive as possible.” (Receptivity is essential to a fit disposition. The natural aptitude for it varies, “coldness of intellect and non-receptivity being found together.” “Only-daughters and wealthy ladies who board prove difficult patients.”) The two having “entered into the silence,” the healer suggests such thoughts as: “I am free! I am free from doubt; I am free from care. I am the free and fearless, impersonal, selfless child of God; and what I am, so are you, my neighbour, as myself; I am eternally perfect; I am master of the body and all its functions.” But here Mr. Dresser comes in with a remonstrance and a distinction: perfect potentially, yes; but not in fact. The true key, he says, is that blessed word Evolution. This is how he would speak:

Put yourself entirely in the present, trustfully, restfully, calmly. You are an immortal soul, and have all eternity before you. Time is of no real consequence—it is simply a matter of mathematical convenience. Space, too, has little meaning for the soul. There is no place in the wide universe where there is more wisdom and power than here in the living present. The omniscient God is here, the source of all life and goodness. He is unlimited by space, unhampered by time. You are eternally a part of Him and of His life. You stand individually for some aspect of wisdom and power which no other soul can represent as well. Your experience is a progressive awakening to the consciousness of that power, and with the discovery of greater power comes greater ability to express it. Peace, then. Trust and be receptive to that Power. Do not nervously strive to grow, but let the soul expand. Let Nature and the sub-conscious mind do their utmost for you, while you devote your conscious thought to the realisation of the Divine Presence, to ways and means of making that Presence known among your fellow men.

But if Mr. Dresser fails to persuade us that the grounds of his confidence are firm to the tread, and though his long years of observation ought, we think, to have issued in a clearer and more orderly exposition of his theory, we can at least sympathise with his amiable attitude and purpose. We rather suspect that it is no “New Thought” that he is struggling to express, but just a very old one, and a very good one, that he has approached from a new side and is slow to recognise: “The Father himself loveth you. . . . Little children, love one another.”

Other New Books.

SHAKESPEARE'S COUNTRY.

By B. C. A. WINDLE.

This little book, one of the most charming guide-books that we have ever handled, might be called a pocket companion to Mr. Sidney Lee's Life of Shakespeare. All who, reading that book, are stimulated to visit Stratford-on-Avon and its neighbourhood, to reconstruct for themselves the poet's youth, will find Mr. Windle invaluable. He seems to us to have hit the mean very successfully, his pages being not too antiquarian, not too literary, not too descriptive, and not too many. Mr. E. H. New, who has made the illustrations in his own simple and vivid way, has chosen his subjects well: Stratford Church, Shakespeare's House, the Latin School, Shakespeare's Monument, Anne Hathaway's Cottage, Charlecote, Evesham Bell Tower, Warwick Castle, Leicester Hospital, Warwick, Kenilworth, Coventry's Three Spires, Ford's Almshouses (Coventry), Edgehill Battlefield, and Compton Wynyates. By a happy thought a map of the Shakespeare country has been pasted in the cover. The book, both for the library and as a travelling companion, is equally choice and serviceable. (Methuen. 3s.)

MR. MIGGS.

By ALEXANDER STUART.

From time to time during the past five years the Pall Mall Gazette has printed the opinions of Mr. Miggs, shoe-maker and philosopher. The author has now collected the best of the papers into a volume. We wish, for its own sake, that the book had come sooner. Had it come last year the inevitable comparison with Mr. Dooley, whom, of course, Mr. Miggs preceded, would have been avoided. Yet Mr. Miggs is well done, consistent, human, and absolutely credible. Here is a specimen of his manner. His interlocutor had remarked: “Might I not, indeed, call you the rising hope of the stern and unbending social Democrats of the future?”—

“Puttin' aside the hit at my melancholy habit of temper,” he replied, not without dignity, “which perhaps is nateral in a man that thinks hard and often for hisself, I am a Social Democrat. And what is a Social Democrat? Is he a man what comes to me like a parson, a beadle, and an undertaker rolled into one, and says with tears in his eyes, ‘Miggs, my friend, there's a man lives three streets from you has drunk hisself to death through a excessive fondness for alcoholic beverages; and the same has left a widder and six pore little orphans.’ ‘And I'm sorry to hear of it,’ I says, wondering wot he's up to next. ‘But you must be more than sorry, my friend,’ he says; ‘you must contribute somethink out of your hard-earned money to keep 'em in comfort. It's your duty,’ he says, ‘and your highest privilege.’ ‘Stop there,’ I says. ‘It is a duty and a high privilege. But it ain't none.’ ‘Why so?’ he says. ‘This why,’ I says. ‘But for soborality and hard work I would be a intoxicated corp myself. It ain't in natur that you should come to me, which am a hard workin' man with a wife and family. Go to them as brought him to it. Go to the dukes and aristocracy and the capitalists. But don't never come near me.’”

Mr. Miggs epitomises a large class of public-house politicians. His utterances, however, are more readable evening by evening than in the mass. (Sampson Low. 2s. 6d.)

SARAH BERNHARDT.

By JULES HURET.

The most interesting part of M. Huret's book concerning Mme. Bernhardt is undoubtedly contained in M. Rostand's preface. Here the author records the exact details of a typical two hours of Madame's erratic life. The picture presented is that of the real Sarah; the Sarah Paris audiences pant and struggle over; the Sarah who has allured, repelled, magnetised, or disgusted half the world on different occasions. M. Huret's diary of events—it is little more—is sufficiently dreary. “On September 27 she did such and such, and the critics said so and so.” No new light is thrown upon a character which the least intimate acquaintance, the merest on-looker, must recognise as chameleon-tinted. Sarah Bernhardt is a woman who lives every moment of her life. To what end? Most of us have some object in view, some “ultimate goal” to strive for. Does Mme. Bernhardt join hands with her fellow-artists and try to raise the moral tone of the stage? Not even Huret says so. Sarah herself claims the attainment of a high ideal. She writes publicly that she “has planted the French language in the heart of foreign literature,” and that her “personal aid has been the missionary whose efforts have made French the common speech of the younger generation.” M. Huret, too, speaks of her “incorrigible patriotism.” Does Mme. Bernhardt forget that her language is the language of diplomacy?—and that desire to be well versed in the tongue in which the fate of nations is decided may possibly carry as much weight with the world in general as the wish to interpret some special phrase spoken of a celebrated actress? It has been said of Mme. Bernhardt that, "for her, charity fills a multitude of empty seats. The only recording angel she cares for is the box office-keeper." Again, on the other hand, a man who has worked with her writes: "She is charitable in the highest sense—even to street cats!" What is one to make of such a manifest bundle of inconsistencies?—of a woman who will rhapsodise equally over a baby grand-child and a pet tiger; who will rescue a starving animal, and disappoint a crowded audience by refusing to appear, at the last moment, at an evening performance, because she has "tired" herself acting before some "aristocratic" gathering earlier in the day? Inconsistency makes for interest, but seldom for greatness. Concerning this last we again quote Mme. Bernhardt. Discussing American scenery, she says: "I don't like it. Everything is so big, too big . . . nothing but mountains with tops you can't see, steppes that stretch away to the horizon . . . skies that look ten times as high as ours. . ." To certain minds the invisible "mountain-tops" appeal as heights to gain, and it is to their eyes that an answering brilliance comes from searching the skies—not the human stage!—for stars. (Chapman & Hall.)

WORCESTER CATHEDRAL. BY CANON TEIGNMOUTH-SHORE.

A new volume in the pretty "Cathedral" series by Messrs. Isbister. The letterpress is of the slightest, and yet sufficient to supply any visitor to Worcester with an intelligent understanding of the building and its history. Nothing that Canon Teignmouth-Shore can say is more beautiful than Walton's inscription to his wife's memory, which is quoted as one of the Cathedral's treasures: "Here lyeth buried soe much as could dye of Anne, the wife of Isaac Walton, who was a woman of the Primitive Piety, her great and general knowledge being adorned with such true humility, and blest with soe much Christian meekness as made her worthy of a more memorable monument. She dyed (alas! that she is dead) the 17th of April, 1662. Aged 52. Study to be like her." The illustrations by Mr. Hedley Fitton are dainty. (Isbister. 1s. net.)

JOHN MILTON.

BY WILLIAM P. TRENT.

Mr. Trent, who is an American teacher of literature, was forced to write this little book from the conviction that Anglo-Saxons do not honour Milton as they should. His conviction is indubitably right, and we trust that the straightforward and forcible eulogy which resulted from it may have the effect that its author hopes. His work is a mixture of biography and praise, and, considering the space at his command, Mr. Trent has done it very thoroughly. He seems to have read not only Milton himself, but also all Miltonic literature, and hence his book has additional value as a guide to students who propose to examine the subject after him. This passage concerning Milton's prose illustrates Mr. Trent's style and attitude:

Neither Hooker, nor Bacon, nor Jeremy Taylor, nor Sir Thomas Browne, . . . nor any subsequent writer of English gives me the sense of sublime power and variety and nobility—of eloquence in its highest meaning, that possesses me when I read the prose of Milton. Regular it is not, in the way that we properly demand of modern prose, with its multiplicity of duties; it has not the clarity, the neatness, the precision of the French; it does not combine subtle charm and picturesqueness and brilliancy as does the prose of a writer like Chateaubriand; but it is better than all this, better than the stately periods of De Quincey or the regal march of Gibbon, better than the vigour of Macaulay, or the beauty of Ruskin, or the quiet force of Newman—it is either the utterance of a demigod or the speech of an angel.

Mr. Trent, it will be seen, deals in the primary colours. But it is enthusiasm in a fine cause, and may it prevail! (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

Fiction.

Lesser Destinies. By Samuel Gordon. (Murray. 6s.)

THIS is the first novel that Mr. Murray has recently published, and it may be stated at once that the selection is good. It is a story of obscure people and mean streets, of folk that work in factories and live in Montague Dwellings. But the obscurest person is interesting if only we know enough about him, and Mr. Gordon has a sure insight into character, writing, except when he lapses into undue moralising, with crispness and force. Here is an example of dialogue between a couple of work-girls:

"Yes, they do come hanging round, somehow," said Maud scornfully, "but there isn't one of them I'd care to speak to twice. Bank-holiday-in-the-brake sort of chaps; play the concertina, and talk of 'walking-out' till their governor 'll give them a rise. Good company or none, that's my motto."

"Quite right, too; time enough for you to settle down. You've a comfortable home, I'm told," remarked Tabitha.

"Scrumptious," said Maud curtly.

"And your stepfather's very fond of you."

"Too fond."

"How's that?" asked Tabitha, struck by her tone.

"Promise me not to tell anyone? Well, then, I don't like the way he looks at me when we're alone."

Tabitha pondered for a moment. "The brute!" she said, as she caught Maud's drift.

"And that's why I've got to strike out for myself," went on Maud hurriedly. "I want to get away before there's more mischief."

We are chiefly concerned with Tabitha, the faded spinster who clutches pathetically at the phantom of love as it passes her by; and Tabitha in Mr. Gordon's hands is real. So, too, is the deformed youth who does odd jobs about the fifth-rate music-hall; so, too, is Tabitha's brother Jimmy, laid helpless on his back by an injury to the spine. A melancholy cast for the book's drama! But the author does not make the mistake of supposing that the poor have no pleasures. In one character only Mr. Gordon fails to convince. Phœbe, the woman who has slipped from an honourable estate to picking a living from dust heaps, and is now and again found drunk in the gutter, talks with the refinement of a philosophic countess. Flowers bloom in unexpected places; but we are sure that Phœbe must in the gutter have lost the bloom of her manners. Nor does the author always avoid the temptation to unnecessary misspelling which besets those who try to reproduce the speech of the uncultured. "Practickle" and "pictchers" represent simply the lazy pronunciation of "practical" and "pictures," and the torture of the words produces no evidence of good faith. In the main, however, Mr. Gordon has succeeded; for he has made a set of quite unimportant persons very interesting.

From the Broad Acres. By J. S. Fletcher.
(Grant Richards. 2s. 6d.)

THE title-page states that this little volume illustrates "rural life in Yorkshire." We are afraid that it also illustrates something else—namely, the demand for the short story of two thousand words. There are twenty-one stories in the book, and they have a monotony of feeling and touch which argues that they were constructed to meet a certain market. That market having been met—skilfully and satisfactorily met—Mr. Fletcher gathers up the sheaf of confessions, binds it in green, and pretends that it is a book. The thing is scarcely a book, but we are not disposed to quarrel with it. Mr. Fletcher would not, we feel sure, wish us to take it so seriously. He is a clever man, and he has done excellent and various work. This work is obviously less good than his best; pending his next appearance as a literary artist, it will serve to remind us of his existence; that is its function.

The tales are favourable specimens of the popular short short-story of the better type. Let their titles speak for them: "The Advent of Julia Ann," "For what shall it Profit?" "Retribution," "For the good of his Soul," "For Certain Pieces of Silver," "A Cast of the Die"—the entire mechanism of the work is laid bare by the mere sound of such titles. We have only one really violent objection to the type, and that lies against the gross sentimentality which seems to be indispensably associated with it. Take the following:

"T' horse fell reight on to him as he pulled it down just on t' edge o' t' quarry," said the foreman in a low voice to old Dick. "I'm afeard it's all over wi' him, maister; it mun ha' crushed his chest in."

The Irishman opened his eyes. Kitty's face was close to his. She was never sure of it, but she thought he smiled, and she bent still closer to him. She was something more than glad afterwards that she let the generous emotions of her impulsive heart have their own way for once, and that she spoke her gratitude to the dying Irishman in that farewell kiss. For suddenly the wandering harvester was dead by the roadside; and the strangers among whom he had lived for a short month stood staring at each other's sorrowful faces across his body—tattered and torn and dirty as to his habiliments as when he had come down the road that summer morning and peeped into the cool garden to catch a glimpse of Kitty Joyce sitting under the yew-tree.

Why does the British public insist on this? We are convinced that Mr. Fletcher has not put it in to please himself.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE CUSTOM OF THE COUNTRY. BY MRS. HUGH FRASER.

The country is Japan, on which Mrs. Fraser is known to be an authority. In this volume are tales of New Japan, all with enchanting backgrounds. "Tokyo is a garden," says, for example, the author in the first of them, "in which a city has grown up by accident, and the flowers have the best of it still." In the foreground is the stormy play of passions. Mrs. Fraser can handle her pen, as, indeed, a sister of Mr. Marion Crawford should. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

MRS. KNOLLYS, AND OTHER STORIES. BY F. J. STIMSON.

This is an American book, but it is cosmopolitan in character. The author, who is also the author of King Noanett, here offers seven short tales. In one of them, "A Daughter of Spain," an unhappy lover writes this note: "SEÑORITA CONDESA,—Thou lovest me. On the morning thou shalt wed Don Sebastian I kill him. —RAMON DEL TORRE." Directness in correspondence could hardly go further. (Downey. 5s.)

THE HEART OF TOIL. BY OCTAVE THANET.

The work of the lady who is known as Octave Thanet is always careful and sympathetic. These six stories are no exception. They are American, both in manner and matter, and very outspoken. In "The Way of an Election" we find this sentiment: "Folks do get awful worked up over politics; but if that Darcy tries any of his slick, fake talk on Harry, and makes him feel bad, d— if I don't knock his flannel mouth off him!" (Downey. 5s.)

MEN'S TRAGEDIES. BY R. V. RISLEY.

The third volume of American fiction this week. Mr. H. D. Lowry some while ago produced Women's Tragedies; this may be taken as its belated companion. Mr. Risley, who is a new American novelist of promise, divides his men into 'The Man Who Loved, The Man Who Hated' The Man Who Bore, The Man Who Cared, The Man Who Fell, The Man Who Sneered, The Man Who Killed, The Man Who Died, and The Man Who Was Himself. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE WHITE KING OF MANOA. BY JOSEPH HATTON.

An Anglo-Spanish romance. "Being the Life, Loves, and Adventures of David Yarcombe, Protégé and Fellow-voyager of Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight." Mr. Hatton is so practised a maker of stories that it is hardly needful to say more than that this is a full-blooded tale with plenty of courage and muscle and Good Queen Bess about it. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE CRIME IN THE WOOD. BY T. W. SPEIGHT.

Mr. Speight is an old hand at melodramatic stories like this; and he knows when to lighten the mystery with good-humour. This is a blend of sensation and playfulness. There is murder, but there is also Miss Primby, who tells how Dr. Botcher once began a proposal thus: "My dear Miss Primby, if I were to assure you that you have stolen my heart from me, I should be stating what is anatomically impossible; but if——" At that point he was interrupted and had never spoken again. (Long. 3s. 6d.)

SOME UNOFFENDING PRISONERS. BY JOHN FULFORD.

A long, gossiping novel of young Londoners. The prisoners are not incarcerated in any of Her Majesty's gaols, but are bound by the chains we forge for ourselves. Mr. Fulford has a light manner, and the literary life comes in for much genial satire in his pages. (Jarrold. 6s.)

A MONK OF CRUTA. BY E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

A new sensational story by a diligent novelist. The frontispiece depicts an elderly gentleman in bed, blazing a pistol at a visitor. Turning the pages we come upon this: "The priest was the first in the room to move. He slowly bent over both bodies, and then turned round to the other man. 'Dead?' he asked, with a dry, choking gasp. 'Both dead.'" (Ward Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE ADVENTURES OF ROSALIE STUART. BY W. SHAW.

Jacobitism again, for the adventures occurred during the Rebellion of 1745-6, and on the first page we meet, at Avignon, "James Francis Edward, son of James II., the exiled King of England, commonly termed the Old Pretender, or the Chevalier St. George. He was a mild-tempered man, of studious habits, adverse to ambitious projects." Among her other adventures Rosalie was seized at Peebles. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

THE MYSTERY OF MONK'S WOOD. BY MRS. LODGE.

Previously Mrs. Lodge had written The Mystery of Bloomsbury Crescent. On page 2 of the new Mystery Mona busies herself about "the breakfast equipage," and her father helps himself to the breast of a pheasant, a goodly slice of ham garnished with fried eggs, and a hot roll. But this is merely sunshine before a storm; mystery and gloom follow remorselessly, together with discussion on creed. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

SAROLTA'S VERDICT. BY E. YOLLAND.

This is the dedication: "Sarolta makes her curtsy to my sister Alice, whose pen wrote out, through many days, these links of the Pharaoh-Nepeks." Sarolta was the head of the gipsy tribe, and the story is of Hungary. A grim romance. (White. 6s.)

ANGELS UNAWARES. BY E. BLACKMORE.

This story opens in Fortnum & Mason's—surely a new setting for a first chapter. Otherwise it is not remarkable for anything but amateurishness. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

"The Heir of Redclyffe."

An Inquiry.

THE English of all the world know the name of Charlotte M. Yonge, and if you ask them what she has written, they will unhesitatingly reply: "The Heir of Redclyffe." She is responsible for other volumes—at least a hundred and twenty of them, for during fifty years she has shown the almost fabulous fecundity of a Dumas; and to the activities of an author she has added those of a journalist and a passionate religionist. The Monthly Packet is hers, and under the Southern Cross you will find the missionary college and the missionary ship which she built to further a cause. Yet, as she was at thirty, before the Crimean War, so she is now at seventy-five—with half a century of admirable accomplishment behind her—the author of The Heir of Redclyffe. That book is her sign-manual upon an epoch.

Those of us who live by weighing words in the balance have a habit of choosing our private perusals from a very narrow circle of literature. In my case The Heir of Redclyffe happened to lie without that circle. The book existed in my mind as a "safe" story for girls. It would never have occurred to me to read it had I not encountered the following passage in Mr. J. W. Mackail's Life of William Morris:

The romances of Fouqué, which supplied Morris with the germ of his own early tales, became known to him through another book which exercised an extraordinary fascination over the whole of the group, and in which much of the spiritual history of those years may be found pre-figured—The Heir of Redclyffe. In this book, more than in any other, may be traced the religious ideals and social enthusiasms which were stirring in the years between the decline of Tractarianism and the Crimean War. The young hero of the novel, with his over-strained conscientiousness, his chivalrous courtesy, his intense earnestness, his eagerness for all such social reforms as might be effected from above downwards, his high-strung notions of love, friendship, and honour, his premature gravity, his almost deliquescent piety, was adopted by them as a pattern for actual life; and more strongly, perhaps, by Morris than by the rest, from his own greater wealth and more aristocratic temper. Yet Canon Dixon, in mentioning this book as the first which seemed greatly to influence Morris, pronounces it, after nearly half a century's reflection and experience, as "unquestionably one of the finest books in the world."

After that, to ignore The Heir of Redclyffe was clearly impossible. I read it. As a piece of literary art it seems to me to fall short of distinction. It is not, on the whole, strongly imagined, though I must own to being genuinely moved by the simple and profound tragedy of the hero's death. Its faults of construction, and the absence of dramatic feeling, make it tedious; there is no economy of means, no reticence, no selection, and the length is prodigious—nearly a quarter of a million words. More important, there is no style, and even very little care for the dignity and refinement of English; to my dying day I shall never forget Charles Edmonstone's dressing-gown, which was all over pagodas. Finally, there is no humour.

However, no one desires, I least of all, to judge The Heir of Redclyffe as a piece of literary art. It is a document, and a document of marvellous interest. Already it has the air of old fashion, with its quaint locutions long since passed out of use. It appertains to a period: it goes with Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," The Crystal Palace, Patmore's Angel in the House, Millais' "The Huguenot," and the Albert Memorial. It shows us what we of to-day have gained—in intellectual freedom and wider horizons. But it also shows us what we have lost—earnestness and the faculty of unashamed devotion to an ideal. We have our ideals now, but when they are mentioned we feel self-conscious and uncomfortable, like a schoolboy caught praying. Moreover, such ideals as we possess are social. Ideals were moral then. Religion had a more authentic force; the Church a stronger sanction. There was Duty and there was Sin. People were frankly serious. They said: "Is this right? Is this wrong?" They fought against Self striving for mastery. They yearned towards righteousness. And they did these things openly. The women of the race practised submission, holy ignorance, and almsgiving. For a maiden, the worst crime was to be unmaidenly, the noblest achievement to become the dutiful and sacrificial helpmeet of a good man of ample means.

What is it in the mere sound of the name "Amabel" that calls up a vision of that era—of the luxurious country house wherein heroines played at "Definitions" and painted in water-colours and permitted the chivalrous advances of eligible cousins; of the family circle gathered at evening round "the instrument," while the superb tenor of the hero-baronet joined in some rendering of "Belle Mahone" or "Look Aloft"; of polite couples "pacing the terrace" in philosophic converse; of blushes, trepidations, and sudden self-concealments from the family gaze? Amabel signified all this for me before I knew her. And now that I know her I may "quiz," but I also admire. Amabel is the more heroic of Miss Yonge's two heroines, the one absolutely without soil. Laura, the elder sister, was a girl nobly loyal; but she was guilty of a secret attachment. Knowing that Philip loved her, she did not divulge the fact to her parents. For Amabel such conduct would have been impossible. She was engaged to Sir Guy, loved him devotedly; yet when Guy, desiring to borrow a thousand pounds for a secret purpose, was suspected of gambling, she honestly strove, in accordance with the paternal behest, to "think no more of the fellow." Even when her brother offered to show her a letter which he had publicly received from the banished youth, she first ran to her mother, and, "averting her face," said: "Mamma, dear, do you think I ought to let Charlie show me that letter?" Mamma, to her eternal credit, said "Yes, dearest," though with qualms. The affair of the thousand pounds was explained on Guy's death-bed. He had wanted it—you will never guess!—in order to found a religious sisterhood; but Amabel's features had no ostentatious smile of moral triumph. These two sisters, amiably inane on days of ease, shone brightly in suffering. It was adversity which proved them. In the hour of disaster their figures take on a strange tragic dignity. The secret of the saints was theirs; they knew the joy of sacrifice and the ecstasy of renunciation. In their faces I seem to see the placid glowing spirituality of the young nun as she gathers the napkin under her chin and closes her eyes to receive the sacred wafer.

And Sir Guy—that Siegfried with the addition of piety; that Saint Francis with an ancestral estate! They are coarse who would laugh at him. He is not to be mistaken for a prig. Philip is the prig, and it is one of the functions of Philip's priggishness to preserve Sir Guy from any suspicion of the same quality. Sir Guy must be accepted as the author offers him—as an ideal of a Man, an ideal perhaps bizarre after forty-six years, but comprehensible enough, perfectly consistent, and far from ignoble.

To make Sir Guy Miss Yonge gathered up all the dreams and pure aspirations of a girlhood passed remote from the world. She remembered all the masculine excellences of her fancy, and imagined a male creature. She did not trouble to compare this male with the males of earth; and she was artistically right in refraining. She acted as a poet then, not as a realist. Realism was as yet uninvented—and, besides, realism is seldom the truth. Miss Yonge bravely discarded the trivialities of verisimilitude, and with an equal courage she scorned the scorn of the profane. With her piety was the first virtue, and so Sir Guy had to be pious. He is vocally pious. He wears his piety upon his sleeve; but it is also within his breast. He is not perfect. Had he been perfect he could have had no motive for that war against the lower Self which for Miss Yonge was so specially the essence of true living. Therefore, Sir Guy had to be afflicted with a fiery and hasty temper, a temper invented by Miss Yonge only that Sir Guy might ultimately subdue it—and die. These momentous matters settled, Miss Yonge was at liberty to be romantic. She made Sir Guy handsome, dark, mysterious, wealthy, and endowed him with a castle conveniently situated near the sea, so that he might behave splendidly as a shipwreck. She gave him every grace, every moral fascination, the manners of an ambassador, the sweet reasonableness of a philosopher, the humility of a saint. Indeed, apart from his temper, he is not of earth. He never existed, never could exist, save in the devout and serious vision of a girl untouched by the world.

There are obvious reasons why the influence of The Heir of Redclyffe—waning, but still powerful—should have been not on the side of progress and intellectual enlargement. It is narrow, dogmatic, inelastic, conventional. Yet one cannot regret it. Are not the angels conservative? If the book has not been an urgent force, it has been a refining fire. Consider the thousands of "English homes" into which it has entered, like a message; those discreet interiors where, sheltered from the east wind of facts and the hot noon of actuality, the exquisite flower of girlhood has been reared. Read on interminable winter evenings before drawing-room fires, pondered over in walled gardens on summer afternoons—The Heir of Redclyffe had no imperfection then. Its limited view, its sweeping omissions, its ignorance, its one-sidedness, its perversions, its impossible dialogue, its undramatic tediousness, its stilted English—these things were not noticed then; they slipped off like an abandoned garment, and the book stood forth for what it was, an impassioned invitation to the young soul to arise and purify itself. As such it was meant. As such it has done its work, and is still doing.

Touching its alleged effect upon Morris and Burne-Jones, that entirely puzzles me. Canon Dixon's appreciation I can understand, and, understanding, can tolerate. But that two of the most individual and daring artists of the century should have been influenced by a book so lacking in both æsthetic beauty and original ideas is a mystery which would need for its solving an inquiry into the moral basis of the great artistic movement of the fifties.

E. A. B.

Tennyson and Virgil.

THE interest taken by the late Lord Tennyson in classical subjects was shown not only in his choice of themes, such as Ulysses, Tithonus, Enone, Tiresias, and others, in which an ancient story was so handled that it proved capable of a touching application to modern thought and feeling, but also in poems like "Lucretius," and the short "Ode to Virgil," in which the "singers" selves found him a theme of song." These last two poems are, in the best sense of the term, appreciations—estimations at its full worth of the poetic work of a great predecessor by a modern master of the art. The short "Ode to Virgil" differs from the dramatic monologue "Lucretius," with its wonderful sympathy and insight into the Lucretian philosophy, in being a direct expression of Tennyson's personal feeling for the great Roman poet; and, although written by request, has all the fervour of genuine spontaneity.

Whatever the Mantuans may have thought of the Englishman's "salutation" of their greatest citizen, there can be no doubt of the admiration felt for the poem by all English lovers of Virgil. Most appropriately does Mr. Page print the Ode in full, by way of introduction to his edition of the text of Virgil's poems for the "Parchment Library" series. The Ode is, in fact, an ideal argument, and may well take the place of a more lengthy prose Introduction for those persons who have acquired a tolerable facility in reading Latin, and a fair knowledge of the text of Virgil.

The opening stanza virtually summarises the Æneid, with more pointed reference to its greatest books—as, e.g., to the Second Book, in "Ilion's lofty temples robed in fire"; to the Fourth Book, in "Dido's pyre"; and to the Sixth Book, as the supreme instance of the "filial faith" of Æneas.

Similarly, the scope of the Georgics is touched upon in Stanza 3, in—

Thou that singest wheat and woodland, tilth and vineyard, hive, and horse, and herd,

—words which recall and are, in fact, a paraphrase of the first four lines of the First Georgic:

Quid faciat lætas segetes, quo sidere terram
Vertere, Mæcenæ, ulmisque adjungere vites
Conveniat, quæ cura boum, qui cultus hab-ndo
Sit pecori, apibus quanta experientia parcis,
Hinc canere incipiam.

It might surprise us at first sight that the Eclogues, Virgil's least original and earliest work, should have two stanzas of the Ode devoted to them; but a little attention shows that a true instinct has guided Tennyson in his references, for the three Eclogues alluded to breathe a personal note, and one of them gives us a glimpse into the best features of Virgil's mind and soul. In the "Happy Tityrus" of the First Eclogue we have an allegorical representation of Virgil himself rejoicing in the restoration of his patrimony. In the Sixth Eclogue the "poet of the poet-satyr" gives expression in the Song of Silenus to those philosophic views which attracted and charmed his youthful studies, and to which, later on in life, he cast back a wistful look. In the Fourth Eclogue Virgil—the "Chanter of the Pollio"—is giving expression to those dim anticipations and vague hopes which have haunted the best spirits of the age—the longing for a better world and the regeneration of human society, symbolised, according to the ideas of the time, by the return of the Golden Age.

Another feature of this Ode which possesses a charm for scholars is its reminiscent character. This appears (i.) in expressions which are almost literal translations, as, e.g., "recubans sub tegmine fagi" (Ecl. i. 1), "(piping) underneath his beechen bowers"—compare also the renderings of "toto diversos orbe Britannos" (Ecl. i. 66), "(the Northern island) sunder'd once from all the human race"; and "injiciunt ipsis ex vincula sertis," "(whom the laughing shepherd) bound with flowers" (Ecl. vi. 19); (ii.) in that exquisite paraphrase which condenses in one sonorous line a whole passage of the Fourth Eclogue:

Summers of the snakeless meadow, unlaborious earth and oarless sea;

(iii.) in the seventh stanza—redolent of the Sixth Æneid—in which Tennyson with supreme felicity, giving a metaphorical turn to a celebrated passage, addresses Virgil as the "golden branch"—the talisman by means of which we moderns gain admittance into the shadowy realms of ancient and imperial Rome:

Golden branch amid the shadows,
kings and realms that pass to rise no more;

Again the Ode contains an allusion to Virgil as the poet of Man and Nature. The traces of that Welt-Schmerz, to borrow the modern phrase, discernible as an undercurrent in Virgil's thought and feeling, and here and there making its way to the surface in pathetic single lines and passages of mournful and tender reflection, are well rendered by Tennyson in that memorable line :

Thou majestic in thy sadness at the doubtful doom of human kind.

In regard to nature, Tennyson's "Landscape-lover" is nothing more than the bare truth. Virgil's love for the forests, waters, and mountains of his native Italy comes out in many passages of his poems, either by way of simile or in pure description for its own sake, numerous illustrations of which students will readily recall for themselves. Then, again, Virgil's dim sense of something far more deeply interfused, the source and sustaining power of what is outward and visible in the Universe, expressed in the Fourth Georgic and the Sixth Æneid, is noted by Tennyson in a paraphrase of a remarkable passage in the latter book :

Thou that seest Universal
Nature moved by Universal Mind.

It remains to notice the appreciation of Virgil as a stylist by a poet who was himself a "lord of language," and whose stately rhythm in this Ode recalls the march of the Virgilian hexameter.

In the two lines—(i.):

All the chosen coin of fancy flashing out from many a golden phrase;

and—(ii.):

All the charm of all the Muses often flowering in a lonely word;

are summed up and flashed upon us in clear and vivid phrase: those peculiar excellences of Virgil's style which constitute the despair of the translator, and the delight of the lover of poetry eager to penetrate into the secret sources of the beauty of poetic diction. Of these "golden phrases" numerous instances are given in the index, under the heading "Style," at the end of each book of Mr. Sidgwick's edition, and the interest of the student in marking them is further stimulated in the notes. To take one example from Virgil, which has a special fitness in connexion with Tennyson's Ode, the words describing the "golden branch" tinkling in the gentle breeze—"leni crepitabat bractea vento"—afford a good illustration.

The expression "lonely word," however, has acquired a peculiar interest since the appearance of Tennyson's biography. It is related there that during the course of a conversation with the President of Magdalen College, Oxford, on the subject of Virgil, Tennyson quoted, as an instance of the "lonely word," the epithet "cunctantem" (ramum) (Æneid vi. 211), where in a single word is condensed a picture of Æneas pulling at the golden bough, which will not come away quickly enough to satisfy his too great eagerness; the notion also of personality suggested by the word adding a further touch of vividness. Two other good examples occur in the Eclogues—"intonsi" (montes) and "arguta" (ilex).

We note, in conclusion, the natural transition by which, after contrasting the "Rome of slaves" of that age with the "Rome of freemen" of to-day, Tennyson, by a seeming contrast—which is really no contrast at all, but implies the thought of Virgil as an imperishable link binding together the present and the past, and with his spiritual presence still haunting his native land—salutes the poet, whom, in his opening stanza, he had hailed as "Roman Virgil," by the title "Mantovano," recalling thus the "anima cortese Mantovana" of Dante, and linking himself with the Great Florentine in a common veneration for one whom both regarded in the light of a Master:

I that loved thee since my day began.

Things Seen.

Unsought.

AN, yes, I must have that cliff farm in my portfolio. So, gathering up my sketching kit, I set off along the dusty road, happy in my intention to capture some scintilla of the earth's beauty!

The farm was well enough. A cluster of gables and new haystacks at the foot of a field that sloped down to the cliff. You see it? It was the high sky-line of the sea, higher than the roofs, and higher than the trees that sheltered the farm, that so took me. When I had finished, the twilight had fallen and the air was keen. Far away, I heard a woman's voice calling to some wandering "Willie." The birds sank their vespers in the thickets, and the stillness of eternity was on the sea.

I turned, and in a moment saw . . . have you ever seen this?—the white wisp of the young moon embranched among white wild roses at that moment when the whiteness of the roses is one with the whiteness of the moon. Oh, inviolable delicacy of whiteness! Oh, airy bridal-wreath of Day and Night! Oh, vision of our innocence, sequestered and safe! I walked home. Camilla said, looking at my sketch: "This will be a nice record of the old farm." "Of the farm?" I said absently.

A Mood.

AT sundown the rain ceased, but the leaden clouds still hung over the city, and the air was hot and heavy with thunder. Then some left the streets and walked towards the fields, and among them was one on whom the atmospheric influences had the effect, as it were, of detaching him from himself. He walked heavily as in a dream, conscious of the depression of the hour, but indifferent to it; indeed, mildly contemptuous, as if his mood belonged to another. Presently he came to the Great Green Space where lakes lie, and upland fields stretch away to the hills that border the Great Green Space. He stood on the verge of the sodden grass—gazing. Far away, like a giant jewel in the fold of the wet fields, gleamed the lights of the bandstand, and about it, row upon row, tier upon tier, were empty chairs, and each chair dripped water. Not a soul had dared the wet grass, but on the fence that skirted the largest of the lakes some half-a-hundred pleasure-seekers sat bedraggled. The music came faintly to them, across the sodden fields; came also to the man who stood gazing at the dim hills that stretched to one another on the hem of the Great Green Space.

The whole landscape was shrouded in thin mysterious mist. Unreal, unsubstantial, everything seemed to him. He seemed to be gazing at a world in which he had no lot, something dim and apart—a land of dreams.

It was as if mankind were taking part in a play by Maeterlinck.

Far away on the crest of the dim hills figures, like marionettes, walked—little figures who had the power of movement and nothing else. It was strange, but to him the real world seemed to be the reflections of the trees in the still waters of the lake. All else was unreal. Fragments of Maeterlinck passed, without effort of memory, through his brain:

"A time will come, perhaps, when our souls will know of each other without the intermediary of the senses."

"Nothing is visible, and yet all is revealed."

"Is it while I flee before a naked sword that my existence touches its most interesting point?"

"Does the soul only flower on nights of storm?"

"It is only by the communications we have with the infinite that we are to be distinguished from each other."

"No tongue can tell the power of a soul that strives to live in an atmosphere of beauty, and is actually beautiful in itself."

And with the word "soul" another passage by another writer came to him, and it remained while in his head Chopin's "Funeral March" drummed, but the band was not playing Chopin. The passage that remained was that sentence wherein Lowell explains the secret of Burke's strength through all the vicissitudes of his career—"because he was profoundly conscious of the soul that underlies and outlives material events." "That 'outlives material events'!" the man thought vaguely—"how very natural." Then, sub-consciously, he knew that presently one of the half-hundred people sitting there on the fence would notice him. She was a young woman of the factory class—awkward, arch, ill-dressed—accompanied by a surly sweetheart, who was smoking a short pipe. Suddenly the girl sprang from the fence and began to capor on the sodden grass. "It's 'Poet and Peasant' they're playing," she cried. "I play that! Come along, Alf, and have a dance." For a minute Alf stared dully, scornfully, at the girl. Then he took his pipe from his mouth, looked at the wet grass, at his sweetheart's muddy petticoats, and said: "Not me! I'm no jay!" The girl showed no resentment. Her attention was arrested by the man who thought the world had become a play by Maeterlinck. "Have a dance, Guv'nor?" she said. Then the world ceased to be a play by Maeterlinck.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE death of Mr. Stewart Hodgson would have been a more considerable event, in the world of art at any rate, had it not been preceded by the commercial fall of the great house of Baring. A handsome part of the wealth he derived when he was a partner in that firm in the days of its prosperity was spent in the studios, and spent with more judgment than was generally shown by the buyers of his own generation. That twenty-feet long "Daphnephoria" of Leighton's could hardly have been commissioned (and generously) by anybody but the owner of the proportionately big house at Lythe Hill, Haslemere. That, of course, was before the City complications which led to his flitting into the much humbler manor-house at Haslemere—a residence more in scale with the same artist's portrait of Stewart Hodgson's daughter. Nor did the ministering of Leighton's brush to this appreciative patron's taste stop with these two canvases, for the town-house he then occupied contained many illustrations of Leighton's decorative fancy; and no man was a more frequent or welcome visitor than Stewart Hodgson in those days to the gay, yet industrious, studio in Holland Park-road.

A PICTURE of Mr. Whistler's, for which he had £600 some years ago, has just been re-sold for a little over three times that sum. The names of seller and of purchaser alike had best be suppressed, or they might be made the rallying-points of a bristling brochure.

THE Queen, of whom there is a record of frank portraiture in Mr. Onslow Ford's marble bust in the Academy, is not of the rather large company of ladies who prefer not to sit, after they have reached a certain age, to the painter, or even the photographer. Three different portraits of Her Majesty will shortly be seen—one painted by a Frenchman, another by a German, and the third by a Scotsman. Von Angeli has, of course, been castled at Windsor. Not so favoured has been M. Benjamin Constant, London's guest for several weeks past, whose portrait shows the Queen seated on her throne, her face flooded with light, but, even so, betraying few of its wrinkles. For accessories there are lions and unicorns, stars and garters galore. Mr. Orchardson's large family group picture promises well; but the painter has been delayed a good deal by his arm trouble; and a vacant space, exciting in its potentialities, is all that yet represents Her Majesty on the large canvas, already peopled by her eldest son, her grandson, and great-grandson.

THE Daily Telegraph reports an interview in Rome with Prof. Ludovico Seitz—a painter of some pretensions, and the Director of the Vatican galleries—all about the decorations of the new Roman Catholic Cathedral at Westminster. "Leo XIII.," we are told, "has often spoken of the great Byzantine erection, and has principally interested himself in the decoration of the walls. This was, indeed, one of the chief points discussed between the Pontiff and Cardinal Vaughan during the visit of the latter to Rome this spring. From what the Archbishop of Westminster said, it would appear that he cherishes," &c., &c. It is not worth quoting as an imaginary conversation, and it cannot be quoted as a real one. "We easily might have talked of the new Cathedral," said Cardinal Vaughan, on reading of his supposed conversation with the Pope; "but it just chances that it was never so much as named." The rest of the Daily Telegraph interview may be taken with equal reserve; and if it is a feeler put forth to suggest that a foreign artist, half German and half Italian, should be set to cover those leagues on leagues of wall-space at Westminster, one may be very sure that it will fail of its intent; unless, indeed, it is the supply of decorative talent at home that disastrously fails, or falls short, first of all.

BELVOIR CASTLE, whither the funeral of the Duchess of Rutland drew a large party this week, is everywhere famous for the views to be seen from its windows. But the Duke's house is also "beautiful within" in many particulars, and the collection of pictures includes other masterpieces besides a Murillo's "Holy Family." True, in the fire that burned half the castle in 1816 no fewer than nineteen Sir Joshuas perished. Even so, Sir Joshuas still remain, and, among others, that portrait of his, representing the militant Marquis of Granby, of which so many travesties have appeared on inn sign-boards all over the country. Nature, as Junius once remarked, did not lavish personal gifts upon the Marquis, and his middle-aged head is shown as smooth as a billiard-ball in Sir Joshua's picture, which presents in this, as in other respects, a striking contrast to the portrait of the present Duke, with his ample octogenarian locks, painted by Mr. Herkomer, R.A.

AT the Hovingham Musical Festival the other day "a novelty was afforded in a choral setting of Keats's Prophecy by Mrs. Tom Taylor, a Yorkshire lady who has long been known as an exceptionally gifted amateur." The Times is responsible for this vaguely worded labelling of "the Yorkshire lady," who is the widow of its own former art critic and the editor of Punch. Mrs. Tom Taylor, we may add, composed this music longer ago than she may now care to remember. She always shrank from its production, however, and only permitted it now because she supposed—and with some reason, it seems—that after many years of retirement and widowhood, forgetful of the world, she was by the world forgot.

A JUDGE on the Bench, and newspaper leader-writers in general, have this week had occasion, in speaking of three Sir Robert Peels, to differentiate the first of the series as "the great Sir Robert." Relatively he was "the great Sir Robert," no doubt, and even actually, when all men are brought into the comparison. But the phrase has its doubtful meanings, its hints of a smile in company with the epithet on the lips of its framer, as you are made to feel in every allusion to "the great Mel" in Evan Harrington.

UNEXPECTEDLY enough I met the other day with a distant cousin of "the great Mel," and in a letter devoted to prosaic facts. In the year 1842 Disraeli crossed to Paris, starting from the Thames, and thus wrote of one of his companions on board :

One of our fellow-travellers was "the great Mr. Candy," as he was described by the captain of the vessel, with his lady reclining on cushions, children in various silken cloaks, continually changed and adjusted, and Candy himself, in the height of the fashion, florid and frank, with new kid gloves and gold-headed cane. On inquiry he turned out to be a silk-dealer or warehouseman or something, and was a source of infinite amusement.

THE second and third performances of "Messaline" were, needless to say, the test of the new work in London; and at their close Mr. de Lara must have been convinced that his work had taken hold upon more than his own friends. The accusation of a contemporary against the libretto is an astonishing piece of prudery which seems to prove nothing but the incoherence of present feeling on the point of public morals. "Messaline" is a tragedy as unimpeachable as "Faust," and Mr. de Lara's music does no more than its dramatic duty in expressing the action and passion of an operatic woman. No one has ever professed to be shocked at the dramatic expression of the evil character—equally tragically required—of an operatic man.

Dorislau Dead.

[Isaac Dorislau, a lawyer of Dutch birth, long resident in England, was employed in the preparation of the case against Charles I. Having been shortly afterwards despatched as special envoy to the United Provinces, he was murdered while at supper in the public room of his inn by a party of English cavaliers. Carlyle has this notice of him: "Dr. Dorislau, by birth Dutch; appointed Judge-Advocate at the beginning of Essex's campaignings; known afterwards on the King's trial; and finally, for that latter service assassinated at the Hague, one evening, by certain high-flying Royalist cut-throats, Scotch several of them." In Evelyn's diary, under date June 13th, 1649, it is written: "This night was buried with great pomp Dorislau, slaine at the Hague, the villain who manag'd the trial against his sacred Majesty." A similar fate overtook Anthony Ascham, the Parliament's envoy at Madrid. In the following poem one of the murderers of Dorislau, being rebuked by members of his own faction, makes his defence.]

PITY? What pity? He got at the last
Such pity as he and his like have shown
To us and to all that have holden fast
By our father's God and the ancient throne.

If ye be of us (and I know ye be),
Give thanks that your eyes are not grown more grim,
That ye still have pity; but answer me,
If ye be of us, why pity ye him?

With the blood of the King his hands were wet,
Warm from that slaughter he fell to our sword,
He hath paid his life to the standing debt
For the sacred life of our Sovereign Lord.

He drudged for the traitors, he shared their task,
And he served them here, he talked in their place;
'Tis as though he had worn the headsman's mask,
As though he had spat in the martyr's face.

Perchance had we sat with our naked swords
And chattered a little about the past,
While one made ready with pulleys and cords,*
When the play was ended, to bind him fast;

* "Staples were therefore hammered into the floor of the scaffold to afford a purchase for ropes, by aid of which, if any resistance were offered, the King could be forced down into the prone attitude in which victims were at that time beheaded."—S. R. Gardiner.

Had we finished our work with butchers' tools,
And brandished the blood-dripping head on high
Had the thing been done according to rules,
Perchance ye would never have asked us why.

But I, who am proud to have struck this stroke,
I fancy that justice and law are things
Too sacred to make an assassin's cloak,
Be they subjects we kill or sceptred kings.

For I, if I hunger to kill a man,
I do not hale him to Westminster Hall;
I cut his throat like a sheep, if I can,
Or else he cuts mine for me—that is all.

Ye say it was murder; I am not awed,
Fools only start at the sound of a name,
But the thing they did to Strafford and Laud,
However men call it, I do the same;

The thing they did to my master and yours,
I did the same to this creature of theirs;
Murder? Maybe—I was bred to the wars,
No schoolman am I to split you such hairs.

However men call it, 'tis life for life,
And lives not a few for the King my Lord,
Only they work with the gallows and knife,
I, lacking a hangman, must use my sword.

I will plead in the Courts of Charles my King,
I will meet my God when I come to die,
But long as I carry a sword to swing
And a wrist uncut and a seeing eye,

I will do justice and judgment on these,
Such justice and judgment as they have done,
Who bow to no law save the sword's decrees,
The might of the many against the one.

I am no stabber for love of the trade,
To slit you a throat in the dark for gold;
If the game of killing must needs be played,
I should choose to play on an English wold,

On an English wold in the free, fresh air,
To the rush of hoofs and the trumpet's ring—
But what odds if I play it here or there,
So long as I kill them who killed my King?

Honour is somewhat? Aye, honour is all,
And little is got by this hangman's deed;
But whether the merit be great or small,
Why should I, childless and wifeless, heed?

For my fair bride died with her babe divine
At Colchester, leaguer beyond the sea,
And I am the last of my ancient line:
Honour, dishonour—all passes with me.

But now in the meantime my life is left
To do what I will with, my arm is long,
And my eye is clear, and my hand is deft,
And I hate the men that have done this wrong,
That have killed God's King for a lawyer's lie,
That have rent God's Church for a rabble's whim;
The blood they have spilled and their blasphemy
Smokes up like a furnace always to Him.

And ye, what are ye to babble and prate
Of pity to me? Ye are outlaws too,
And the iron bond of the exile's hate
Should bind us together, both me and you.

For the robber sits in our fathers' halls;
By the tyrant's ban we are landless men.
Ye will fight, ye say, when the trumpet calls;
I also shall not be the hindmost then.

But now, since the battle is not arrayed,
And the kites must wait for a larger meal,
I kill as I may, without leave or aid,
Save this in the scabbard that smites my heel.

The Empty Homes of England.

ONE of the prime delights of London town is the extreme rurality of its outer suburbs—always, worse luck, drawing nearer to the zone of brick. Many is the pleasaunce, ten or a dozen miles from the Royal Exchange—who knows exactly what men do, what they buy and sell at the Royal Exchange?—which for silence and solitude, for clarity of atmosphere and charm of garden, might be in Devonshire or Cumberland. Precisely such a place is the Elizabethan house of Franks, near Farningham, only one-and-twenty miles from London, which Messrs. Debenham, Tewson, Farmer & Bridgewater are offering for sale by private contract. Here are over five hundred acres of arable, meadow, and woodland, intersected for nearly a mile by the Darent, which is no mean trout-stream; for did not Spenser write of—

. . . the still Darent, in whose waters clear
Ten thousand fishes ply and deck his pleasant stream.

The dry fly it is which the Darent trout loves. Franks itself is delicious, with its recessed Elizabethan front, its slightly advanced wings, its ruddy Tudor brickwork, bold mullions, and richly decorated and pleasantly twisted chimneys. Here we have all the graces of antiquity with the comforts of modernity, for an owner of a generation or two ago adapted the interior to the ways of cosiness and convenience while dealing gently with the spirit of the place. We need not trace the devolution of the property through the mediæval centuries; suffice it to say that it took its name from the Yorkshire family of Frankish, which migrated to Kent in the time of Henry III. The modern history of Franks begins with its purchase towards the end of the sixteenth century by Launcelot Bathurst, who, in 1591, built the present house—the original dwelling had been on the opposite side of the river. His arms, in painted glass, together with those of the City of London and the Grocers' Company, bearing that date, are still in one of the ground-floor bay windows. Through a succession of owners the place passed, sometimes by descent, and sometimes by purchase, till, in 1860, by way of the auction-room, it reached the late Mr. Robert Bradford. He found it being used as a farmhouse and in a condition of some dilapidation, and set himself to restore it to its olden dignity. How well he succeeded he who has ever seen Franks may say. The fine old hall, with its latticed gallery, is still there, unaltered save that it has been lengthened: there is a very agreeable view of it in Nash's Mansions of England in the Olden Time. The house is full of moulded stuccoed ceilings and fine fireplaces. A note on its value to conclude. In 1830 Franks was sold for £14,000; in 1832, for £16,000; in 1860, for £32,000; in 1872, for some advance upon the last figure.

Any modern Monte Cristo who may desire an island all to himself is advised to apply to Messrs. Trollope, of Mount-street, from whom he will be very likely to hear something to his advantage. For have they not in hand, for private sale, the castle and island of Branksea, at the mouth of Poole Harbour? The lord of Branksea (or Brownsea as it used to be called) might be as solitary or as sociable as it pleased him. The pretty island would be all his own; while just over the way is the Isle of Purbeck, with the queer little town of Swanage, full of bits of old London carefully removed and re-erected. Almost equally close are Bournemouth and the Isle of Wight—here, indeed, we are among the islets of the blest. Branksea itself is exceeding pleasant, its 750 acres being broken up into quite romantic glens and dells, dominated sometimes by respectable hills. Nor is the place destitute of historical interest. The ancestor of the present castle was the blockhouse fortress which Henry VIII. built as part of his scheme for fortifying the southern coasts against foreign invasion. Little of this now remains, but in Elizabeth's time a much more important fortress was made, and in the Civil Wars it was strengthened considerably. The castle has been greatly added to at various times, and is now a house of considerable magnitude. Mr. Humphrey Sturt, something more than a century ago, spent £50,000 in enlarging it and improving the gardens and plantations. Then, in 1817, came Sir Charles Chad, who was also an improver on a large scale. Somewhere about that time it was that the Prince Regent, like Charles I. in more troubled times, visited the island. Since then Branksea has had several owners. There was Col. Waugh, who lived there in great state, built a pier and a church, and began to work the potters' clay of which the island chiefly consists, but was ruined by the failure of the Royal British Bank. The late Mr. Cavendish Bentinck was the next owner; and it next passed, in 1894, to Captain Balfour. The house was partly burned three winters ago, but has been restored.

If one cannot be the rose, the next best thing is to dwell nigh unto it. That would be the delightful condition of whosoever should buy the compact Highborn Estate, in the North Riding, which Messrs. Richardson & Trotter will put up for sale at York next Tuesday. The rose in this case is Coxwold, with its many memories of Laurence Sterne. The property nearly adjoins Coxwold Church, is very close to Newburgh Priory, the legendary burial-place of Cromwell, and so often the dining-place of the author of Tristram Shandy. Rievaulx Abbey and Byland Abbey are a mere drive away. In the midst of a fine stretch of pastoral country, Coxwold is a very pleasant village. The old grammar school and the picturesque Shandy Hall still exist. In the parlour of the Hall were written both Tristram Shandy and The Sentimental Journey. Sterne has left a memorable picture of his life in this charming old house, with its pleasant garden. In 1767 he wrote to a friend: "I am as happy as a prince at Coxwold, and I wish you could see in how princely a manner I live—'tis a land of plenty. I sit down alone to venison, fish, and wild fowl, or a couple of fowls or ducks, with curds and strawberries and cream, and all the plenty which a rich valley (under Hambleton hills) can produce—with a clean cloth on my table and a bottle of wine on my right hand, and I drink your health."

Jack-o'-Lantern.

CAN you not see me careless? Can you not feel me weak?
Dear hands upon my heart-strings, dear lips upon my cheek,
Out of a world of wandering men is this the man you seek?
These eyes that look through yours, my dear, have looked into the Pit,
Will look again, and yet again, and linger over it.
Are lights, my love, o' nights, my love, not all in heaven lit?
If I am Jack-o'-Lantern, sweet, however you draw nigh,
I cannot warm you, but must see you cold until you die.
Will you not choose a homely hearth to sit and warm you by?
You choose the wildfire even so? You follow where I go?
Oh, sweet heart and soft heart, made strong for me to know,
Although I go I will return; although I change and grow,
Or change and lessen, on your heart my wayward heart
I stay:
Your steady light my wandering light shall draw and feed and sway:
And I will love you, sweet, as well as Jack-o'-Lantern may.

NORA HOPPER.

Correspondence.

Another Kilmarnock Burns.

SIR,—All collectors will feel grateful to you for your interesting article on the "Kilmarnock" Burns, with its instructive table of prices, &c.

It might interest your readers to have a glimpse behind the scenes connected with the life of one of the copies described. About 1880 I became acquainted with a rich City collector, who told me he would gladly give £50 for a copy, and for a time I kept a pretty sharp look out for one. I heard through a friend that Mr. Stille, the old Edinburgh bookseller, knew of a copy. I wrote him, and he informed me that he knew of one in the possession of an old lady in Ayrshire, and that £30 was the price. I said if it was in fair condition I would have it at that price; but, on sending it for my inspection, Mr. Stille said that, on close examination, it was believed that the last leaf of the glossary was in facsimile, and that the price would be reduced to £20.

I took the book to my friend and explained its supposed defect; but he was so keen to have it that he drew me a cheque for £50 on the spot. I may say that my friend, who was a Dundee man, knew Lamb's copy well.

Some time after, my friend came to me, and, almost with tears in his eyes, said that he could not keep the copy I sold him, as he got dreaming o' nights about the leaf in facsimile. He sent it to Puttick's sale-room, and it fetched £71! This, I believe, is part of the history of the eighth item in your list.

The copy referred to was much cut down, bound in contemporary calf (probably a presentation copy, but with no inscription), and had been much used.

You will see from my signature that I am not the first of my name who has possessed a copy of this unique book, although I have no knowledge of the Glasgow family who originally possessed the Lamb copy, and am perhaps better acquainted with its commercial value than they could have been.—I am, &c.,

JAMES DRUMMOND.

37, Perham Road, W.: July 14, 1899.

Matthew Arnold's Creel.

SIR,—How many salmon did Matthew Arnold "capture"? "S. G.," in the Pall Mall Gazette—quoted by you last week—says one, and that "his first and only salmon" was caught on the Wye "almost within the last years of his life." But Matthew Arnold himself tells a different story. In letters to Mrs. Grant Duff and Lady de Rothschild, dated September 17, 1866 (more than twenty years before his death) he writes—and his delight is that of a boy—of a "salmon capture" made by him on the Deveron ("What a beautiful river it is!"): "Now I am come back, having, as perhaps you have seen from the 'public journals,' caught a salmon." (Letters of Matthew Arnold, Vol. I., p. 337).—I am, &c.,

JAMES V. ROGERSON.

49, Reginald-terrace, Leeds: July 17, 1899.

The High History of the Graal.

SIR,—My friend Dr. Evans asks "why, if Mr. Nutt had read the French romance, or Mr. Williams's translation of the Welsh translation, did he not give an abstract of the version?" On page 64 of my Studies will be found the following note: "I have not thought it necessary to give a summary of the prose romance Perceval le Gallois. The version, though offering many interesting features, is too late and unoriginal to be of use in the present investigation." On page 67 I stated definitely that little was to be gained from this romance "respecting the oldest forms of the legend." I further pointed out that the Welsh translation represented an earlier form of the romance than the text printed by Potvin. Dr. Evans continues: "Why did Mr. Nutt leave it to me to point out for the first time that this (romance), and none other, is 'the Graal, the Book of the Holy Vessel?'" For the simple but sufficient reason that it is no such thing. I may have put aside the romance translated by Dr. Evans as the High History too hastily; secondary sources are often useful in preserving traits that primary sources have lost. But that the High History is a late and secondary source, that it is not, as Dr. Evans vainly imagines, the fons et origo of the Grail legend, is my conviction, and that of every scholar who has investigated the matter at first hand. I am perfectly content to refer the decision of this point to M. Gaston Paris, to MM. Lot, Muret, and Philpot, to Profs. Heinzel and Birch-Hirschfeld, to Drs. Freymond and Baist. We should none of us probably agree as to the exact position of the romance in the development of the cycle; we should one and all agree in considering Dr. Evans's contention that it is "the first and most authentic" version of the legend to be utterly baseless. It is, of course, possible that all other scholars are wrong and that Dr. Evans alone is right. There is one way, and one way only, by which he can make good the claim he advances: he must work through the mass of Grail romances and establish their order of development, on the hypothesis that the High History is the earliest form of the story. Until he has done this he must excuse serious students taking his assertions, uncompromising as they are, seriously; when he has done this he will, I think, be the first to see that his theory won't hold water.

So much for the comparatively unimportant question as to the true place of the High History in the development of the Grail legend, a question upon which only those are qualified to give an opinion who have studied the texts of the legend at first hand. Now for the larger question of whether there is a Celtic substratum to the legend. Dr. Evans is of opinion that the Celtic theory as applied to the Grail legend is played out. I can only assure him that he is entirely mistaken, and that he is mistaken because he has not followed the progress of research, and is unacquainted with the data necessary to the formation of an instructed opinion. As a simple matter of fact, the number of competent scholars prepared to give a modified adherence to my views is larger now than it was ten years ago, and the measure of adherence would be more pronounced. The reason is one which even the non-expert can appreciate. Many of the parallels and analogies upon which I relied were drawn from Irish and not from Welsh sources; it was objected that I had no right to use Irish and Welsh evidence as interchangeable, and it was in this respect that I had to encounter my fiercest criticism from Prof. Zimmer. The research of the last ten years has fully vindicated my position; the intimacy of the relations between Irish and Welsh mythic romance is daily becoming more apparent, as is also the influence of Irish legend upon that of Britain, and, through Britain, of Europe. The reasons of principle invoked against me by Prof. Zimmer, in 1890, have, in fact, ceased to operate. I may be allowed to quote one instance of the trend of research as having special interest for the ACADEMY. In 1891, Dr. Whitley Stokes cited in your columns an Irish version of the romantic theme represented in English literature by Chaucer's "Wife of Bath's Tale." I shall publish next year, in the Grimm Library, a study upon this theme by an American scholar, Dr. Maynadier. The conclusion to which he comes is that not only the Irish tales may be looked upon as the source of the English ones, but that they influenced England directly, and not through the medium of France.

I have, of course, no hope of converting Dr. Evans; indeed, his own theory is so delightful an exercise of the faculty of pure imagination that it would be cruel to disturb his faith in it. But I may appeal for one moment to the general reader. There are in the Grail legend two elements—a Christian and a non-Christian one. I assume the latter to be earlier on the ground that while a Christian story might take over a non-Christian one, and thus preserve non-Christian elements, it could not originate them. These non-Christian elements are connected by the names of the personages and places of the story with Celtic legend. I therefore, in the first place, turn to Celtic legend for an explanation of the non-Christian elements of the Grail legend. These two assumptions can be judged of by anyone who possesses common sense and some modicum of the critical faculty, and I venture to think that they will commend themselves to him. The use I make of these assumptions and the results at which I arrive can, however, only be judged by fellow-experts. With all respect to my friend Dr. Evans and to Mr. Courthope, whose authority he invokes, I must decline to place them in this category, neither of them having, so far as is apparent, done that which alone gives right of judgment—namely, examined critically all the texts of the cycles.—I am, &c.,

ALFRED NUTT.

In Praise of the Strawberry.

Our Literary Competitions.

RESULT OF No. 41.

IN response to our request for a poetical eulogy, not exceeding twenty-four lines, of the strawberry, a goodly number of effusions reach us. The best eulogy is this, by Mr. F. B. Doveton, Karsfield, Torquay:

STRAWBERRIES.

I.

An even better berry yet
God could have made; but it is clear
Thou, luscious strawberry, art set
Above all berries far and near.

II.

Fair crimson globule, still to thee
All other fruits the palm must give,
Peach, apricot, and raspberry,
And dainty nectarine, as I live!

III.

And when Devon's cream we use,
Thy rare enchantment is complete,
Abashed and silent is the Muse
That whilom sang so passing sweet.

IV.

She cannot praise those charms aright
That lie beneath thy crimson guise;
Ambrosia yieldeth less delight,
And "honey dews of Paradise."

V.

June bringeth in her laughing train
A many pleasant things and dear;
But thou the Queen of all dost reign,
The sweetest product of the year!

Here are others:

TO THE STRAWBERRY.

O queenly form, most pure, most sweet,
Your joyous reign is all too short;
Your name is murmured at the Court,
And clamoured in the loud-tongued street.

Fastidious kings who sit at wine,
And pass the bottle each to each,
Coldly reject the proffered peach,
And wave aside the lordly pine,

But yield their senses to your spell
And sit and eat their royal fill
With other potentates, until
They feel excessively unwell.

The peasant with secure delight
Denies himself the humble stew,
Or pie, that he may taste of you
With undiminished appetite.

However widely men dispute
On minor points of Church and State,
All equally participate
In love of you, most genial fruit.

And in the end your willing slave,
The World, when August's fiery breath
Has brought you an untimely death,
Unsated, weeps upon your grave.

[C. H. B. K., Blackheath.]

STRAWBERRY SONG—AFTER SUCKLING.

Hast thou drunk of the woodbine's dew
Before the sun hath dried it?
Or inhaled the violet
Before thine eye have spied it?
Hast thou lain in a field of clover
With the sunshine over?
Or hast plucked off the tree the great rose
Where the summer all glows?
Beyond such sweets can sweetness be?
O, more subtle, O, more fresh, O, more sweet is the strawberry.

[L. K., Highgate.]

STRAWBERRIES.

I.

If greedy wish, as preachers tell,
Should not within one's bosom dwell,
Then sinful I, who greedy spy
This wondrous berry;
A berry plump and rolling red,
Massy, yet on the palate spread
Soft as a fairy.

II.

His feast a glorious one I deem
Who has a silver pot of cream,
And some broad plate, heavy with weight
Of crowds of these.
He looks thereon, with merriment
He eateth them, and his content
Doth still increase.

III.

Our English land so soft and fair
Is clung with fruit thick ev'rywhere;
To speak of all, from tree or wall,
Were a long story.
But June's own stately patch receives
Ripe strawberries, blissful in their leaves,
Here is her glory.

[F. W. H., Cardiff.]

THE STRAWBERRY: A SUMMER SONNET.

Fair comes the Summer, fair and soft her charms,
With blessings dropping from her plent'ous arms;
Amid her store there's nothing half so sweet
As strawberries, for gods and mortals, meet.
The essence of the Summer's glory lies
Within the little fruit dome: at your feet,
The fresh lush breath of morning in their sighs,
And dews of evening cool, in summer heat.

Begat by Spring's soft sun and softer showers,
They gladden with their parents' virtues fair
With morning light, they evening glory share
With tints that tell of Summer's burning hours,
A flavour, of the gods—a taste of bliss,
The strawberry, rich and luscious, Summer's kiss.

[H. P. B., Glasgow.]

THE STRAWBERRY.

The bonniest of English fruit,
Thou, strawberry, wast made
By kindly Providence to suit
Our "ninety in the shade."

All other fruits that grow and grew
We honour not the less;
But thou wert nurtured well in view
Of Summer's laziness.

No stones to mar thy juicy pulp,
No unforbidding peel—
We pick thee up, and at one gulp
Thy destiny reveal.

Gathered by many a red-faced queen
'Neath the one-hour-old sun,
Thou'rt borne alike to Bethnal Green,
And stately Kensington.

Now London's demagogues may rest,
Well satisfied to see
How North and South, and East and West,
Consolidate in thee!

[G. W. S., Brixton.]

STRAWBERRIES.

Of all thy sins, insatiate trencherman,
This one, at least, shall not be pardoned thee :
When thou pokest, with indifferent clumsiness,
First in cream, then sugar, lastly in thy mouth,
The bulging spheroids—crimson strawberries,
Embroidered net-like with small golden points.
Such luscious ripeness, dainty savouring,
For thy gross palate is too good by far.
Come, walk with me the garden, and I'll show
How manna should be eaten ! With respect
Approach the bed whereon the wandering plant reposes ;
Inhale the sweetened breathing of the fruits ;
And watch the ripened berries as they hang with fatness,
All be-bowered 'neath protecting leaves ;
And see how, reaching down, they kiss the mother soil
That gave them birth and nursed them on her ample breast.
Now pluck, not large, but small and ripe and red,
And eat the berries as you pluck, with understanding—
Away with sickly sugar ; sweet enough the fruit :
Away with cloying cream ; soft enough the fruit !

Thus eat, as Nature gives, the strawberry,
And eating, thank the goodly earth, the sun, the rain,
For this among their handiworks, the most delicious.

[N. A., Beckenham.]

THE LAST OF THE STRAWBERRIES.

They are over, all but over,
Shrivelled, scorched for lack of rain ;
Let the harmless blackbird hover
O'er the barren leaves in vain !

They are over ! Like a vision
They come—they blush—and straight depart,
They mount to Alpine fields elysian,
To leave to us—a broken heart.

Gooseberries, cherries, other berries
Are unworthy of our care,
Let them float in Charon's wherries
On their Lethæ—anywhere !

They are over, they are over,
And (as ever) all too soon,
Ay, the Sussex strawberry lover
Breathes, perforce, these words—"Next June !"

Saint Swithin, tardy saint !—art weeping
Thy slow and ineffectual tear !
Too late !—For over is their reaping
Until our nineteen hundredth year !

[T. C., Buxted.]

Poems received also from A. J. E., London ; T. H. S., Amsterdam ; H. B., London ; G. N., Clifton ; H. D. H., Anglesea ; L. M. L., Stafford ; M. O. K., Dublin ; N. H., London ; S. P., Manchester ; F. B., London ; E. C. H., Bradford ; J. H., Tunbridge Wells ; H. G. H., Aldeburgh ; E. H., Ledbury ; G. S. A., Ilford ; E. W., Croydon ; J. D. A., Ealing ; J. H., Tavistock ; T. B. D., Bridgwater ; E. M. S., London ; G. W., Hull ; E. C. M. D., Crediton ; B. B., Birmingham ; K., Oxford ; W. M., Dunkeld ; S. R. M., Glendevon ; C. C. C., Hull ; and Mrs. C., Redhill (please read rules).

Competition No. 42.

IN Father Russell's Idyls of Killowen, just published, are four pages of "Irish Literary 'Learic,'" of which this is an example :

Professor R. Yelverton Tyrrell
In Latin is brisk as a squirrel ;
And e'en his Greek prose
As pleasantly flows
As the English of Lang or of Birrell.

We offer a prize of a guinea for the best English Literary "Learic." Any well-known writer may be taken, but the tone of the lines must be critical rather than personal.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, July 25. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 73 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names—both Christian name and surname—and addresses should always be given : we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon, or stamps for the same ; otherwise the first to be looked at will alone be considered.

Books Received.

Week ending Thursday, July 20.

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES-LETTRES.

Russell (Rev. Matthew), Idyls of Killowen ..... (Bowden) 3/6
Little (Marion), Essays on Browning ..... (Sonnenschein) 3/6
Arnold (Sir Edwin), The Gullistan of Sa'di ..... (Burleigh) 3/6
Rogers (A.), The Rajput's Bride ..... (Burleigh) 3/6
Strindberg (A.), The Father. Translated by N. Erichsen ..... (Duckworth) 3/6
An Ideal Husband. By the Author of Lady Windermere's Fan ..... (Smithers) 7/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Falkner (J. Meade), History of Oxfordshire ..... (Stock) 7/6
Vizetelly (E. A.), With Zola in England ..... (Chatto) 3/6
Parkman (F.), The Oregon Trail ..... (Macmillan) 8/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Foa (E.), After Big Game in Central Africa ..... (Black) 21/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Robson (H.), The Principles of Mechanics ..... (The Scientific Press) 2/6
Hutton (F. W.), Darwinism and Lamarckianism ..... (Duckworth) 3/6

EDUCATIONAL.

Fowler (J. H.), Essay Writing ..... (Black) 2/6

NEW EDITIONS.

Hunt (Leigh), The World of Books, &c. ..... (Gay & Bird) 2/6
Sterne (Laurence), A Sentimental Journey. "Temple Classics" ..... (Dent) 1/6
Wordsworth (W.), Sonnets. "Temple Classics" ..... (Dent) 1/6
Melville (C. J. Whyte), Kate Coventry ..... (Ward, Lock) 3/6
Yonge (Charlotte M.), The Two Guardians ..... (Macmillan) 3/6
Pos (E. A.), The Raven, and The Pit and the Pendulum.
With some Account of the Author by Vincent O'Sullivan .. (Smithers) 7/6

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

Announcements.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish early next week the third number of the Novelist. This consists of a complete novel by Mr. Ernest Glanville, entitled "The Inca's Treasure," and is concerned with the adventures of an Englishman among the Indians and Gauchos of Peru.

MR. FISHER UNWIN will publish next week a novel by Mr. Jenner Taylor, entitled Wanted a Hero.

MR. GRANT RICHARDS has made arrangements to issue a large number of the novels that he has published in the course of the last two years in cloth boards for a couple of shillings apiece. The first volumes will be Mr. Frederic Breton's True Heart, and Mr. G. B. Burgin's The Cattleman. They will be followed by volumes from the pens of other popular writers.

TRAVELLERS by the Great Western Railway have always had at Paddington Station an excellent and well-arranged bookstall, with a smaller one for the sale of papers nearer the hotel ; but now, by the pressure brought to bear on the directors by Messrs. Smith's representative, they have a second large stall between the two original ones, so that passengers to the West of England have every opportunity of laying in a good stock of literature for perusal, not only in the train, but at their leisure.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED),

*For the CIRCULATION and SALE of
all the BEST*ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUB-SCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.*Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.*Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in
TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY,
SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SUR-
PLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

80-84, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on
DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £1
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For JULY. Price One Shilling.

CONTENTS.

THE RISE of the "SHORT STORY." By BRET HART.

COLONIAL MEMORIES.—Part II. By Lady BROOME.

THE DECAY of SENSIBILITY. By STEPHEN GWYNN.

THE OLD MAN'S SON. By HORACE ANNESLEY
VACHELL.SUDAN RECOLLECTIONS. By Lieut. H. C. B.
HOPKINSON, Seaforth Highlanders.THE ABODES of the HOMELESS. By the Rev.
Canon BARNETT.AT "the HOUSE" in the FIFTIES. By JOHN A.
BRIDGES.THAT TERRIBLE QUIDNUNC: a Cricket Story.
By ALFRED COCHRANE."POLYGLOT RUSSIAN SCANDAL" in the SIXTIES. By GEORGE SOMES LAYARD.THE MOST SUCCESSFUL BIGAMIST on RECORD.
By F. SCARLETT POTTER.

THE HOTEL MUDIE: a Selection. By HORACE PENN.

CONFERENCES on BOOKS and MEN.—IV. By
URBANUS SYLVAN.LITTLE ANNA MARK. Chaps. 28-31. By S. R.
CROCKETT.London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place.*The Old Series of THE ACADEMY, which
ended on October 1st, completed a volume.
The Index can be obtained gratis on application to the Publisher.A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall &amp; Co. Llangollen: Darlington &amp; Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J.
PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING;
A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORTH WALES COAST. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED, and SNOWDON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, ORIOCIETH, and PWLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world."What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes."—The Times."The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

SECOND EDITION, ENLARGED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With an additional Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON &amp; CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, &amp; Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY."The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained; orComplete Sets may be had separately for 3s. 6d.:—*BEN JONSON.
JOHN KEATS.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.
TOM HOOD.
THOMAS GRAY.
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
LEIGH HUNT.
LORD MACAULAY.
ROBERT SOUTHLEY.
S. T. COLERIDGE.
CHARLES LAMB.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
SAMUEL PEPYS.
EDMUND WALLER.
WILKIE COLLINS.
JOHN MILTON.WILLIAM COWPER.
CHARLES DARWIN.
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.
HENRY WADSWORTH
LONGFELLOW.
ANDREW MARVELL.
ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS CARLYLE.
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.
CHARLES DICKENS.
JONATHAN SWIFT.
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE
THACKERAY.
WILLIAM BLAKE.
SIR RICHARD STEELE.
ALEXANDER POPE.
DOUGLAS JERROLD.
FRANCIS BACON.
HENRIK IBSEN.

Price 1s. net.

TALMATHA: a Play in Four Acts.
By ARTHUR CRUMP."Talmatha" is well done, and is good to read. Zermot, cool and calculating, and Tostry, jealous, headstrong, and passionate—two hostile kings—make the foundation. Then imagine Talmatha, daughter of Zermot, possessed of a sense of filial duty, which is only after a long struggle overcome by her affection for Pouder, son of Tostry; Pouder, a prince, whose love for Talmatha blinds him to all reason; Fosfora, Pouder's mother, faithless to her husband, and indifferent to everything but her intrigue with Zoab; Zoab willing to sacrifice all to realise the supreme happiness of his love for Fosfora; and we have the materials for a plot as bold and original as need be. With such a plot to work upon, it would not be difficult to write a play—of a kind. But Mr. Crump, as we have said, has done it well. His mingled blank verse and rhyme is full of graceful similes and felicitous turns of expression. There is a philosophy of life and of love in it which shows a keen observation and a mind capable of pondering on things seen. The interest is by turns sustained by a happening of the unexpected, by a charming vein of humour, or by plain-spoken eloquence which cannot but arrest the attention. In conclusion, it may be said that the scene in which Tostry debates within himself whether to sacrifice his wife's honour that he may overcome his enemy by strategy is very powerful, as is that where Tostry finds his queen and Zoab together; and Caspar is a well-drawn character of a bluff old soldier."—Richmond and Twickenham Times.

HISCOKE &amp; SON, Richmond, Surrey.

CONTENTS OF AUGUST MAGAZINES.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

No. 270.—AUGUST, 1899.

THE EXCESSIVE ARMIES OF RUSSIA. By Field-Marshal Sir LINTON SIMMONS, G.O.B., G.C.M.G.
 THE LIMITATIONS OF NAVAL FORCE. By Colonel Sir GEORGE SYDENHAM CLARKE, K.C.M.G., F.R.S.
 A WOMAN'S CRITICISM of the WOMEN'S CONGRESS. By Miss FRANCES H. LOW.
 WHAT CHURCH has "CONTINUITY"? By Dr. St. GEORGE MIVART, F.R.S.
 THE RECENT FUSS about the IRISH LANGUAGE. By Professor MAHAFFY.
 THE CONNECTION of ENGLAND with NEWFOUNDLAND. By Sir WILLIAM DES VŒUX, G.C.M.G.
 (formerly Governor of Newfoundland).
 LORD ELLENBOROUGH: A Reply. By the Right Hon. LORD COLCHESTER.
 DID BYRON WRITE "WERNER"? By the Hon. FREDERICK LEVISON GOWER.
 THE MARLBOROUGH GEMS. By CHARLES NEWTON-ROBINSON.
 WHY ARE OUR BRAINS DETERIORATING? By Colonel H. ELSDALE, C.R.E.
 LIFE on the NILE SOUTH of FASHODA. By ARTHUR D. MILNE.
 "THE HUMOURS of TER-NA-NOG." By Mrs. OSMAN COOPER.
 THE "DECAMERON" and ITS VILLAS. By W. J. STILLMAN.
 MADAME NECKER. By the Hon. MARCIA C. MAXWELL.
 THE EVOLUTION of the PARLIAMENTARY OATH. By MICHAEL MACDONAGH.
 THE CASUS BELLI in SOUTH AFRICA. By EDMUND ROBERTSON, Q.C., M.P.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

Monthly, price Half-a-Crown.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

CONTENTS FOR AUGUST.

RACE and RELIGION in INDIA. By A. M. FAIRBAIRN, D.D.
 A NEW TRAMWAY MONOPOLY. By ROBERT DONALD.
 THE REFORM of CHINA. By KANG YEU WEI.
 THE SEVEN SENSES of FISHES. By MATTHIAS DUNN.
 "AS ESTABLISHED by LAW." I. By Canon MACCOLL. II. By J. HORACE ROUND.
 NATURE in the LAST LATIN POETS. By the Countess MARTINENGO CREARESCO.
 ARMS and the GENTLEMAN. By Z.
 THE TRANS-SIBERIAN RAILWAY. By W. DURBAN.
 THE ANGLO-INDIAN CREED. By A HERETIC.
 THE IMPERIALISM of BRITISH TRADE.—II. By RITORTUS.

London: ISBISTER & CO., LIMITED, Covent Garden, W.C.

NOW READY.—Price Eightpence.

CHAMBERS'S JOURNAL,

For AUGUST, contains

THE LOST CAUSE. By D. L. JOHNSTONE.
 HOW SAILORS FIND their WAY at SEA.
 SECRET DESPATCHES. By T. W. BRISHT.
 ON the LIFE and DEATH of BOOKS. By JOSEPH SHAYLER.
 SALMON-FISHING on the NAVER, NUTHERLANDSHIRE.
 By W. A. SOMMERVILLE.
 SOME OLD INDUSTRIES: PIN and CLOCK MAKING.
 BOGUS ANTIQUES.
 SECONDARY EDUCATION in ENGLAND.
 "PENNY-IN-THE-SLOT" GAS METERS and their USERS.
 FEUILLETONS.
 SOME MARVELS of 1900.
 THE PROOF-READER. By MICHAEL MACDONAGH.
 CUCKOO MIMICRY.
 POACHERS and THEIR WAYS.
 THE RED FLAG.
 ADDER BITES.
 THE GOLDFIELDS of SIBERIA.
 MID-OCEAN SHELLS. By C. PARKINSON, F.G.S.
 HUMOURS of the IRISH LAW COURTS.
 SCOTCH FISHER LIFE, AS IT WAS and IS.
 "LLOYD'S" and OVERDUE SHIPS.
 THE MONTH: SCIENCE and ARTS. A Ship's Rudder-Recorder—An Interesting Centenary—Balloons in Warfare—A New Printing Method—A New Cab-Fare Meter—Air Liquefaction—Printing Without Ink—Subterranean Tramways—Aluminium—A Glorification of the Vine—Pile-Driving—Birds' Nests—A Roller and Mower Combined—History in Pottery—Combating Disease—Experiments on the Fertilisation of Plants by Insects—German Exploration of Babylon.
 THE VELVET MOUNTAIN.

CHAMBERS'S JOURNAL,

For AUGUST.

See also next page for CONTENTS of MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE, THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE, THE ARGOSY, THE CENTURY MAGAZINE, and ST. NICHOLAS.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

AUGUST, 1899.—Price SIXPENCE.

PARSON KELLY. By A. E. W. MASON and ANDREW LANG. (Continued.)
 GREAT ORMOND STREET, LONDON. By Prof. HALES.
 THE CRITICAL ESSAY in FRANCE. From the French of PAUL BOURGET.
 A CHANGE of CLOTHES. By C. K. BURROW.
 A FARMER'S YEAR.—XII. By H. RIDER HAGGART.
 THE GREAT LETTER WRITERS.—IV. Madame de Sévigné. By S. G. TALLENTYRE.
 AT the SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co., London, New York and Bombay.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1006.—AUGUST, 1899.—2s. 6d.

THE GHOST-DANCE OF THE FRENCH.—IN CHAINS, by Hugh Clifford.—MORE ABOUT WILDFOWL-SHOOTING in the OUTER HEBRIDES, by Gilfrid W. Hartley.—EXPERIENCES in a QUARANTINE CAMP.—ON TRIAL, chaps. xiv.-xviii., by Zack.—JOHN COOK.—OUR OBLIGATIONS to WILD ANIMALS, by Sir Herbert Maxwell.—A BEDOUIN'S VENGEANCE, chap. iv.—THE PAVILION and the LINKS: THE OLD ORDER and the NEW.—A BOER WAR: THE MILITARY ASPECT.—"HISTORY as SHE OUGHT to BE WRITTEN," by Andrew Lang.—THE LOSS of MOSHI. With Map.—THE POSITION of the GOVERNMENT.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

NOW READY.
 PRICE ONE SHILLING.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

AUGUST—FICTION NUMBER—1899.

CONTENTS.

FRONTISPIECE reproduced in Colour from a Drawing by W. GLACKENS.
 LETTERS of ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Edited by SIDNEY COLVIN. FROM BOURNEMOUTH, 1885-1886.
 THE LION and the UNICORN (a complete Tale of London and American Life). RICHARD HARDING DAVIS. Illustrated by Howard Chandler Christy.
 VAILLANTCEUR (a complete Story). HENRY VAN DYKE. Illustrated by Walter Appleton Clark.
 "THE PLAY'S the THING." ALBERT WHITE VORSE (a complete Story of Italian Life). Illustrations by W. Glackens, reproduced in Colour.
 SPECTRE in the CART. THOMAS NELSON PAGE (a complete Tale). Full-Page Illustration by F. C. Yohn.
 AN URBAN HABBINGER. Poem. E. S. MARTIN. With an Illustration (Frontispiece) by W. Glackens.
 THE TRAIL of the SANDHILL STAG. ERNEST SETON THOMPSON, Author of "Wild Animals I Have Known." Illustrated by Mr. Thompson (a complete Story).

JAPANESE FLOWER ARRANGEMENT. THEODORE WORES. Illustrations from Paintings by Mr. Wores.

DANIEL WEBSTER. With Unpublished Manuscripts and some Examples of his Preparation for Public Speaking. GEORGE F. HOAR.

A ROYAL ALLY. WILLIAM MAYNADIER BROWNE. Illustrated by A. I. Keller.

THE SHIP of STARS. Chaps. 18-20. A. T. QUILLER-ROUCH ("Q").

THE FIELD of ART. Concerning Painters who would express themselves in Words. (John La Farge).

&c. &c. &c.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"Scribner's is synonymous with well-nigh all that is brightest and purest and best in nineteenth-century magazine literature and artistic illustration."—Bournemouth Guardian.

"Scribner's offers a feast of fiction which is almost unequalled, and is certainly not surpassed."

Independent.

"Scribner's Magazine can boast of considerable prestige in respect of its serial fiction."

Birmingham Daily Post.

"This excellent magazine."—Sheffield Telegraph.

"Keeps up to acknowledged standard of excellence in every detail."—Belfast News Letter.

"The illustrations throughout the magazine are beautiful."—World.

London:
 SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

VOLUME I. NOW READY.

The Anglo-Saxon Review

A QUARTERLY MISCELLANY.

Edited by

LADY RANDOLPH SPENCER CHURCHILL.

Small folio, bound in leather, with a design in gold from a richly tooled volume executed about 1604 for King James I. Price 21s. net.

CONTENTS.

Introductory ...	The Editor
A Note on the Binding ...	Cyril Davenport, F.S.A.
The Great Condition ...	Henry James
A Modern Woman ...	Elizabeth Robins
Some Consequences of the Last Treaty of Paris ...	The Hon. Whitelaw Reid
Letters to Vervaine ...	"E. V. B."
Sir Robert Peel ...	The Earl of Rosebery, K.G.
Osborn and Ureynne ...	"John Oliver Hobbes"
All the World's Mad ...	Gilbert Parker
The Battle of the Nile ...	A. C. Swinburne
Wireless Telegraphy ...	Prof. Oliver Lodge, F.R.S.
The Sudan ...	Sir Rudolf Slatin, K.C.M.G.
A Mezzotint ...	Sir Frank Swettenham, K.C.M.G.
Selection from the Letters of Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire ...	Edited by the Duchess of Devonshire
Impressions and Opinions ...
An Epitaph on Charles James Fox ...	With a Note by Earl Grey
Notes on the Portraits of George Washington, Anne of Austria, and Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke ...	Lionel Cust, F.S.A., Director of the National Portrait Gallery

PHOTOGRAPHURE PORTRAITS.

Her Majesty the Queen ...	E. Onslow Ford, R.A.
Lady Mary Wortley Montagu ...	From a Miniature
George Washington ...	Gilbert Stuart
Sir Robert Peel ...	John Linnell
Anne of Austria ...	Rubens
Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke ...	Marc Gheeraerts
Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire ...	Sir Joshua Reynolds

Speaker.—"Its type and paper, its binding in embossed green and gold, are mighty agreeable to the eye. The cover is the subject of a learned note and deserves it."

Times.—"Lady Randolph Churchill has planned her new quarterly magazine with daring originality, and has carried it out with remarkable success. ... nobly printed on noble paper, illustrated with seven first-rate photographures, and, above all, bound with a sumptuousness and a good taste that must go straight to the heart of the bibliophile."

Pall Mall.—"We heartily congratulate Lady Randolph Churchill on her magnificent new quarterly. Her contributors include some of the best known of contemporary names alike in literature and in politics, and the splendid setting given to their work stamps the new publication as a thing apart."

APPRECIATIONS and ADDRESSES by LORD

ROSEBERY. Edited by CHARLES GEAKE. With Portrait and exhaustive Index. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
"It will take its place among the favourites, the oft-read books."—Echo.
"It is this delicate instinct for the word and the form which strikes us chiefly in this volume, and, indeed, in nearly all Lord Rosebery's speeches."—Westminster Gazette.

NEW NOVELS FOR HOLIDAY READING.

DEFENDER of the FAITH. An Historical

Romance. By FRANK MATHEW, Author of "The Spanish Wine." With Three Portraits after Holbein. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Daily News says:

"AN ARTISTIC HISTORICAL NOVEL."

"Mr. Frank Mathew is a literary artist. He has a vivid and evasive touch in style and distinction of presentation. The monarch's figure seems to loom out. Anne Bullen is a very living bit of portraiture. Every scene between her and Henry in the book is a little masterpiece."

BOTH GREAT and SMALL. By A. E. J. Legge,

Author of "Mutineers." Crown 8vo, 6s.
Echo: "Both Great and Small" must be reckoned a very brilliant and a very poignant story of modern love."

THE MANDATE. By T. Baron Russell, Author

of "A Guardian of the Poor." Crown 8vo, 6s.
The Bookman says: "The Mandate" is original and striking. There is unmistakable talent in the book. Mr. Russell should go far."
The Literary World says: "The Mandate" thoroughly deserves to be placed among the good novels that have been published during the last twelve months."

GREATER INCLINATIONS. By Edith Wharton.

Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Any one of the eight stories of which this volume consists would suffice to make the author's reputation."—Critic.
"A clever book and an interesting. The sketches are American in tone, with an undercurrent of humorous pathos that is very charming."—To-day.

HEARTS DESIRE. By Vanda Wathen-Bartlett.

Crown 8vo, 6s.
The Spectator says: "Vail Glanock is really a charming personage, full of dreams and moods, and best of all, quite beautifully dressed. We cannot remember any heroine lately side-glances on whose clothes have been so entirely satisfactory. The little pictures casually presented of Vail's life with her foreign grandmother before her marriage have a great charm, and the dimly outlined figure of the grandmother herself is most delicately and charmingly pencilled in."

MR. PASSINGHAM. By Thomas Cobb, Author

of "Carpet Courtship." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
Punch says: "Permit the Baron to recommend 'Mr. Passingham.' It is an absorbingly interesting story, admirably told, mainly in a crisp, dramatic dialogue, without a note of false sentiment. The characters speak for themselves; and an uncommonly good account they give of themselves too."

JOHN LANE, Publisher, London and New York.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO.'S NEW BOOKS

VOLUMES I. and II NOW READY.

UNIFORM EDITION OF
THE PROSE WRITINGS OF JUDYARD KIPLING.

In 10 vols., extra crown 8vo, red cloth, gilt tops, 6s. each.

PLAIN TALES FROM THE HILLS

With Portrait.

LIFE'S HANDICAP.

Being Stories of Mine Own People.

FIFTH THOUSAND.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF

"ELIZABETH AND HER GERMAN GARDEN."

THE SOLITARY SUMMER.

Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

NEW AND ABRIDGED EDITION.

ANNALS OF AN OLD MANOR HOUSE—

SUTTON PLACE, GUILDFORD.

By FREDERIC HARRISON.

Extra crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

ROLF BOLDREWOOD'S NEW NOVEL.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"WAR to the KNIFE"; or, Tangata Maori.

OUTLOOK.—"Anyone who likes a good story, combined with any amount of information on strange lands, should get this book."

RHODA BROUGHTON'S NEW NOVEL.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE GAME and the CANDLE.

SIXTH EDITION.

CHARACTERISTICS. By S. Weir Mitchell,

M.D., LL.D. (Harvard). Crown 8vo, 6s.

A NEW VOLUME OF FICTION.

MEN'S TRAGEDIES. By R. V. Risley.

CONTAINING:—The Man who Loved—The Man who Hated—The Man who Bore—The Man who Cared—The Man who Fell—The Man who Sneered—The Man who Killed—The Man who Died—The Man who was Himself.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

By Mrs. PARR.

DOROTHY FOX. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE TIMES.—"We must thank the author for a charming novel..... Dorothy Fox herself is represented as charming all hearts, and she will charm all readers."

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

AUGUST.—Price 1s.—CONTENTS.

1. VALDA HANEM (the Romance of a Turkish Harim.) Chapters XVIII.—XX.
2. THE LAKE of the MOURNFUL CRY. By A. G. BRADLEY.
3. THE RANEE'S JOURNEY. By Dr. BOURCHIER.
4. ANGLO-SAXON WOMANHOOD.
5. A PLEA for the DOMESTIC SERVANT.
6. HOW TIM MORGAN WAS CONVINCED. By HAMILTON DRUMMOND.
7. MAN'S LOVE for NATURE. By the Rev. E. J. NEWELL.
8. SAVROLA (a Military and Political Romance). By WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL. Chapters IX.—XI.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE

AUGUST.—Price 1s.—CONTENTS.

1. DONNA TERESA. By F. M. PEARD. Chapters VII.—X.
2. THE SALONS of LONDON.
3. THE TWO TWILIGHTS.
4. SOME POETS in LOVE.
5. SHONAT and CADDI.
6. NORMAN RAMSAY.
7. A YOUNG SOCIALIST.
8. OTTER HUNTING.
9. THE VERGERS.
10. ROSE ADAR.
11. OUTSIDERS. By JOHN ATSCOUGH. Chapters I.—V.

THE ARGOSY.

AUGUST.—Price 1s.—CONTENTS.

1. THE TOWER GARDENS. Chapters XXVII.—XXXI. Illustrated.
2. TO MY MOTHER. By PAUL ENGLAND.
3. THE LOOKER-ON. By C. E. MERTKERE.
4. A LOVE LYRIC. By ANNIE G. HOPKINS.
5. THE SWEET POWER of MUSIC. By F. L. PLUNKET.
6. ANIMATED FLOWERS.
7. DOCTOR GREENFIELD. By Lady MARY HOWARD.
8. ELIZABETH of HEIDELBERG. By CHARLES W. WOOD, F.R.G.S. Illustrated.
9. BROKEN IDEALS. By Lady MARGARET MAJENDIE.
10. ICE-BAN. By C. E. MERTKERE.
11. WHAT SHOULD BE THE FEAR? By P. W. ROOSE.
12. THE VISIT. By MARY A. M. MARKS.
13. MR. CHOLMONDELEY'S INDECISION. By EDITH GRAY WHEELWRIGHT.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated.—Price 1s. 4d.—Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The AUGUST NUMBER contains:—

- THE NIGHT WALK. By GEORGE MEREDITH.
VIA CRUCIS X. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.
THE CHURCHES of AUVERGNE. By Mrs. SCHUYLER VAN RENSSLAER.
FRANKLIN as JACK of ALL TRADES. By PAUL LEICESTER FORD.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Illustrated.—Price 1s.—Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The AUGUST NUMBER contains:—

- THE GOOPS. Imitation Verse. By GELITT BURGESS.
WITH the "ROUGH RIDERS." (Second Article). By HENRY LA MORTE, M.D.
TRINITY BELLS. Serial. Chapter V. By ANELIA E. BARR.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO., LTD., London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1421. Established 1869.

29 July, 1899.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE fact that a new lifeboat on the West Coast of Scotland is not needed has decided the Committee of the William Black Memorial Fund to expend the money subscribed in the erection of a beacon light, to be known as the "William Black Beacon." Such a light is said to be necessary at Duart Point, near the entrance to the Sound of Mull; and that, therefore, is likely to be the site chosen.

A UNIQUE performance of Mrs. Craigie's play, "A Repentance," has been arranged. In August it will be played by Mr. George Alexander's company in the Banqueting Hall of Carisbrooke Castle, in the Isle of Wight. Mr. Alexander will take his original part of the Count Des Escas, and the music specially written by Sir Hubert Parry will be rendered. Carisbrooke Castle (although the room where Charles I. was imprisoned, and the other parts shown to tourists, are no longer habitable) is in great part in excellent preservation, the Banqueting Hall, where "A Repentance" is to be staged, being a particularly fine apartment.

MRS. CRAIGIE's new poetical drama, "Osbern and Ursyne," the text of which is printed in the Anglo-Saxon Review, will be performed this autumn in London by Mr. George Alexander and company at the St. James' Theatre, and at the same time in New York at the Empire Theatre. Sir Hubert Parry is now at work composing the incidental music for the play. Mr. John Lane will publish "Osbern and Ursyne" in book form in time for the performances.

MR. HARDY is said to be meditating putting one of his novels into a sixpenny edition, and Tess of the D'Urbervilles is likely to be the one. We should have thought that the novelist's earlier manner was better suited to the democratic form—say Far from the Madding Crowd or Under the Greenwood Tree.

IN the new Cornhill Mr. Stephen Gwynn replies with spirit to Mr. Lang and Mr. Walkley's strictures on his treatment of Miss Austen and sentimentality generally. Therein Mr. Gwynn repeats the wish not to meet Miss Austen in Paradise, and in so doing achieves a rather neat score off one of his critics. He writes: "Mr. Walkley bids me beware of meeting her even in Elysium, for in the next world she will still be formidable. I am sure that she would pass me with the calmest indifference, but I am not sure that Mr. Walkley would get off so lightly. I said she was unlovable, but I did not call her Jane, much less 'the gentle Jane.' I picture to myself Mr. Walkley presenting himself to her with this paragraph from his panegyric as a credential: 'In an age of "sensational" headlines, kinematographs, motor-cars, and boomsters, we could do with a gentle Jane or two.' In such an event the state of Miss Austen's panegyrist would probably be worse than that of her detractor."

IN the very interesting article on Mrs. Oliphant in the new Quarterly we have a glimpse of Turgenev, a writer of whom personal glimpses are rare. The novelist visited Mrs. Oliphant in 1879. She described him as "a great giant, with much melancholy, much gentleness of expression. He was not to be hurried, not given to talking much when he had come expressly to converse, but contemplative—oh, a very contemplative, very gentle big man."

HERE is a pretty passage from the same article, which evidently is the work of some near friend: "No picture of Mrs. Oliphant's leisure hours would be complete without mention of her needlework, her dogs, and her flowers. . . . One day Mr. Blackmore, visiting her for the first time, spent the visit in discussing a pear-tree in full fruit which he found in her garden. After rushing to catch his train and getting home, he sat down to write his regrets that the conversation had not been literary, as he had intended. Mrs. Oliphant related this as a triumph of her horticulture."

THE extent of Robert Louis Stevenson's popularity as a novelist may be partially gathered from the table of sales which Messrs. Cassell have compiled. These are the figures, which refer to the editions published at six shillings and three shillings and sixpence:

	Published.	Circulation.
Treasure Island . . . . .	1883 . . . . .	82,000
Kidnapped . . . . .	1886 . . . . .	60,000
The Black Arrow . . . . .	1888 . . . . .	30,000
The Master of Ballantrae . . . . .	1889 . . . . .	39,000
The Wrecker . . . . .	1892 . . . . .	29,000
Island Nights' Entertainments . . . . .	1892 . . . . .	11,000

During the past few months certain of these books have circulated anew at sixpence.

THE catalogue of the late Gleeson White's library, which is now being sold for the benefit of his widow, is in two forms: one strictly to the point, and the other enriched by a portrait of Mr. White and a memoir of him by his friend Prof. York Powell. In this memoir we read:

There are some men whose companionship is eminently helpful, their sympathy being so wide, their judgment so broad, their temper so fine, that one is lifted, as it were, on to a higher plane into serener air while one is with them. Such a man was Gleeson White. It was a refreshment to pass an hour with him, one came away from him with more hope, faith, and charity. The secret of his influence lay in his sincerity, his single-mindedness, the sensitive feelings that enabled him to understand and appreciate the aims and achievements of others, while his amazing and accurate acquaintance with the various means of expression that are employed in literature and the arts enabled him to see precisely what was the line along which any individual development was proceeding. His wit lit up the most serious discussions, and his absolute freedom from all the sordid motives that so often clog men's opinions, his lack of jealousy, and generous delight in other men's work, whether in his own or others' fields, gave his conversation qualities exceptionally rare and valuable to his friends.

MR. HENLEY's indictment of Mr. Andrew Lang as editor of the "Gadshill Dickens"—printed in the Pall Mall Magazine for August—has been long in coming but is no less severe and searching for that. We make a few extracts:

The true Dickensite cannot other than consider it [the "Gadshill" edition] with a frowning brow. It is lacking neither in shrewdness nor in generosity—I had almost said enthusiasm. Yet its inspiration is wayward, humoursome, perfunctory: as its effect is largely belittling, and its conclusions are often exasperating. Upon one reader it has left an impression as of work not done by the right man: of work, too, done against the grain, after insufficient preparation, and on principles that shift and change according as the writer's whim is lively and alert or jaded and indifferent.

"Talk of the cordial that sparkled for Helen," wrote the same artist in quotation [Lick Swiveller] to Kit in jail—"her cup was a fiction, but this is reality (Barclay and Perkins)"; and our wayward Editor, referring his readers to—not Tom Moore and the Irish Melodies, but—"a beautiful passage in the fourth book of 'The Odyssey'" (which he cites), goes on to remark that "Mr. Swiveller does not elsewhere display traces of a classical education." How true! And how very like the Aunt of Mr. F.!

And, says he [Mr. Lang], referring to Harold Skimpole: "He is, as usual, overdrawn, no doubt, for men in real life are not incessantly betraying their real characteristics." That may or may not be true of "real life"; but it is certainly not true of the more real life of fiction: as—to name but these—Don Quixote, Trunnion, Captain and Mr. Walter Shandy, Partridge, Colonel Bath, the Rev. Mr. Collins, Monkbarns, Dugald Dalgetty, that delightful Baron whose cognisance was a Bear, Costigan, Major Pendennis, exist to show.

Why does he call, too, The Tale of Two Cities by so ugly and discrediting a name as "melodrama"? I think he would rather die than so describe either Ivanhoe or the Mousquetaires; yet the description would fit both better than it fits the Tale.

It appears to be the case that "prejudice . . . of education, country, and training" accounts for his half-heartedness, and stoops him to the yoke of Thackeray and Walter Scott. Nay, it wanders him to worse purpose yet; for it even makes him say that, if he could oblige the dead to break their unending sleep, he would rather, far rather, meet not only "him that sleeps in Dryburgh"—which is natural and pious enough—but him "to whose room came Athos, Porthos, Aramis, and D'Artagnan with their noiseless swagger." Something I know of Dumas; and what he'd think of Mr. Lang, and what Mr. Lang would think of him, and how their interview would end—these, O these are topics, "Spirit searching, light abandoned, much too vast to enter on" at this stage of these Notes.

MR. LANG, we suppose, will reply: it is his métier, or one of his métiers; and we shall read his reply with interest. To differ about Dickens is as common as to differ about Mr. Gladstone; and Mr. Lang's opinion is not necessarily less correct than Mr. Henley's. We remember feeling that there was danger ahead when the intimation was made that Mr. Lang was to edit Dickens; but we felt then, and still feel, that it is the publishers who are to blame, more than the editor of their choice, if the "Gadshill Dickens" lacks reverence in the eyes of the true lover of Dickens (we cannot follow Mr. Henley to the point of saying "Dickensite"). This applies, of course, to the Introductions. As far as the notes go, we fear that Mr. Lang stands convicted again and again. Anyway, the true lover of Dickens will certainly be glad of Mr. Henley's spirited defence. Two literary tasks are now before that gentleman: an edition of Dickens done in the right spirit, and a report of the conversation between Mr. Lang and Dumas père.

A CORRESPONDENT, "B. B.," sends us a long letter suggesting that some literary man of good taste should edit an "Anthology of Minor Poetry." "It seems," he writes, "to be as true to-day as ever that 'all waters flow to the sea'; and while the public attention is naturally taken up with those who dwell on Mount Olympus, there are many toilers up the slopes whose verse, while, perhaps, lacking the divine afflatus, still exhibits merit worthy of recognition." Our correspondent then appends several quotations from the work of such poets as he would wish to be represented in the book. We do not repeat them, because poets, we have observed, have an invincible dislike to be called "minor"; but we may say that the passages are good—indeed, so well chosen as to convince us that our correspondent himself is well qualified to act as editor. Those with whom ideas originate are often the best persons to give them shape. But he will be wise, we think, to omit the word "minor" from his title.

APROPOS of the Minor Muse, we find in Mr. T. W. H. Crosland's little collection of parodies, entitled Other People's Wings, which the Unicorn Press has just published at the very reasonable price of sixpence, an address to that Lady which is one of the happiest things in a volume noticeable for its verbal felicities and straightforward thinking. This is it:

TO THE MINOR MUSE.

Out of the light of the age,
An age of superior things,
I call unabashed unto thee,
O little Muse of the valley.

Scorn for the simple pipe,
The trivial trite tune
That a man may make in his youth,
Is the fashion with all the world;

A fashion dear to the cheap
Young supercilious scribe,
Also, to wits and wags,
And every honest fool.

So that thy numerous sons,
Sired by the windy Spring,
Bristle, or blush, or blench
At a hint of their parentage.

But little Muse of mine,
They err who have shame in thee,
And grievously do they err
Who bandy thy name when they scoff.

For comely art thou, and wise,
And affluent of heart,
White are thy feet by the brooks,
And pleasant thy voice in the vines.

Thy Sister, the beautiful-brow'd,
Calm friend of them that endure,
Loveth thee from her heights,
And wherefore not we, who are naught?

THE death of Col. Robert Ingersoll means very little in England, where lurid atheism is, out of Hyde Park, unpopular. English editions of most of his writings may be had, but their influence cannot have been extensive. In America, however, where Ingersoll delivered many orations, he was a power. Oratory was essentially his proper vehicle: he had great command of vigorous language and was a master of effective platform methods. Indeed, Ward Beecher once introduced him to a public meeting in these words: "On the ground of a pure patriotism, of a pure humanity, and of a living faith in liberty, I give to him the right hand of fellowship. Let me introduce to you a man who, I say not flatteringly, but with sincere conviction, is the most brilliant speaker of the English tongue in any land on the globe." His private life, we believe, was spotless, and that he considered himself a warrior in the battle for Truth we believe too. But the disturber of the simple faith of simple folk plays a horrible part.

MR. F. J. GOULD, writing in the Literary Guide, repeats this story from an Indiana paper: "Colonel Ingersoll, while walking in front of the hotel yesterday, was approached by 'Rooster,' the cross-eyed little newsboy, who is about two feet high, and a most forlorn-looking little fellow. 'Take a paper, sir?' he asked, holding one up to the gigantic Pagan; 'take a paper, sir? All about Ingersoll.' 'Ingersoll!' exclaimed the Colonel, 'what's Ingersoll been doing?' 'I dunno, sir,' said Rooster helplessly, 'but something orful, I expect.' The Colonel took the paper, and gave the boy seventy-five cents as a reward for his unconscious humour."

MISS HETHERINGTON's valuable Index to Periodicals has now been published for 1898. Every year the task becomes more onerous. In 1890, for example, 64 pages sufficed; for 1891, 74; for 1892, 109; and so on, the new volume running to 241 pages. In her introduction Miss Hetherington writes: "What is wanted to inaugurate the new century bibliographically is first some annual complete general record of contemporary literature, but secondly and thirdly an annual classified catalogue of contemporary books with a subject-index of the main contents of the books all incorporated in one alphabet." No one could carry through such a project better than Miss Hetherington herself.

DEAN FARRAR's school story, Eric; or, Little by Little, has just been issued in a sixpenny edition by Messrs. Black. The following bibliographical note gives a good idea of its popularity: "Published Nov. 1858; reprinted Dec. 1858, Feb. 1859, Nov. 1859, Nov. 1861, Oct. 1862, May 1864, Nov. 1865, Feb. 1867, May 1868, Sept. 1869, Nov. 1870, Jan. 1873, July 1874, Sept. 1875, Dec. 1876, April 1878, Sept. 1879, Jan. 1881, July 1882, Sept. 1883, July 1885, June 1887, Sept. 1896, Sept. 1897, Dec. 1898. New Illustrated Edition published Nov. 1889; reprinted March 1891, Aug. 1892, Oct. 1894."

M. ZOLA, having Fécondité off his hands, is considering the shape in which to cast his novel on the Dreyfus case. But according to Mr. Vizetelly's exercise in Boswellism, With Zola in England, a novel on English life is also to come, and there is also the social series, of which Fécondité is the first, to complete; so that M. Zola has plenty of work in store for him. He is likely, indeed, to be very busy for some time to come, particularly as the embarrassments attaching to the position of a French popular idol are probably to be his directly the Dreyfus case is over.

IN the "Temple Classics," Mr. Dent's series of good literature for the pocket, Sterne's Sentimental Journal has just been issued. In looking through it our eyes fell on the word Rennes, a name just now in every one's mind as the spot selected to see the rebirth of honour in France; the spot where, if justice is still possible, Caytain Dreyfus will make good his right again to receive his sword. It was at Rennes, we then noticed, that, nearly a century and a half ago, Sterne witnessed the return of his sword to the Marquis d'E****. The Marquis, our readers will not object to be reminded, had come upon evil days, and he decided that there was no way out but commerce. So to the Court he delivered up his sword, for the State to keep it until he could reclaim it. It happened that Sterne was in Rennes when the Marquis returned to make this reclamation:

The Marquis enter'd the court with his whole family: he supported his lady——his eldest son supported his sister, and his youngest was at the other extreme of the line next his mother——he put his handkerchief to his face twice——

—There was a dead silence. When the Marquis had approach'd within six paces of the tribunal, he gave the Marchioness to his youngest son, and advancing three steps before his family—he reclaim'd his sword. His sword was given him, and the moment he got it into his hand, he drew it almost out of the scabbard—'twas the shining face of a friend he had once given up—he look'd attentively along it, beginning at the hilt, as if to see whether it was the same—when observing a little rust which it had contracted near the point, he brought it near his eye, and bending his head down over it——I think I saw a tear fall upon the place: I could not be deceived by what followed.

"I shall find," said he, "some other way to get it off."

When the Marquis had said this, he return'd his sword into its scabbard, made a bow to the guardians of it—and with his wife and daughter, and his two sons following him, walk'd out.

O how I envied him his feelings!

And that other soldier whose sword also must be handed to him again—metaphorically, at any rate: there will be many, we trust, to envy his feelings too.

IN the second act of Strindberg's drama The Father, of which an English translation has just been published—to which we allude elsewhere this week—there is either an instance of literary borrowing or a striking literary coincidence. The Captain is addressing Laura, who has commented on his tears. "Yes, I am crying," he says, "although I am a man. But has not a man eyes? Has not a man hands, limbs, senses, opinions, passions? Is he not fed with the same food, hurt by the same weapons, warmed and cooled by the same summer and winter as a woman is? If you prick us do we not bleed? If you tickle us do we not laugh?" And so forth. Remembering the tremendous force which the same words, or nearly the same, have as spoken by Shylock, we wonder that Strindberg borrowed them for the new situation. But perhaps he did not borrow them at all.

A HINT as to influence upon life which novels can exercise may be gained from an article in the Pottery Gazette, where the novelists are taken to task for neglecting the potter and the potter's art, to the detriment of the potter's fame. If only well-treated in fiction the potter might win as prominent place in the public eye as, say, the professional cricketer. Instead, he is passed by. Dickens neglected him, Charles Reade neglected him, Stevenson, Mr. Haggard, Mr. Hardy, Mr. Blackmore, and Mr. Kipling—all have left him out of their books. On the other hand, we would remind the Pottery Gazette, the potter's place in the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam is an important one.

THE vigilance of our readers is unfailing. Last week we quoted the following announcement of a country clergyman in his parish magazine: "The ancient oak chest belonging to the parish has been restored and placed in the schoolroom. It is over 200 years old. If any parishioners have books or articles of public interest which they would like to give to the parish, and hand down to posterity, they will be welcomed by the rector and churchwardens, and deposited in the chest." And now comes a card from a novelist, asking pertinently, we must admit: "What have the parishioners done to be deposited in a chest 200 years old?"

IN connexion with the Literary "Learics" which are printed on our Prize Competition page, it might be mentioned that the London Letter is now offering its readers an amusing series of political "Learics," which both in picture and verse follow closely the classical examples in the Book of Nonsense.

MR. JESSE LYNCH WILLIAMS, a new American writer of short stories, chiefly with a journalistic flavour, tells the following reminiscence of his beginnings as a member of the Fourth Estate. Like so many other young men who have the true literary spirit, he began with reverence. In his own words:

When I first came to Scribner's Magazine I was a walking interrogation point. The editor would toss a letter across the table just like a common piece of paper, saying: "Here's a letter from Kipling. It's all right." It might as well have been a note from his tailor.

I stood by and shivered at the sacrilege. And the typewriters! They would pound out letters to Meredith, Stockton, James, Howells, and Kipling, just as they might have done to me, without changing a feature or missing a punctuation mark, and I marvelled at their nerve. One day a stout, middle-aged man brushed by me in the office. We begged each other's pardon.

"Hold on a minute," called the editor; "I want to speak to you, Howells."

"Is that Howells?" I asked the office-boy.

"Sure."

"Mr. Howells?"

"Yes."

"Mr. W. D. Howells?"

"Cert."

"Mr. William Dean Howells?"

"The same."

And I softly caressed the sleeve that the novelist had brushed against, as if it had been touched by a saint.

But the feeling, Mr. Williams adds, wore off after a time. And now he is an author himself.

IN a letter from Mr. James Drummond, concerning a Kilmarnock Burns, which we printed last week, the name of Mr. Stillie, the Edinburgh bookseller, was printed Stille.

Bibliographical.

"SIR WALTER" will soon be one of the most edited of authors. In the old days it was considered sufficient to reprint the Waverley novels in all sorts of sizes, bindings, and prices, without any further introduction than the name and fame of Scott afforded. But latterly we have changed all that. In 1893-94 Scott was "introduced" to a degenerate public by Mr. Andrew Lang; last year Mr. Clement Shorter supplied an edition of the novels with "bibliographical notes"; and now we are told that Dr. Garnett has undertaken to supervise yet another edition. I am glad to observe, by the way, that though we have taken to editing Sir Walter, we have ceased for the moment to "abridge" him. Miss Braddon performed this office in 1881 for a certain number of the novels, but I believe the project was never carried to completion. In 1886 came an abridgment of Kenilworth for the use of schools, and then, in 1888, an abridgment of The Talisman. I do not say that Scott does not bear "cutting" here and there, for he was apt to be slow and perfunctory in his movement; but so many readers, happily or unhappily, have acquired the art of "skipping," that abridgments, nowadays, seem an unnecessary luxury.

So we are to have a memoir of Mr. and Mrs. Kendal, the popular players; and from the pen of Mr. Edgar Pemberton. The wonder is that we have not had it before. Mrs. Kendal has favoured us with her Dramatic Opinions (reprinted from Murray's Magazine), and very readable they were; but they were very slight in the biographical sense, and in that respect Mr. Pemberton will have no difficulty in improving upon them. Unhappily, he has already dealt with the early history of Mrs. Kendal's family in his memoir of her brother, T. W. Robertson (1893); and there is a good deal about the Kendals, too, in his account of John Hare, Comedian (1895), Mr. Hare and the Kendals having been associated between 1875 and 1888. Still, I have no doubt Mr. Pemberton will be able to say about both Mr. and Mrs. Kendal a good deal that is fresh and interesting. Though most of his time, I believe, is, or has been, given up to commerce, he is an enthusiast for the stage, and has for a long time acted as critic of the theatre for one of the Birmingham daily papers.

Talking of players, I see that Mr. George P. Hawtrey has written a novel which Mr. Arrowsmith will publish. Mr. Hawtrey has always been one of the most literary of actors. He comes, as most people know, of good academic stock, and no one who knew him was surprised when, some years ago, he wrote a classical burlesque on the subject of Atalanta, which was duly produced at the Strand Theatre. Since then short stories and sketches from his pen have been in evidence in many journalistic quarters. Actors and actresses, in truth, are becoming formidable rivals of the professional men and women of letters. They "throw off" novels and poems in the intervals between theatrical engagements, and, to that extent, some of them are never "resting." When they are not on the stage they are in the study, always "picking up gold and silver" wherever they may be.

Do we want another biography of John Wesley? Mr. H. D. Lowry would seem to think so, or he would not have taken it in hand. But, really, assuming that Southey's memoir is inadequate and out of date, what is to become of its numerous successors? The centenary in 1891 brought with it not only new editions of the Life by Southey, and of the Life and Times by Tyerman, but new monographs by James Ellis, Edith Kenyon, and others, to say nothing of one or two anonymous volumes and also Wesley His Own Biographer, a book compiled from Wesley's letters and journals. Previous to 1890-91 there were the Lives by Bevan, J. W. Kirton, Matthew Lelievre, R. Green, John Telford, Atkinson, and so on. On the whole, John Wesley has been one of the most "biographed" of men.

It is pleasant to know that the late Principal Caird's lectures on Natural Religion will have for preface a memoir of the author, from the pen of his brother, the Master of Balliol. Personally I am for reducing the number of biographies, but John Caird's personality and career were among those that really deserve to be celebrated. I do not believe that anything he wrote will live as literature, but he was in his time a great influence in Scotland, and that influence has since been extended—through the agency of those whom he impressed—to many quarters of the globe. Whatever he may have been as professor or as Principal, he was essentially a preacher, and one who attracted and delighted thinking and feeling people. I feel quite sorry for those who have never heard John Caird speaking, at his best, from the "poopit." Though he was not precisely a "man of letters," his sermons had a very agreeable literary tone and flavour.

One cannot help regretting that Lady Betty Balfour's monograph concerning the late Lord Lytton should be confined to the incidents of his Indian Viceroyalty. There is another case in which the biography of a man ought to be written. Lord Lytton the Viceroy is a very interesting, and even piquant, figure; but why not tell us something about "Owen Meredith" the verse writer, and Robert Lytton the diplomatist? The second Lord Lytton had not the versatility of his father, but he was the more engaging of the two. "Bulwer" never did magnetise, but "Owen Meredith" (within limits) does. One would like to have the story of Robert, Lord Lytton, told in full. He must have been a very clever letter-writer when he chose.

There should be a public for the facsimile reproduction of The Germ which Mr. Stock announces. The story of the short-lived serial has been told over and over again, fragmentarily or otherwise, in such books as Rossetti's Letters, Mrs. Wood's Rossetti and the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, and so forth; and yet uncommonly few have ever "set eyes" upon a copy of the remarkable periodical. That Mr. W. M. Rossetti should edit and "introduce" the facsimile is right enough, for did he not originally edit the later issues of The Germ, albeit he was only twenty years of age at the time? No doubt he has a good deal of interesting information to convey.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Cornish Poet.

The Poetical Works of R. S. Hawker. Edited, with Preface and Bibliography, by Alfred Wallis. (John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE Rev. Robert Stephen Hawker is a very interesting and vigorous minor poet. Now, "minor poet" is a much-abused word. When the modern reviewer wishes to give a mere versifier a "soft dismissal from the skies" he calls him a minor poet. It signifies that the reviewer (rightly or wrongly) thinks him merely a clever versifier. In other words, he uses it as a euphemism for "poetaster." And since the average modern reviewer is "sneaky" (as our American brethren say) of pronouncing any recent poet to be really distinguished, lest he should happen to guess wrong, all recent poets are likewise called "minor poets." It follows that, since "things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another," "new poet" and "poetaster" are convertible terms. That is not quite what the reviewer intended; but it is a logical conclusion for the man in the street to draw, and really not so far from the average reviewer's private thoughts. Nor yet far from the truth. Three-fifths of new poets have ever been poetasters. The pity is that the average reviewer has not the judgment or courage to distinguish the remaining two-fifths; and, above all, that he should cover his lack of discernment or courage by abusing the old term "minor poet." It means a true poet who, from varying causes, falls into what one may call the subaltern rank of poetry. Or perhaps rather a rank below that of General—since there are various degrees of General, both official and dependent on earned reputation. True minor poets may be divided into two classes—professional and unprofessional. Professional minor poets may again be subdivided into those who have cultivated small powers to an exquisite degree—such as Herrick, Collins, Gray—and those whose careers have been manqués, in spite of great powers, through defective taste. Such were Crashaw, Cowley, and perhaps Donne—men who would have been much more than minor poets had their great gifts been controlled by a corresponding æsthetic sense. Even now their affluence of power would suffice most living artistic poets for a reputation. The unprofessional minor poets may be subdivided into those, like Raleigh, who were content to cast off some two or three small poems in the course of an externally active life, but those few admirable; on the other hand, those who have written not less copiously than the professional poets, but seldom with equal effect. To the latter class Stephen Hawker belongs. What he would have been as a professional poet it is difficult to surmise. Probably he was too interested in external life ever to have been a poet by profession: his verse was purely accidental. It is true that even with the great professional poet his poems are an accident, the overflow of a brilliant life and mind. As a singer of the highest rank once said to the present writer, "a poet should be much greater than his poetry." The difference is that such a man's poems are the distillation of his life. The verses of a Hawker are mere careless rills from his life. It is the scope between the trickle of casual runnels and the convergent rush of a few great rivers. Hawker wrote almost as much, quite as too much, as Wordsworth, without Wordsworth's lifelong concentration of aim and study. What could come of it but amassed mediocrity? Yet, because of what was really in the man, now and again he found himself, in spite of himself, in spite of his anti-poetic method; his personality broke its way into verse, and the result was a poem—beyond all room for doubt, a living poem.

ROBERT STEPHEN HAWKER.

For Hawker had a personality, a very singular, arresting personality; and our one quarrel with this otherwise excellently edited book is that the Memoir does not bring it out. We have all the essential facts of his life, as carefully as biographer could desire. We do not get at one essential fact of his character. Yet his character is most necessary to the appreciation of his poetry. You would think he was merely a cultivated, conscientious, hard-working country parson, devoted to his duties and his people, with a taste for poetry in his leisure hours. All that he was. But all that many another vicar is. What he was more than this is just what makes Hawker the poet, as distinct from Hawker the excellent clergyman. We should have been given some glimpse of the stalwart, athletic Cornish parson, mingling with the fishermen of the beach in a half sea-garb, as much at home with them as with the poets, enamoured of the sea and all open-air pursuits; yet, shot through this brave, open character, a most curious, at first sight antithetical texture of mysticism, verging even towards superstition—probably no less Cornish than the rest; for who says Cornish says Celtic. He believed in the evil eye, and would recount how this or that old dame displayed all the tokens of it. Now all this serves to explain the very remarkable dual texture of his poetry. One finds the same antithesis in a certain detail of his life. He found himself stranded in his career at the University, without funds to continue his education. What did this chivalrous, poetic-minded native of Plymouth, Drake's Plymouth, do? He went off and proposed to a lady some years his elder, who had money; was accepted, married her, and continued his studies at the University. It was a quite happy marriage; but exhibits the singular blending of two characters in this most picturesque man. There are not a few people who can fall decently in love with any woman they please, provided she be amiable and capable of personal attachment to them. It is a character rare in poets; but Hawker would seem to have been one of the exceptions. Why should he not, on the principle of the Northern farmer, fall in love where the money was? He saw no reason why he should not; and since he wanted the money, he did.

These two sides of Hawker—the plein air and the mystical—emerge most strikingly in his poetry, as we have intimated. We are not aware of any such remarkable combination in the whole range of literature. Within a few pages of this book you can find it all exemplified in its seeming discordance. He caught the spirit of the old ballads and songs with striking success, if it may not rather be said that he belonged by nature to their class. There is a rare vigour and masculinity in his productions of this kind. The famous "Song of the Western Men" was actually taken for an antique by Scott, Macaulay, and others, though only its refrain was old. "Sir Beville" is another ballad with the true martial ring; or take this fine song, grimly spirited, full of the salt sea wind:

A CROON OF HENNAcliffe.

Thus said the rushing raven
Unto his hungry mate:
"Ho! gossip! for Bude Haven,
There be corpses six or eight.
Cawk! cawk! the crew and skipper
Are wallowing in the sea,
So there's a savoury supper
For my old dame and me

"Cawk! gaffer! thou art dreaming,
 The shore hath wreckers bold;
 Would rend the yelling seamen
 From the clutching billows' hold.
 Cawk! cawk! they'd bound for booty
 Into the dragon's den,
 And shout for 'death or duty'
 If the prey were drowning men."
 Loud laughed the listening surges
 At the guess our grandame gave:
 You might call them Boanerges
 From the thunder of their wave.
 And mockery followed after
 The sea-bird's jeering brood,
 That filled the skies with laughter
 From Lundy Light to Bude.
 "Cawk! cawk!" then said the raven,
 "I am fourscore years and ten,
 Yet never in Bude Haven
 Did I croak for rescued men.
 They will save the Captain's girdle,
 And shirt, if shirt there be,
 But leave their blood to curdle
 For my old dame and me."
 So said the rushing raven
 Unto his hungry mate:
 "Ho! gossip! for Bude Haven,
 There be corpses six or eight.
 Cawk! cawk! the crew and skipper
 Are wallowing in the sea,
 O what a savoury supper
 For my old dame and me!"

Or read that swinging hunting-ballad which tells how

On the ninth of November, in the year fifty-two,
 Three jolly foxhunters, all sons of true blue,
 They rode from Pencarrow, not fearing a wet coat,
 To take their diversion with Arscott of Tetcott.

Then turn to "Aishah Shechinah," a mystical poem of wonderful power and beauty, and be amazed that it should have come from the same mind. Or let us quote another such poem, "King Arthur's Waes-Hael." It should be explained that the wine was drawn with straws from a bowl, the cover of it domed to represent a woman's breast.

Waes-hael for knight and dame!
 O! merry be their dole;
 Drink-hael! in Jesu's name
 We fill the tawny bowl;
 But cover down the curving crest,
 Mould of the Orient Lady's breast.
 Waes-hael! yet lift no lid:
 Drain ye the reeds for wine.
 Drink-hael! the milk was hid
 That soothed that Babe divine;
 Hushed, as this hollow channel flows,
 He drew the balsam from the rose.
 Waes-hael! thus glowed the breast
 Where a God yearned to cling;
 Drink-hael! so Jesu pressed
 Life from its mystic spring;
 Then hush, and bend in reverent sign
 And breathe the thrilling reeds for wine.
 Waes-hael! in shadowy scene,
 Lo! Christmas-children we;
 Drink-hael! behold we lean
 At a far Mother's knee;
 To dream that thus her bosom smiled,
 And learn the lip of Bethlehem's Child.

Such a bold yet reverent blending of sacred and profane is altogether imaginative, and mediæval rather than modern in spirit. Space would fail us to quote all that strikes us in these remarkable poems. They deserve to be widely known by all lovers of literature, who are willing to undergo the labour of search among a mass (it must be confessed) of often lengthy mediocrity, hardly paralleled outside Wordsworth.

A Gay Tragedy.

Thibaw's Queen. By H. Fielding. (Harper & Brothers. 6s.)

HERE is a tragedy that one reads with halting laughter. Thibaw was not twenty years of age when he became King of Burma and lord of all white elephants; Mebya, his queen, was nineteen. Boy and girl they had grown up together; boy and girl they governed Burma in the intervals of ball-play and private theatricals. And then one morning steamboats came, steaming fast—and the king stopped playing, and the queen threw herself on the palace floor and cried her little eyes out.

Can't you 'ear their paddles chunkin' from Rangoon to Mandalay?—

It is scarce fifteen years since we annexed Burma and carried Thibaw to India, yet no one has made close inquiry into the life of splendour and fatuity which these young people lived in the gilded palace at Mandalay. No one, until Mr. Fielding saw in the tragedy a new Arabian Nights tale. "It seemed from all I could hear that it would be more like looking a thousand years back into the days of the charmed Bagdad than hearing a tale of yesterday. The whole atmosphere was full of hidden loves and secret murders, of plots and counter plots, of passion and of colour, such as we know not now." How to find the thread? There were no documents, or newspapers, or volumes of reminiscences. At last Mr. Fielding found one who knew.

"She was a maid of honour." This may seem to throw a backstairs and dubious light upon the story; but the author of that penetrating study of Burmese character and creed entitled The Soul of a People is not likely to be deceived in matters of fact; and Mr. Fielding's long judicial experience is an even more practical guarantee that these statements are true in substance. "She had been maid of honour to the queen for four years, up to the last moment of the surrender. . . . It is true that she had been but a child then; she was only thirteen when Mandalay was taken; she saw but with childish eyes, heard but with childish ears." Mr. Fielding wisely gives us the maid's own words as much as possible; and alike when the child is speaking or the man is interpreting the story is naive and limpid and unique.

There were five or six hundred maids of honour to Mebya, and this little daughter of a Chinese contractor, who joined the throng in her ninth year, was as proud and happy as any. You would swear to her lisp and dancing eyes when she tells how the queen allowed each of her maids of honour nine new silk skirts a month. "Skirts got spoiled in many ways, playing hide-and-seek in the palace gardens, and feeding the fishes—you were never allowed to wear an old skirt, even to go boating in; it was always necessary to be smart before the queen." The hide-and-seek was great fun, but it did not do to find the queen, and so "the maids of honour would go wandering about and looking in all the wrong places."

"What happened if any one was rash enough to find the queen?" I asked. The girl laughed. It appears that when she first went to the palace and played hide-and-seek she found the queen. "For, indeed, it was easy enough. I could see her kneeling down on a little hill behind a clump of bamboos. Every one who looked could see. I went up and found her. I thought I was very clever."

"And then?"

"She boxed my ears. She was angry."

Three times a year there was a water festival. The King of Burma and his pages threw water at the Queen of Burma and her maids of honour, and they threw water back. "We got very wet, and we were not allowed to wear old dresses, but quite new ones. They were all spoilt, of course." There was a low bamboo barrier separating the king and his pages from the queen's party.

"And did the ministers and pages never cross over the barrier?"

"If any minister or page had crossed the barrier he would have been executed right off. No one did, of course. No, girls never crossed to the men's side. How can you ask such questions, Thakin? The barrier was put up to prevent it."

Still it was difficult to avoid being executed sometimes. One day the queen lost her little dog. It was a tiny dog of the "Flossie" type; it had long silky hair. Search was made, and at last Flossie was found squeezed to death behind a large new mirror, one of several which had just been placed in the palace by soldiers. Disgraceful carelessness! The queen said she would have all those soldiers executed immediately.

"Maung, Maung," said the queen to the king, "I do not think your soldiers are any better than animals, or they would not have let my little dog die like this. They ought to be executed."

But the king patted her shoulder again.

"You are angry now, Su, Su, but you would be dreadfully sorry to-morrow if you had a lot of men killed because of your dog. See, now, it was only an accident."

But the queen was very angry, and moved away towards the palace to give the order to have the men executed, and the king went with her, speaking soothing words to her as she went. We all looked at each other in fear and followed behind, horrified at what the queen proposed to do. We all hoped that the king would succeed in quieting the queen. And he did. . . . Then the little dog was buried in the garden, and soon we forgot all about him and the narrow escape the men had who put mirrors in the palace."

Twice a year the king scrambled rupees among his soldiers and attendants, who tumbled over each other in their greed. "We all used to laugh; the king and queen and everybody laughed till they could not laugh any more." And once the king and queen thought they would cook their own dinner! The king learned to boil rice quite nicely, and the queen to make cakes like Japanese women. "Ah, Thakin, it was pleasant in the palace in those days." They were so young, this king and queen, and think of their portion! The palace, built by King Mindon, was ablaze with red and gold; all of gold were the façade, the pillars, and the great spire called "the centre of the universe." The throne room was supported on pillars of the finest teak; and all the state rooms were gilded and carved. The palace gardens contained lakes full of lotus and lilies; and the odours of champak and jasmine blew from alley to alley. Beyond lay the Irrawaddy, and the hills of Sagaing crowned with pagodas. And what of the sunsets, and what of the moonlight, and what of the tinkly temple bells?

It would have been paradise but for politics. On the death of King Mindon in 1878 Thibaw had been taken from a monastery and pushed on the throne by the queen-mother, who then executed his brothers. Mebya, burning with love and jealousy, had thrust her elder sister out of the position of head queen. Thibaw regretted his rivals, Mebya feared hers. A cruel and sleepless watch she kept. Her queenship, which began when she was nineteen and ended when she was twenty-six, was a fight for her own hand. Gradually the old wise ministers of King Mindon fell away: Mebya snubbed them one by one. "Who is a minister to order such a thing?" the girl-queen would say with flashing eyes; "let him go!" And so the minister went to his country house, and his department went to the dogs. Crime increased. Plots multiplied.

And the boy king was not always good. One evening he was led away by some of his pages, and got miserably drunk—he who had been a monk, and who still loved the pagoda!—he was ashamed of himself. But he had worse tempters. There was his old schoolfellow, the Yenaung prince; what a reprobate he was you may guess by the use he made of electricity:

He had electric bells fitted up from his room to the rooms of the wives, one bell to each, and when he wanted any particular wife he just touched her bell and she came running quickly. He did this so that the other wives should not know who was with him and be jealous. They only heard a bell ring somewhere, but they could not tell who it was the prince favoured. If he wanted them all he rang all the bells, and there was a noise as of a tempest of ringing, and girls came running from all their many rooms.

This Yenaung prince introduced the king to a young and pretty girl, the daughter of the Wun of Kanni, and chuckled when he saw that the king's love was captured. The girl, dressed as a page, was introduced into the male side of the palace. For months she lay hidden, and the king came to her daily, and Mebya knew nothing. Yet the girl was doing all she could to endanger Mebya's position as queen. At last the queen heard all, and "in a thought, in a moment, before the king had even time to realise that he was discovered, before the girl and her people had time to escape, the girl and her father, and all those who had taken part in the plot, were seized and executed." A little later the Yenaung prince himself died of a fever; it was the queen who called it "fever." Events like this—and there were many such—undoubtedly ruffled the happiness of the king and queen. But the king was for a quiet life, and the queen had a buoyant heart, and so "in the intervals between the plots and the assassinations they played. They ran about the gardens and hid in the thickets, and laughed with the abandon of children."

The queen was but wise in her own conceit; she feared calamity from within; it came from without. She connected it with love; it rose out of the duty on teak. There were other things: vide the Blue Books. But the teak trouble was uppermost. The Bombay-Burma Trading Corporation, Limited, had a lease of some teak forests in Upper Burma. It felled and exported teak under certain conditions and on payment of a duty. In 1884 the Burmese Government accused the Company of infringing the rules as to the size of the timber cut, causing a heavy loss to the revenue. There was an inquiry, and the Burmese Government ordered the Company to refund the missing revenue, and also pay a fine of a quarter of a million sterling. The Company refused, and was supported by the British Government. The war cloud grew and grew. The golden palace at Mandalay was given over to councils and embittered differences of opinion. If the Sinpyu-maslim, the queen-mother, who had given this boy and girl their throne, could have prevailed, there would have been no war. If the venerable Kinwun Mingyi could have stood against the mocking words of Mebya there would have been no war. If Thibaw and Mebya had possessed the smallest knowledge of what they were doing there would have been no war.

The little maid of honour lay ill, and her mother was with her, when one day she heard a deep sound. "There was no sign of any thunder. I could not make it out. . . . My mother said: 'Did you hear no sounds?' and I said: 'Yes; a sound as of thunder far away.' Then she told me it was the great guns of the English firing down the river." Meanwhile the queen had learned the truth. Under a tamarind tree in the glorious gardens of her palace, Mebya had coaxed from a few children the facts which every official had conspired to keep from her ears. Children told her of her doom. She was herself a child in knowledge. A child's memory has preserved the story of her brief splendour. The whole tragedy is childish, pretty and pitiful, and of small account. But as a tale for the chimney corner it is good hearing, and Mr. Fielding is to be thanked for giving it to the world. His book is the lightest reading, yet its charm and pathos are haunting.

An Amateur of Religion.

The Message and Position of the Church of England. By Arthur Galton. With a Preface on the Royal Supremacy, by J. Henry Shorthouse. (Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d.)

THE author of this book, who on the title-page writes himself down Curate of Windermere, is a man endowed by nature with a taste for theological speculation, and by hazard with a sufficiency of this world's goods to render him free to indulge it. Soon after graduating at Cambridge the methods of Roman controversy captured his imagination, and he submitted himself to the authority of the Pope. He was ordained priest in 1880 by Dr. Ullathorne, and resided at Oscott as professor of something till 1885; then he retired from the exercise of his sacerdotal office and entered again into university life at New College, Oxford. With some success and distinction he pursued the study of history. Now, fourteen years after his abandonment of his priestly office, he has offered himself for the ministry of the Anglican Church. The path of his deliberate wanderings is sufficiently unusual to be interesting to a looker-on, and we may say of him what we should say of few religious eccentrics, that he was justified in writing a book.

Of Mr. Galton's Apologia it may be said, in the first place, that it is free from the personalities and pettiness which before now we have had occasion to deprecate in the controversial writings of quondam priests. Persons who are curious as to the menus and wine lists of the presbytery, or the demoralising influence of the confessional, will search this volume in vain. The Curate of Windermere writes as an historical student, if not always very temperately. He presents you with a bird's-eye view of ecclesiastical history as he sees it. Within the compass of his 250 pages he could do no more. He sees the Christian world divided into patriarchates; sees the Roman patriarchate predominant in virtue both of the city's temporal lordship and of its importance as the great clearing-house and market-place of the nations. He sees Rome presently cut off from the East, and from the Greek spirit and literature; little by little he sees the spirit of Christianity overwhelmed and stifled by the genius of the City. A hard, mercenary mind—the mind of the papal Curia—is concentrated always upon the effort to gain wealth, and on the basis of spiritual powers divinely committed to consolidate a temporal empire. So the courtesy title of one generation is asserted to vindicate a new prerogative in the next. To a like end the forged Donation of Constantine; to a like end are heaped up the False Decretals. On every hand, in every nation of the West, the Pope by his agents is busy. In every diocese the authority of the Ordinary is undermined by intrusive battalions of monks and friars subject directly to the Holy See, and by it endowed with spiritual powers that must leave the parochial clergy by comparison impotent. The Pope is found exercising more and more influence over parochial and provincial affairs, till the bestowal of all benefices, all bishoprics, is almost absolutely conceded to him, as of divine right. Meanwhile, in learning and physical science a darkness that may be felt. The witness of such a Church, accepted at its own price by Newman and his followers, the Curate of Windermere laughs to scorn. The mediæval Church “is out of court as an authority solely on the plea of ignorance.”

Western Europe, composed of young and barbarous peoples, was shut up within itself for nearly a thousand years, with only a debased form of Latin and a few scattered shreds of knowledge as its only inheritance from the great past. Naturally, in this ignorant isolation, its point of view was narrowed and distorted. . . . Those ages could only look at the past through themselves and their own experiences. They applied this curious and wrong perspective to every species of knowledge: to their theology no less than to their science and their history. . . . The heroes of Greece and Rome, the characters of the Old and New Testaments, wore the clothes and spoke the language of the Middle Ages. . . . The mediæval point of view is full of interest, and is perpetually charming; but we must allow for it when we pass on to serious criticism. . . . We all have allowed for it in classical history and literature. We have by no means all escaped from it in theology or in church government. Nor shall we escape until we realise that the papal claims, the Donation of Constantine, and all that depends on them, are precisely on the same level, and of as much or as little value as any other mediæval interpretations of history and the classics.

The Anglican reformers, therefore, were most wonderfully right when, in the grey dawn of the new learning, they cast boldly back to the earliest ages and made their appeal to the consensus of the undivided Church and, ultimately, to the testimony of Holy Writ. And that, says Mr. Galton (surely lapsing for a moment from the Greek spirit which he so commends), “there can be no doubt whatever, excludes the very notion of a Papacy.” He is at some pains, however, to discredit the majestic sentence that circles the dome of St. Peter’s—(“May not that have something to do with it?” asked Thackeray of a friend, who had expressed his British wonder at the endurance of Roman authority): “Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram ædificabo ecclesiam meam.” He impresses upon us that while πέτρα means a rock, πέτρος is a mere boulder; only he should not have forgotten to explain how that distinction might have been pointed in the Aramaic original speech. But it is a tedious old controversy, and on the whole we rejoice that Mr. Galton has found time, since his Oscott days, to forget the other “Petrine” speeches and the grounds of the asserted predominance of Peter in the narrative of the New Testament.

But what of the “message and position” of the Church of England? They cannot be given more fairly than in the author's own words:

The Roman clergy, as a whole, are almost as ignorant of Greek now as they were before Erasmus; and their Vaticanism has made them even more bitterly opposed than they were at the Renaissance both to the methods of Greek thought and to the masters of Greek theology. . . . If Russia become civilised and hold together, her Church must become civilised with her. We may see a large, learned, and zealous Greek Church again, after five centuries of oppression. If so, Rome will find on one flank of herself such a rival as, for size, unity, and unanswerable arguments against the Papacy, she has never known. On the other flank, I hope she may find a strong, united Church of all the English-speaking peoples, worthy to represent the British Empire and the United States on their spiritual side. This I conceive to be the true Message and Position of the English Church, and her Mission to the world.

And so, when the Russian Orthodox Church and the Church of England shall have closed in upon and finally razed the rotten edifice of Trent and Pius IX. the future of Christendom, we are to understand, will be assured. We confess ourselves less sanguine than Mr. Galton. There will be surely a few outstanding difficulties. The peasantry of Russia and the Balkan States are said to be not a whit behind the corresponding class in Italy or Spain in the extravagance of their superstition; the learned theologians of the Oriental churches repudiate the orders of the Anglican clergy no less vehemently than does Leo XIII.; and the heresies implied in the XXXIX Articles—a hundred and forty-nine was it that the Moscow authorities counted up for Mr. Palmer?—have not grown fewer: it is not for nothing that the Oriental churches boast “orthodoxy” as their note. Here it occurs to us to wonder that Mr. Galton's spirit of reverence for antiquity has not guided him into that stronghold of conservatism itself. But perhaps that resource is reserved against the recurrence of disappointment in his present sphere.

Meanwhile the value of his essay consists in the personal testimony of an honest, active-minded amateur of history and religion. It is a pebble in the urn.

The Finest Short Story?

Boule de Suif. From the French of Guy de Maupassant, with an Introduction by Arthur Symons. (Heinemann. 15s.)

THIS slim and luxurious volume was put forward as a translation of "the finest and most artistic short story" ever written. Mr. Arthur Symons, in his discreet introduction, makes no such claim for it, but there is no doubt that Boule de Suif does exist in the minds of many people as a supreme achievement. Boule de Suif is now almost sacred; it has a halo. It is as unimpeachable as Free Trade. It is accepted, not argued about. One day soon it will have grown into a superstition. Appearing as it did, the first work of a youthful writer, under the majestic sanction of Emile Zola, it happened by its freshness and demure naughtiness to catch the wearied fancy of a public well able to appreciate also its qualities of impartial aloofness and manual dexterity. Legends of this young author's long and arduous apprenticeship to literature floated in the air; the populace was awed by such devotion; even the experts were tickled by this dramatic entry into fiction, this sudden apparition of a man fully armed at all points. De Maupassant was made.

We should not care to assert that his instant success was undeserved, but we take it to have been a little accidental as regards the public. De Maupassant was, of course, a born writer. Observe, writer. No one ever said what he wanted to say with a nicer exactitude or a more certain effectiveness than did de Maupassant. The sentence was a marvellous tool in his hands. But, having admitted that, one has the right to inquire: what did he want to say? What of importance had he seen? We cannot believe, for ourselves, that de Maupassant's imagination and insight were of the first order, or even of the second order. His philosophy was a Parisian cynicism. His spirit was happy in that world of sense which the greatest writers have either ignored or assumed. Animalism is good, but it is not the best. There are writers who might have taken a story of de Maupassant's and, using it for a mere concrete foundation, might have built upon it the more delicate fabric of the essential story—the intimate spiritual drama which he had either missed or, in the ruthlessness of his animalism, disdained.

The main secret of de Maupassant's mere vogue is that he dazzles. As a cyclist at night, he rides down the highway with Dexterity flashing ahead of him like an acetylene lamp. In that illumination you can perceive no defects; you can only wonder. De Maupassant will not survive translation. Although translation may retain every ingenuity of construction, the last finish, the ultimate polish, is lost in it. The magic dazzle fades. You wake as if from enchantment. Boule de Suif in English (good English, too) is a shock. The superficiality, the trickery of it, stand forth ashamed and convicted. This the finest short story? What of "Wandering Willie's Tale" in Redgauntlet? What of forty things by Balzac and Turgenev? What of Stevenson's "Markheim"? What of Hardy's Group of Noble Dames (those unsurpassed feats of simple narrative)?

Boule de Suif is deficient, not only in fine observation, but in imagination. To us, in this English version, it positively lacks fire. It seems to be a little smug even in its elaborate cynicism. Regarding it technically, the opening is somewhat fumbled and shapeless; and surely no one will deny that the conclusion is forced, against probabilities, into a conventional shape. (Get a climax; get it honestly if you can, but get it.) Let us not be accused of belittling de Maupassant. We assert our intense admiration for much of his work. He wrote the last fifty pages of Une Vie, and, by a fortunate concatenation of circumstances, therein produced an effect of pathos which, crude though it is, has scarcely been surpassed in all fiction. He also wrote La Maison Tellier, a thing infinitely superior to Boule de Suif, which we are surprised to find Mr. Symons describing as "perhaps the best short story de Maupassant ever wrote." One is glad that La Maison Tellier is absolutely impossible in English. Its superb and outrageous humour ought not to be withered under the terrible process of Anglicisation. And yet, who knows? Ten years ago Mr. Heinemann would as soon have thought of issuing Boule de Suif as he would have thought of issuing Justine. La Maison Tellier may come. If it does, we trust it may come unexpurgated. Though there is no announcement of the fact, this rendering of Boule de Suif is not quite complete.

Sense and Sentimentality.

Social Phases of Education. By S. T. Dutton. (Macmillan. 5s.)

Common Sense in Education and Teaching. By P. A. Barnett. (Longmans. 6s.)

MR. DUTTON's very tedious congeries of nebulous and somewhat feminine maunderings cannot be said to possess any practical value, though it contains a respectable number of vague truths: truths, however, that have been proclaimed before on a hundred occasions of old and of late, and expressed on each occasion a hundred times better. Throughout it, too, there runs a strain of high falutin sentimentalism and religious hysteria, that comes oddly from across the Atlantic. Nor is dulness of matter relieved by graces of style; and its pages, moreover, are even defaced by faulty grammar and by an exuberant weed-crop of mis-spellings. The last annoyance at least might have been spared us by a little care in the revision of the proof-sheets. As no mortal, according to the proverb, is at all times wise, so few, whatever their natural qualifications, can contrive to be at all times fatuous, and there are in these lectures two commendable features. One is the healthy stress laid on the pre-eminent claims of physical education; an attitude to be welcomed at a time when much nonsense is being talked and written about the over-development of athleticism in English public schools. The other is the exposure of the quaint fallacy that the Board school will empty the prison. Still, when all is said, the lectures really were not worth giving to mankind at large, and the world is not the richer, but the poorer, for the production of yet another unnecessary volume. The author disclaims responsibility for their circulation in permanent form, and we are told in his preface that "the venture would not have been made except at the urgent request of friends." Some of us achieve crime, some of us have it thrust upon us. In these days of over-publication to issue a superfluous book is criminal, and apparently there was no one to save Mr. Dutton from his friends.

Common Sense in Education is a book of a very different stamp, and fully justifies its title. Mr. Barnett, it will be remembered, was the editor of Teaching and Organisation, an admirable piece of work by several hands, which we had the pleasure of noticing in these columns some eighteen months ago. This, his latest contribution to the science and art of teaching, is, as usual, marked by force, definiteness, and sanity: from end to end it is simply packed with valuable material, and from end to end there is hardly a dull page. It is too uniformly good to lend itself to quotation; where the general level of excellence is so high one is perplexed by the embarras de choix, and to sample it as lavishly as it deserves would be both difficult to do and unfair if done. We must leave the educationist to take our word for its merit, an assurance backed, however, by the yet safer warranty of Mr. Barnett's name. Incalculable would be the gain if parents could be persuaded to read such a book as this; but seeing that the vast majority of the masters in our secondary schools can rarely be induced to pay any regard to educational literature, it is perhaps idle to expect the fathers and mothers of their pupils to do so. The ordinary public schoolmaster is ignorant of or despises the guide-books of his craft. He picks up a knowledge of his business haphazard in the classroom, at the expense of the parent, the scholar, the institution in which he works, and himself. "Experience," some one has said, "is an excellent school, but the fees are rather high"; and the mental attitude of the untrained teacher is commonly, as Mr. Barnett puts it, "that of the good woman who was rebuked for feeding her year-old babe on salt herring. 'I ought to know,' she said, 'how to bring up children. I've buried ten.'"

A Thin Literature.

A History of Bohemian Literature. By Francis Count Lützow. (Heinemann. 7s. 6d.)

COUNT LUTZOW is already favourably known to English readers by his historical sketch of Bohemia up to the year 1620. His present contribution to Mr. Gosse's "Literatures of the World" will be useful upon the shelf of the student, but we fear that the industry and learning so liberally spent upon it will hardly stimulate the ordinary man to any very marked interest in its subject. In fact, Bohemian literature, beginning late, and almost exclusively occupied with theological controversy and historical research, is singularly lacking in those efforts of the imagination which alone really endure. There is but a ha'porth of poetry, fiction, or drama to an intolerable deal of sack. The earliest documents are ascribed to the fourteenth century. One of them, the Manuscript of Grüneberg, is now admitted to be a forgery, and the most important of all, the Manuscript of Königshof, is gravely suspect. Such as it is, however, it contains, in half a dozen ballads and as many songs, all the Bohemian poetry that can be regarded as really primitive, or coming, conceivably, from the Slavonic folk. On later folk-songs, though we suppose that such exist, Count Lützow does not dwell. Perhaps he thinks them beneath the dignity of literature. This is almost sentimental and mournful enough to be genuine:

In the fields there stands an oak-tree,
On the oak-tree a cuckoo calls:
He ever calls, he laments
That spring does not last for ever.
How could the wheat ripen in the fields
If spring lasted for ever?
How could the apples ripen in the garden
If summer lasted for ever?
Would not the ears of corn freeze in the stack
If autumn lasted for ever?
Would not the maiden be mournful
If her solitude lasted for ever?

The rest of mediæval Bohemian literature seems to resolve itself into adaptations of the ordinary themes of European hagiological legends and chivalric romances or chansons, filtering eastwards through the medium of the ubiquitous wandering students and jongleurs.

With the fifteenth century, and under influence from the English Wycliffites, Bohemia plunged into the Hussite controversies, which, with the political struggles, absorbed most of her remaining national energies. Of later writers, the most worthy of remark is John Amos Komensky, who, under his Latinised name of Comenius, is a somewhat important figure in the history of educational literature. Komensky visited London and became familiar with Samuel Hartlib, and, therefore, probably also with Hartlib's educational correspondent, John Milton. An interesting letter is extant in which Komensky describes his experiences of London: the Puritan London of the Long Parliament, in which a hundred and twenty parish churches were not enough for their worshippers, and youths and men took down the sermons in shorthand for their subsequent delectation after dinner. He relates an instance of iconoclastic fury against Church ornaments:

In one of the churches here in London there was a window, the religious and very artistic painting of which, they say, cost £4,000—that is, 16,000 imperials. The ambassador of the Spanish King who resides here offered to pay the whole of this sum if he could have the window intact. But the somewhat exaggerated zeal of the people despised the proffered money and broke the window, considering that it was wrong to obtain gain by means of idolatrous objects.

Komensky and Hartlib tried to found in England a "Christian Academy of Pansophy," but the outbreak of the Civil War destroyed the project.

In modern times there has been some revival of literature, and particularly of historical research, in Bohemia. The writings of Paul Joseph Safarik on Slavic Antiquity, and Francis Palacky's History of Bohemia, are, so far, its principal outcomes.

New World Criticism.

The Post-Apostolic Age. By Lucius Waterman, D.D. (T. & T. Clark.)

AN excellent piece of work—of a kind that Americans sometimes do better than Englishmen. Perhaps the consciousness that they are writing for a critical audience is less heavy upon them, or perhaps the more rapid methods of the New World are better for a bird's-eye sketch than those of the Old, but the fact remains that nowadays some of the best and most readable summaries are written in the United States. In this book Dr. Waterman, who is apparently the episcopal pastor of Laconia, New Haven, manages to compress the history of the Christian Church, from the time of the Apologists Quadratus and Aristides down to the Edict of Milan, into five hundred pages, with such skill that it would be difficult to find an important fact unnoticed or a really important document neglected. Nor is the book written merely for scholars. He tells us in his preface of the answer of one of his hearers to the announcement that he was going to write a Church History: "Then I hope you'll make it interesting"; and it is only fair to say that this hope, though "uttered in an unhopeful tone," has certainly been fulfilled. Given an interest in the subject, no one who takes up the book is likely to lay it down unfinished.

Some part of the interest is, of course, due to the period chosen. "The Church of the second and third centuries," says Dr. Waterman, "was not the best, but the purest of all" that the Christian world has known. Yet this purity was only preserved at the cost of the most severe trial. Sheltered to some extent by her own insignificance during her infancy, the Church no sooner arrived at adolescence than she found herself beset at once by external and internal enemies. On the one hand, were the Roman emperors trying by fitful and intermittent persecution to crush what they honestly considered to be a danger to the State; on the other, were the crowd of "heretical" or half-converted proselytes, outnumbering probably the orthodox, who did their best, like the Ebionites, to drag the Church back into Judaism, or, like the Gnostics, would have taken her more than half-way towards Paganism. Yet through all this the Church steadfastly held her way, and contrived not only to beat off her enemies, but to complete her organisation.

What this organisation was Dr. Waterman has no doubt whatever. He quotes with approval the statement of St. Ignatius of Antioch, that without bishops, presbyters, and deacons "there is not even the name of a Church." The bishops, he holds, were not merely in name, but by actual inheritance of office, the successors of the Apostles.

the presbyters acted as their counsellors and helpers, and the deacons were the ministers who attended to the material wants of the laity. He does not say that this scheme was necessarily unalterable, or even that it might not now be altered with advantage, for he would apparently welcome a scheme which would give the laity greater control in Church matters, and thinks it "not impossible that some day a great Church should bring together brethren devoted to Independency, and others who, though Episcopalians, do still prefer Episcopacy to Prelacy, and try again the experiment of a really primitive Church Order." But he records his opinion that the Post-Apostolic Church did consist of the three orders he names, and he certainly gives excellent reasons for his opinion. He is equally frank in speaking of the Eucharist, the Post-Apostolic view of which he gives thus, after explaining that it does not exactly square with that of any modern school:

The Eucharistic Elements of bread and wine are made to be the Body and Blood of our Lord by a consecration which makes them vehicles of His Incarnate Life, and, therefore, a Body and Blood of His, superadded to those He had by nature.

The following (abridged) account of a Church Service in the Constantinian Age may also be of interest in view of the present controversy about Ritual:

- (a) A preparatory service in which reading of sundry Scriptures would have place, . . . certainly an Epistle and Gospel and the sermon would be preached. . . .
- (b) The service proper, containing—
  - (1) The Kiss of Peace, given by men to men and by women to women. . . .
  - (2) The offering of bread and wine to the officiating clergy.
  - (3) The verses, "Lift up your Hearts" [and the responses].
  - (4) A Preface of exalted praise and thanksgiving. . . . passing into
  - (5) The Sanctus or Triumphal Hymn.
  - (6) A prayer commemorating the redemptive work of our Lord. . . .
  - (7) A Solemn Oblation of the bread and wine as a Christian Sacrifice.
  - (8) An Invocation of the Holy Ghost to consecrate the Elements as a Sacrament.
  - (9) A Prayer of Intercession for the Living and for the Faithful Departed.
  - (10) The Fraction and Commixture [Dipping of the Bread in the Wine].
  - (11) The Lord's Prayer.
  - (12) The Communion.

We have not looked for inaccuracies—although Dr. Waterman invites us to do so in his Preface—and such as we have met with accidentally do not seem to us to be serious. Nor do we say that this is a book which should attract the attention of scholars; but for a fair, readable, and temperate account of the moderate Anglican view of the period of which it treats we have met with none better.

Wayside Discourse.

A PRIDE of legs in motion kept
Our spirits to their task meanwhile,
And what was deepest dreaming slept:
The posts that named the swallowed mile;
Beside the straight canal the hut
Abandoned; near the river's source
Its infant chirp; the shortest cut;
The roadway missed; were our discourse;
At times dear poets, whom some view
Transcendent or subdued evoked
To speak the memorable, the true,
The luminous as a moon unclouded;
For proof that there, among earth's dumb,
A soul had passed and said our best.

From Mr. Meredith's poem "The Night Walk," in the "Century."

Other New Books.

THE HEART OF ASIA. BY F. H. SKRINE AND E. D. ROSS.

The history of Central Asia seems to have become fascinating all of a sudden to the industrious people who dig in the byways of history. To the recently published volumes on the subject must be added this book, written by Mr. F. H. Skrine, a retired Indian Civil servant, and Mr. E. D. Ross, the Professor of Persian at University College, London. To the great majority the Arabian Nights will always remain the text-book for the manners and customs, and in some degree for the history, of the monarchies of Central Asia, but those who desire to learn something more of the romance of Khiva, Bokhara, and Samarcand will find in this volume the history of many centuries conveniently boiled down, and condensed into a small compass. Prof. Ross is responsible for the historical part of the book, and he has placed much original research and an acquaintance with Oriental historians in their own language at the service of the reader. Some of the great rulers, such as Tamerlane, and well-known epochs of history, have been treated shortly, space being wisely reserved for the lesser-known part of the story. Mr. Skrine had dealt with Russia in Asia; her gradual advance across the deserts towards India, and her ruthless absorption of the Central Asian Khanates. The fault of this part of the book is that it is written too absolutely from a Russian point of view. Much information has been derived from such men as M. Lessar and Colonel Arandarenko, District Officer of Merv, and consequently we have a rose-tinted picture of Russia as a beneficent and civilising power politely absorbing barbarous tribes. No man is so charming or so specious as a Russian of the governing class, and Mr. Skrine has come under the influence of M. Lessar and his fellow-workers. The result is a pro-Russian account which leaves out of account the bad faith, treachery, and brutality which accompanied the advance of Russia. Bearing this fact in mind, the book is of interest and even of value, but the second part must be read in conjunction with other works which are not so much based on Russian authorities. The general reader will be interested to learn that the Tekke Turcomans, like the nomads of the Mongolian plateau, north of the Great Wall, ride exactly in the manner adopted by Tod Sloan, the American jockey, with the body well over the horse's neck.

The Heart of Asia is well illustrated, the majority of the pictures being reproductions of photographs, and the rest drawings by M. Verestchagin, the Russian battle-painter. A sketch map showing the advance of Russia across Central Asia, and an excellent map of the country from the Caspian Sea to Tibet, illustrate the text, and a fair index is of much help to the reader. (Methuen & Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

LETTER-BOOKS OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

ED. BY REGINALD R. SHARPE.

Antiquaries and others will welcome this, the first volume of a Calendar of the Letter-Books preserved among the archives of the City of London. These Letter-Books, so called from being distinguished by letters of the alphabet, have already been exploited by Mr. H. T. Riley in his interesting Memorials of London Life in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, and in his edition of Letter-Book E, known as the Liber Albus. The Corporation has now committed to Mr. Sharpe the task of constructing a systematic "Calendar" of these books so rich in details and suggestions of the City's ancient life.

We have here the calendar of Letter-Book A, covering the period 1275-1298. This book and Book B are filled chiefly with recognizances of debts, and are not in this respect typical of the series which number fifty volumes. Dry as these "recognizances" may seem, Mr. Sharpe points out "their value as illustrating the commercial intercourse of the citizens of London with Gascony and Spain in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, more especially in connexion with wine and leather." There are also records of that peculiar and complex tribunal the Assize of Bread. Other matters crop up. We find the deed (1237) whereby the City of London obtained its first rural water-supply from the Conduit which stood near the Marble Arch and collected the sweet waters of the Tye Bourne. "Free and quit and void of restraint," such were the adjectives that qualified the grant; strange that this remote reality is become a remote ideal!

How fatherly were the intentions of the City rulers may be seen by the ordinances passed at an Assize held in 1277. Thus it was enacted:

First that the peace of the lord the King be well kept between Christians [and Jews].

Also that two loaves be made for 1d., and four loaves for 1d., and that none be coated with bran (furratus) or made of bran.

Also that no one shall take another into his house for more than one night, unless he hold him to right if he make default, and his host answer for him if he departs.

Also that no pig be henceforth found by the streets or lanes of the City or suburb, nor in the ditches of the City; and if found they shall be killed by whoever finds them, and the killer shall have them without challenge or redemption for 4 pence from the owner. Whoever wishes to feed his pigs, let him feed them in the open (in franco) away from the King's highway [or] in his house under heavy penalty.

Also that no pentices, gutters, or jetties be of such a height (adeo alta) as to prevent persons riding under them without impediment and hurt, and that they be of the height of nine feet at least.

No leper shall be in the City, nor come there, nor make any stay there.

Also vendors of fish shall not throw their water into the highway, but cause it to be carried to the Thames.

Also that no one shall have a measure, beam, or other weight, unless it be good and just and agreeing with the King's beam and weights.

And Mr. Sharpe's editing promises well for the success of the Calendar as a whole. (Francis.)

CHANGES IN THE MINI Y, 1765-1767.

EDITED BY MARY BATESON.

The title to this volume—A Narrative of the Changes in the Ministry 1765-1767, Told by the Duke of Newcastle in a Series of Letters to John White, M.P.—sufficiently explains the nature of its contents. There is no surprise in store for the reader: it adds practically nothing to our knowledge of events during the ministries of Grenville, Rockingham, and Chatham; but we are quite of the editor's opinion, that it was worth publication. Macaulay has made familiar to the least historical reader the character of the Duke of Newcastle who, when a leading minister of the Crown, treasured up for the King the discovery that Minorca was an island! Even the smatterer in history knows of him as the partner of the elder Pitt in perhaps the most famous ministry of English history—the ministry under whose auspices Canada was conquered and our supremacy in India assured. Miss Bateson justly remarks that it is one of the surprises of eighteenth century history to find such a man as Newcastle attaining and maintaining for fifty years a great political position. George III. soon got rid of him; but, despite the break up of the Whig party, the old Duke remained until his death, in 1768, a political influence to be reckoned with. It is not surprising that the longer part of letters written by or to the greatest wirepuller who has ever taken part in English politics should be chiefly concerned with changes in the personnel of the King's ministers. We hear little of America and general warrants, much of the terms on which the followers of the Duke of Bedford—the "Bloomsbury gang"—would consent to support a projected ministry. The old man is not ungenerous to Pitt; but the rumour that his old colleague has refused to serve in any Cabinet of which Newcastle should be a member is a bitter pill for the old politician to swallow. Nor is it soothing to the dignity of the great Whig magnate to feel that, although he is included in the Rockingham Cabinet, its leading members, some of whom were not born when he entered politics, do not admit him to their confidence. "The truth is," says the sore old man, "my Lord Rockingham and the Duke of Grafton think themselves so sure of the closet (i.e., of the King's ear) that they neglect every other consideration; they make up their majorities in both Houses, and are more solicitous to gain new friends than oblige and retain their old ones." The eager desire and the frequent negotiations for the return of Pitt to office and the selfish meddling of Lord Temple, to whom Pitt seems to have surrendered his conscience; the patient mediation of the King's uncle, the Duke of Cumberland; the continued fear of the influence of Bute even in the most obscure forms—these and other interesting topics find additional illustration in this small volume of 170 pages. The editor has done her work well. (Longmans. 10s.)

SKETCHES AND STUDIES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

BY W. J. KNOX LITTLE, M.A.

It shows how far we have travelled in the last twenty years that one of Mr. Gladstone's canons should have the courage to raise his voice against the "unctuous rectitude" which has done our race such harm in South Africa. It is a pleasant surprise, and Mr. Knox Little deserves to be congratulated on the way in which he stands up against the giant Cant. Like many another dignitary, the Canon went abroad in search of health, and, with a due regard for tradition, he celebrated his return—and, we may hope, his restoration to health—by writing a book on what he had seen and heard. For us moderns South Africa was discovered by the Portuguese some centuries ago; but Mr. Knox Little, faithful to the best traditions of elegant authorship, has a fascinating little air of having discovered the Cape himself.

The book is divided into three parts, the first of which, containing the travels, interests us but moderately. The second and third parts, however, which deal with history and politics in South Africa, are excellent. The English improves, and the Canon has a grasp of his subject which is quite admirable and, in South African affairs, not too common. But few people know anything about the history of South Africa, and how it was that we came to be the Paramount Power in that part of the world, nor do they realise the inglorious record of ineptitude and incompetence piled up by the Colonial Office, which almost broke the hearts of Sir Benjamin D'Urban, Sir George Grey, and Sir Bartle Frere. These three statesmen fought against the futilities at home, and it is owing to their devoted efforts that we still retain the Cape. The terror of responsibility which infected our public men, when the doctrines of the Manchester School were in the ascendant, have cost us much blood and treasure, and seem likely to cost us more before the crowning blunder of Majuba Hill is wiped out.

Canon Knox Little's book is admirably adapted for beginners, for those who have many opinions but little knowledge about our position in regard to the Boers. In particular may it be recommended to women who take an intelligent interest in the papers, and have not time nor patience to read the more abstruse historical works on the subject. Here they will find a plain statement of the whole business set forth in interesting form by a Canon of the Church on whose knowledge and whose sense of what is just and right they may rely. Grave events have been preparing in the wide lands south of the Zambezi, and it will in no way detract from the interest of the telegrams to read the story of how we prepared the way for the present crisis in Mr. Knox Little's easily read pages. (Ibister.)

THE ROMANCE OF WILD FLOWERS. BY EDWARD STEP.

We can heartily recommend this little book to those for whom it is written—"unscientific flower-lovers." There is something very kindly and engaging about Mr. Step's explanations. For example, he no sooner has to begin using technical terms than he breaks off, on the word corolla, to explain exactly why it is necessary to say corolla instead of a little crown, and to employ Latin words generally in describing plant structure. The aim of the book is not to enable the reader to identify plants—that he may do with other help—but to "call his attention to those details of their structure and behaviour which suggest the term romance."

True to his "romantic" intention, Mr. Step gives his readers—his unscientific readers, be it remembered—a series of pleasant surprises in the titles of his chapters. For what will surprise the reader, the unscientific reader, more than to find Roses and Apples classed together, with the Strawberry thrown in between them, and to find that these are of one family; or to learn that the Wall-flower and the Stock are closely related to the Cabbage and the Turnip; or to see Daisies and Thistles associated in another chapter heading?

We cannot imagine anything more clear and fascinating than, say, Mr. Step's description of the means by which the Violet perpetuates itself. Adapted by its structure for cross-fertilisation by insects, the English violet is strangely neglected by these carriers of pollen. "It can only be explained on the assumption that the insects which successfully fertilise it in the warmer climates of the Continent do not occur until quite recent times, or the flower would have degenerated." That the Violet has not degenerated in our woods and hedgerows is due to its own patent and patient scheme of self-fertilisation. This is described step by step by the author up to the triumphant moment when the Violet applies pressure to its seed-vessel, and "one after another the hard shiny seeds are shot out with great force to a distance of several yards, where their smoothness enables them to sink readily between the grass or moss to the moist earth beneath." Thus the shy Violet is a self-sufficient little flower, whose beauty is attained by struggle and resource. Mr. Step's daughter has contributed pen drawings, and Mr. Step's photographs of plants in their natural state are pretty and lifelike. (Warne & Co. 6s.)

"Arms and the Man."

A MAN applied to the College for a coat-of-arms, and was asked if any of his ancestors had been renowned for any singular achievement. The man paused and considered, but could recollect nothing. "Your father," said the herald, aiding his memory. "Your grandfather?—your great-grandfather?" "No," returned the applicant, "I never knew that I had a great-grandfather, or a grandfather." "Of yourself?" asked this creator of dignity. "I know nothing remarkable of myself," returned the man, "only that being once locked up in Ludgate prison for debt I found means to escape from an upper window; and that, you know, is no honour in a man's scutcheon." "And how did you get down?" said the herald. "Odd enough," retorted the man. "I procured a cord, fixed it round the neck of the statue of King Lud, on the outside of the building, and thus let myself down." "I have it," said the herald: "no honour!—Lineally descended from King Lud! and his coat-of-arms will do for you."

From "Conferences on Books and Men" in "Cornhill."

Fiction.

That Fortune. By Charles Dudley Warner.
(Harper & Brothers. 6s.)

THERE is a good deal of pleasant fancy in this amiable romance of modern New York; but scarcely any imagination. The book has not been écru. In fiction there is Balzac and anti-Balzac, and nothing else. Mr. Warner is anti-Balzac. He has experience, culture, suavity, kindness, and the prudence of "moderation in all things." But he has not the passion for life. His attitude towards this splendid fracas is a little lackadaisical. He watches it through the window of the New York equivalent for the Athenæum Club, brings the tips of his fingers together, and begins to talk—like a popular preacher giving an address on Browning. It is not the essentials he cares for, but the apparatus of sentiment and event. Essentials are apt to be crude and intractable; they are apt to make one serious and too much in earnest. On the whole (he would say) it is as well to get away from life, especially in those leisure hours when one reads fiction. So his fancy sets to work and constructs a new New York of its own, a pretty city of sentimentality, a city of which conversation and private thoughts are manipulated in accordance with the etiquette of the Court of Spain. There is a poor boy swinging in the pine tops on a mountain; and there is a fabulously rich heiress in the pretty city hedged about by all the bastions of wealth; and you see the boy getting nearer and nearer till at last he gets too near and is kicked off. And then a smash happens in a place called Wall-street, and the heiress is not an heiress, and the boy comes again, and this time he captures "that fortune"—namely, "the love of Evelyn Mavick."

Of course it is not all so old-fashioned as that. Mr. Warner well knows how to keep pace with the latest æsthetic and social movements. Thus the hero first sees the heroine at the Opera, half-way through the overture to "Siegfried." (It is unfortunate that "Siegfried" happens to have no overture, but Mr. Warner would not care to be mistaken for a realist.) Thus also the fabulously rich heiress is stalked by the heir to an English peerage, who acts as English aristocrats usually do—in American fiction.

The following passage, which describes the hero's first attempt to storm the heroine's castle, is fairly representative of the book:

Mrs. Mavick was so beside herself that she could hardly speak. The lines in her face deepened into wrinkles and scowls. There was something malevolent and mean in it. Philip was astonished at the transformation. And she looked old and ugly in her passion.

"You!" she repeated.

"It is only this, Mrs. Mavick," and Philip spoke calmly, though his blood was boiling at her insulting manner—"it is only this—I love your daughter."

"And you have told her this?"

"No, never, never a word."

"Does she know anything of this absurd, this silly attempt?"

"I am afraid not."

"Ah! Then you have spared yourself one humiliation. My daughter's affections are not likely to be placed where her parents do not approve. Her mother is her only confidante. I can tell you, Mr. Burnett, and when you are over this delusion you will thank me for being so plain with you, my daughter would laugh at the idea of such a proposal. But I will not have her annoyed by impecunious aspirants."

"Madam!" cried Philip, rising, with a flushed face, and then he remembered that he was talking to Evelyn's mother, and uttered no other word.

It will be observed that Mr. Warner's pretty city is not strikingly different from the pretty cities of other eminent anti-Balzarians.

When Knighthood was in Flower. By Edwin Caskoden (Charles Major). (Sands & Co. 6s.)

THIS historical novel dealing with the love-story of Charles Brandon and Mary, sister of Henry VIII., is devoid either of literary pretension or of literary merit. It is the work of a man with little sense of the dignity or the romance of history; it shows no insight into character and no imaginative strength. Yet we can actually see in it some germ of hope for the future of the historical novel. At the end of his Introduction the author says:

I shall, therefore, with a few exceptions, give Sir Edwin's memoir in words, spelling and idiom which his rollicking little old shade will probably repudiate as none of his whatsoever. So, if you happen to find sixteenth century thought hobnobbing in the same sentence with nineteenth century English, be not disturbed; I did it. If the little old fellow grows grandiloquent or garrulous at the time—he did that. If you find him growing super-sentimental, remember that sentimentalism was the life-breath of chivalry just then approaching its absurdest climax in the bombastic conscientiousness of Bayard and the whole mental atmosphere laden with its pompous nonsense.

One may perceive there the attitude of a man who is afraid neither of history nor of literary precedent. At one clumsy but magnificent sweep Mr. Major brushes away the entire existing convention of historical fiction—as though he should say: "I will have none of it. I will write after my own fashion. The tradition which Scott inaugurated, being dead, is nothing to me. No ostentations, no hollow pomps, no make-believes, no perpetuation of ancient lies. I see history in the cold light of my American horse-sense, and as I see it so I will paint it." He is like the Yankee at the Court of King Arthur.

Here is part of a scene, towards the end of the book, between Harry the Eighth, Mary, and Wolsey:

Henry looked at her in surprise and then burst out laughing. "Married to Brandon with your hair down?" And he roared again, holding his sides. "Well, you do beat the devil; there's no denying that. Poor old Louis! That was a good joke on him. I'll stake my crown he was glad to die! You kept it warm enough for him, I make no doubt."

"Well," said Mary, with a little shrug of her shoulders, "he would marry me."

"Yes, and now poor Brandon doesn't know the trouble ahead of him, either. He has my pity, by Jove!"

"Oh! that is different," returned Mary, and her eyes burned softly, and her whole person fairly radiated, so expressive was she of the fact that "it was different."

Different? Yes; as light from darkness; as love from loathing; as heaven from the other place; as Brandon from Louis; and that tells it all.

Henry turned to Wolsey: "Have you ever heard anything equal to it, my Lord Bishop?"

My Lord Bishop, of course, never had; nothing that even approached it.

It is, of course, thoroughly bad—without any sort of literary decency. But it is also a sincere attempt, though by a man absolutely unfitted for his task, to be realistic. Call it the realism of an enfant terrible—but call it realism. When Knighthood was in Flower has achieved a sale of sixty thousand copies in the States. We trust that some author better equipped than Mr. Major will be encouraged by such success to imitate his audacity in ignoring our exhausted and effete convention of historical fiction. By no other means can this form of literary art be regenerated into an authentic life.

Satan Finds Some Mischievous Still. By E. V. Beaufort. (Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.)

THIS book is called "a character study." If it be such, then the "character" is "studied" by means of phrases. In reading the story we have been pre-occupied with the epithets which the author applies to the heroine. She is styled the "fair visitor," the "fair soliloquist," the "fair traveller," the "fair Herrice," the "fair Londoner," the "fair burden," the "fair assistant," the "imperious young beauty," "a true daughter of Eve," "a very angel of goodness," and "the observed of all observers." Miss Beaufort should have spared us that last; and we think she need not have stated that the fair assistant, at tea-time, "proceeded to make herself useful by pouring out the pleasant beverage."

The author has some aptitude for clear narrative, but her incessant use of stock-phrases and her inability to refrain from verbal quips of the most irritating description render the book quite impossible. There is, moreover, nothing of importance in the tale itself. Herrice, guilty of flirtation, is banished by her father to an aunt and a village. The village bores her, and the aunt forbids fires in bedrooms. "A fire I will have," said Herrice, and "proceeded to" burn up a chair in the grate. Then she wanted surreptitious bacon: "Now, Anastasia," she said, "go down to the cook and tell her to toast a rasher for me. You see, I fully understand the philosophy of Bacon, and there's nothing so sustaining—and then, when I've eaten it, we can sit by the fire and have a long chat."

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE VIRGINS OF THE ROCKS. BY G. D'ANNUNZIO.

The first of D'Annunzio's trilogy—"Romances of the Lily"; the scope of which is to depict a strong and disciplined intelligence, failing in its attempts to gain an operative influence over others, resorting to self communion and the creation of an ideal world of beauty and poetry. The translation has been made by Miss Agatha Hughes. This makes the fourth of D'Annunzio's novels to be translated into English, its predecessors being The Child of Pleasure, The Victim, and The Triumph of Death. (Heinemann. 6s.)

FORTUNE AT THE HELM. BY MRS. HERBERT MARTIN.

A Welsh story. Gaynor, the heroine, is thus described: "This eager-eyed, picturesque, curiously ignorant, warm-blooded girl." Gaynor comes to London, is introduced to the world, and has a hard time. A feminine story, on familiar lines, sympathetically done. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE INCA'S TREASURE. BY ERNEST GLANVILLE.

This is the third volume in Messrs. Methuen's "Novelist" library. The story opens in the temporary offices of the Condor Gold Mining Syndicate, but soon moves to Peru, where adventures the most thrilling and scenery the most inspiring regale the reader. (Methuen. 6d.)

THE HONOUR OF VIVIEN BRUCE.

BY MRS. J. H. NEEDELL.

The list of Mrs. Needell's novels is becoming a long one. This story is concerned with an inheritance, a faulty will, a rascal captain; and it is by a variety of dramatic strokes that justice and happiness are finally dispensed to those who deserve it. (F. V. White. 6s.)

A SEA COMEDY.

BY MORLEY ROBERTS.

Sea comedies are now the fashion. Mr. Roberts's yarn is a story within a story and is told racyly by the hero himself. It deals with the voyage of the Great Republic in the hands of a unique crew, shipped under unique conditions. "Owsever I woke up and found the 'ole ship owlin' drunk"—and so forth. (Milne. 2s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Littérateur, Ambassador, Patriot, Cosmopolite.*

MR. E. E. HALE's biography of Lowell is in essence a series of gossip reminiscences regarding the man and his friends. Interesting, yes, but also disappointing; interesting it could not but be.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL (1864).

It is written by an old and early friend of Lowell, perhaps the one surviving man best acquainted with Lowell and his career from the brilliant start to the honoured close. Yet from such a man one would have expected a fuller, more vivid, more meaty book; and one might have hoped a more orderly book. "Surely," one might have said, "this comrade of the young Lowell, and the young Lowell's brilliant band of friends, will give us a concrete presentment of the man as he lived and moved, will show us the breathing Lowell, enable us to get an orderly grip on the gradual evolution of his reputation, the successive epochs marked by the milestones of his progressive books or lectures, which were themselves books in ultimate form; will show us those books arising under his hand, give us a glimpse into the process of their creation. The more important the book, the more marked its position in the genesis of the man's universal reputation, the more we shall be told of its production and birth history." But all these things are not so. The book not merely lacks, but discards symmetry; it is systematically unsystematical. In the first place, it is disproportioned; the trail of the dominie is over it all. An intimate view of Lowell's connexion with and associates in Harvard was needful; but college matters occupy an inordinate share of the volume—college matters often trivial to the outsider, and often irrelevant to Lowell. For numbers of pages there is no reason but that they pertain to Harvard, and Lowell pertained to Harvard. Harvardiensis est, seems to be Mr. Hale's motto, nil Harvardiense sibi alienum puto. (We apologise for ruining the famous line of Terence.) Far too much of this matter, related at garrulous length, is only of interest to old Harvard students, and should have no place in a volume of Lowell reminiscences meant for the general public.

* James Russell Lowell and his Friends. By Edward Everett Hale. (Constable.)

Loquacity, indeed, is another of the author's sins; the book would profit by severe compression; moreover, it is amorphous as regards order. The author zigzags backward and forward between date and date in a bewildering fashion, so that the reader never feels easy in mind as to what part of Lowell's life is under notice. And with all this we get little direct and living picture of Lowell. For his personal glimpses Mr. Hale mostly has recourse to other writers. Want of art, of arrangement, of presentation, are chiefly responsible for the defect of definite and interesting impression. Digressiveness runs riot, and reaches its climax when the writer actually pauses to lecture undergraduates on their behaviour, or lack of behaviour, towards their teachers. An ill-compiled book, we must sorrowfully say, though it contains material which no future biographer of Lowell can neglect.

Before we part with this side of our subject, however, let us quote a story which does excuse its own introduction. It must be quoted here, for it has so little concern with Lowell that the author is not even certain whether he were present. It is of a dinner party given at Cambridge (Harvard) by Dr. Arnold Guyot. The doctor had received a present of a fine black bear, which he confined in a cellar, where also lay a small barrel of cider. Ominous rumblings below began to disturb the diners. Suddenly in rushed an attendant with breathless tidings. The bear had got loose, had been having his own private festivities on the cider, and was now coming upstairs, a most drunken bear. "The guests fled through windows and doors." It is a distinct loss to science that none of those learned men stayed to report the demeanour of this dissipated bear. His feelings must have been hurt to find himself so markedly "cut," after (most naturally) "coming upstairs" with the hilarious and social purpose of joining in the scientific convivialities. "Solitary drinking is a pernicious habit," said this genial animal, "I will go up and share my jovial mood with those good fellows overhead." It was his fate to be misunderstood.

English critics will not share Mr. Hale's estimate of Lowell as one of the foremost poets of his day. But with

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

From a Daguerrotype taken at Philadelphia 1841 that exception, America has every right to assign him a high place among her great men. He was, perhaps, the best representative of the American mind at its highest point of cultivation. His sanity, his balance, the equa-bility and variety of his powers, the all-round fineness of his character, would make him a remarkable man in any country. He touched many things, and all that he touched prospered under his hand. No English man of letters could have such a career, such opportunities for showing all that was in him. We do not naturally take our diplomats from the literary ranks. The liberal-minded policy of the United States in this respect gave a splendid opening to this most liberal-minded of her sons; and he well availed himself of it. Poet, essayist, editor, professor—all these he was; and knew failure in none. He was taken from the professor's desk and the editor's chair to be an ambassador; and forthwith he became an eminent ambassador. He earned a reputation as an occasional speaker unmatched on this side the water, and gained a name in England scarce inferior to that he possessed in America. Withal, he was a gentleman of the finest kind, sought after for his social gifts. Few men can show such a record; and fewer still would have remained unspoiled by it. Yet to the last he remained what he had been in the days of his youth. He related himself how he was one day walking along the Edgware-road with a friend, when he saw a building marked "Hospital for Incurable Children." He turned to his companion: "There's where they'll send me one of these days." To this perennial sympathetic geniality must, no doubt, be ascribed a large measure of his extraordinary success in life.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES (1862).

For it is a noticeable thing that, from the first, everything came to him. His severest mishap was a temporary rustication during his college course—the result of irregular attendance in chapel, apparently. But he was a favourite with the authorities, for all his waywardness, and they successfully pulled him through his examinations. He dabbled in letters while he was studying law, and from the start Boston leaders of literature recognised his ability. He had the luck that one of his friends was made editor of a periodical destined ultimately to become the Atlantic Monthly, so that his early poems and articles were at once "placed." His first book of poems succeeded. He gave up law and took to literature; he further tempted fate, simultaneously marrying a wife: yet he did not starve, and his marriage was happy. His first volume of essays obtained immediate recognition in America. Without struggle he became a recognised power in letters, consorting with the leading authors of the day. His appointment to the Smith Professorship of Modern Languages at Harvard followed, and he never looked back. Assuredly, for all this his happy faculty of making and retaining friends was largely responsible.

According to all accounts, his wit and brilliancy in talk were already remarkable in his youth. The pity is, that throughout this book we get no specimens of this brilliancy. It may have been of that kind which does not crystallise itself in single utterances, or perhaps the Boswell was lacking. One description there is of an evening spent in the circle of his friends; but it is a generalised description, and too long to quote. We can see that part of his attractiveness lay in sheer high spirits, and the ability to fool in season. He did not disdain to sing comic songs, or, at least, songs which were the occasion of uproarious fun in others. It is an excellent good thing when a man of genius can play the fool in private. He is the less likely to play it in public. Who does not think the better of Coleridge when he reads of that party where the poet-philosopher, after drinking the final toast of the evening, stood up and solemnly sent his glass crashing through the window? Upon which the rest of the party in turn sent their glasses after it. It was, perhaps, one of the most philosophic actions of his life. Lowell, moreover, could be all things to all men. He was ever willing to fraternise with the students of his class at Harvard; treated them as individuals, not "in the loom," as the Northern farmer would say. His house at Elmwood was open to any of his pupils who chose to call: refreshment, chat, the society of his wife and children, they there found waiting for them. A man who so treated the world was likely to be well treated by the world.

At the same time he had marvellous power of work. While he was fulfilling the functions of a university professor, he was also editing an important periodical. It seems impossible, yet he did both, and both well. This brilliant man of letters was also one of the most successful of American editors. His one failure was the abortive Pioneer; but he was then suffering severely from his eyes. Afterwards, he headed first the Atlantic Monthly, and then the North American Review; and made them pay.

But he had yet another field of activity. Poet, essayist, editor, professor, he was likewise a lecturer; and here, too, he was in the front rank. His best lectures, indeed, rank among his best prose. The lectures on the English poets, together with the volume of essays, My Study Windows, are his best known prose work; and they are classical work. His poetry has many merits: one might almost say it has every merit, except that inevitableness which is the distinctive note of great poetry. As a satirist in verse he is keen, shrewd, and felicitous at his best. He has the caustic Yankee humour in nailing a sham, pointed by literary study. But he is not too often at his best, and much of the Biglow Papers are no very lightsome reading at the present day. In prose, on the other hand, in his essays or lectures, he is a master. He can hardly write a despatch without the masterly hand showing itself. His style is perfectly modern, yet classical—classical by virtue of the scholarly build of the sentence, the admirably just choice of words from a wide and finely selected vocabulary, and the flash here and there of a striking and apposite image, whenever it is needed, lighting up his meaning at just the right angle of illumination. His prose, indeed, is much richer in striking imagery than his verse—a curious reversal of natural conditions which in itself seems to show that he is more natively a proseur than a poet. He says that prose demands an effort from him, while verse is delightful and easy. No one would guess this from comparing his work in the two kinds; particularly from the literary opulence of his letters and despatches, where he had no motive to take special pains. May it not have been that it was the subject-matter of his verse which he found more congenial rather than the medium itself? Above and beyond his style, the substance of his prose is delightful. It is mostly critical, whether criticism of literature or other subjects: and he had an exquisite gift of appreciation. Themes which seemed exhausted by the full harvests they had yielded to others yield up fresh crops to him. Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, Wordsworth, Keats—how we shudder at yet a fresh article on theses such as these, fly-blown by swarm on swarm of buzzing critics! Yet from Lowell's pen they are fresh as daffodil and crocus. His critical perception is reinforced by his own technical experience and understanding as a poet. This lends a special value to his appreciation of the great poets. How delightful, in his lecture on Milton, to find that great master of harmony vindicated from the ignorant aspersions of Prof. Masson, measuring metre by the foot-rule! Prof. Masson has done excellent work of the professorial kind; but, in gauging metre, only a poet's criticism is of value. There are exceptions of non-poets with a very fine ear and understanding for metre (Mr. Oman is one), but they are rare. In appreciation Lowell is certainly among the foremost of recent critics, while his beautiful gift of diction and expression lends added value to his work in this kind. But as a philosophical critic he is decidedly to seek. He has no grip of fundamental critical principle; indeed, he seems slack to grasp philosophical principle of any kind. For this reason, his lecture on Carlyle is one of his least successful. Approaching the least academic of writers, he begins by a long academic discussion of poetry and imaginative writing, which nowhere gets down to any basic truth. It is not easy for any man to grasp the philosophic conception (such as it is) of Carlyle's French Revolution through its phantasmagoric utterance. But Lowell does it peculiarly injustice. The Yankee Democrat is throughout "riled" by the English lover of kingship, and gives him vigorous counter-hitting, with scant measure of judiciousity. It is the most telling onslaught on Carlyle's weak points ever delivered; it seems to have caught something of Carlyle's own tempest-sleet of imagery: but it is little more. But in yet another class of essay, such as that On a Certain Condescension in Foreigners, what polished humour, what urbane satire! And what exquisite vignettes of natural scenery in others! A prose-writer as fine as America has produced.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW (1860)

We spoke of his urbanity. He is charmingly urbane, as only a cosmopolitan could be. And it is the crowning distinction of this singularly orbéd, equable, and lovable character that he was at once patriotic and cosmopolitan. Sensitive American, he was alive to the culture and distinctive excellence of all foreign countries; he had a place in his bosom even for Spain. Many an American patriot has an ignorant scorn for "feudal Europe." Many a cosmopolite (American or English) loses touch with patriotism. He, by a gift as gracious as his other gifts, preserved united, yet severally unblemished, the fine flower of both. Littérateur, ambassador, patriot, cosmopolite—America will not soon produce his like again.

Things Seen.

Different People.

A VERY hot afternoon on the S.E.R. In the carriage were two ladies who were young and happy, a lady who was elderly and apparently single, and a little girl. At Orpington there entered a tall, fresh, loose-limbed boy, of nineteen or so, carrying surveying poles and a large basket, who took the seat opposite the two ladies who were young. As the train panted along, and the carriage became more and more stifling, the boy was noticed to be growing restless and nervous. Twice or thrice he made as if to speak, and each time thought better of it; and then, suddenly, reaching out the basket and displaying its contents to the two friends, he gasped, indicating one of them with a timid eye: "Would you mind taking some of these? They've just been given me, but I couldn't eat them all, you know, and . . . so very hot . . . and really if you would be so kind . . . ?" The basket was loaded with strawberries, and he was quickly assured that his request was not an impertinence. He then turned to the little girl, who no sooner observed his intention than she crossed over to the basket side, and, seating herself within range of the fruit, saved him further trouble. To the elderly lady, however, he had to repeat his invitation. Frigidly accepting it, she took two strawberries from the basket with much ceremony. At New Cross the boy gathered together his property and jumped out. "What a dear boy!" said one of the two friends. The little girl looked wistfully after him. "I have never," said the elderly lady, tightening her lips and turning to the other two, "I have never been so embarrassed in my life."

Repose.

It was the day Dreyfus arrived at Rennes. As we sped through Normandy I thought, "There will be a noise on the boulevards." And the whole monstrous drama would have uncoiled in my memory but that Paris was still a three hours' journey, and Normandy lay to right and left. Now the fields closed in, and gave us the scent of haycocks; now they opened out, wet and gleamy. Then we began to cross, and to recross, the Seine; and each time we thundered over I had a vision of angry boulevards.

Suddenly, against the wide, white river, I read, on a signboard, this strangely-peaceful inscription: "Gambard, Pêcheur." I looked back, and saw a little boat that was half in shadow, half in soft sunlight, under some osiers. "That," I mused, "is Gambard's boat." I shall always see this. It was the day Dreyfus arrived at Rennes.

"The Most Pessimistic of Living Pessimists."

THERE is no instrument, we believe, for taking the measure of a man's pessimism. It must always be doubtful who is in the greatest dumps. Yet in the preface to a translation of August Strindberg's play The Father (Duckworth) we find the palm for pessimism unhesitatingly given to the Swedish dramatist. Of Strindberg's Inferno we are told darkly: "In it you will find a pessimism so abysmal and terrifying as to defy comparison with the darkest thoughts of your darkest hours." This reads rather like a bill outside a ghost booth, and when the editor, "W.," adds under his breath: "I admit that I have never reached the second volume of Inferno: one does not willingly prolong a nightmare," his readers will only complain that they are not given Inferno instead of The Father. This loose word, pessimism, has much to answer for. Pessimism is generally the pose of unhappiness. Even "W." finishes by doubting whether Strindberg's works are not to be regarded as "the awful, maginings of an overtired brain. It seems impossible that any being could have suffered all that is here depicted and retain his sanity." Very well; but can the imaginings of an overtired brain be literature? "W." is scarcely happy here. We prefer his quotation from an article by Mr. Justin H. McCarthy. This gives the facts of Strindberg's life in a nutshell.

Strindberg springs, I believe, quite from the people; his youth belongs to the "servile life of the cities." Poverty twice interrupted his studies at the University of Upsala, and to say that implies very grinding poverty. Poverty made many things of him—made him an assistant teacher at a school in Stockholm, made him a doctor's assistant, made him a super at a theatre. Men of the Gil Blas temperature, men of the Con Oregan temper, would have found food for mirth in all these vicissitudes; Strindberg seems to have found only bitterness, combativeness, a fierce indignation like unto Swift's. When he left the University he became, as many a gallant youth has become, a journalist, drifting from one news-sheet to another till, in 1874, he drifted into the comparatively tranquil haven of an assistant librarianship. In this haven he remained for some years. Then his active literary career began. Then came years of travel, years of incessant production, years of incessant strife. Then came the influence of the German philosopher Nietzsche. Then came fame and unhappiness, and all the elements that have made him what he is.

This one understands. Strindberg, like most of us, is not happy. But don't let us call him the champion pessimist, or we shall soon have more candidates for the sackcloth and ashes, each with his editorial backer. It is significant that, in defending his play, The Father, from the charge that it is "too sad," Strindberg writes: "People call authoritatively for the 'joy of life,' and theatrical managers call for farcos, as though the joy of life consisted in being foolish, and in describing people who each and every one are [?] suffering from St. Vitus's dance or idiocy. I find the joy of life in the powerful, terrible struggles of life; and the capability of experiencing something, of learning something, is a pleasure to me." We are reminded of Dr. Johnson's friend who confessed that he had tried very hard to be a philosopher, but that, somehow—he did not know how it was—cheerfulness would keep breaking in.

In translating The Father, which we do not here examine critically, Mr. Erichsen has undoubtedly done good service; and we are glad to see the series which has given us Verhaeren's Dawn, and Ostrovsky's Storm thus maintained. The plot of The Father must not be revealed here. But in accordance with his dictum that the joy of life is inherent in the powerful, terrible struggles of life, "I have chosen," says Strindberg, "an unusual but attractive subject; in other words, an exception, but a great exception, that will strengthen the rules which offend the apostle of the commonplace." And he adds:

What will further create antipathy in some is the fact that my plan of action is not simple, and that there is not one view alone to be taken of it. An event in life—and that is rather a new discovery—is usually occasioned by a series of more or less deep-seated motifs, but the spectator generally chooses that one which his power of judgment finds simplest to grasp, or that his gift of judgment considers the most honourable. For example, someone commits suicide: "Bad business!" says the citizen; "Unhappy love!" says the woman; "Sickness!" the sick man; "Disappointed hopes!" the bankrupt. But it may be that none of these "reasons" is the real one, and that the dead man hid the real one by pretending another that would throw the most favourable light on his memory.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE picture of the Queen by Wilkie, for the desirable purchase of which the Government will not give a special Grant to the National Portrait Gallery, was painted when her Majesty had been reigning for two years. She had been only a few months on the throne when she commissioned Wilkie—who had been appointed Painter in Ordinary—for the picture of her first Council. That was in October, 1837—the year, by the way, not only of the Queen's accession, but also of the removal of the Academy to Burlington House. At Brighton he had his first sitting, when, as Wilkie wrote to his sister, she was "most gracious, and appeared to recognise me as an early friend." "She appoints a sitting ~~once~~ in two days," is another item, "and she ~~never~~ puts me off." The painter's impressions of the Queen's appearance at the time also find a record:

She is eminently beautiful; her features nicely formed, her skin smooth, her hair worn close to her face in a most simple way, glossy and clean-looking. Her manner, though trained to act the Sovereign, is simple and natural. She has all the decision, thought, self-possession of a queen of older years; has all the buoyancy of youth; and from the smile to the unrestrained laugh, is a perfect child.

An appropriate passage, though not subtle; and the portrait of the Queen in the Council picture is quite to match: it is, beyond question, "clean-looking."

OUT of the painting of this larger picture came the commission for the portrait that has been figuring in the correspondence between Lord Peel and the Treasury. "It appears to me very like her," was Sir David's own comment, when he first saw it finished and framed. It was exhibited in the Academy of 1840; it cost the Queen £200, and was by her given to a Lady of her Bed-chamber, the Marchioness of Normanby. The present Marquis, in offering it for sale to the nation at fifteen hundred guineas, does not ask more than a market value that can elsewhere be easily realised.

MESSRS. STREET & Co., the eminent advertising agents, have issued to a limited number of authors the following notice, dated from 164, Piccadilly, W.:

Messrs. Street & Co. notify that they receive and supply to the daily and weekly papers domestic and society news. One copy only of any paragraph is required, and in no case does the fee exceed that made by the paper.

"But by which paper of the twenty or a hundred, with varying tariffs, in which it may appear?" asks the interested correspondent who sends us the circular announcing this rather novel form of journalistic middlemanship.

THE Dowager Lady Howard de Walden, whose serious illness has been announced, is known to the public principally as the owner of the large London property which came to her twenty years ago on the death of her brother, the fifth Duke of Portland, and, in a much less degree, as the holder of a Scottish property she inherited from her sister, Lady Ossington. Lady Howard de Walden herself, however, takes her greatest if not her only pride in the fact that Lord George Bentinck was her brother. She is the sole survivor of that large family of brothers and sisters, and it is to be hoped that she will yet live to see the new edition of Lord George Bentinck: a Political Biography, which was called for some time ago in this column, and which is likely shortly to appear under the editorship of Mr. Coningsby Disraeli.

THE old lines, which one has had time to forget, but which in some form linger on in the mind from the occasion of a first meeting with them in boyhood,

When coals to Newcastle are carried,
When Castlereagh's wife has an heir, no longer carry any sting in their last allusion. The Marquis of Londonderry of to-day has had an heir for the last one-and-twenty years, and his tenantry, especially in Ireland, have kept this week the coming of age of Lord Castlereagh. The childless head of this family of the Stewarts, who have also been Tempests and Vanes and Vane-Tempests, but have retaken to their Stewart again during the present Lord Londonderry's life, was, of course, the famous politician, and his unfruitful marriage with a daughter of the Earl of Buckinghamshire was the point of a good many lampoons and jests besides Byron's.

THE Duke of York, who does not forget that he takes his title from the North Country, and who has already paid more visits to its territorial magnates than any Prince has paid in recent years, will go a little further north still towards the end of the year as the guest of the Earl of Durham at Lambton Castle. Lord Durham, to all intents a bachelor, entertains comparatively little in the North. He is nothing if not a Londoner. But, if put to it, he can display northern hospitality to perfection; and though a sight of the chimneys of coal-pits are not easily dodged in his domains, and the trail of the serpent smoke is to be found in the recesses of his woods, he can offer his guests the best of sport and the pleasures of a well-assorted party.

MR. ROBERT BARRETT BROWNING is translating into brick and marble the cheque sent him by the publishers of his parents' love-letters. He is building himself a new studio in Venice, and that is just what the married poets would have wished. With a studio of his own arranging, Mr. Barrett Browning will resume again his long-discarded brushes, with results which the public will watch with interest, if only because he is the child of his parents. His works have at least the "literary interest" in a sense of the term rather different from the usual. That they may have the artistic interest too is not impossible: that great hope of his father may be realised, and may be helped to realisation by the new and particularly favourable conditions.

Correspondence.

La Jeune France et le Vieux Shakespeare.

MONSIEUR,—Croyez-vous vraiment—on le dirait à lire votre Gilles-Shakespeare du 24 Juin—que nous en soyons restés aux opinions de Voltaire sur Shakespeare, et qu'au fond du cœur nous n'ayons pas cessé de lui reprocher sa grossièreté et sa barbarie? Ces lignes que vous citez, savez-vous qu'elles ont été la risée de deux ou trois générations de Français, et la preuve souvent invoquée des changements survenus dans notre goût public? Quand Voltaire les écrivit, par jalousie de poète sans doute—le pauvre Voltaire se croyait grand poète—le public français pouvait encore lire la Henriade sans bailler, et se délectait à voir jouer des tragédies platement rimées, dont le titre seul aujourd'hui nous endort. L'Art Poétique de Boileau était alors considéré comme le code éternel des belles-lettres; ce n'est plus aujourd'hui qu'un instrument de supplice à l'usage des collégiens de quinze ans, ou, si vous voulez, un appareil scientifique qui permet de mesurer le degré d'ennui qu'on peut supporter sans en mourir. Le public du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle ne voulait voir partout que mesure, civilités et bienséances: c'est un reproche qu'on fait assez souvent à nos auteurs modernes, de négliger quelque peu les unes et les autres. Si peut-être, au cours de nos révolutions littéraires—non moins profondes que nos révolutions politiques—nous avons perdu l'exquise politesse de nos arrière-grands-pères, en revanche nous avons appris à comprendre beaucoup de choses qu'ils méprisaient sans les connaître.

Ducis, quand il se mêla d'adapter Othello et Macbeth, écrivit des pièces assez ridicules: nous sommes les premiers en France à nous en égayer. Mais il serait juste, au sens du mot fair, d'ajouter qu'avant Garrick on jouait en Angleterre des adaptations qui ne valaient pas beaucoup mieux que celles de Ducis. Le docteur Johnson, Forbes, et bien d'autres, ne sont guère plus tendres pour Shakespeare que Voltaire lui-même. Par contre, nous sommes tombés plus que vous dans l'excès opposé. Pour nos romantiques, Shakespeare a été simplement un dieu. Ce qui dans ses œuvres avait paru bizarre ou choquant à leurs prédécesseurs leur a semblé par là même digne d'une admiration particulière. Théophile Gautier a écrit plusieurs pages pour montrer que l'apostrophe: "Well said, old mole!"—que Forbes Robertson supprime à la scène, je crois—est du dernier sublime. François Victor-Hugo et E. Montégut se sont plu à traduire les passages les plus simples du monde par des violences et des trivialités de leur crû, qu'ils y découvraient de bonne foi. Victor-Hugo, dans le volume de divagations extatiques, ou d'extases divagantes, qu'il a consacré à Shakespeare, l'appelle un homme-océan: que vous faut-il de plus?

Ce temps de fanatisme littéraire est passé. Mais il n'a pas été suivi d'une réaction qui nous ait ramené à Voltaire, et nous aimons Shakespeare autant que jamais, quoique plus sobres dans nos transports. Ce n'est pas nous qui retardons d'un siècle; c'est peut-être vous, Monsieur, dans l'idée que vous vous faites de la France et du goût français. Il m'a semblé souvent que vos compatriotes ont une tendance à nous voir tels que nous étions il y a fort longtemps. Ou plutôt tels qu'étaient nos émigrés de la Révolution, que vous avez vus ici, incapables de rien oublier comme de rien apprendre, et gagnant leur vie en exerçant quelques métiers d'ancien régime. Avouez-le: pour vous un Français est toujours plus ou moins cuisinier, maître d'armes, perruquier, ou professeur de danse et de maintien. La psychologie de ces gens-là ne saurait admettre, évidemment, l'intelligence et l'admiration de Shakespeare. Mais peut-être aussi serait elle insuffisante à expliquer l'esprit français d'à présent, renouvelé par le contact et l'étude de la pensée étrangère, accoutumé aux plus grandes audaces par l'exercice illimité du libre examen, ouvert à tous les problèmes et agité pour les résoudre de passions véhémentes et tragiques. Nous fournirions assez de sujets de drame à un nouveau Shakespeare s'il s'en pouvait trouver. Voltaire n'avait pas vu la Révolution. Voltaire n'était pas contemporain de Taine, d'Emile Zola, ni de l'affaire Dreyfus.

Veillez agréer, Monsieur, l'assurance de ma considération distinguée.

Londres: 3 Juillet, 1899.

PAUL MANTOUX.

Literary Disguises.

SIR,—The irritating frequency of reviewers' mistakes as to the identity of those who adopt well-known pseudonyms for their works tempts me to invoke the aid of your readers to discover a remedy for such ignorance.

It occurs to me how the simple employment of inverted commas might act as a useful indicator and corrective. But doubtless this notion might be vastly improved upon. Suggestions would be welcomed by many victims.—I am, &c.,

CECIL CLARKE.

Authors' Club, S.W.: July 25, 1899.

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 42.

We asked last week for "Literary Learics," that is to say, criticisms of living authors in the manner, more or less, of the following example by Father Russell:

Professor R. Yelverton Tyrrell
In Latin is brisk as a squirrel;
And e'en his Greek prose
As pleasantly flows
As the English of Lang or of Birrell.

The best of the new ones is, we think, the following, by Miss Elizabeth F. Stevenson, Kenton Lodge, Newcastle-on-Tyne:

IAN MACLAREN.

Our minister, Ian Maclaren,
Of copy will never be barren.
Just a smile and a tear
In a dialect queer—
And he's read from the Thames to Loch Carron.

Among the others are no fewer than ten of which Mr. Kipling is the subject, most of their authors finding "stripling" an invaluable rhyme. We quote a few of the better "Learics":

MR. KIPLING.

Those juvenile "Ditties" of Kipling,
Like brooklets ran flashing and rippling:
Now laboured and strong
Swirls the tide of his song;
But the Giant charms less than the Stripling.

[J. D. A., Ealing.]

There's a poet called Kipling whose tone,
Though changeable, is always his own;
He's himself when he swears,
Writes Recessional prayers,
Or picks with his Agent a bone.

[W. M. Dunkeld.]

MISS C. M. YONGE.

Miss Charlotte M. Yonge is a writer,
Whose stories make school-girls' lives brighter,
But her scope it is small,
She's no humour at all,
So male readers generally slight her.

[J. D. W., London.]

PROFESSOR SAINTSBURY.

A drawer of water, a hewer
Of books that one wishes were fewer,
A preacher, professor,
Defender, oppressor,
In fact, in one word—a reviewer.

[T. C., Buxted.]

MR. H. D. TRAILL.

O! Harry, cognomen Traill
May excellent fortune prevail!
If wit and good sense
May procure a man pence,
You will not have rea-on to fail.

[C. S. O., Malvern.]

MR. BRYCE, M.P.

Most pleasant historian, James Bryce,
In English so brilliantly nice;
So lucid and clear
That dull facts appear
Full of interest, to charm and entice.

[E. C. H., Bradford.]

MR. ARCHER.

The best of all critics to-day
Is undoubtedly W. A.,
For views that are sound,
And opinions profound,
There is no one like W. A.

[A. M., London.]

MR. CROCKETT.

A novelist named Mr. Crockett
Soared up to the sky like a rocket,
Some critics may say
"He's not likely to stay,"
But they envy the state of his pocket.

[H. B. K., Brockley.]

Oh, great is the genius of Crockett!
His storehouse is always "unlockit,"
For murders and feuds,
And troubles of dudes,
He carries them all in his pocket!

[T. J., Lincoln.]

Answers were received also from: G. W., Hull; C. E. H., Richmond; J. A. H., London; P. W., Hastings; B. C., Redhill; E. H., Stroud; M. N. A., Beckenham; Miss G., Reigate; L. K., Highgate; W. E. T., Caterham; T. B. D., Bridgwater; M. O. K., Dublin; F. W. H., Cardiff; A. G., Cheltenham; H. R. P., London; E. M., London; B. B., Birmingham; S. F. C. B., London; H. P. B., Glasgow; A. A., London; M. P., Nutfield.

Competition No. 43.

THIS is the time for anything rather than serious reading: the time for swimming and rowing and basking and playing cricket and living the outdoor life. A little reading is pleasant, of course, but if ever there was a season for not desiring books as books—books in the aggregate—it is now. Hence this is eminently the time to express a wholesale condemnation of reading. We offer a prize of a guinea for the best verses against books. We leave metre and form to competitors, who may be as brief as they like, but must not exceed 24 lines.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, August 1. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the second column of p. 120 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names—both Christian name and surname—and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon, or stamps for the same; otherwise the first to be looked at will alone be considered.

Books Received.

Week ending Thursday, July 27.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Gilbert (G. H.), The Student's Life of Paul ..... (Macmillan) net 5/0
Nicoll (W. R.), The Expositor, Vol. IX. .... (Hodder & Stoughton) 7/6

POETRY.

Machar (A. M.), Lays of the "True North" ..... (Stock)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Wilson (W.), The State: Elements of Historical and Practical Politics ..... (Isbister) 7/6
Cussons (J.), A Glance at Current History ..... (Cussons: Glen Allen, Va.) 3/6
Muirson (A. F.), King Robert the Bruce ..... (Oliphant) 1/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Lindley (P.), Tourist Guide to the Continent (Great Eastern Railway Co.) 6d.

EDUCATIONAL.

Lyde (L. W.), The Age of Drake ..... (Black) 1/0
Auden (H. W.), Greek Prose Phrase-Book ..... (Blackwood) 3/6
Preasland (A. J.) and Tweedie (C.), Elementary Trigonometry ..... (Oliver & Boyd) 2/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

Louis (H.), A Handbook of Gold Mining ..... (Macmillan) net 10/0
Pike (R.), Life's Borderland and Beyond ..... (Simpkin Marshall) 3/6
Allbutt (T. C.), A System of Medicine ..... (Macmillan) net 25/0
A Guide to the Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities ..... (British Museum) 6d.
Handbook of British, Continental, and Canadian Universities ..... (Macmillan) 3/0
Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation, No 2 ..... (Murray)

NEW EDITIONS.

Whympier (E.), A Guide to Zernatt ..... (Murray) net 3/0
Whympier (E.), A Guide to Chamounix and the Range of Mont Blanc ..... (Murray) net 3/0
Darmesteter (A.), An Historical French Grammar ..... (Macmillan) 12/6
Lindsay (R.), An Introduction to the Study of Zoology ..... (Sponenchein) 6/0
Shakespeare, Everyday Edition, Vol. VII. .... (Macmillan) 5/0
Herrick, Hesperides, Temple Classics, 2 vols. .... (Dent) each 1/6

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

Announcements.

WE understand that Mr. Lionel Deele's book on the French Army, which will lose nothing in interest by appearing on the eve of the Dreyfus trial in Rennes, will throw an unexpected light upon the "lamentable" condition of the French Army of to-day which made the whole disgraceful affaire possible. Mr. Deele served for some years as a private soldier in one of the chief cavalry regiments. Mr. Heinemann will publish the book shortly under the title Trooper 3809.

MR. ARNOLD WHITE was commissioned by Baron Hirsch to inquire into the condition of the Jews in the different countries of Europe in connexion with his Jewish colonisation scheme for the Argentine Republic. His report takes the shape of a volume on the whole condition in Western civilisation of the Jewish race, which will be published by Mr. Heinemann at the beginning of next month.

MESSRS. METHUEN are about to publish a completely new edition of Mr. Baring Gould's Life of R. S. Hawker. The book, which is known as The Vicar of Morwenstow, has been out of print for many years, and has been practically unobtainable in England. Mr. Baring Gould has carefully revised the book, and it will be published at the popular price of 3s. 6d.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish this week A Constitutional and Political History of Rome, by Mr. T. M. Taylor, Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. Mr. Taylor succeeded Mr. Walter Wren in the well-known establishment at Powis-square.

THE same firm will publish in a few days a new book by Mr. Eden Philpotts, the author of The Children of the Mist, &c., entitled The Human Boy. In this volume of stories Mr. Eden Philpotts elaborates his own theory of schoolboy humour.

THE Empress Frederick has accepted a copy of Lives and Times of the Early Valois Queens, which the author, Mrs. Catherine Bearne, has lately sent her.

A SECOND edition of The Maternity of Harriott Wicken will be published by The Macmillan Company in America.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. will publish in a day or two a volume by Mr. Spenser Wilkinson, entitled British Policy in South Africa, reproducing in a revised form the author's articles on "The Crisis" which lately appeared in the Morning Post.

MR. GRANT RICHARDS is about to publish two volumes of Wagner's letters—Wagner's Letters to Wesendonck and Wagner's Letters to Keckel. In each case the translation is the work of Mr. William Ashton Ellis.

A WORD-BOOK AND A FACT-BOOK.

THE CENTURY DICTIONARY is a fact-book and word-book combined. It is a new work on a new plan—giving, for the first time, every form of spelling, pronunciation, and usage known, whether English, American, Australian, provincial or colloquial. It consists of eight sumptuous volumes; 7,000 large quarto pages; 500,000 definitions; 7,500 illustrations; 300,000 quotations; and the editorial cost, alone, of the work was more than £200,000.

THE CENTURY DICTIONARY is issued by the Times upon the plan of monthly payments which proved so successful in the case of the Times Reprint of the Encyclopædia Britannica. Specimen pages, order forms, and full information may be obtained, gratis and post free, upon application to the MANAGER of the TIMES, Printing House Square, London, E.C. Copies of the Dictionary in the various styles of binding may be examined at the Office of the Times; at the Advertising Agency of Messrs. STREET & CO. 164, Piccadilly; or at the establishment of Messrs. CHAPPELL & CO., Pianoforte Manufacturers, 50, New Bond Street. At any of these three addresses orders may be booked.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained; or Complete Sets may be had separately for 3s. 6d. :—

BEN JONSON.
JOHN KEATS.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.
TOM HOOD.
THOMAS GRAY.
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
LEIGH HUNT.
LORD MACAULAY.
ROBERT SOUTHHEY.
S. T. COLERIDGE.

CHARLES LAMB.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
SAMUEL PEPYS.
EDMUND WALLER.
WILKIE COLLINS.
JOHN MILTON.
WILLIAM COWPER.
CHARLES DARWIN.
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

ANDREW MARVELL.
ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS CARLYLE.
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY
CHARLES DICKENS.
JONATHAN SWIFT.
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.
WILLIAM BLAKE.
SIR RICHARD STEELE.
ALEXANDER POPE.
DOUGLAS JERROLD.
FRANCIS BACON.
HENRIK IBSEN.

MR. JOHN LONG'S NEW LIST.

Second Large Edition of MRS. LOVETT CAMERON'S NEW NOVEL.
THE CRAZE OF CHRISTINA.

Art vellum, gilt, 6s.
"An amusing book is always sure of a welcome and 'The Craze of Christina' should be popular. Mrs. Lovett Cameron hits upon a genuinely comic idea, and she develops it with skill. Mrs. Lovett Cameron means to entertain her readers, and entertain them she does."—The World.

ESMÉ STUART'S NEW NOVEL.
IN THE DARK.

By the Author of "Sent to Coventry," &c. Art vellum, gilt, 6s.

T. W. SPEIGHT'S NEW NOVEL.
THE CRIME IN THE WOOD.

By the Author of "The Doom of Siva," &c. In striking picture cover, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

WILLIAM S. WALKER'S NEW BOOK.
FROM the LAND of the WOMBAT.

By the Author of "When the Mopoke Calls," &c. In striking picture cover, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Fully illustrated.

G. G. CHATTERTON'S NEW NOVEL.
THE SPORT OF CIRCUMSTANCE.

Art vellum, gilt, 3s. 6d.
Athenæum.—"The book is interesting and clever throughout, and has good literature in it."

A NEW EDITION.
THE STORY OF A CAMPAIGN ESTATE.

By ROBERT THYNNE, Author of "Irish Holidays," &c. Cloth gilt, 6s.

London: JOHN LONG, 6, Chandos St., Strand.

LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

8vo, 18s.

THE SIX SYSTEMS OF INDIAN PHILOSOPHY.

By the Right Hon.
F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M.,
Foreign Member of the French Institute.

NEW AND CHEAPER IMPRESSION.

LEDDY MARGET.

By L. B. WALFORD,
Author of "Mr. Smith," &c.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Spectator.—"Mrs. Walford has seldom given us anything better than this picture of a lovable yet unconventional old age."
Fall Mall Gazette.—"An ideal story to read on a sunny afternoon under an apple tree .... A story which does one good."

TWO NEW VOLUMES OF THE
"SILVER LIBRARY."

THE EARLY HISTORY OF CHARLES JAMES FOX.

By the Right Hon.
Sir G. O. TREVELYAN, Bart.
New Impression. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF ERASMUS.

By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE.
New Impression. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
London, New York, and Bombay.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

This work is particularly interesting to students of naval warfare. "Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War. The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare." Frontispiece. 193 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
4, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class
Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other Last Machines
for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built
Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page
Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence
New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS WANTED, at Prices affixed.—
"Snob and Gownsmen," 1829-30, £5.—"The Germ,"
1850, £2.—"Old Paris," 1878, £2.—"The Lover's Tale," 1833, £5.
—Borrow's "Wild Wales," 1862, £2.—Moore's "Alps in 1864," £3.
—Tytmarsh's "Comic Tales," 1841, £5.—"Queen Mab," 1813, £7.
—"Alice in Wonderland," 1865, £2.—"Pauline: a Fragment,"
1832, £30. 2,000 Books Wanted at fancy prices. List free.—
EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish. — Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 8, Farnival Street, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.
Multi-Copies. — Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.,
68a, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing
in foreign languages.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on
DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £1
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums
on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

A THIN COCOA.

EPPS'S

The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the con-
sistence of tea, of which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.
Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 5 stamps.—JAMES EPPS & Co., Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London.

COCOA
ESSENCE

The Old Series of THE ACADEMY, which ended on October 1st, completed a volume.
The Index can be obtained gratis on application to the Publisher.

UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW.

CHAIR OF HISTORY.

The University Court of the University of Glasgow will at an early date proceed to APPOINT a PROFESSOR to occupy the above Chair in this University, recently rendered vacant by the death of the late Professor James Macgregor Burns.

The Professor will be required to enter on his duties as from 1st October next, from which date the appointment will take effect.

The normal salary of the Chair is £900, subject to § VIII. (2) and (3) of Ordinance No. 25. The appointment is made ad vitam and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, who will furnish any further information desired, twenty copies of his application and twenty copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit, on or before 15th September next.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,

Secretary of the Glasgow University Court.

91, West Regent Street, Glasgow.

ROYAL ACADEMY of ARTS.

LAST WEEK.

The EXHIBITION will CLOSE on the EVENING of MONDAY, AUGUST 7.

ROYAL ACADEMY of ARTS.

EVENING EXHIBITION.

The EXHIBITION will be OPEN in the EVENING from MONDAY, JULY 31, to MONDAY, AUGUST 7 (Bank Holiday), from 7.30 to 10.30. Admission, 6d. Catalogue, 6d. On BANK HOLIDAY, the admission throughout the day will be 6d., on other days it will be as usual.

COLLEGE of PRECEPTORS, Bloomsbury

Square, W.C.—The Council of the College of Preceptors will shortly proceed to the APPOINTMENT of an additional EXAMINER in MATHEMATICS and an additional EX-AMINER in GERMAN. Candidates must be Graduates (with a preference to those who have taken high Honours), and should have had considerable experience in Teaching.—Applications (twenty copies), stating age, experience, &c., should be addressed to the Dean of the College not later than August 31.
If testimonials are sent they should be not more than three in number, and twenty copies of each should be forwarded.

C. R. HODGSON, B.A., Secretary.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months,
and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS
of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE
(Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING
PRESENTS.

80 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;
And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

"THE ACADEMY"
LITERARY COMPETITIONS.

No. 43.

All readers attempting this week's Competition (described fully on page
118) must cut out this Coupon
and enclose it with their reply.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY'S LIST.THE SUPPER OF THE LORD.

By HANDLEY C. G. MOULE, D.D., Norrisian Professor of Divinity, Fellow of St. Catharine's College, Cambridge, and Hon. Chaplain to the Queen.
Price 3d., on good paper and in cover, or in a special cheap form, 1d. net.

"A very able statement of the controversy." Spectator.

"For the perfect urbanity and the scholarly ability with which he presents his case, we have nothing but praise."—Glasgow Herald.

"An excellent text-book for class-meetings and Bible-classes."—Methodist Times.

GOD FIRST;

OR,

Heater Needham's Work in Sumatra.

Her Letters and Diaries arranged by MARY ENFIELD. With a Preface by the late Miss S. G. STOCK. Portrait and illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d., cloth boards.

"It cannot but be read with interest by all who are concerned to further the progress of missionary enterprise abroad."—Scotsman.

"One cannot but admire her pluck and serenity in very trying circumstances."—Glasgow Herald.

"A pathetic narrative of great suffering endured not with patience only, but with the most confident hope."—Spectator.

UNSEAL
THE BOOK.

Practical Words for Plain Readers of Holy Scripture. By Mrs. ASHLEY CARUS-WILSON (MARY L. G. PETRIE,
B.A.). Crown 8vo, 2s., cloth boards.

"There is a fine freedom in the author's methods and recommendations, the result of distinguishing the matter from the spirit of Scripture. We shall lose no time by reading this book, though it is often lost time to read books about the Bible and leave the Bible itself unread. And it is so saturated with clever modern examples of the mistakes that are made in misreading the Bible, that the reading of it is a very great delight."—Expository Times.

"Will prove useful and suggestive to Sunday-school teachers."—Scotsman.

RAMBLES WITH NATURE
STUDENTS.

By Mrs. BRIGHTWEN, Author of "Wild Nature Won by Kindness," &c.
With 130 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 5s., cloth boards, gilt edges.

"An admirable little guide for all who are weary of bricks and mortar."—Academy.

"A book which will help both teacher and pupil to see, and thus open up a new world for observation, experiment, and research."—Echo.

"Well written, well printed, and capitally illustrated."—Literature.

"A work of this kind is worth many times of the kind which unfortunately often do duty for school rewards."—Glasgow Herald.

Published at 56, Paternoster Row, London.

SIXPENNY BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY READING.

MACMILLAN & CO'S Sixpenny Series.

LATEST ADDITION.

THE FOREST LOVERS

A Romance.

BY MAURICE HEWLETT.

PREVIOUSLY PUBLISHED.

BY LORD TENNYSON.

POEMS, including

IN MEMORIAM.

MAUD, THE PRINCESS,
ENOCH ARDEN, and other Poems

BY FLORENCE MONTGOMERY.

MISUNDERSTOOD.

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

A CIGARETTE MAKER'S
ROMANCE.

A ROMAN SINGER.

MR. ISAACS: a Tale of Modern India.

BY LEWIS CARROLL.

ALICE'S ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND.

With 42 Illustrations by JOHN TENNIEL.

THROUGH the LOOKING-GLASS

and
WHAT ALICE FOUND THERE.

With 50 Illustrations by JOHN TENNIEL.

BY A. E. W. MASON.

THE COURTSHIP OF MORRICE BUCKLER.

BY CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

DOVE IN THE EAGLE'S NEST.

BY THE RT. HON. SIR JOHN LUBBOCK,
BART., M.P., &c.

THE PLEASURES OF LIFE.

BY W. E. NORRIS.

MY FRIEND JIM.

BY T. HUGHES.

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOLDAYS.

BY CHARLES KINGSLEY.

WESTWARD HO!

HYPATIA.

ALTON LOCKE.

YEAST.

HEREWARD THE WAKE.

TWO YEARS AGO.

MACMILLAN & CO., LIMITED, London.

THE SILENCE OF DEAN MAITLAND.

By MAXWELL GRAY.

OTHER SIXPENNY COPYRIGHT BOOKS, suitable for Holiday and General Reading, are:

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.
She: a History of Adventure.

By GEORGE MEREDITH.
The Ordeal of Richard Feverel.

By BEATRICE HARRADEN.
Ships that Pass in the Night.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.
Robert Elsmere.

By RUDYARD KIPLING.
Departmental Ditties, and other Verses.

By A. CONAN DOYLE.
Adventures of Sherlock Holmes.
Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes.
The Sign of Four.

By H. S. MORRISON.
A Yankee Boy's Success.
Being an Account of how an American Lad Worked his Way through Europe. With 7 Illustrations, and an Introduction by CHAUNCEY M.
DEPUE.

By the late W. E. GLADSTONE.
The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture.
A Series of Old Testament Studies.

Price SIXPENCE each.

At all Bookstalls or Newsagents; or post free from the Publishers for SIXPENCE.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD.,
7 to 12, Southampton Street, Strand.

POPULAR EDITIONS.

Set in new type, medium 8vo, 6d. each;
cloth, 1s. each.

All Sorts and Conditions of Men. By WALTER BESANT.

The Golden Butterfly. By WALTER
BESANT and JAMES RICE.

The Deemster. By HALL CAINE.

Shadow of a Crime. By HALL CAINE.

Antonina. By WILKIE COLLINS.

The Moonstone. By WILKIE COLLINS.

Woman in White. By WILKIE COLLINS.

The Dead Secret. By WILKIE COLLINS.

Moths. By OUIDA.

Under Two Flags. By OUIDA.

By Proxy. By JAMES PAYN.

Peg Woffington; and Christie Johnstone. By CHARLES READE.

The Cloister and the Hearth. By CHARLES READE.

"It is Never Too Late to Mend." By
CHARLES READE.

Hard Cash. By CHARLES READE.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS,
111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

See also next page for List of Messrs.
CASSELL & CO'S SIXPENNY BOOKS.

A FRESH DEPARTURE IN PUBLISHING.

A NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVEL
FOR SIXPENCE.

THE NOVELIST.

MESSRS. METHUEN are making an interesting experiment. Many reprints of popular novels have been issued at Sixpence, but no NEW book by an author of high repute has been published at that price. Messrs Methuen have just commenced the issue of a monthly series of New Fiction, under the general title of "THE NOVELIST." Each number contains a complete story or set of stories by an author of high reputation, and is as long and as good as the popular Six-shilling novel of to-day.
The books are admirably printed, in good type, on good paper, and are most attractively bound in a cover specially designed in green and crimson.

I. DEAD MEN
TELL NO TALES.

E. W. HORNUNG. [Ready.]

II. JENNIE BAXTER,
JOURNALIST.

ROBERT BARR. [Ready.]

III. THE INCA'S TREASURE.

ERNEST GLANVILLE. [Ready.]

IV. A SON OF THE STATE.

W. PETT RIDGE. [August.]

V. FURZE BLOOM.

S. BARING-GOULD. [September.]

VI. BUNTER'S CRUISE.

C. GLEIG. [October.]

As there is a great demand for these New Sixpenny Novels, the public are requested to place their orders at once with their Booksellers or Newsagents.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Magnificent Presentation Volumes.

DEDICATED BY PERMISSION TO
HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

NOW READY. Complete in Two Handsome Volumes, price 9s. each.

The Queen's Empire.

A Pictorial Record in which the Modes of Government, National Institutions, Forms of Worship, Methods of Travel, Sports, Recreations, Occupations, and Home Life of the Inhabitants of the British Empire are faithfully and vividly portrayed. With about 700 MAGNIFICENT ILLUSTRATIONS, beautifully reproduced from authentic Photographs, and printed on Plate Paper, with Descriptive Text.

The Graphic says: "Messrs. Cassell & Company are indeed to be congratulated on the publication of such a work, happy alike in conception and execution, for it can with safety be said that no other book brings home to the reader more vividly the true character of our Empire, and what a powerful agency it is in the progress and civilisation of the world."

New and Enlarged Edition. Price 10s. 6d.

The Queen's London.

Containing nearly 500 Exquisite Views of London and its Environs, together with a fine series of Pictures of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee Procession.

The Times says: "A fascinating collection of photographs, several hundreds in number, illustrating buildings and scenes taken throughout London and the suburbs, at once very varied and very well chosen."

Complete in One Volume. Price 9s.

Pictorial England and Wales.

With upwards of 320 Beautiful Illustrations prepared from Copyright Photographs.

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "Here are some 320 beautiful pictures costing each of them only the fraction of a farthing. Scenes of historic interest and picturesque spots (some of them still virgin of the tourist) are included, and the blocks in almost every case are creditable to both photographers and engravers."

NOVELS FOR HOLIDAY READING.

BY R. L. STEVENSON.

Library Edition, 6s. each; Popular Edition, 3s. 6d. each.

TREASURE ISLAND.

KIDNAPPED.

CATRIONA.

THE MASTER OF BALLAN-TRAE.

ISLAND NIGHTS' ENTER-TAINMENTS.

THE BLACK ARROW.

THE WRECKER. By R. L.
STEVENSON and LLOYD OS-BOURNE.

BY Q. (A. T. QUILLER-COUCH).

WANDERING HEATH. 5s.

DEAD MAN'S ROCK. 5s.

"I SAW THREE SHIPS." 5s.

NOUGHTS and CROSSES. 5s.

THE SPLENDID SPUR. 5s.

THE BLUE PAVILIONS. 5s.

THE ASTONISHING HIS-TORY OF TROY TOWN. 5s.

THE DELECTABLE DUCHY.
5s.

IA: a Love Story. 3s. 6d.

BY FRANK STOCKTON.

THE GIRL AT COBHURST. 6s.

MRS. CLIFF'S YACHT.

3s. 6d.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAP-TAIN HORN. 3s. 6d.

POMONA'S TRAVELS. 3s. 6d.

BY J. M. BARRIE.

SENTIMENTAL TOMMY. 6s. | THE LITTLE MINISTER. 6s.

BY STANLEY WEYMAN.

THE MAN IN BLACK. 3s. 6d.

THE STORY OF FRANCIS

CLUDDE. 6s.

FROM THE MEMOIRS OF A MINISTER OF FRANCE. 6s.

BY MAX PEMBERTON.

THE GARDEN OF SWORDS.
6s.

KRONSTADT. 6s.

A PURITAN'S WIFE. 6s.

THE IMPREGNABLE CITY.

Popular Edition. 3s. 6d.

THE SEA-WOLVES. Popular
Edition. 3s. 6d.

THE IRON PIRATE. Popular
Edition. 3s. 6d.

THE LITTLE HUGUENOT.
1s. 6d.

BY RIDER HAGGARD.

KING SOLOMON'S MINES. 3s. 6d.

BY ANTHONY HOPE.

FATHER STAFFORD. 3s. 6d.

BY E. W. HORNING.

SOME PERSONS UNKNOWN.

6s.

YOUNG BLOOD. 6s.

MY LORD DUKE. 6s.

THE ROGUE'S MARCH. 6s.

"TINY LUTTRELL." 3s. 6d.

BY W. CLARK RUSSELL.

WHAT CHEER! 3s. 6d.

LIST, YE LANDSMEN! 3s. 6d.

SIXPENNY EDITIONS OF POPULAR NOVELS.

READY SHORTLY.

THE IRON PIRATE. By MAX PEMBERTON.

ALREADY PUBLISHED.

THE WRECKER. By R. L. STEVENSON and LLOYD OSBOURNE.

LIST, YE LANDSMEN! By W. CLARK RUSSELL.

THE MASTER OF BALLANTRAE. By R. L. STEVENSON.

KIDNAPPED. By R. L. STEVENSON.

CATRIONA. By R. L. STEVENSON.

TREASURE ISLAND. By R. L. STEVENSON. Illustrated.

KING SOLOMON'S MINES. By RIDER HAGGARD.

DEAD MAN'S ROCK. By Q.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., London, Paris, New York, and Melbourne.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1422. Established 1869.

5 August, 1899.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE new London daily paper of which we spoke recently may possibly be called The Illustrated Daily Press. This title, however, lacks the crispness which is essential to the name of a daily necessity in these times, and it will, for its own sake we trust, be curtailed. Meanwhile the Bookman hints at two other projected morning papers for London—one to proceed from the house of Pearson, with Mr. T. P. O'Connor as editor, and the other with Mr. Birrell in the chair. But we cannot believe in the latter appointment at all, nor indeed can the Bookman.

A NOVEL on the Dreyfus Case is not, it seems, in M. Zola's programme after all. He told the Paris correspondent of the Daily News that he should write nothing about the Case, "unless it were a naked story, without the faintest tinge of romance, or any attempt to dramatise, and this would be for posthumous papers, to be published when the Affair is almost forgotten; a perfectly sober treatment alone would be admissible—the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

THE publication of the book called W. G. may, when taken into consideration with Mr. W. G. Grace's newspaper articles now being syndicated all over the country, and the literary activity of other prominent cricketers, cause the lover of cricket serious uneasiness. If, as has been asserted, intense literary activity precedes the fall of nations, may it not as certainly precede the decadence of a pastime? Personally, we view without pleasure the publicity now given to cricket. It is difficult to believe that a game which was originally intended to be amusement for twenty-two active players should rightly become entertainment for thousands of passive onlookers, to say nothing of countless readers. The energy expended in watching cricket and writing about cricket is out of all reasonable proportion to the energy spent in the game itself. This must be wrong. There is, however, money in it; so much so that we expect to hear soon that an enterprising literary agent has set up a kiosk at Lord's in order to be on hand to engage the services of the latest big scorer.

BUT this is merely a private moan. If any man has earned the right to take to the pen it is Mr. W. G. Grace, who abstained from it until he had done marvellous things in the field; and we do not wish to be thought to include his book in a sweeping condemnation of all cricket writing. On the contrary, it seems to us a good book, and we would that all cricket books were as good, and that all writers on cricket had as long a record at their backs before they took to literature.

THE Executive Committee of the Burne-Jones Memorial Fund, who were charged with the selection of a picture to represent Sir Edward Burne-Jones in the National Gallery, have secured the offer of "King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid." This picture belongs to the executors of the Earl of Wharnccliffe, who have agreed (subject to the approval of the Court of Chancery) to sell it to the Committee for the sum of £6,500. The funds already subscribed and acknowledged amount to about £4,000, and a further sum of £2,500 is therefore needed. All who desire to be associated in this gift to the nation are invited to forward their donations to Messrs. Glyn and Company, 67, Lombard-street, E.C.; or to the hon. treasurer, Alexander Henderson, Esq., M.P., 52, Princes-gate, S.W.

THE author of The Hooligan Nights will be interested in a suggestion which has been made in the Boston Literary World by a reader of that book. "The veracious chapter," he writes, "in which Alf, the burglar, saves the baby's life was fresh in his mind when, on July 6, he read on the New York Herald's bulletin board, 'Burglar Saved a Dying Child.' This recalled to him two stories of burglars and babies that have been both read and seen on the stage—Mrs. Burnett's Editha's Burglar and Mr. Davis's The Disreputable Mr. Reagan. Evidently burglars are kind to babies, and are apparently their natural protectors. Why should not people employ them instead of nurses?"

DURING the autumn two books may be expected from Mr. Swinburne: one a collection of poems, and one a drama.

NEW novels from Mr. Rudyard Kipling and Mr. Stephen Crane are likely to be seen before long. Mr. Crane, by the way, sent to a recent Chronicle the clearest statement on the position in the Philippines that has yet appeared anywhere. In America his new book of poems, War is Kind, is receiving some hard treatment from reviewers.

THE Oil and Colourman's Journal gives only a limited amount of attention to literature, but we can trust its judgment when, as in its current issue, it deals with technical books. Comparing English, French, and German manuals, this authority says:

The German is apt to be verbose, and is fond of long, historical essays; the Frenchman has similar characteristics; hence their writers are invariably long in coming to the point. . . . The German technical writer is exceedingly scientific, and his productions are as much scientific as technical treatises; the French writer has much the same fault. . . . The English technical writer has, in our eyes, the merit of sticking closer to his subject; he does not believe in long historical introductions, nor in long scientific discourses, but plunges at once into the real subject-matter of his book, and thereby he enables his reader to get a better grasp of the subject, and is able also to put more real technological value into his book. We have long been of opinion that, judged fairly, English technical literature is much superior to either German or French technical literature; it is generally more clearly written; there is less verbiage about it.

APROPOS of Col. Roosevelt's book on the Rough Riders, which we review elsewhere in this number, an American humorist is now engaged on a work entitled Fun and Fighting with the Rough Riders, which should make an amusing sequel.

THE Stevenson letters in the August Scribner are rather less interesting than some that have preceded them, but their writer, as we know, had it not in him to be dull. They belong to the Prince Otto and Bournemouth period, and some refer to the reception of Prince Otto by the papers. Stevenson clearly was a little hipped by certain reviews. Here is a mordant passage from a letter to Mr. Gosse:

That is the hard part of literature. You aim high, and you take longer over your work, and it will not be so successful as if you had aimed low and rushed it. What the public likes is work (of any kind) a little loosely executed; so long as it is a little wordy, a little slack, a little dim and knotless, the dear public likes it; it should (if possible) be a little dull into the bargain. I know that good work sometimes hits; but, with my hand on my heart, I think it is by an accident. And I know also that good work must succeed at last; but that is not the doing of the public; they are only shamed into silence or affectation. I do not write for the public; I do write for money, a nobler deity; and most of all for myself, not perhaps any more noble, but both more intelligent and nearer home.

AND here, from a letter to John Addington Symonds, is Stevenson on Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment:

Raskolnikoff is the greatest book I have read easily in ten years; I am glad you took to it. Many find it dull: Henry James could not finish it: all I can say is, it nearly finished me. It was like having an illness. James did not care for it because the character of Raskolnikoff was not objective; and at that I divined a great gulf between us, and, on further reflection, the existence of a certain impotence in many minds of to-day, which prevents them from living in a book or a character, and keeps them standing afar off, spectators of a puppet show. To such I suppose the book may seem empty in the centre; to the others it is a room, a house of life, into which they themselves enter, and are tortured and purified. The Juge d'Instruction I thought a wonderful, weird, touching ingenious creation: the drunken father, and Sonia, and the student friend, and the uncircumscribed, protoplasmic humanity of Raskolnikoff, all upon a level that filled me with wonder: the execution also, superb in places.

Apropos of Stevenson, one of the recent additions to the British Museum library is the little pamphlet containing the testimonials written for R. L. S. when he applied in 1881 for the professorship of modern history at the University of Edinburgh. Mr. Leslie Stephen wrote:

I know of no writer of Mr. Stevenson's standing of whose future career I entertain greater expectations. . . . Although I have not had any opportunity of forming a judgment of Mr. Stevenson's more specific qualifications for a Chair of History, I know that he has paid special attention to the history of Scotland; and from all that I have seen of him, I should think him admirably qualified to command the attention and respect of students, and to convey knowledge in the most interesting form.

Prof. Meiklejohn wrote:

I believe that Mr. Stevenson would do the work of that Chair with real success. He possesses in a quite rare degree the most needful qualifications for a historian—a keen and true insight into the life of man, and a strong sympathy with all shapes and forms of it. Then he is both widely and deeply read in literature; and I am quite sure that he, more than any man I know or know of in Scotland, would make the past of our Scottish history live again, and be quickeningly present in our present life.

Dr. Lewis Campbell wrote:

His knowledge of the history of some periods, especially of Scottish history, is intimate and minute; and this, combined with his remarkable powers of imagination and expression, would enable him to kindle enthusiasm among the students, and incite them to investigation. His amiable facility of style must communicate grace and power to any subject which he handles with seriousness.

After this we can but wonder that the application was not successful. How could testimonials be better? But perhaps testimonials rarely count.

A CORRESPONDENT writes, apropos of an essay on Catalogues in one of the magazines: "One catalogue I have heard of is a treasure after which book collectors might profitably strive. The Athenæum of a northern shipping town once came into the custodianship of a retired mariner. As soon as he had made all weather-tight elsewhere he set to work in compiling a catalogue of the library. This document is a riot of false ascriptions. Mr. Clark Russell's John Holdsworth, Chief Mate, I remember, went down to Charles Dickens; and Paul Clifford to Sir Walter Scott. Sir John Lubbock's Pleasures of Life and Lord Meath's Social Arrows (essays on over-population, shop assistants, and other extremely matter-of-fact subjects) were classed as 'Fiction'; and not a pseudonym was allowed to stand. In vain did one look under 'O' for the works of Ouida; they were relegated to 'D'—De la Ramé (Louisa, Ouida). The catalogue was a masterpiece. But a committee without any feeling for masterpieces intervened; the edition was suppressed; and the list from which the readers now pick their novels is a monument of insipid accuracy. Whether the mariner remained to acquire precision, or returned to his old element the sea, I cannot say."

THERE are signs that the cult of the poster is on the wane, at any rate in this country. The low prices which ruled at the dispersion of the collection of posters brought together by the late Mr. Ernest Hart indicate that the craze is practically over. The best work of Willette, Grasset, and Boutet de Monvel failed to excite any enthusiasm, and in many cases no bid could be obtained until several lots had been grouped together. The fact is, posters are too awkward to collect: their size prevents them occupying either portfolios or wall space satisfactorily. And by deliberate intention they are designed for a short life: in time the colours lose their brightness, their crudity repels.

IN connexion with the death recently of Mr. Robert Bonner, the proprietor of the New York Ledger, it will be recollected that one of his most famous contributors was Henry Ward Beecher. Anything that the celebrated divine cared to write was at once snapped up by the indefatigable Mr. Bonner. He gave Beecher, for instance, £6,000 for his novel, Norwood. This anxiety to secure contributions from the preacher once gave rise to an amusing incident, which is perhaps worth relating. During Beecher's courting days it was related by his wife that he once "dropped into poetry," writing a few lines of verse, full of affection for his betrothed. Those verses were naturally treasured with care by Mrs. Beecher, but no one could get a sight of them, though many knew of their existence. One day Mr. and Mrs. Beecher were in Bonner's office, when the latter, suddenly struck with the idea, asked: "Why don't you write a poem, Beecher?" "He once did," Mrs. Beecher immediately exclaimed, and Bonner's eyes sparkled as he turned to her. "Recite it to me, won't you, Mrs. Beecher?" he said in dulcet tones. But the preacher gave his wife a look which plainly told her to be silent. "Come," continued the pushing publisher, "I'll give you 5,000 dollars if you will recite that poem for me." "Why," began Mrs. Beecher, "it ran—" "Eunice!" exclaimed her husband warningly. And although Mr. Bonner doubled the sum he had previously offered, and brought all his editorial wiles to bear on Mrs. Beecher, he never obtained that precious poem.

Apropos the "Anthology of Minor Poetry," of which a correspondent wrote last week, we learn that precisely such a volume as that indicated is now in preparation for publication in the autumn by the Unicorn Press. The editor has read many hundred collections of recent poetry in order to make his choice.

LORD ROSEBERRY's felicitous way of improving and adorning all occasions was evident at Epsom last week in his charming speech to the boys of the college. Manhood was his subject, but before reaching it the speaker alluded to the recent litigation concerning the volume of his Addresses and Appreciations: "At this moment the question is raging before the Courts as to the first copyright of a speech when it is delivered and reported. We have only got to this point so far, that the one person who has no property in it is the man who delivers it, and, therefore, until this question of proprietorship is settled by that highest voice in the land, it would be premature, it would be about criminal, for anyone to add to this species of indescribable property which is at this moment in the lost luggage office of the law. I, at any rate, am not prepared to-day to utter what may to-morrow be declared to be stolen goods, and so—if for that reason alone—I must be brief until the question is settled." This is as happy and timely an apology for brevity as we can remember.

THE sun of the triolet has lost some of his power, and yet there is no reason why the capabilities of a very pretty form of verse should be neglected simply because fashion has changed. We are led to these remarks by the following little poem by Miss Elsie Higginbotham, which she sends us this week:

AN APOLOGY

On Reading the Browning Love Letters.

I.

Forgive, sweet Lovers of this book,
The sad, who scan your story;
Forgive their wistful eyes that look . . .
Forgive, sweet Lovers of this book,
Their knowledge where your fingers shook;
Their watching of your glory;
Forgive, sweet Lovers of this book,
The sad, who scan your story.

II.

Accept, true Lovers here enshrined,
The few, who share your gladness
In touch of heart, and soul, and mind;
Accept, true Lovers here enshrined,
Their seeing of themselves defined,
Their growth to joy, from sadness . . .
Accept, true Lovers here enshrined,
The few, who share your gladness.

III.

Condone, great Lovers—being dead,
The printing of these pages;
Nor shrink that we—we too, have read;
Condone, great Lovers—being dead,
Our vision of the Gold you shed . . .
For hearts in coming ages,
Condone, great Lovers—being dead,
The printing of these pages.

In the current Architectural Review, which has a supplement of reproductions from the architectural room of the Royal Academy, we find a drawing of the front elevation of some new "labourers' cottages" at Bromford, near Edrington. They are red brick, sombre, dignified, Elizabethan. And they set us wondering wherein the plan would differ had the architect, Mr. H. T. Buckland, been ordered instead to design some authors' cottages. The difference would be, we presume, in isolation; for though labourers can live in rows, authors should be detached. But an author in a small way would need to be very fastidious if he could not be satisfied with such a home as this. Yet, as a rule he must put up with an ugly jerry-built abode, "labourer" though he be too.

MR. ADRIAN ROSS recently wrote some maddeningly memorable verses on poets' wives, and now, in Temple Bar, the same subject is amplified in prose by a social historian. The stories which this gentleman, Mr. Alfred T. Turner, has collected are not new, but in the mass they would have a terrible effect on the prospects of all young women who may happen to be for the moment engaged to practitioners of the poetic art, were it not for the cases of happiness that can also be arrayed. "Am I in the way?" Lady Byron timidly asked, as she knocked at his lordship's door to announce dinner. "Damnably!" was the veracious answer. Byron, of course, was a monster; but look at the author of Paradise Lost. One day the Duke of Buckingham referred to Mrs. Milton as a rose. "I'm no judge of colours," said the poet; "but it may be so: I've often felt the pricks." Wordsworth, who was happily married, explained the situation to Mrs. Hemans: "It is not because they possess genius that their homes are unhappy, but because they do not possess genius enough." But Milton can hardly be said to have been deficient in genius. Probably the truth is that Mrs. Milton was anything but a "phantom of delight," as Mrs. Wordsworth was. It has to be remembered that occasionally the fault is with the poet's wife.

THE latest of the magazines is the Yorkshire Ramblers' Club Journal, which is to be issued twice a year. As the Yorkshire ramblers do not confine their wanderings to Yorkshire, but roam wherever they are disposed, the magazine will probably cover a great deal of ground. In the first number, for instance, are articles on mountaineering, on the Dents des Bouquetins, and on Norway, with excellent illustrations.

THERE are signs that a revival of interest in Miss Austen is beginning. Not that she has ever lacked popularity; but we learn that at least two new editions for the pocket are now in preparation. Mr. Gwynn's severities and the replies they called forth have probably produced new readers; and a new critical and biographical work on Miss Austen is about to appear from the pen of Mr. Walter Pollock. For information concerning such works of this kind as already exist, we refer our readers to the bibliographical article on the next page. Incidentally we might mention that several juvenile efforts of Miss Austen are still in MS. books in the possession of her descendants, who wisely, perhaps, refuse to let them see the light. Mr. Austen Leigh, however, printed one of them, the pleasant piece of nonsense which we reproduce:

THE MYSTERY: A COMEDY.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Men.	Women.
COL. ELLIOTT,	FANNY ELLIOTT,
OLD HUMBUG,	MRS. HUMBUG,
YOUNG HUMBUG,	and
SIR EDWARD SPANGLE,	DAPHNE.
and CORYDON.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

Enter CORYDON.

Corydon. But hush; I am interrupted. [Exit CORYDON.]

Enter OLD HUMBUG and his Son, talking.

Old Hum. It is for that reason that I wish you to follow my advice. Are you convinced of its propriety?

Young Hum. I am, sir, and will certainly act in the manner you have pointed out to me.

Old Hum. Then let us return to the house. [Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—A Parlour in HUMBUG'S house. Mrs. HUMBUG and FANNY discovered at work.

Mrs. Hum. You understand me, my love?

Fanny. Perfectly, ma'am. Pray continue your narration.

Mrs. Hum. Alas! it is nearly concluded; for I have nothing more to say on the subject.

Fanny. Ah! here is Daphne.

Enter DAPHNE.

Daphne. My dear Mrs. Humbug, how d'ye do? Oh! Fanny, it is all over.

Fanny. Is it, indeed!

Mrs. Hum. I'm very sorry to hear it.

Fanny. Then 'twas to no purpose that I—

Daphne. None upon earth.

Mrs. Hum. And what is to become of—?

Daphne. Oh, 'tis all settled. [Whispers Mrs. HUMBUG.]

Fanny. And how is it determined?

Daphne. I'll tell you. [Whispers FANNY.]

Mrs. Hum. And is he to—?

Daphne. I'll tell you all I know of the matter.

[Whispers Mrs. HUMBUG and FANNY.]

Fanny. Well, now I know everything about it, I'll go away.

Mrs. Hum. } And so will I.

Daphne. }

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The curtain rises and discovers Sir EDWARD SPANGLE reclined in an elegant attitude on a sofa fast asleep.

Enter Col. ELLIOTT.

Col. E. My daughter is not here, I see. There lies Sir Edward. Shall I tell him the secret? No, he'll certainly blab it. But he's asleep, and won't hear me, so I'll e'en venture. [Goes up to Sir EDWARD, whispers him, and exit.]

END OF THE FIRST ACT.

FINIS.

Not a bad piece of fooling for a girl in her early teens.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Being desirous of getting a copy of J. F. Sullivan's latest jeu d'esprit, The Great Water Joke, I applied, without success, to Messrs. Smith & Son and one or two other leading anti-monopolist booksellers. Eventually I ordered it through a retail house in one of the most prominent city thoroughfares. When I called this morning I was handed, in reply to my inquiry, Dr. —'s Water Cure: Its Principles and Treatment. Such is fame!"

In his narrative of M. Zola's stay in England, reviewed in another column, Mr. Vizetelly remarks on M. Zola's habit of changing the names of his characters at the last moment. This explains why in Mr. Vizetelly's version of Paris certain names had apparently been changed arbitrarily by the translator. The fact was that M. Zola had made the alterations and forgot to notify his English collaborator.

Bibliographical.

How far are the rhythmic products of Dr. Walter C. Smith known now in England? How far, indeed, are they known in Scotland, his birthplace and (since 1858) his dwelling-place? I remember that quite a stir was made in the Seventies by his Olrig Grange and his Hilda—mainly, perhaps, because they exhibited, in a minister of the Free Church, a surprising breadth of intellectual sympathy. Dr. Smith showed himself to be, as a thinker and a moralist, well abreast of the most advanced philosophy and science of his time. I see we are to have his Reminiscences. He is now in his seventy-fifth year, and should have much that is interesting to tell us—much that will have special interest for Scotsmen. I fear his longer poems have not come to stay, but the Selections from his verse (1893) are well worth possessing.

Mr. Walter Pollock's forthcoming book on Miss Austen is described as a "monograph"—a word used so inaccurately nowadays that it does not tell us for certain whether the book is to be biographical or critical, or a mingling of the two. Of biography Miss Austen has had, I should say, even more than enough. Apart from her nephew's work, which may be called the official Life, and which appeared nearly thirty years ago, there have been the memoirs contributed by Mrs. Charles Malden and by Mr. Goldwin Smith, respectively, to the "Eminent Women" and "Great Writers" series. Mrs. Malden's came out in 1889 and Mr. Smith's in 1890. Mr. Oscar Fay Adams, too, has (I believe) written something biographical about Miss Austen, but I have not seen his effusion.

The announcement that Mr. George Allen's autumn publications will include a volume of ten short stories by Sienkiewicz, never before translated into English, reminds one of the recent and rapid growth of Sienkiewicz' popularity in this country. Up to 1890, when Messrs. Low published With Fire and Sword, the Polish writer was practically unknown here. Then came The Deluge in 1892, Pan Michael, Without Dogma, and Yanko and Other Stories in 1893, Children of the Soil in 1895, Quo Vadis in 1896, Hania and Lilian Morris and Other Stories in 1897, and Sielanka and Other Stories in 1898. With Fire and Sword has had three English publishers; The Deluge, Pan Michael, Without Dogma, and Yanko have had two each.

An edition of Charles Reade's Peg Woffington, "introduced" by Mr. Austin Dobson, and illustrated by Mr. Hugh Thomson, must needs be acceptable when it comes. I have read somewhere that the story existed originally as a play, and that Reade was advised to rewrite it in narrative form, and did so. Everybody knows that the story (found to be successful) was promptly turned into a drama by Reade in conjunction with Tom Taylor, and that under the title of "Masks and Faces" it has been popular ever since—that is to say, since 1852, the year in which the book also appeared. It was probably Peg Woffington that suggested to Mr. Frankfort Moore his series of tales of which famous actresses are the heroines.

Apropos of the controversy raised about the authorship of "Werner," itself based upon a piece of prose fiction (though by another hand), one recalls the fact that the drama was performed one afternoon at the Lyceum Theatre in 1887. The representation was for the pecuniary benefit of Dr. Westland Marston; and Werner, Ulric, Josephine, and Ida were interpreted by Sir Henry Irving, Mr. George Alexander, Miss Ellen Terry, and Miss Winifred Emery respectively. It was an impressive, but a gloomy, afternoon. Sir Henry has never reproduced the play.

Talking of novels made out of plays, and plays made out of novels, I should not be surprised if Mr. Joseph Hatton's forthcoming romance, When Rogues Fall Out, proves to be, in the main, a reduction to narrative form of a drama of his which was lately performed at one of the East End or South side theatres. In that drama, Jack Sheppard and Jonathan Wild were conspicuous, and they are to be conspicuous, I gather, in When Rogues Fall Out. By the way, the very latest of the novels built upon acted plays is that by Mr. Seymour Hicks called One of the Best.

Sir George Douglas's promised Life of James Hogg will be one of the books which really "supply a felt want." Hogg was not a very brilliant luminary, but he was typical of the Scotland of his day, and his literary achievement calls for rather more elaborate record than it has as yet received. Formerly, and for a long time, he lived in the pages of the Noctes Ambrosianae; but few people read that work nowadays, and Hogg deserves a more direct and permanent celebration. The biographical sketch published in 1838 is obviously inadequate.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

A Burning Servant of the Lord.

Fra Girolamo Savonarola: a Biographical Study based on Contemporary Documents. By Herbert Lucas, S.J. (Sands & Co.)

THE most difficult historical characters to judge are those in which religion is a moving element, present in all their outward acts. It is easy to fling about such terms as enthusiast, hypocrite, fanatic, impostor; human nature is seldom so simple as that. Probably the most absurd and vulgar and revolting of religious frauds was that of Joe Smith, the Mormon Prophet; yet it is impossible, upon a minute study of his amazing career, not to see that he half-deceived himself by his own lies, and was willing to die for them devotedly. Or, turning from low things to higher, no one now thinks Oliver Cromwell's a transparent character to read. All those wrestlings and writhings with the Lord, those bursts and snatches of struggling speech, as of a man talking in his sleep or thinking aloud in fitful soliloquy, they show neither the manifest hypocrite nor the passionate idealist, but a pathetic mixture of both. The king's death: must he, ought he, to bring that about? The crown: should he accept or refuse? Is he, indeed, the Lord's Anointed, girt with the sword of the Lord? Has he verily an appointed work in England? He "waits upon the Lord" for answer, half of him filled with uncouth prayer and prophecy, the other with a keen political intelligence and worldly insight. And few famous men have more perplexed their contemporaries and posterity than Fra Girolamo Savonarola, son of Ferrara, prophet of Florence, the great theme of this erudite and fascinating work. He has been the theme of almost innumerable books, in which he figures as hero, humbug, martyr, apostate, illustrious saint, and melancholy example. His portrait has adorned the chambers of Popes; his statue stands beside that of Luther at Worms. Anti-clerical Italy claims him one of her champions; clerical Italy has longed for his canonisation. By his own Florentines he was idolised and execrated, killed and to this day venerated. Machiavelli saw in him but a political intriguer; St. Philip Neri, a burning servant of God. "Do I contradict myself? Very well, then! I contradict myself!" Walt Whitman's utterance largely explains the apparent inconsistencies in Savonarola's life and character, which have never been studied with greater impartiality than by Father Lucas. He has no prepossessions, holds no brief for or against the great Dominican, is master of the best ancient and modern authorities, deals plentifully in citations from both, and writes alluringly. Our sole and unimportant complaint is, that he gives us no portrait of Savonarola, whose gaunt, imperious, wistful face reminds us so strangely of Dante, Newman, and George Eliot.

A man of one conviction, consuming him from that day of his early life when he fled to the cloister with a line of Virgil on his lips—"Heu! fuge crudeles terras, fuge littus avarum!"—to the day when, as an English poetess, buried at Florence, has it, "Savonarola's soul went out in fire." He was on fire with a zeal for the reform of morals in Italy; of general morality, as the principle of Christian states and communities. This, in strict conformity with the Catholic Faith, in which he recognised the perfection of revealed religious truth, and nothing in need of reform. He conceived of his mission as not directed to the patient conversion and reclamation of individual souls, but to a universal awakening of whole cities and territories through the power of divine speech, wherewith he believed himself inspired. Dante, that infinitely lonely man, dreamed much the same dream of a regenerate Italy, Florence, Rome; he, too, scourged popes and priests, though never papacy and priesthood; but the wandering exiled layman was more of a recluse than the cloistered cleric. Savonarola, from the pulpits of San Marco and the Duomo, yearned to turn his dream into a reality: his was vox clamantis, not in deserto, but in plena urbe. An age of luxurious corruption, renescent paganism, hideous crime and moral laxity; Christian upon the surface, indifferent or superstitious within; resplendent with gorgeous vanities and cunning inventions and exquisite arts; such, to Savonarola, seemed the enemy assigned to the sword of his word. "Thunders of thought and flames of fierce desire" surged through his soul; after a time, and for a time, he triumphed. Sacred oratory, able to inspire Michael Angelo at work upon the Sistine Chapel, thrilled Florence, and threw multitudes prostrate at his feet; he found himself ruling where Lorenzo de' Medici had ruled; and it is clear that success overstrained his sober reason; that he should have set up a reign of righteousness, abased the pomps of sin, purged the vicious and distracted Florence, marked him surely for a prophet whose utterance was that of God! His earlier preaching was full of fiery apocalyptic warnings, of vehement appeals to Church and State, of sternest denunciation and pathetic entreaty; but from that he passed to a perilous conviction of his prophetic insight into the immediate politics of the day, his divinely given right to inspire and direct the policy of Florence, to defy authority in the name of higher authority. "If Rome be against me, know that she is not against me, but Christ"—words unconsciously echoed by Pascal: "If my writings are condemned at Rome, they are approved in heaven." Both men of ardent ascetic natures, their weak side is one with their strongest; their intensity of spiritual will becomes tainted with spiritual pride. As Cardinal Newman puts it: "A very wonderful man, you will allow, my Brethren, was this Savonarola. I shall say nothing more of him, except what was the issue of his reforms. For years, as I have said, he had his own way; at length his innocence, sincerity, and zeal were the ruin of his humility." His last days are profoundly piteous. We can picture him in his cell upon his knees or pacing up and down, with miserable doubts and questions crowding upon him: had he made some vast miscalculation? was his great reform a delusion? those trumpet-tongued prophecies, were they half his own wishes and intentions, ascribed to God? his consciousness of his marvellous mission, was it but a glorifying of his own strong will? and from deep, dejected gloom his soul would flash into a divine certainty, and sink back into the gloom of doubt, and that doubt, was it also divine or of the devil? Across his self-racked brain would pass the great cry of Augustine: "Lord, if we be deceived, we are deceived by Thee!" The terrible, sweet face, framed in its white cowl, its nerves quivering, its veins swollen, would strive to see the past, as it had never foreseen the future: justifications! "There, at least, I was in the right"; accusations! "There, God knows, I did wrong." And the petty pitifulness of it all: personal spites, religious rivalries, the letter of canonical obedience exacted by an infamous Pope, his regenerated Italy the sport and prey of wretched, temporal ambitions! He was not a happy man just then, Fra Girolamo Savonarola of Ferrara, Prior of Saint Mark; nor happier when, under torture, he played the Cranmer, confessed, recanted, lost his head, and felt himself, once the indomitable "hound of the Lord," the weakest of men. Only in the instant presence of death will he again be happy. "From the Church Militant and Triumphant We cut thee off!" pronounced the Papal Legate to the unfrocked Savonarola at the foot of the gallows and beside the pyre:

His voice flashed forth above the city's roar:

"Nay! from the Church Triumphant, never more!"

One word more, but one, from this voice of torrents and illimitable floods: "My Lord has suffered as much for me." Then the rope, and the flames kindled under his feet: a movement of the hand in benediction, and so the end. Benediction, be sure, of Florence, Rome, Italy, Christendom: perhaps a last loving assertion of his mission.

It is among the most pathetically stupid of historical facts this slaying of Savonarola. The Church of later days, as though longing to make amends, has declared that in his writings there is nil censura dignum: his worst antagonist can bring against him no graver accusation, as a Catholic, than that of technical disobedience to the reigning Pope, and a certain reluctance, almost from the first, to submit his personal claims and convictions to authority which he acknowledged to the full. Filled as he was with a consciousness of a prophetic mission, directly entrusted to him by God, he never, when checked or hindered, thought of creating a schism, a new departure, justifiable in his own eyes and conscience. John Wesley, devoted to the English Church, at last started a new organisation; Edward Irving, a far greater man, shook the dust of Scottish Presbyterianism from off his feet, in the "thrice holy name of God." Savonarola lived and died a Roman Catholic, who had no difficulty in saying to Pope Alexander Borgia: "Your Holiness holds the place of God on earth." But they hanged him, they burned him, and it stands out as one of the world's central tragedies. He was killed by the complicated and insignificant politics of the Italian States in the fifteenth century; for nothing diabolically heroic, like atheism, but for being politically in the way. He was no pestilent obscurantist, sworn foe to classic literature and the revival of art: read carefully his extant works, and you will see that he was a man of sensitive taste, who drew a line between artistic licence and artistic liberty. No one, who has realised the moral degradation of his times, will reproach Savonarola upon the score of Vandalism in his famous Bonfire of Vanities. They were times in which learned men, outwardly decorous and decent, wrote things in the name of learning which have no iniquitous parallel in the days of Catullus or Martial. And the man's huge heart, sick at these abominations, boiled over with holy rage: he felt that at any moment fire from heaven might descend to the destruction of such an age. Little blame to him if, consumed at heart with a vast and sacred indignation, he strayed beyond the strait bounds of ecclesiastical sobriety; little blame if, lover as he was of literature and art, he was sometimes narrow and over-puritanical in his views. With Alexander Borgia in the Chair of Peter, the very air seemed heavy and tainted with voluptuousness. But he was no fanatical enemy of beautiful culture, who numbered among his friends such men as Pico della Mirandola, Sandro Botticelli, and the Della Robbias. He did but place above all other excellences that of holy living: as the inscription ran upon the Palazzo della Signoria, Jesus Christus Populi Florentini Rex was his ideal, rather than the fame of Florence for the arts and learning. A massive man of impassioned simplicity, with something of an antique Roman worthy in the large outlines of his character: not subtle nor supple, but lofty and direct. As a statesman, a man of affairs, he was not of the familiar Italian Renaissance type: "not for the ambitious and practical politician," writes Mr. Morley in his study of Machiavelli, "was the choice of Savonarola, who, at the moment when Machiavelli was crossing the threshold of public life, had perished at the stake, rather than cease from his warnings that no good would come to Florence save from the fear of God and the reform of manners." He excites in us almost as much pity as admiration and awe: he meant so simply and so well, his failure was so perfect! "Power," says George Eliot, "rose against him not because of his sins, but because of his greatness—not because he sought to deceive the world, but because he sought to make it noble." Perhaps, at the last, there may have crossed his mind those mournfullest of words: "Popule meus, quid feci tibi? aut in quo contristavi te? responde mihi: Quia eduxi te de terra Ægypti: parasti crucem Salvatori tuo."

Children of the Dragon's Blood.

The Rough Riders. By Theodore Roosevelt. (Kegan Paul. 9s.)

IN many respects this is the best record of the American campaign in Cuba. It is the most picturesque, the most human, the most American. In the Rough Riders the American and English publics insisted on seeing the very flower and genius of the army. Impromptu fighting seems to belong to the States, and this regiment of cow-boys and athletes and sheriffs, hastily gathered and drilled, soon took the public eye. Of course that was not quite fair. The claims of the five regiments of the regular cavalry which operated in Cuba have been too much obscured, and Colonel Roosevelt knows it. With a grace which goes far to atone for the strain of personal vanity which marks his narrative (the less admirable side of which we have already playfully referred to), he dedicates his book to the officers and men of the regular cavalry.

At first it was intended that the Rough Riders should consist exclusively of hunters, cow-punchers, and mining prospectors, drawn from the four great Territories. The final fantastic mixture of men of all creeds and breeds was achieved when the number of men allotted to the regiment was raised from 780 to 1,000, and permission was given for recruits to be drawn from other quarters. Then came the rush of club men, college men, base-ballers, and young fellows with giant frames and uncertain destinies. Colonel Roosevelt revels in his enumeration of the types of men he commanded. There is nothing in his book more inspiring than this catalogue of men, which, like the Homeric catalogue of ships, lends human suggestiveness and glory to the narrative. The college men come first: Dudley Denn, "perhaps the best quarter-back who ever played in a Harvard Eleven," and Bob Wrenn, whose feats with the leather rivalled Denn's; these must needs go to Cuba as brothers-in-arms. From Yale came the high jumper Waller; from Princeton the football players Devereux and Channing, and the tennis player Larned, and Craig Wadsworth, the steeplechase rider; and Joe Stevens, the polo crack; and Hamilton Fish, ex-captain of the Columbia crew. These men asked only for places in the line, having coolly discounted the hard work, rough fare, and the chance of being left dead in a jungle. They mingled naturally, yet piquantly, with the wild spirits of the West. Among these was "little McGinty, the bronco-buster from Oklahoma, who had never walked a hundred yards if by any possibility he could ride." No braver man in the regiment, in spite of his "absolute inability to keep step on the drill-ground." From Idaho came Frank Herrig, an Alsatian slayer of mountain-deer on the Little Missouri. Came also "tall Proffit, the sharp-shooter, from North Carolina—sinewy, saturnine, fearless; Smith the bear-hunter from Wyoming, and McCann, the Arizona book-keeper, who had begun life as a buffalo-hunter." The Internal Revenue officer, Crockett, came from Georgia, and Darnell and Wood, "who could literally ride any horses alive," and Goodwin, and Buck Taylor, and Armstrong the ranger, "crack shots with rifle or revolver." There were skilled packers, "who had led and guarded their trains of laden mules through the Indian-haunted country surrounding some outpost of civilisation." There were Rocky Mountain stage-drivers, miners from Yukon and Leadville, cow-punchers "in whose memories were stored the brands carried by the herds from Chihuahua to Assinboia," and lassoers of wild steer who, "year in and year out, had driven the trail herds northward over desolate wastes and across the fords of shrunken rivers to the fattening grounds of the Powder and the Yellowstone."

These were not all; there were policeman, sheriffs, marshals, deputy-sheriffs, and deputy-marshals, men who had dealt with Indians, and white criminals more noxious than Indians. There was Captain Llewellyn from New Mexico, a great peace-officer, with bullet scars gained in four pitched fights with red-skinned marauders and white outlaws. Lieutenant Ballard came, he who broke up the Black Jack gang, and his captain, Curry, another New Mexican sheriff, bore him company. With these came that mighty sheriff of the West, Bucky O'Neill of Arizona, famous for "his feats of victorious warfare against the Apaches, no less than against the white road-agents and man-killers." One's imagination stops to play around Bucky O'Neill, "born soldier, born leader of men," soft-spoken comrade, reckless gambler, and at bottom a visionary. He alone of all that stalwart company seemed to keep an eye for the inwardness of things. He was quiet about it and careful of his listeners, but at night on the sea—when we leaned on the railing to look at the Southern Cross, he was less apt to tell tales of his hard and stormy past than he was to speak of the mysteries which lie behind courage, and fear, and love, behind animal hatred, and animal lust for the pleasures that have tangible shape. He had keenly enjoyed life, and he could breast its turbulent torrent as few men could; he was a practical man, who knew how to wrest personal success from adverse forces, among money-makers, politicians, and desperadoes alike; yet, down at the bottom, what seemed to interest him most was the philosophy of life itself, of our understanding of it, and of the limitations set to that understanding.

We have read few things more moving in recent war literature than these names and characterisations, suggesting, as they do, the amazing human vitality and resources of the United States. And from first to last we are alert to see how individuals behave and suffer. In the confusion of Tampa, in the long, nervous sea-tramp to Santiago, and in the jungle-fight of El Caney, we do not forget, are not allowed to forget, that each man in the Rough Riders is interesting. The book bristles with the things this man said, or that man did. How well, too, we are put down in the tropical forest, among the royal palms and the red-flowered acacias, among strange bird calls, the cooing of doves and the call of great brush cuckoos, land-crabs scuttling away in the underwood, and the Mauser bullets of the Spaniards "singing through the trees over our heads, making a noise like the humming of telephone wires." Now and then a man falls, saying: "Well, I got it that time." And still the bullets sing, and no one knows whence they come. Glasses rake the field, and halts are called. Then Richard Harding Davis says: "There they are, Colonel; look over there; I can see their hats near that glade." It is the first glimpse of the enemy, and the firing becomes eventful. Harry Heffner, of G troop, gets a bullet in his hips, and is propped against a tree, where he goes on firing his rifle, and quenching his thirst from his canteen, to be found dead after the fight. Rowland, bleeding in his side, is ordered to go to the rear to the hospital: grumbles, and goes; but fifteen minutes later is back on the firing-line: says he cannot find the hospital. A dead rider is found torn by vultures. Says Bucky O'Neill, looking grimly at the body: "Colonel, isn't it Whitman who says of the vultures that 'they pluck the eyes of princes and tear the flesh of kings'?" The Colonel cannot place the quotation. Surely we know the lines that ran in Bucky's head: Macaulay, in his ballad of Regillus, tells

How wolves came with fierce gallop,
And crows on eager wings,
To tear the flesh of captains,
And peck the eyes of kings.

But before Bucky could trace his quotation his own hour came. He was strolling up and down in front of his men, smoking his cigarette, for he was inveterately addicted to the habit. He had a theory that an officer ought never to take cover—a theory which was, of course, wrong, though in a volunteer organisation the officers should certainly expose themselves very fully, simply for the effect on the men;

our regimental toast on the transport running: "The officers; may the war last until each is killed, wounded, or promoted." As O'Neill moved to and fro, his men begged him to lie down, and one of his sergeants said: "Captain, a bullet is sure to hit you." O'Neill took his cigarette out of his mouth, and blowing out a cloud of smoke, laughed and said, "Sergeant, the Spanish bullet isn't made that will kill me." A little later he discussed for a moment with one of the regular officers the direction from which the Spanish fire was coming. As he turned on his heel a bullet struck him in the mouth and came out at the back of his head: so that even before he fell his wild and gallant soul had gone out into the darkness.

All the same, Bucky was a fool: no man ought, while serving his country, to play target like that. Already Captain Allyn Capron, the finest soldier of them all, and Hamilton Fish, the blithest and most promising of New York youth, had fallen in the jungle; and Edward Marshall had dictated his last despatch with dimming eyes. Sickness and delay alternate with little hours of glorious life. Now we hear the wounded singing "My country, 'tis of thee"; now it is Parker's Gatling-guns drumming away somewhere in the long grass. The trench life before Santiago, with long watches and little food, is fruitful of incident. Thus:

When the hard tack came up that afternoon I felt much sympathy for the hungry unfortunates in the trenches, and hated to condemn them to six hours more without food; but I did not know how to get food into them. Little McGinty, the bronco buster, volunteered to make the attempt, and I gave him permission. He simply took a case of hard tack in his arms and darted toward the trenches. The distance was but short, and though there was an outburst of fire, he was actually missed. One bullet, however, passed through the case of hard tack just before he disappeared with it into the trench. A trooper named Shanafelt repeated the feat, later, with a pail of coffee.

The whole book is excellent reading, and if, as we have hinted, professional vanity obtrudes in many a story and photograph, we recognise that there is strength behind it. Assuredly Colonel Roosevelt is a strong man, of whom more will be heard. A generous man, too: few escape his praise. He loved his Riders, and they returned the sentiment. "My men were children of the dragon's blood," he writes, and he must needs tell us how McGinty called on his captain in New York, hitching his horse to a lamp-post; how George Rowland summed up the war scornfully in a letter, saying: "I've been in closer places than that right here in Ynited States"; and how Tom Darnell, he who rode the sorrel horse of the Third Cavalry, came home to die in a revolver brawl. Some of the Riders ran for office, some for the Philippines, but most returned whence they had come, and took up their old lives.

Jeffreys' Way.

State Trials, Political and Social. Edited by H. L. Stephen. 2 vols. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)

NEXT to a good new book, the product of an interesting personality, we would place a good old book, revived by an interesting personality. That is what we have here. Mr. Stephen, a discreet critic and a sound judge of what is picturesque and important, has been delving in the extensive mine of Howells' State Trials, and has brought out two little volumes of pure gold. His method has been to use Howells wherever he is most dramatic and vivid, and elsewhere to summarise swiftly and with unusual lucidity. As a result we have the raw material, fascinatingly interesting, for romances, dramas, and monologues in profusion—monologues particularly, perhaps, for at every turn of the page we come upon situations all ready to the hand of a practitioner in that medium. Browning, for instance—what poems in the rough were waiting for him in Howells!

To review such a book as a whole is unnecessary. It is better to say that the editor has done his work extremely well, selection, arrangement, and notes alike, and then to concentrate upon one trial among so many. Leaving aside as too well known the tragedy of Charles the First, with the superb dignity of the king lighting it as with a silver flame, and the long and noble struggle of Raleigh for his honour and his life, we turn to the trial of Alice Lisle at the end of the first volume, which has peculiar interest in illuminating the self-righteous system of terrorising a witness, and determined control of the trend of a case, as practised by the famous, or infamous, Judge Jeffreys. Alice Lisle, an elderly lady, was the widow of John Lisle, President of the High Court of Justice, and a devoted follower of Cromwell. In 1685 she was tried at Winchester, at Jeffreys' Bloody Assize, on a charge of high treason, her crime being the alleged harbouring and protection of one Hicks, a Dissenting minister, whom she knew to have fought under Monmouth at Sedgemoor. The principal witness—indeed, the only witness from whom the condemnation of Lady Lisle could possibly proceed—was James Dunne; and it is in his dealings with Dunne that Jeffreys' amazing methods may be studied: Jeffreys having "got up" the case beforehand, with as much zeal as if he were a briefless barrister taking advantage of his first opportunity, rather than the Lord Chief Justice of England.

Jeffreys may have been a monster of cruelty, but he was a great monster. He had the grand manner. In his way he was tremendous. Look, for example, at his charge to Dunne, in the interests of truth, at the outset of the examination:

"Now mark what I say to you, friend: I would not by any means in the world endeavour to fright you into anything, or any ways tempt you to tell an untruth, but provoke you to tell the truth, and nothing but the truth, that is the business we came about here. Know, friend, there is no religion any man can pretend to, can give a countenance to lying, or can dispense with telling the truth: Thou hast a precious immortal soul, and there is nothing in the world equal to it in value: There is no relation to your mistress, if she be so; no relation to thy friend; nay, to thy father or thy child; nay, not all the temporal relations in the world can be equal to thy precious immortal soul. Consider that the Great God of Heaven and Earth, before whose tribunal thou, and we, and all persons are to stand at the last day, will call thee to an account for the rescinding his truth, and take vengeance of thee for every falsehood thou tellest. I charge thee, therefore, as thou wilt answer it to the Great God, the Judge of all the earth, that thou do not dare to waver one tittle from the truth, upon any account or pretence whatsoever: For though it were to save thy life, yet the value of thy precious and immortal soul is much greater than that thou shouldst forfeit it for the saving of any the most precious outward blessing thou dost enjoy; for that God of Heaven may justly strike thee into eternal flames, and make thee drop into the bottomless lake of fire and brimstone, if thou offer to deviate the least from the truth, and nothing but the truth."

Incidentally, throughout the trial Jeffreys maintained the attack more or less on this high level. Thus: "I would not terrify thee to make thee say anything but the truth, but assure thyself I never met with a lying, sneaking, canting fellow but I always treasured up vengeance for him." Immediately after this particular warning, Dunne had the misfortune to slip into an inconsistency. He mentioned that the stable door at Lady Lisle's was opened by Carpenter, having already stated that he opened it himself. Jeffreys was at him like a tiger. "Why, thou vile wretch, didst thou not tell me just now that thou pluckedst up the latch? Dost thou take the God of Heaven not to be a God of truth, and that He is not a witness of all thou sayest? Dost thou think because thou prevaricatest with the Court here thou canst do so with the God above, who knows thy thoughts? And it is infinite mercy that, for this falsehood of thine, He does not immediately strike thee into hell! Jesus God!" A minute or two later Dunne's first examination was finished and he was permitted to stand down, with a parting shot from the Bench: "Thou art a strange, prevaricating, shuffling, snivelling, lying rascal." But his cross-examination had yet to come, and there was one point on which his evidence was of the highest importance. Dunne, however, remained mute for many minutes, while Jeffreys tried every threat to make him speak. This was his final invocation:

"If I know my own heart, it is not in my nature to desire the hurt of anybody, much less to delight in their eternal perdition; no, it is out of tender compassion to you that I use all these words: I would have thee to have some regard to thy precious and immortal soul, which is more valuable than the whole world; reflect upon that Scripture again which I mentioned before, which must be true because it is the words of Him that is truth itself: 'What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul; for what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?' If that soul of thine be taken away, what is the body fit for but, like a putrid carcase, to be thrust into and covered with the dust with which it was made? Therefore I ask you, with a great desire that thou mayst free thyself from so great a load of falsehood and perjury, tell me what the business was you told the prisoner the other man Barter did not know."

Dunne, in response, did his worst. "Hold the candle to his face that we may see his brazen face," cried the L.C.J. Another interval for the examination of other witnesses, and Dunne was up again. Jeffreys reverted to divine assistance: "I pity thee with all my soul and pray to God Almighty for thee, to forgive thee, and to the Blessed Jesus to mediate for thee; and I pray for thee with as much earnestness as I would for my own soul; and I beg of thee once more, as thou regardest thy own eternal welfare, to tell all the truth." Dunne, thereupon, returned such answers as a man could with his skin in jeopardy, a lighted candle burning within an inch of his nose, and Lord Jeffreys thundering on the bench. At last it was over. "I pity thee," said Jeffreys, by way of valediction, "with all my soul, and pray for thee, but it cannot but make all mankind to tremble, and be filled with horror that such a wretched creature should live upon the earth."

The summing up followed, a violently impartial one, and the jury adjourned. From the foreman's questions it is pretty clear that the jury inclined to acquit Lady Lisle, but the tone of Jeffreys' answers settled her fate. She was found guilty, and condemned—though over seventy years of age—to be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution, and burned alive. The sentence was afterwards commuted to beheading. Four years later Lady Lisle's attainder was annulled by Act of Parliament on the ground that the verdict was injuriously extorted and procured by the menaces and violences and other illegal practices of the L.C.J.

"On the flight of James II.," says Mr. Stephen, Jeffreys "attempted to escape disguised as a sailor, but was seized in the Red Cow in Anchor and Hope Alley." He was removed to the Tower, where he died. What material here for a dramatic monologue! How Browning could have treated it!

To Rightly Go Into a Wood.

If thou wouldst go into a wood,
Go not with boist'rous laugh and noisy tread;
Step softly, as a pilgrim should,
By the worn shrine of the renowned dead.

To bird and beast doff thou thy hat,
Though thou the owner be, the wood's not thine;
Wipe thou thy shoon on mossy mat;
'Tis as a guest thou comest here, in fine.

By Gertrude E. M. Vaughan, in the "Butterfly."

"J'accuse . . . J'observe."

With Zola in England. By Ernest Alfred Vizetelly.
(Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

WHEN M. Zola, weary and travel-grimed and carrying no luggage, entered the Grosvenor Hotel in the early hours of July 19 of last year, the first thing he did was to write a note to Mr. Vizetelly announcing his arrival and enjoining utter secrecy. For years Mr. Vizetelly had translated M. Zola's novels into English, hence M. Zola's note, beginning "My dear Confrère." From that moment Mr. Vizetelly became M. Zola's chief adviser and helper in England. The hero of "J'accuse" needed advice and help. He was a fugitive, and he did not know enough English to buy a pair of socks. M. Zola's secret stay in England lasted many months, and was of necessity irksome. His whereabouts had to be concealed, and disguises, strategies, and small deceptions had to be entered into in order to secure this end. Spies and journalists had to be repelled. And M. Zola's temperament as well as his interests had to be consulted. Throughout, Mr. Vizetelly proved himself a staunch and prudent lieutenant, and throughout he was in the best position to reduce the events of M. Zola's sojourn—so long the sport of rumour—to a plain narrative. He has done this admirably.

M. ZOLA IN HIS ENGLISH GARDEN.

From a Photograph by Victor Vizetelly.

Nevertheless, it is an instance of the effacing power of events in the Dreyfus drama that the value of this narrative, begun little more than two months ago, while M. Zola was still among us, has largely shifted. The plotting, having served its purpose, has lost much of its interest, whereas the smallest glimpse into M. Zola's impressions of England is welcome still. If there are not many such glimpses in these pages, this is because Mr. Vizetelly was occupied with the stern business of protecting M. Zola's privacy and assisting his case. Moreover, M. Zola proposes to put his impressions of England into writing himself. Still, there are amusing and suggestive passages in which we see England through M. Zola's eyes.

It was on the journey to Wimbledon, where he found a temporary home, that M. Zola first became sufficiently detached from his troubles to look around him with any eagerness. On the way to the station he gazed intently on the river scene from Waterloo Bridge. He denounced the ugliness of Hungerford Bridge, which, he said, no Paris municipality would have tolerated for four-and-twenty hours. He was astonished to find that the Savoy Hotel, where he had stayed in '93, had been architecturally dwarfed by the Hotel Cecil. "To think, too," said he, "that you had such a site, here, along the river, and allowed it to be used for hotels and clubs, and so forth. There was room for a Louvre here, and you want one badly." As the train approached Clapham Junction M. Zola's face was glued to the window.

At the sight of all the mean, dusty streets, lined with little houses of uniform pattern, each close pressed to the other—at the frequently recurring glimpses of squalor and shabby gentility—M. Zola exploded.

"It is awful!" he said.

We were alone in our compartment, and he looked first from one window and then from the other. Next came a torrent of questions: Why were the houses so small? Why were they all so ugly and so much alike? What classes of people lived in them? Why were the roads so dusty? Why was there such a litter of fragments of paper lying about everywhere? Were those streets never watered? Was there no scavengers' service? And then a remark: "You see that house, it looks fairly clean and neat in front. But there! look at the back-yard—all rubbish and poverty! One notices that again and again!"

But the brightness of Wimbledon, and its suggestion of wealth, pleased M. Zola. Again and again he said that the Wimbledon shops "were by far superior to such as one would find in a French town of corresponding size at a similar distance from the capital." It was at Wimbledon that M. Zola discovered that cycling "rationals," of which he is an advocate in France, "are not suited to the lithe and somewhat spare figure of the average English girl," who, he remarked, carries herself better than her French sister. Bloomers for Frenchwomen, skirts for Englishwomen, became his dogma. And at Wimbledon, M. Zola began admiring English scenery, especially the splendid holly hedges in the district. The rookeries, too, gave him many a half-hour's wonder and delight.

After several changes of residence, the Queen's Hotel, Upper Norwood, became the exile's resting-place. This hotel, it should be explained, consists of what were once separate houses, and to the various parts or "pavilions" separate entrances and staircases are still attached. In one of these pavilions M. Zola made himself comfortable, and, while his henchmen kept watch and ward, settled down to write and observe and talk. Small things pleased him when great were lacking.

"Do you know," he remarked to me one afternoon, "when I come out all alone for my usual constitutional, and want to shake off some worrying thoughts, I often amuse myself by counting the number of hairpins which I see lying on the foot-pavement. Oh! you need not laugh, it is very curious, I assure you. I already had ideas for two essays—one on the capital 'I' in its relation to the English character, and another on the physiology of the English 'guillotine' window and the forms it affects, not forgetting the circumstance that whenever an architect introduces a French window into an English house, it invariably opens outwardly so as to be well buffeted by the wind, instead of into the room as it should do. Well, now I am beginning to think that I might write something on the carelessness of Englishwomen in fastening up their hair, and the phenomenal consumption of hairpins in England. For the consumption must be enormous since the loss is so great, as I will show you."

Then he proceeded to ocular demonstration. As we walked on for half an hour or so, principally along roads bordered by the umbrageous gardens of villa residences, we counted all the hairpins we could see. There were about four dozen. And he was careful to point out that we had chiefly followed a route where there was but a moderate amount of traffic.

The "capital I" idea was this: M. Zola learned to spell out the news from Paris (which he usually laughed to scorn for its lateness or its untrustworthy character) in the London papers, and he observed:

"Why is it that the Englishman when he writes of himself should invariably use a capital letter? That tall 'I' which occurs so often in a personal narrative strikes me as being very arrogant. A Frenchman, referring to himself, writes je with a small j; a German, though he may gratify all his substantives with capital letters, employs a small i in writing ich; a Spaniard, when he uses the personal pronoun at all, bestows a small y on his yo, while he honours the person he addresses with a capital V. I believe, indeed—though I am not sufficiently acquainted with foreign languages to speak with certainty on the point—that the Englishman is the only person in the world who applies a capital letter to himself. That 'I' strikes me as the triumph of egotism. It is tall, commanding, and so brief! 'I'—and that suffices. . . ." In a chaffing way he suggested that one might write a very humorous essay on the English character by taking as one's text that tall, stiff, and self-assertive letter "I."

Such divagations brightened what after all was an anxious and tedious sojourn. We do not wonder at the relief which Mr. Vizetelly felt when, after the Court of Cassation had given its verdict, M. Zola packed up for Paris. By the way, it was at Norwood, in a friend's birthday book, that M. Zola wrote the terse sentence: "Truth is on the march, and nothing will be able to stop it." Truth is even now bivouacked at Rennes, and we may feel proud that England gave help and asylum to the man who suspended the peace of his home and the loved quietude of an author's days in order to quicken that "march."

A View of Japan.

Japan in Transition: a Comparative Study of the Progress, Policy, and Methods of the Japanese since their War with China. By Stafford Ransome. (Harper. 16s.)

THE Shogun, or, as we were wont to call him, the Tycoon, fell in 1867, and the Mikado no longer only ruled, but reigned. Since that date Japan, then a barbaric, mediæval, feudal kingdom, has acquired Western manners and methods and has now been recognised as one of the civilised Powers of the world. How great and how solid her progress had been was remarked only by the few who had an intimate knowledge of Japanese affairs, until the outbreak and rapid conclusion of the war with China. "Speaking generally," as Mr. Ransome puts it, "the outside world had no idea that the progress which was being made by the Japanese was of a genuine nature. It is true that we heard that they were buying many things, endeavouring to copy our inventions, and generally burlesquing our methods." Then, in the various chapters of his book Mr. Ransome describes, with temperate appreciation, the material and moral progress of Japan since her victory over China; he does not compare the Japan of to-day with the Japan of yesterday, but with other civilised countries; he does not over-praise everything Japanese, or, on the other hand, unduly depreciate, as so many writers have done; he points out fairly enough when things have been done rightly or wrongly; but, like almost all other Occidental writers on matters Oriental, he seems to us to fail to grasp the essential fact, which must not be forgotten, that the Oriental mind is different from the Occidental. Whether we of the West will ever thoroughly comprehend the mind of the East is matter for speculation; that we have not yet done so is a matter of fact. Many of us have heard the East a' calling; but the call though sympathetic has been vague, we could not put it into words, and must admit that much of the fascination of the East for us is the glamour of mystery.

Mr. Ransome's book is too materialistic; he was a stranger in a strange land, and has sought to interpret that land to us by a description of its material progress, though occasionally we receive a hint that he does see that, to understand the present state and position of Japan, mind as well as matter must be explored.

"Japan, of course, is being transformed, or, rather, is transforming herself, from her Oriental to our Western methods; but this does not mean that the old Japan has altogether gone, or will ever altogether go"; and he proceeds to state that Japan is adopting Western and modern methods, not necessarily because she likes them, or considers them superior to her own, but because she realises that she must do so to preserve her place among the Powers of the world. Then he puts, though hardly forcibly enough, the central fact of the case:

The progress that is being made by the country—if we assume that by "progress" is meant the adoption of Western methods—may be of an artificial nature; but in the long run it will be found that contact with Europeans will not transform the Japanese into a people with European instincts, but that they will have assimilated and absorbed into their nature so much of our habits as they think advisable.

In other words, Japan is not merely adopting, but adapting Western civilisation.

But elsewhere Mr. Ransome puts himself out of court as the interpreter of the Japan of to-day, when apparently he comes to the conclusion that "the unexpected always happens with regard to Japanese matters." Yes, unexpected, because we almost invariably expect the Oriental to reason on the same lines as we do and such an expectation is doomed to invariable disappointment. The Eastern outlook on life is entirely different to our own, and contact with the West does not alter it one tittle. For instance, in his chapter on the prospects of Christianity in Japan, Mr. Ransome joins with others not only in underestimating the influence of Shintoism but also the religious feeling of the Japanese as a nation. "Shintoism," he says, "which many foreign authorities maintain to be no religion at all, amply suffices for the requirements of the ordinary Japanese of to-day. A faith which consists in the worshipping of one's ancestors mainly, it is to be presumed on account of their having brought into the world so perfect a specimen of humanity as one's self, is essentially a self-satisfying belief, and one which, if it tends to self-assertion, essentially helps to hold families and the nation together. But there is a want of conviction among the Japanese about religion in any form." This passage is neither elegant nor accurate. Shintoism cannot be dismissed so jauntily, it tends not to self-satisfaction and self-assertion, but rather to the opposite, to self-depreciation and self-effacement, and it has shown how strong, though how quiet, is its influence by the intense patriotism and reverence for the authority of the Emperor which were displayed during the recent war. Shintoism and Buddhism satisfy the religious desires of the religious minded in Japan; the philosophy of Confucius gives a cold comfort to those who have lost their faith, and if there are many of the latter among the educated Japanese, surely the same may be said of any civilised country? Japan is not, as we have so often been told, either immoral or unmoral; the Japanese are not all head and no heart, but while their heart can be understood by us, for it is the same as our own, their mind is still to us a closed book, and the Japanese have no intention of opening it for us.

Next to religion, and to a certain extent in conjunction with it, the greatest force in modern Japan is education. We often forget that the advance made by Japan in recent times has been the brain work and the handiwork of a few leading spirits. The nation, as a whole, remains uneducated, and it is only the inborn sense of obedience to the powers that be, a relic of the feudalism which died only a few years ago, which has led the people to follow their leaders. Education will alter all this, whether for the better who can say? But, as Mr. Ransome points out "in criticising Japanese methods of the present day we must not lose sight of the extraordinary fact that in less than thirty years Japan has run through all the political phases which lie between feudalism of the most uncompromising order and a constitutional government on modern principles." But education, on the most modern and extensive system, has been called in "to give children the rudiments of moral education, and of education specially adapted to make of them good members of the community, together with such general knowledge and skill as are necessary to practical life," which is the Japanese description of efficient elementary education.

But we must not be led into thinking that the Japanese is nothing if not practical; he is indeed intensely practical, and is making practical use of the knowledge which Europe has taken many centuries of experiment and experience to acquire; but he is much more than that, much more, indeed, than Mr. Ransome and other writers realise; he is possessed of an extraordinary and almost blind patriotism, a power, indeed, in the hands of judicious statesmen, but a power that must be guided, not let loose; a patriotism which consists not only of love of his own country, but dislike of most other countries, with the one exception of China; his intellect is extremely acute, receptive, and speculative; and as a nation the Japanese are young, just entering upon the struggle which has occupied other nations for hundreds of years. The faults of the Japanese many have pointed out, the merits many have over-praised, but we may fairly say that in Mr. Ransome's book will be found a very just, if rather narrow, picture of the material Japan of to-day. But no wise man will venture even a guess as to what will be the Japan of to-morrow.

Other New Books.

A PICTURESQUE HISTORY OF YORKSHIRE.

By J. S. FLETCHER.

Mr. Fletcher's history of our largest county has reached its fifth monthly part, opening in the middle of an account of Sheffield, and ending halfway through "Leeds." Pontefract and its castle come between, and smaller places in the valley of the Aire are treated with pen and pencil. The illustrations throughout are very unequal, and alike in choice and treatment they seem to us to fail in topographical descriptiveness. They are too seldom useful. The view of Carlton Towers, on p. 324, might represent almost any place where corn is in sheaf. Mr. Railton's drawings run too much to extraneous prettiness, as in "Methly Hall," where there is an intolerable deal of blasted oak to a hap'orth of Hall.

Mr. Fletcher's text is not wanting in life. Under Rawcliffe we have an account of its once famed inhabitant, the eccentric Jimmy Hurst, whose Life and Adventures were issued by a Knottingly bookseller sixty years ago. George III. asked Lord Beaumont to bring the much-talked-of Yorkshireman to Court. Jimmy, being a king himself in a small way, showed a proper amount of reluctance to go, but, finally, he set forth, conveyed by his four Andalusian mules drawing the quaint self-contrived carriage. Jimmy had caused a new suit to be made for the journey: it consisted of a lamb-skin hat, nine feet in circumference, an otter-skin coat lined with red flannel and turned up with scarlet cloth, a waistcoat made of the skins of drakes' necks, breeches of list, red and white striped stockings, and shoes ornamented by large buckles of silver. He was received with wonder and admiration wherever he stayed along the road to London, but in the London streets the crowds were so thick that it was difficult to make any progress. He was lodged at Lord Beaumont's on the night of his arrival, and was shown something of the sights of London. Next morning he was conducted to Court, and in due time ushered into the presence of the King. There, much to the horror of the surrounding courtiers, he took the King's hand, gave it a hearty grip, and exclaimed, "Eh! I'm glad to see thee such a plain owd chap. If thou ever comes to Rawcliffe, step in and give me a visit. I can give thee some rare good wine, or a sup of brandy and water at any time." Other similarly amusing remarks followed, after which the King and his courtiers descended to the courtyard to examine Jimmy's travelling carriage. George III. was much interested in all that he saw, and observing that Jimmy's receptacle for wine was empty, he ordered it to be filled from the royal cellars. During the remainder of his stay in London he saw more sights, and was taken to various social functions, at which he astonished everybody, and discomfited not a few by the sharpness of his wit.

On his return to Rawcliffe Jimmy made a coffin for himself with folding doors and glass panels. He was eccentric to the end and died in 1829, being carried to his grave by twelve old maids. (Dent. 1s. net.)

IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.

By T. C. PORTER.

Mr. Porter travelled through the States with his camera, taking photographs of all the grandest scenery. Niagara, the Yellowstone Park with its geysers and grottoes, the Sierras, the Earth Pillars, the Salt Lake Desert, all came under his observation. The idea of writing a book of travel impressions came to Mr. Porter on his return voyage. He has carried it out in a simple, frank way that calls for little comment. The peculiarity of the book is the method of illustration. Each photograph is double, and you are invited to bring each pair of views into stereoscopic relief by means of a small double lens inserted in a pocket at the end of the book. But you may dispense with this and learn from Mr. Porter that it is possible to achieve this object with the eyes alone if you go the right way about it. We have ourselves performed the feat of seeing each pair of photographs in stereoscopic relief by a gymnastic adjustment of our eyes. But the result is a headache, and with the best will in the world to find merit in this method of illustration, we cannot commend it. Were it generally adopted the national eyesight would be imperilled. (C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd.)

IN RELIEF OF DOUBT.

By THE REV. R. E. WELSH.

To the second edition of Mr. Welsh's book the Bishop of Stepney contributes a cordial preface, in which he cites the case of a physician and others whose doubts have been alleviated by its arguments. Here is an excerpt from the chapter on the "Personal Verification of Christ," which may serve as an index of the class of minds to which the book will be useful:

It may be well for minds baffled with problems of ancient history to relinquish the exhausting inquiry, and, without positively pronouncing upon the historicity of the fully-developed story, yield their hearts to the spiritual impulse of the captivating Ideal and unique Life. Could they not suffer Christ thus far—submit their minds to be filled with His sense of God and His lofty conceptions of the Father, and lay open their spirits to be charged with His spiritual intuitions and quickened with His spiritual sensibilities? They should place their hearts under His direct spell, so as to receive His spiritual endowment. And if they come thereby to think of goodness, beauty, truth, and love as at their divinest in Jesus, and if they are thus baptised with a humble sense of God and inspiration for a Christly life, have they not received much of the essence of what He desired for His disciples? This direct personal sense of Divine perfections and grace is the true recognition of the essence of the Divinity.

To the majority of intelligent educated men, who find themselves deafened by a controversy out of which it is impossible for themselves to extract any but negative results, such advice is as good as good can be. (James Bowden. 2s. 6d.)

Fiction.

Men's Tragedies. By R. O. Risley.
(Macmillan & Co. 6s.)

At the end of this volume of tales is an advertisement of an English edition of the works of Honoré de Balzac. Among them we observed the title, La Grande Bretèche. Was it chance? We seem to have perceived throughout Mr. Risley's book an ambition to write "powerful" short stories in the manner of La Grande Bretèche, which is undoubtedly the most "powerful" short story ever written. To say that Mr. Risley reminds us, even faintly, of Balzac is to praise him. He does so—of Balzac without the exuberance, without the vast masses of detail, without the luxuriant imagery. He has a sense of romance, an eye for colour. He likes large themes, and he is not afraid of them. He will put a lifetime, a passion, and the atmosphere of a dozen cities all into a tale of thirty pages. In order to accomplish the feat he finds it necessary to be terse, abrupt. One result of this is that he has acquired almost a mania for short sentences; it is an irritating mania:

He spoke little; I talked much. He never asked questions; I liked to. He looked older than he was; I was older than I looked—unhappily. He hated women; I enjoyed their society greatly. He was calm; I was enthusiastic.

Yet we understood one another. We had some tastes in common, it is true. We were both fond of music. But I played love-songs on my violin; while he played gypsy dance music, and dirges, on his 'cello.

We both liked books. But he read poetry, and metaphysics, and battle stories; while I read what are called the standard authors. And I liked newspapers, but he seldom read them.

There is a great deal too much of that. Another result is that he does not devote sufficient room to the preliminary building-up of an environment. Balzac sometimes gave seventy per cent. to the environment, thirty per cent. to the tale. And Balzac knew how to carry conviction. A character cannot exist in space. In space it is merely an Idea. Mr. Risley is too fond of Ideas. He gets an Idea, and makes it into a story. A novelist of European fame once stated that Ideas were the curse of Art, and though people laughed he was right. Every work of Art will have an Idea, but the Idea will come last. The order of things is: Environment, Emotion, Idea. Mr. Risley, like scores before him, has sought to make it Idea, Emotion, Environment. But the scheme will not satisfactorily work. You can perceive the evolution of his stories. You can see him clothing the Idea ("The man who loved," "The man who hated," "The man who died," "The man who was himself," &c.) with a cleverly-cut and neatly-fitting garment of event and atmosphere. He uses every device of catastrophe, of brilliant and strange local colour, of planned surprise, of audacious wit. His heroes are foreign counts with towers and islands and riches and pasts, and they flit from Hamburg to Paris, from Paris to Copenhagen, from Copenhagen to Dresden. They are king's bastards, scholars, dreamers. They suffer. They exist after their souls have expired. They love when it is too late to love. They have brief passages of ecstatic joy—and then darkness and silence. But this wonderful apparatus of romance is all to no purpose, because nothing lives, nothing is realised. One moves amid shadows, amid Ideas masquerading as human beings.

That Mr. Risley has talent is nevertheless beyond question. He is capable of doing something. We therefore urge him first of all to find his Ideas in his characters, not his characters in his Ideas; and then, abandoning affectations and audacities, to devote himself to matters of detail and the careful accumulation of effects. He has much also to learn about the English language, which he submits to innumerable indignities.

Finally, he should beware of unconsciously adopting current mannerisms. "The Professor got up, and softly groped his way to the door, and down the stairs. He said to Madame, in the restaurant: 'You had better look to the man upstairs.' Outside the heavens were luminous with the dust of stars." What is the significance or appositeness of the sentence which we have italicised? Certainly we encounter it several times a week in the course of our "adventures among masterpieces" of to-day.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

JASPAR TRISTRAM.

BY A. W. CLARKE.

A very sympathetic study of a sensitive schoolboy. "What's his name?" asks Orr, the biggest boy. "Tristram, Orr! Jaspar Tristram!" they all shouted out. "Did you ever hear such a name?" "Oh, well," said Orr; "of course, we can't have such a rotten name as that here! What shall we call him?" "I votes we call him 'Rosy,'" as he blushes so!" observed the good-looking small boy who stood by Orr. . . . Everybody began to applaud. "Rosy, Rosy!" they cried." (Heinemann. 6s.)

LOVE MADE MANIFEST.

BY GUY BOOTHBY.

Mr. Boothby's new story begins in the Pacific, and continues after a break of years in London. It is emotional and sensational; we need hardly say that much happens, and much that is strange and violent. Incidentally we meet Lord Belmouth, who had "the reputation of being able to drink a greater quantity of mixed liquors at one sitting than any man in London, and also of being able to vault over the corner of the billiard table." (Ward, Lock & Co. 5s.)

IN THE DARK.

BY ESMÉ STUART.

A very readable story of the melodramatic order. A young English doctor is brought by his gondolier to a gloomy house in Venice to see a patient. His stay is inconveniently prolonged owing to the fact that he is taken for one Count Moro, and the house is the nest of a secret society. A beautiful Italian girl is, of course, in the affair, which ends well, but leaves a life-long regret. (John Long. 6s.)

THE ROMANCE OF THE GREYSTONES. BY H. A. NELSON.

An Australian story, melodramatic and breathless, of racing and rascality, Barts. and betrothals. "The Cup Race," "A Death-bed Confession," "Wedding Bells," "A Russian Prince," "Nemesis!"—these are some of the chapter headings. The frontispiece depicts a shipwreck. (Ward, Lock & Co. 3s. 6d.)

IN FULL CRY.

BY RICHARD MARSH.

A murder mystery. The hero, or villain, for he is both, goes by the name of "Gentleman," and the nickname is not wholly without honourable fitness. In the course of a lurid narrative the author employs dashes in place of strong language; but such a method of preserving decency is surely carried rather far when it results in sentences like this: "Don't try to come that with me; I won't have it. You're a ———! and a ———! and now you've got it!" (F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

THE SIFTING OF THE WHEAT.

BY C. M. HOME.

An historical romance of the days of Elizabeth, written from the Roman Catholic standpoint. It is claimed that "the account of the barbarous persecutions carried on during her reign" is taken chiefly from Anglican sources. (Art & Book Co.)

THROUGH UNSEEN PATHS.

BY K. E. HARRISON.

A conventional story with a happy ending, all in strict accordance with Adelphi rules. (Sonnenschein. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

A Neglected "Lowell."

THE admirable article on Lowell printed in last week's ACADEMY took no account (writes a correspondent) of his very charming and seemingly little-known volume of reminiscences and holiday impressions called Fireside Travels. To my mind it is more charming than the Study Windows, although, except by the few who are particularly interested in Lowell the man, it is easy to understand that those essays are the more likely to be popular. But in this little book, with wit and kindliness and humorous observation and charity in every line, Lowell the man, Lowell the honoured friend of so many men and women, is everywhere apparent. The Fireside Travels, it must be remembered, is more peculiarly Lowell's own book than My Study Windows and Among my Books. There he is mainly critic, and discourses upon the thoughts of others. Here he is just himself, remembering his youth, or noting down in a journal whatever takes his fancy as he makes holiday at home or abroad. A man who keeps a journal is more likely to be pleasing himself in so doing than the man who writes a literary essay. Anyway, to my mind, delightful as Lowell's other prose writings are, in these Fireside Travels he is more delightful still; and it makes one additionally sorry that diplomacy should have exacted the energies it did from a mind so stored with honey.

The extracts which follow are all taken from the first essay: "Cambridge [Mass.] Thirty Years Ago" (this was written in the sixties), "a memoir addressed to the Edelmann Storg in Rome." Here is a parenthetical excursus on Boswellism apropos of Allston the painter:

As the stranger brushes by you in alighting, you detect a single incongruity—a smell of dead tobacco-smoke. You ask his name, and the answer is, "Mr. Allston." "Mr. Allston!" and you resolve to note down at once in your diary every look, every gesture, every word of the great painter? Not in the least. You have the true Anglo-Norman indifference, and most likely never think of him again till you hear that one of his pictures has sold for a great price, and then contrive to let your grand-children know twice a week that you met him once in a coach, and that he said, "Excuse me, sir," in a very Titianesque manner, when he stumbled over your toes in getting out. Hitherto Boswell is quite as unique as Shakespeare. The country-gentleman, journeying up to London, inquires of Mistress Davenant at the Oxford inn the name of his pleasant companion of the night before. "Master Shakespeare, an't please your worship." And the Justice, not without a sense of the unbending, says, "Truly, a merry and conceited gentleman!" It is lucky for the peace of great men that the world seldom finds out contemporaneously who its great men are, or, perhaps, that each man esteems himself the fortunate he who shall draw the lot of memory from the helmet of the future. Had the eyes of some Stratford burgess been achromatic telescopes, capable of a perspective of two hundred years! But, even then, would not his record have been fuller of says I's than says he's?

Here is part of the portrait of K., President of Harvard in Lowell's day:

How he suggested cloistered repose, and quadrangles mossy with centurial associations! How easy he was, and how without creak was every movement of his mind! This life was good enough for him, and the next not too good. The gentleman-like pervaded even his prayers. His were not the manners of a man of the world, nor of a man of the other world either; but both met in him to balance each other in a beautiful equilibrium. Praying, he leaned forward upon the pulpit-cushion as for conversation, and seemed to feel himself (without irreverence) on terms of friendly, but courteous, familiarity with Heaven. The expression of his face was that of tranquil contentment, and he appeared less to be supplicating expected mercies than thankful for those already found—as if he were saying the gratias in the refectory of the Abbey of Thélème.

Possibly the essay would not have been just as it is, had not Lamb first written his memories of the South Sea House and the Benchers of the Temple, and yet Lowell had as little need of an immediate exemplar as anyone that ever wrote. His store of metaphor and apt illustration, the ease of his manner, the perfect breeding of it, his unsleeping sympathy and understanding—these are to be borrowed from no one. Here is P., Professor of Greek:

He was a natural celibate, not dwelling "like the fly in the heart of the apple," but like a lonely bee rather, absconding himself in Hymettian flowers, incapable of matrimony as a solitary palm-tree. There was, to be sure, a tradition of youthful disappointment, and a touching story which L. told me perhaps confirms it. When Mrs. — died, a carriage with blinds drawn followed the funeral train at some distance, and, when the coffin had been lowered into the grave, drove hastily away to escape that saddest of earthly sounds, the first rattle of earth upon the lid. It was afterward known that the carriage held a single mourner—our grim and undemonstrative Professor. Yet I cannot bring myself to suppose him susceptible to any tender passion after that single lapse in the immaturity of reason. He might have joined the Abderites in singing their mad chorus from the Andromedo; but it would have been in deference to the language merely, and with a silent protest against the sentiment. I fancy him arranging his scrupulous toilet, not for Amaryllis or Nœra, but, like Machiavelli, for the society of his beloved classics. His ears had needed no prophylactic wax to pass the Sirens' tale; nay, he would have kept them the wider open, studious of the dialect in which they sang, and perhaps triumphantly detecting the Æolic digamma in their lay. . . . Fidelity was his strong characteristic, and burned equally in him through a life of eighty-three years. He drilled himself till inflexible habit stood sentinel before all those postern-weaknesses which temperament leaves unbolted to temptation. A lover of the scholars' herb, yet loving freedom more, and knowing that the animal appetites ever hold one hand behind them for Satan to drop a bribe in, he would never have two cigars in his house at once, but walked every day to the shop to fetch his single diurnal solace. Nor would he trust himself with two on Saturdays, preferring (since he could not violate the Sabbath even by that infinitesimal traffic) to depend on Providential ravens, which were seldom wanting in the shape of some black-coated friend who knew his need, and honoured the scruple that occasioned it.

And here is a Cambridge medical worthy:

First is W., his queue slender and tapering, like the tail of a violet crab, held out horizontally by the high collar of his shepherd's-gray overcoat, whose style was of the latest when he studied at Leyden in his hot youth. The age of cheap clothes sees no more of those faithful old garments, as proper to their wearers and as distinctive as the barks of trees, and by long use interpenetrated with their very nature. Nor do we see so many Humours (still in the old sense) now that every man's soul belongs to the Public, as when social distinctions were more marked, and men felt that their personalities were their castles, in which they could intrench themselves against the world. . . . W., like P., wore amazing spectacles fit to transmit no smaller image than the page of mightiest folios of Dioscorides or Hercules de Saxonia, and rising full-disked upon the beholder like those prodigies of two moons at once, portending change to monarchs. The great collar disallowing any independent rotation of the head, I remember he used to turn his whole person in order to bring their foei to bear upon an object. One can fancy that terrified Nature would have yielded up her secrets at once, without cross-examination, at their first glare. Through them he had gazed fondly into the great mare's-nest of Junius, publishing his observations upon the eggs found therein in a tall octavo. It was he who introduced vaccination to this Western World. Malicious persons disputing his claim to this distinction, he published this advertisement: "Lost, a gold snuff-box, with the inscription, 'The Jenner of the Old World to the Jenner of the New.' Whoever shall return the same to Dr. — shall be suitably rewarded." It was never returned. Would the search after it have been as fruitless as that of the alchemist after his equally imaginary gold? Malicious persons persisted in believing the box as visionary as the claim it was meant to buttress with a semblance of reality. He used to stop and say good morning kindly, and pat the shoulder of the blushing schoolboy who now, with the fierce snowstorm wildering without, sits and remembers sadly those old meetings and partings in the June sunshine.

Mr. Dobson, in a little poem to Herrick, hails the Devonshire lyrist as Golden Mouth. Even better does the phrase seem to me to fit Lowell. His urbanity was god-like.

Whether an English edition of Fireside Travels is now to be obtained I know not; the copy before me is the sixth American edition, 1882. But published with circumstances of taste, befitting the utterances of a Golden Mouth, the little book should gladden many minds in love with aristocratic humour.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. ANATOLE FRANCE's new book, Pierre Nozière, is a decided disappointment, coming after that rare and charming little masterpiece Anneau d'Améthyste. Of course, it is not without much of the old witchery, especially in the early chapters, with their exquisite sketches of memories and portraits done with all M. France's finish and perfection of art. But when our delightful philosopher turns tourist under the pseudonym of Pierre Nozière we own we like him less.

The artful simplicity of M. France is always at its best when he is dealing with children or sages. In the childhood of Pierre Nozière he recalls the loveliness of Livre de mon Ami, the most delicate and delicious of childish reminiscences that has ever been written, and the quaintness of his ever-popular Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard. Writing of the child's impressions of Bible history, he says, with his eternal smile: "It also gave me pleasure to see Samson carry off the gates of Gaza. That town of Gaza, with its towers, its belfries, its river, and the bouquets of woods that surrounded it, was charming. Samson went off, a gato under each arm. It interested me greatly. He was a friend of mine. On that point as on many others I have not changed. I love him still. He was very strong, very simple, there was not a shadow of wickedness about him; he was the first of the romantic school, and certainly not the least sincere." He turns from the Bible to old Paris, which he evokes in the quiet way so peculiarly his own. Alas! month by month some trace of that old Paris vanishes, its charm is almost swamped in the vulgar promises of the Exhibition. The quays he has so faithfully loved will soon prove unremembered walks to his astonished gaze. The present visage of sunny Paris is most dolorously blotted by scaffolding and hideous palisades. The Jardin des Plantes suggests to the child the terrestrial paradise, "a little aged but not much altered." His mother had described the Garden of Paradise as "an agreeable garden with fine trees, and all the animals of creation." Of course, this must be the Jarlin des Plantes, only iron railings having been placed before the beasts through the progress of art because of lost innocence. And the angel with its flaming sword was replaced by the soldier in red trousers.

M. France always delights when he talks of the quays and old streets of Paris, and as he wanders down the avenues of the past he is sure to light upon fugitive figures of literary and human enchantment. First, there is the unfortunate spectacle merchant, who talks of such splendid dreams as the Pacific Ocean, California, China, Spain, the Malay Peninsula, whither he had brought back fever, hunger, an incurable hatred and disgust of work and poverty, and through whom the child loses his first faith in the kindliness of nature. "No doubt," adds the writer, "it will surprise nobody to learn that I never again found it." He lingers in his familiar spirit of tender irony over the portrait of Mme. Mathias, his nurse. She had had misfortunes, and remained proud of them. "Hollow cheeks, with eyes of red coal under the grey locks that tangled out of her black cap; dry, mute, her ruined mouth; her threatening chin, and her mournful silence, afflicted my father." But the child, guided by his heart, has an advantage over the father, guided only by science; the child alone is not afraid of his repellent nurse, for he loves her, and is loved by her. He alone remarks her soft little nose of an innocent roundness, which lends grace to the austere mask beneath which she played her part in life. "This nose was almost unperceived in that scene of violent desolation which was the visage of Mme. Mathias." It expressed suffering tenderness and dolorous humility. He apostrophises the memory of the old nurse charmingly:

Ah, Mme. Mathias, Mme. Mathias, what would I not give to see you once more as you were, or at least to know what has become of you since thirty years ago, when you left this world, where you had so little joy, where you held so small a place, and which you so loved. I felt it, you loved life, and you were attached to terrestrial affairs with the desperate obstinacy of the unfortunate. If I had news of you, Mme. Mathias, I should thereby infinitely receive peace and contentment. In the pauper's coffin in which you went off one fine spring day, I remember—one of those fine days whose mildness you so enjoyed, dear lady—you bore away a thousand things that were as much mine as yours, a thousand touching things, all a world of ideas, created by the association of your age and my infancy. What have you done with them, Mme. Mathias? There where you are, do you still remember our long walks?

The little stories told by his mother are extremely dainty, of so supreme an apparent artlessness as only that artful master, M. France, has the secret of, and we hail the chapter on the two tailors, with its gentle satire and superb elegance, as almost as good as a chapter from the seductive Orme du Mail. There is nothing else in the book quite so good as this chapter, though the portrait of M. Debas and the episode of Onésime Dupont and M. Joseph Peignot, the porcelain merchant of Dijon, are delightful. "Your father would have made me a reduction," says M. Joseph Peignot. "Sir, I will send you my seconds to-morrow," says Onésime Dupont: "you have insulted my father; in declaring that he could make a reduction, you insinuated that his charges are excessive, and consequently iniquitous." "Young man," protested the merchant of Dijon, "one of us is mad, and I am ready to swear it is you." The poor merchant went home ill, and while Onésime was arranging for the duel, his father happily arrived and relieved him from the commercial responsibilities he so rashly misunderstood. The second part of this graceful but disappointing book is culled from the notebooks of Pierre Nozière, and makes some pretty reading.

H. L.

Edgar Allan Poe.

So much ink and ire have been spent in discussing the character of the author of "The Raven" that it is difficult to feel sanguine about any new attempt to give Poe his due. And a careful perusal of the appreciation of Poe which Mr. Vincent O'Sullivan prefixes to a quarto reprint of The Raven, and The Pit and the Pendulum (Smithers) does not weaken this sceptical mood. Mr. O'Sullivan romps through the problem, but the effect is that he deranges rather than solves it. He abuses a great many people who had to do with Poe, and yet is not kind to the poet himself. We have a tremendous discussion of Poe's drinking habits. Mr. O'Sullivan suggests that Poe drank with the deliberate intention of bringing himself down to the level of the people who surrounded him, and so deaden the pangs of superiority.

The truth is, that at certain long intervals in his short life Poe thus reasoned with himself: "At this point life becomes insupportable: I am surrounded by brutes who sting me and wound me at every turn." Then quite coldly, with the same deliberation that he brought to the study of an automatic chess-player, he saw that to get rid of his loneliness he must abandon his contempt, he must thicken his skin and deaden his senses, he must fling away this superiority which kept others afraid and at a distance, he must drink till he came to the level of the coarse or commonplace persons with whom he found himself (for there is no superiority in a drunken company) and so, with these thoughts, soberly he took to the bottle.

We confess this seems to us a too neat and perfect explanation, as much too satisfactory as Poe's description of the way in which he evolved "The Raven." Poe never exhausted the possibilities of friendship; he never tried assiduously to find worthy mates. And what is the gain to his memory if we believe that he soberly drowned his superiority in wine? Mr. O'Sullivan makes the same defence of Poe in his dealings with women. Just as he got drunk with cold deliberation in order to be at peace with vulgarians (an end he never achieved), so he wrote love-letters with the cynical purpose of pleasing women who were "glutted and besotted with Byronism." Mr. O'Sullivan actually says: "Read in this light, with all hope of their sincerity and good faith abandoned, these letters become interesting and tolerable." Do they? Can they? Mr. O'Sullivan may find "something curiously and attractively diabolic in this attempt of Poe to play the lover by calculated effects—to make the intellect do the work of the senses"; but we hope he is not under the impression that he is doing Poe's memory a service by this line of argument. Poe may have abused wine and women by algebra, but to say he did so is not to defend him. And to say he did so is to be too cocksure about the hidden things of the human heart. The heart knoweth its own bitterness and frailty. Surely it is kinder to think that Poe erred in the old human way, and that the palliation is to be found, not in "calm intention," but in the impulses communicated by a nerve-racked body and a too fine and febrile mind. We do not believe that Poe was at the mercy of a particular set. Does Mr. O'Sullivan think that if Poe had been asked into those Boston drawing-rooms in which Emerson and Longfellow and Holmes and Lowell prattled he would have maintained his self-respect on tea, and fed his heart with prudent love? That he was not asked to meet these men may be a matter for regret and surprise. Mr. O'Sullivan says that they thought Poe "a man without sweetness and light, a hack journalist, a compromising person to know; if not quite a ruffian, at least a 'loafer.'" We suspect they did think Poe "a man without sweetness and light." This is the one severe thing which we think is worth saying about Poe. With all his brilliance, ingenuity, and grace, he seems to have been a man without much sweetness and light; both his life and his writings declare it. The Boston set may have held its prigs, but in the men and women who composed it culture and character were blended in a very amalgam. Whereas Poe's asset was an æsthetic sense and sensitiveness of febrile intensity in America unique. His genius was too new to be more than a wonder and a doubt which sought information in the man. But the man was a moral and temperamental invalid. He had that fatal wish to possess beauty without the earth in which it is rooted. Mr. O'Sullivan, who writes extremely well, is near the mark when he says:

The keystone of Poe's character was his hatred of humanity; had that been removed you would have had a different man, a different artist. Dogs avoid by instinct the man who hates dogs; and in likewise men and women instinctively recognise the man who loathes and despises them, and they let him go by. So it was that Poe, since he could not be an Emperor, went through life solitary, proud, and discontented, having really as little to do with the community of the earth as a lonely eagle winging its way above a humming town. The friends of death are often the enemies of life, and Poe was a friend of death. Mr. Stoddard relates that one rainy afternoon in New York, as he was walking up Broadway, he saw Poe, who looked wet and cold, standing for shelter in a doorway. Mr. Stoddard says that he had an impulse to cross the street and offer Poe his umbrella, but that something—certainly not unkindness—made him refrain. It was this "something" that enwrapped Poe like an infected garment.

Things Seen.

From the Carriage Window.

THE Paris train starts from Dieppe at a snail's pace, threading its way with humane caution along the street by the quays. As we moved I scanned the Norman faces with wonder: they were so curiously English. In men and women alike I saw the English ruddiness and honesty. It was strange to alight on this raw material of our aristocracy—material that had never been worked up. Well, I observed this, and the weather-worn houses with dormer windows, and the coloured blinds, and the air of old-French decay—for the general look of Dieppe is foreign enough. So foreign that in a tiny balcony outside a bedroom window, quite forty feet from the ground, I noticed a live turkey. Simply a turkey, a—let me see—dindon, up there, alone, untended. I did not understand it. But I saw how travellers' absurdities arise. "The Dieppois are great breeders of turkeys for the table, and a few turkeys are reared by hand in the poorest households, sharing the sleeping apartments of the family, and perching like sparrows on eaves and window-sills." So the tale might run.

Defeat.

THE train was nearing the New Forest at that point where Southampton Water laves the very line and mudlarks wave their brown arms to the engine driver. Four commercial travellers sat in the carriage, and their talk was the seaport of England. One man, with a strong bullying voice, who for too long had dominated the conversation, was upholding Southampton's claims. "Only by scurvy unfairness," he thundered, "was Southampton thrust aside. Look at her harbour, her natural advantages; and yet she was passed over as our commercial centre in favour of London. London!" His contempt filled the carriage. "And why is London the centre?" he asked witheringly, glaring round. A little man who had not previously spoken looked up. "Because it's in the middle," he said; and in the laughter which filled the compartment the supremacy of the champion of Southampton passed away. Thinking of it afterwards, it occurred to me that London is not in the middle. But the bully had been silenced.

The Triumph of the Hour.

LOVE SHALL SUFFER.

THE LOWEST SHALL DESTROY THE GREATEST SHALL TOUCH THE HIGHEST, THE LEAST,

THE DESPAIRING SHALL BECOME BLIND.

FAITH SHALL ENGENDER HOPE.

THE MISTAKEN SHALL FALL, THE RAISED SHALL TOUCH THE FALLEN.

THERE SHALL EVER BE THE UNENOVABLE.

DIVINE LAW.

THE HOUR IN ALL ITS GLORY SHALL BE LED AWAY EVERLASTINGLY.

THE OLD SHALL EVER RING IN THE NEW.

(Photographed from the Enamelled Copper Shield, by Hubert Herkomer, R.A., exhibited at the Royal Academy.—The legends are taken from the enamels on the Shield.)

Lines

Suggested by the Shield of Enamels

EXHIBITED BY PROF. HERKOMER, R.A., IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY, 1899.

A VISION of Life: the Law Divine
Broods overhead, imposing still
The tangled, mutable twist and twine
Of ill in good and good in ill,
Of woe from joy and joy from woe,
On the ebbing and flowing world below.

There stands the triumphing Hour, amid
The splendours of the universe;
Yet, in her very triumph hid,
Stirs the inevitable curse,
The Law that nothing may remain
And all except the Law is vain.

Triumph of Love: yet Love contains,
E'en in the moment of his bliss,
His own exterminating pains,
The skull that grins beneath the kiss;
For souls that each to other fly
In pangs of coalescence die.

Triumph of Hate: but yet the deed
Of vengeance or fanatic rage
Is pregnant with the wide-blown seed
Of an ameliorating age;
Death crowns him, when a good man dies,
And Death his deeds will canonise.

Murder and motherhood—the strange,
Sad meetings of the high and low—
Hope and despair—in changeless change
Of woe from joy and joy from woe,
Like bubbles rise, to orb and burst
In cursings blest and blessings curst.

Lapsing, unlapsing, like a stream,
The old for aye rings in the new;
Man is a dream and life a dream;
Yet the unattainable is true;
And the one triumph not quite vain,
The soul's stern striving to attain.

F. B. MONEY COURTS.

The Empty Homes of England.

Chepstow on the Wye.

THE Dukedom of Beaufort has long been remarkable for, among other things, the possession of three of the noblest ruins in England—Tintern Abbey and the Castles of Raglan and Chepstow. All three were inherited from the Herberts, who had themselves received them, through the Bigods, from the De Clares, who, as a baronial family, came to an end with the death of Strongbow. Thus for quite six centuries Raglan and Chepstow have abode with the blood of the present owner, while Tintern was actually founded by the De Clare Earls of Pembroke. Now, however, Chepstow Castle is at last to be rattled down "the ringing grooves of change." In October it is to be put up for sale by auction by Messrs. Driver, Jonas & Co., of St. James's-street, and stately Raglan and peerless Tintern are, in the fulness of time, to follow it. The prospect is a sad one, and saddest of all to the Duke of Beaufort, whose family has always had an historic conscience. But it will be impossible to shake off the memory of their possession:

Owners and occupants of earlier days, from graves forgotten stretch their dusty hands,
And hold in mortmain still their old estates.

It will be a noble bit of mediæval property which will be acquired by whosoever shall buy the ten or eleven acres which comprise and surround Chepstow Castle. Legend has been as busy as usual with the origin of a fortress which, from its fine strategic position, with the Wye flowing one hundred and twenty feet below, must, from the very beginning, have been formidable. We may be quite sure that its foundations were not laid by Longinus, the fabled father of the Roman soldier whose spear pierced the side of Christ; but it may have been the ancient Castle Gwent—anything may have happened so near to Caerleon, in a land crowded with the Arthurian legends. However that may be, we know for certain that Fitz Osborne, Earl of Hereford, was practically the founder of Chepstow almost before the victorious shouts of Senlac had died out of his ears. The time of Edward I. was a great castle-building age in the Marches, and much was, no doubt, done then at Chepstow; but the fortunate Fitz Osborne was the first authentic man to keep his castle there. His house was not in power for long, and the arrogance and rebellion of his son towards his over-lord, the King, transferred his manors and lordships to the De Clares. They were no jerry-builders these mediæval Barons, and the massy towers, the enormous walls which flank the four courts of Chepstow, would probably still carry their roofs and floors had not the hand of war been called in to accomplish what time refused to do. The place was four times besieged in the Civil Wars, twice by each side. The fourth time the godly army of the Parliament took it by assault and slaughtered the garrison. It became Cromwell's private property, till the Restoration carried it back to the house of Somerset.

During the Interregnum Chepstow was chosen as the prison of Jeremy Taylor, who was much disliked by the saints, and there he remained for several months. When the King came to his own again Chepstow had, and kept for twenty years, a prisoner of quite another kidney—Marten the Regicide, whose horseplay when he signed the King's death-warrant disgusted even Cromwell. He was well-treated, and allowed to go out on parole. Since he never failed to return, it is unlikely that he was confined in any dungeon, as Southey and others would have us believe. Marten's Tower still stands, and a traveller of sixty years ago relates how the "blooming girl" who was the guide in those happy days got over the conflict of evidence as to dungeon or no dungeon. She was wont to show the tourist three rooms, of which the first was the inevitable "deepest dungeon beneath the castle moat." "Here," she said, "Marten was put at first when he was wicked; but when he became serious he was moved a story higher; and at last, when he was religious, he had the room with the beautiful view." The condition of the ruins was not improved when, in the last century, they were used as a factory; but they have long been so tenderly cared for that, granted a continuance of good guardianship, they are likely to last in full beauty for many a generation.

Sir Richard Steele.

DICK STEELE, who so did love his wife and friend,
Who gave to Addison of praise no end,
And wrote his Prue such tender letters daily
I like and love. What though he took life gaily
And sometimes did strict laws of right offend?
His sins are free from guile. His deeds portend
No serpent's craft: he crawls not, is not scaly.
No faults of his could land him in Old Bailey.

High spirits and warm heart; a wit as sweet
As it was shining; courage high as any;
And civic virtue, giving to his seat
In Parliament a fortress for the many—
Say, are not these a character complete,
And need we care for wasted pound or penny?

Charles Woodward Hutson in the "American Bookman."

Memoirs of the Moment.

LORD ROSEBURY'S praises of Captain Marchand addressed to British schoolboys were characteristically independent; and independent also was the straw hat in which the ex-Premier arrived at the Epsom College, much to the envy of men who thought top hats and frockcoats part of the formality strictly due to their reception of him. At Goodwood, too, last week the top hat got another nasty knock. A few years ago it was the inevitable headgear among men of fashion on the course. Then laxity crept in, and only one day, the Cup Day, was reserved for the hottest and most punctilious of hats. The reservation had, at any rate, a graceful plausibility in its favour—it was supposed to be made in honour of the Princess of Wales, generally present on the Cup Day; but Her Royal Highness did not this year grace the race, and the Prince himself set the example of wearing a white felt bowler. The Duke of Cambridge, who still remembers what it was to serve one's country as Commander-in-Chief in plumes and feathers under a July sun, appeared on the stand at Goodwood with an undress head-covering, although his host, the Duke of Richmond, and almost he alone, was faithful found to the high hat. The surprise which St. Aldegonde (the present Duke of Devonshire) created in his set by walking down Piccadilly during the season in a "bowler" is enshrined in the pages of Lothair. That is well; for such surprise is likely henceforth to rank no more in memoirs of the moment, but with emotions that died in men's minds before the death of the current century.

MR. J. M. SWAN has just accepted a commission for a bronze panther. The price to be paid is £1,000; and the size may be roughly estimated by a comparison with the two little bronzes exhibited this season, costing but a tenth of that sum.

SIR LAURENCE ALMA TADEMA will be very much at home at Antwerp, where he will act as a sort of Academy delegate at the forthcoming show of Vandycks. Nearly forty examples of the master will go from England; but among them will not be Lord Warwick's pictures—not even his famous Charles I. This is a pity; but not, perhaps, a surprise. Lord Warwick says he regards his Vandycks as national treasures, of which he is only, as it were, the keeper. That is a plausible objection to sending them upon a journey. A practical one, though unnamed, is possibly to be found in the fact that Lord Warwick is somewhat in the hands of "The Earl and Countess of Warwick, Limited," under the terms of whose trust his treasures may have to remain where they are—his treasures, of which he is, like so many other reputed possessors of property, less the owner than he is the custodian.

THE mass of correspondence belonging to the late Mr Beresford Hope, found only the other day at Bedgebury Park, does not throw much light on current affairs. A man is said to be known by the letters people write to him; and by that test, if by no others, you do not get the idea of great strength or exceeding sweetness as attributes of Beresford Hope. His grace, as we all know, was only Batavian. That phrase brings us to the most interesting entry, from many points of view, in the catalogue of the sale yesterday (Friday) of these letters in an auction room in St. James's-street. "Letters from the Earl of Beaconsfield" seemed full of possibilities—destined on near view, however, to nothing but disappointment. They contain no echoes of those "battles long ago" between the minister and his mutineer. The distrust of Disraeli which the member for Cambridge University entertained had an added importance from the fact that he was the brother-in-law of Lord Salisbury. But the few odds and ends of envelopes in the Bedgebury collection contain no hint of these internecine feuds; and the only letter of the scrappy lot is one that is entirely pacific. It is dated 1879; it has the deep mourning border proper to a widower; and it announces to Mr. Beresford Hope that he has been elected a Trustee of the British Museum on the proposal of the writer of the letter—the chief against whom he rebelled over a long course of years. Lord Beaconsfield was too powerful by that time to need to be conciliatory; and the letter is yet another proof of his triumphant magnanimity in trifles.

THE new Roman Catholic Cathedral of Westminster is now closing in the roof that is to resound a year hence with the offices of the Church—sung by whom? That is a burning question, and the fire of it already singes all who approach it. The first idea of Cardinal Vaughan was that the Benedictine Monks from Downside Abbey should form the choir. But the Monks who sang wished to be also the Monks who preached and who did the work of the parish—to the exclusion of the secular clergy. That being so, the Cardinal's preferences passed to a French abbey, that of Solesmes, where alone the Gregorian Plain chant has been preserved in all its purity, exhibiting, in a perfection that England cannot vie, the elaborate simplicity and the simple elaboration of those most moving strains. But then comes the outcry of the patriotic. Twenty French monks to sing in an English Cathedral! The criticism seems a little out of place, where Art is concerned—to say nothing of piety—in a country whose National Gallery is crammed with foreign pictures, and the stage and orchestra of whose English Opera House was crowded, a fortnight ago for example, with the hundred French performers in "Messaline." Religious Art should surely not lag behind its secular sister in breaking down the accursed barriers which, as Rossetti has it, parcel out man into men.

NEXT month a little penny monthly magazine, entitled the Net, will be issued "in the interests of the various charitable works of the Archdiocese of Westminster, and under the immediate direction and control of the Cardinal Archbishop." Not in vain, we may hope, will the net be spread in the sight of the bird.

MR. ASTOR, the British citizen, will probably in due course take a seat in the House of Lords. When he becomes the latest member of that old order, he will also be the first of a new order. American women have shown no reluctance to bear titles; you would say they had, if anything, a preference for a husband who brought them one. The American man must earn his own, and naturalisation is the preliminary process. When Mr. Astor secured the Pall Mall Gazette for the Conservative party, the man in the street inferred that sooner or later its owner would wish to be a British senator, with a seat in the Upper House. The man in the street in London will view the nationalising of Mr. Astor as the first stage in the fulfilment of his predictions, where the man in the street in New York sees in it nothing more aspiring than an opportunity to be rid of some taxation in the States.

MR. LOUIS GARVIN, whose work on the Newcastle Chronicle has attracted more than local attention, is about to come to London, where he has accepted a post on the Daily Telegraph. Mr. Garvin, who is the author of several anonymous articles that lately attracted attention in the Fortnightly Review, and whose notice of Miss Ada Smith, a poetess of the North Country, untimely dead, will be in the recollection of many of our own readers, is not only a good all-round journalist, but a man of letters as well. Very welcome is his accession to the ranks of writers upon the daily press.

Correspondence.

The High History.

SIR,—Mr. Nutt shares with a good many other "expert" witnesses a tendency to give himself away under cross-examination. I asked him why he did not give a summary of the High History among his other summaries. In reply, he quotes the very remarks in his Studies which suggested to me the probability that he had never read the High History at the time he wrote his book. He tells us that it was because it was too late and unoriginal to be of use in his investigation, and adds: "I further pointed out that the Welsh translation represented an earlier form of the romance than the text printed by Potvin." I take the last point first. I have translated the text printed by Potvin, and have compared the translation of the Welsh version with the French chapter by chapter throughout, with the results published in my "Translator's Epilogue." The Welshman translates freely and often blunderingly, but the incidents related are the same throughout. There is not a shadow of foundation for the assertion that the Welsh represents an earlier form of the romance than the French. On the contrary, the very blunders of the Welshman show that the original before him was the same as the one from which I translated. In one passage, for instance, the Welshman tells of a certain brazen tower which was possessed of a devil, and bellowed at intervals. A reference to the French shows that the word translated as "tower" is tor, which really means a bull, the translator evidently thinking that the word meant the same in French as in Welsh.

Now, if Mr. Nutt had read both the French original and the Welsh translation, it is simply impossible that he could fail to see how precisely the story told in the translation tallies with the original. His statement, therefore, that the Welsh represents an earlier form of the romance, instead of assisting him, simply proves that he had not read both versions. The inevitable corollary is that Mr. Nutt's "expert" opinion on this point is worth considerably less than that of the outsider who was at the pains of reading the documents themselves. Mr. Nutt is, however, probably correct in considering the Welsh an early form of the romance. The difficulty, or, rather, one of the difficulties, in which he is landed is that, however early the Welsh version may be, the French original from which it is translated must necessarily be earlier still.

I do not propose at present to follow Mr. Nutt's irrelevances as to Irish folk-lore or literature. When he has discovered anything in them at all like the story of the Graal, I have no doubt he will let me know. At present, in spite of the consensus of early, and in at least one case contemporary, evidence, he asserts that the High History is not "the Graal, the Book of the Holy Vessel," without giving the smallest reason for so doing. He simply throws at my head an imposing list of foreign gentlemen, unacquainted with the early evidence I collected, who, if his account of their opinions is to be trusted, are at present disposed to consider the High History as belonging to a date somewhat later than I assign to it. In fact, what he wishes, and apparently thinks right, is that the whole question of the date of the High History shall be decided by authority rather than by facts, by "experts" like himself, who are given to blundering in a highly irresponsible fashion, or "experts" like those he mentions, who are unacquainted with the evidence, rather than by the early records of its existence. It was the "critical attitude" of your reviewer that elicited his first letter. His own "critical attitude" in this matter leaves a good deal to be desired. But then, as Aristotle long ago remarked, "the Celts are a courageous people."—I am, &c.,

SEBASTIAN EVANS.

Chambers's New Dictionary and Mr. Herbert Spencer.

SIR,—I am reluctant to trespass on your space for the purpose of striking a jarring note about a good and useful book; but as an adherent of Mr. Herbert Spencer I am obliged to draw attention to the inaccurate and unfair treatment accorded to our distinguished philosopher in the pages of Chambers's New English Dictionary. I willingly admit that a new dictionary which includes such words as "Spencerianism" and "Synthetic Philosophy" displays an up-to-dateness much to be commended; but there is something more important in a dictionary than up-to-dateness—namely, accuracy and impartiality, and these are lacking in Chambers's New Dictionary so far as Mr. Spencer is concerned. Permit me, briefly, to deal with this. According to Chambers's, Synthetic Philosophy is "the system of Herbert Spencer, being an ambitious attempt to combine all the sciences together." This is, to say the least of it, very inaccurate, and exceedingly misleading. Synthetic Philosophy, instead of being an attempt, ambitious or otherwise, to combine all the sciences together, is simply evolution at large, evolution defined in philosophical terminology, and worked out as a universal process and applied to all classes of phenomena. This ought to be surely well enough known nowadays, after Mr. Spencer's many volumes, his numerous essays, and his innumerable literary duels. But something more serious than inaccuracy calls for notice—to wit, a sweeping ex cathedra judgment on Mr. Spencer from the vantage ground of a dictionary. For Ancestor Worship is thus defined: "The chief element in the religion of China and other countries—erroneously supposed by Herbert Spencer to be the foundation of all religion." This is very misleading, as Mr. Spencer has worked out an explanation of the origin of all religious belief, ancestor worship included. It is also somewhat mixed, for surely the chief element in the religion of China and other countries must have an important bearing on all religion. I do not, however, wish to dwell on these points; but I contend that such a sweeping expression of opinion as is implied by the word "erroneously" is entirely out of place in a dictionary which deals with explanations and definitions. In the preface we are told that the lexicographer is a harmless drudge without prejudice or passion, and consequently debarred from enlivening his pages with his own particular views. I cannot understand why in the case of Mr. Spencer this sound dictum has been violated; and I hope that in future editions the blemishes I have noted will be removed—I am, &c.,

Glasgow: July 29, 1899.

WILLIAM C. MCBAIN.

An Omission.

SIR,—In your kind notice of my Romance of Wild Flowers the reviewer is good enough to say he "cannot imagine anything more clear and fascinating" than my "description of the means by which the violet perpetuates itself," and then gives a quotation from that description. Unfortunately, your printers have omitted a line, and, in consequence, the sentence of which it formed part is rendered anything but clear. Will you permit me to give it as it occurs on page 95 of my book:

"It can only be explained on the assumption that the insects which successfully fertilise it in the warmer parts of the Continent do not occur in Britain, though they must have been indigenous until quite recent times, or the flower would have degenerated."

The words in italics are those omitted from your extract.—I am, &c., London: July 31, 1899.

EDWARD STEP.

Ballads against Books.

Our Prize Competition.

RESULT OF No. 43.

LAST week, impelled thereto by the hot weather, we asked for verses in dispraise of books, and many poets have accepted the invitation. The best effort seems to us to be that of Mr Ernley Walrond, 7, Cornwall-street, St. George's-square, S.W., which follows:

TO A BOOKWORM.

Come out! Come away! Will you addle your brains
With the sepulchred ashes of learning,
When Summer's pavilion is pitched in the plains,
And the tint of the barley is turning?
Oh! why to these cabinet thoughts do you cling,
Each one with its label and number,
When out in the open are thoughts on the wing,
Just wakened from chrysalis slumber?
In the purl of a brook there's a note of delight,
In the scent of the meadows a rapture,
A charm in the butterfly's gossamer flight,
That none of your poets can capture.
Philosophy? Well, with laborious thought,
You may build up a God, and devise him;
But under his heaven, unnamed and unsought,
God is, and our hearts recognise him.
Then shut up your books! Let them sleep on the shelf!
For from Summer has gone forth the ukase,
That no one shall study except from herself,
So back with them all to the bookcase!

We quote five others:

THE BOOKMAN ON THE MOORS.

The heather'd hills, patched here and there
With hurrying shadows, seem to sleep;
Slow floating down the summer air
The curlew calls; and everywhere
Arches the sky, so blue, so deep.
Oh! who would care in such a spot,
On such a day, for pens and ink?
Man's greatest thoughts seem small, I wot,
By Nature's book; a tiny blot
Upon her mighty page's brink.
So would I seek what I can get
From these broad heavens' cloud-display;
From yon still loch: my books forget
In quietness. And yet, and yet—
Let's see what Horace has to say.

(Fumbles in pocket and produces well-thumbed volume.)

[W. M., Crieff.]

HOURS OF IDLENESS.

No more my books are scattered round
On chairs where people wish to sit;
No one of all but can be found
Upon the shelf assigned to it.
Each in its place—no longer scanned
To sate a bookworm's bookish lust—
The vellums, calfs, and buckrams stand,
And even Shakespeare's clothed in dust!
For summer through my window flowed,
And August's breath was on the lea;
My study is the open road,
A Baedeker my library.

[C. E. H., Richmond.]

A WISE PASSIVENESS.

Come, let us for a while rebel
Against the bookish tyranny;
No other lore we now will spell
Than Nature's wise philosophy,
Oblivious, 'mid her joys and splendours,
Of all book-writers and book-vendors.
Why should we seek another's aid
To make the gracious language clear
Wherewith she speaks, in sun and shade?
The seeing eye, the hearing ear,
Will win more from their own excursion
Than from another's laboured version.
And wherefore toil with vain expense
When her felicities are free,
And proffered, in their affluence
Of quiet bliss, to you and me?
So, while flowers bloom and woods are leavy,
Away with reading—light or heavy!

Away with fictive vanities,
And stubborn facts, and rhyme and reason;
Away with verse? ah, well, it is
A time of heresy and treason—
I'd rather hear a mewling kitten
Than the best sonnet ever written!

[I. S., Brighton.]

COOLING DRINKS, NOT BOOKS.

'Tis autumn, my ACADEMY
Betrays the season's away.
It preaches indolence, and we
May cast our books away—
Nay, turn aside with "scornful looks Averse" from every sort of books.
'Tis autumn. In a golden clime,
Asleep on halcyon seas,
The giant serpent basks. A time
Of giant gooseberries—
A time when prone in shady nooks
We ask for cooling drinks, not books.
'Tis autumn: when the "latest news"
Assumes a simpler face,
And things all editors refuse
Secure unwonted grace—
When only hapless, heated cooks—
In search of recipes—need books.
Ah, prosit omen! even we,
Pedestrian muse, may gain
A hearing now, nor always be Competitors in vain.
And if we win this time, gadzooks!
I'll buy—a guinea's worth of books!

[J. D. A., Ealing.]

FAREWELL, MY BOOKS.

Thrilled with the sunny playtime of the year,
"Farewell, my book," I cry, like Chaucer dear.
Like "summer's green all girded up in sheaves"
I leave my gentle Shakespeare's magic leaves.
I close my Keats, with very eyes to look
"Athwart the shallows of a river nook."
I banish Walt, and gather as I choose
Dust off the dusty roads upon my shoes.
You, too, my ragged darlings, more than pelf!
You'll gather dust while I enjoy myself.
Oh! ne'er from books were made you books I love,
Of mortal men whose words immortal prove!
I neither care what your old authors say,
Nor all your modern imitators may.
Knowing what mighty masters pardon me
My not malevolent apostacy.

[G. W. S., London.]

Replies received also from E. A., Royston; S. R. M., Glen Devon
L. H., Leeds; B. C., Redhill; B. B. B., London; A. H. A., London;
T. C., Buxted; H. R. C., Egham; G. F., Gateshead; T. A. G.,
Brighton; V. H., London; B. B., Birmingham; J. D. W., London;
A. D., Shrewsbury; H. R. P., Acton; N. A., Beckenham; H. P. B.,
Glasgow; L. M. L., Stafford; M. L. M., Comrie; C. F. K., Eccles; E. K., London; F. W. H., Cardiff; F. B. D., Torquay.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our weekly prize competition will be suspended during the next few weeks.

Books Received.

Week ending Thursday, August 3.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Lockyer (T. F.), The Evangelical Succession ..... (Kelly) 2/6

POETRY, ETC.

H. D., Songs of the New Age ..... (Speirs)
Fitzgerald (P.), Pickwickian Studies ..... (New Century Press) 5/0
Wagner (R.), Letters to Wesendonck et Al. Translated by W. A. Ellis
(Richards) net 4/0
Wagner (R.), Letters to Emil Heckel. Translated by W. A. Ellis
(Richards) net 5/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Taylor (T. M.), A Constitutional and Political History of Rome (Methuen) 7/6
Grace (W. G.), Cricketing Reminiscences and Personal Recollections
(Bowden) 6/0
Tyrrell (G.), Saint Louis ..... (Duckworth) 3/0

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Fletcher (J. S.), A Picturesque History of Yorkshire, Part V. ..... (Dent) net 1/0
Crofts (C. H.), Handbook to Britain On and Beyond the Sea ..... (Johnston) 1/4
Plutarch's Lives, Vols. VII. and VIII. (Temple Classics) ..... (Dent) each 1/6

SCIENCE, NATURAL HISTORY, PHILOSOPHY, ETC.

Chambers's (G. F.), The Story of Eclipses ..... (Newnes) 1/0
 Rendle (A. B.), Catalogue of African Plants collected by Dr. F. Welwitsch in 1853-61 ..... (Trustees British Museum)

EDUCATIONAL

Jeffrey (P. S.), The Study of Colloquial and Literary French (Whittaker) 8/0
 Page (T. E.), P. Vergili Maronis Georgicon, Lib. III. ..... (Macmillan) 1/6
 Harivel (C. G. Le), Elementary French Grammar ..... (Oliver & Boyd) 1/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

Phillipotts (E.), The Human Body ..... (Methuen) 6/0
 Boyle (W.), A Kish of Brogues ..... (Marshall) 2/6
Royal Colonial Institute: Proceedings 1898-9 ..... (The Institute)
 Wilson (W. L.), England and the Transvaal ..... (Grosvener Press) 6d.

NEW EDITIONS.

Thompson (Sir H.), Modern Cremation: its History and Practice to the Present Date ..... (Smith, Elder & Co.) 2/0
 Stephen (Sir H.), Digest of the Law of Evidence, 5th Edition ..... (Macmillan) 6/0
 Baring-Gould (S.), The Vicar of Morwenstow; being a Life of Robert Stephen Hawker ..... (Methuen) 3/6
 Russell (W. C.), The Two Captains ..... (Downey) 6d.
 Harrison (F.), Annals of an Old Manor House ..... (Macmillan) 3/6
 Symonds (J. A.), An Introduction to the Study of Dante ..... (Black) 7/6
 Scott (Sir W.), Anne of Gierstein, 3 vols. ..... (Dent) each 1/6
 Guide Books to Switzerland, Eastbourne, London, Llandrindod Wells, Whitby, Liverpool ..... (Ward, Lock & Co.) each 1/0
 Guide Books to Dublin and Killarney ..... (Black) each 1/0

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

Announcements.

In his new novel, Siren City, which Messrs. Methuen will publish on August 9, Mr. Benjamin Swift has chosen as his theme the disillusion of an international marriage. An Englishman is the central figure, and the motive seems to be that two conflicting ideals of life and character can be only momentarily united in love. The book deals with the ensuing antagonism. Although London figures in it, the title Siren City has been given to Naples as the point of gravitation of the chief characters.

MR. BARING-GOULD has written a description of the counties of Devon and Cornwall, in two volumes, bearing the general name of A Book of the West. He has treated in detail the scenery, folk-lore, history, and antiquities of each county, and the volumes are fully illustrated. The first volume—that on Devonshire—is to be published by Messrs. Methuen immediately.

MR. W. L. COURTNEY is writing a monograph on Thomas Hardy for the "English Writers of To-day" series, which Messrs. Greening & Co. recently inaugurated with Mr. Monck-hood's Rudyard Kipling: The Man and His Work. Messrs. A. C. Swinburne, George Meredith, W. E. Henley, A. W. Pinero, and Bret Harte will also be treated in this series, and a volume on Realistic Writers of To-day is also projected.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces a library edition of Mr. Augustine Birrell's works in two octavo volumes, to be published in the early autumn.

MR. SIDNEY LEE makes a public appeal on behalf of the funds of the Elizabethan Stage Society. Three hundred pounds is needed to meet the annual deficit on the performances given by the Society. We understand that, in addition to the plays already named for performance next season, Kyd's "Spanish Tragedy" and the "Samson Agonistes" of Milton will, it is hoped, be given.

In Mr. Fred Jane's forthcoming book on the Imperial Russian Navy (W. Thacker & Co.) a good deal of attention is devoted to the history of the Russian attempts to obtain possession of Constantinople.

A SIXTH edition of The Care of the Sick at Home and in the Hospital, by Dr. Th. Billroth, translated by J. Bentall Endean, is now published by Messrs. Simpkin & Marshall, of Stationers' Hall-court.

MESSRS. EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE will publish in October Mr. Charles Dalton's annotated Blenheim Roll, which gives the names of all the officers in British pay who served under Marlborough during the campaign of 1704, the amount of bounty money bestowed on each officer, and the special awards to the widows and children of the slain. Only 150 copies of the Roll will be issued.

* * * Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE ARCADIAN. By H. C. Minchin.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 8s. 6d. net.

"This is a charming little story.....There is nothing professional or conventional about the book.....It is about as pleasant a holiday book as one could find after much searching among the works which laboriously profess to amuse."—Scotsman.

"A bright and amusing series of sketches of gay and happy people."—Academy.

THE ARCADIAN. By H. C. Minchin.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 8s. 6d. net.

"One hardly knows how to characterise such a book as this. It is not a novel, nor an essay, nor is it a biography—yet it is something of all three, and leaves a peculiar and pleasant flavour on the mind.....There is in the book a suggestion of deeper thought than appears on the surface, and the poem 'Candida's Way' is a proof of the poetic taste of the writer. 'The Arcadians' will not appeal to all minds, but for those who can understand him Mr. Minchin has something to say."—Guardian.

THE ARCADIAN. By H. C. Minchin.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 8s. 6d. net.

"An entertaining set of papers, with a good deal of humour in them, just a suspicion of cynicism, not in the least bitter, and a slender thread of story to keep them together."—Spectator.

"We have found his light comedy very diverting.....A very proper book for the lawn on a languid afternoon in August."—Daily Chronicle.

THE ARCADIAN. By H. C. Minchin.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 8s. 6d. net.

"The dialogue is bright and easy and suggestive."—Manchester Guardian.
 "Bright, sparkling, cleverly written sketches—humorous and pathetic pictures of the incongruities of which life is woven."—Birmingham Gazette.
 "A bright and witty narrative."—Outlook.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

Pott 8vo, antique boards, 3s. 6d. net.

A PRIEST to the TEMPLE; or, The Country Parson, his Character and Rule of Holy Life. By GEORGE HERBERT. Edited by the Rev. H. C. BEECHING, Rector of Yattendon, Berks.

"Since George Herbert's 'Priest to the Temple; or, a Country Parson' was first published in 1832 it has not been often issued separately, and Mr. Blackwell's pretty reprint is therefore welcome. Mr. H. C. Beeching has supplied an excellent introduction."—Athenaeum.

"A dainty edition of an old-world book that has not lost its charm."—Manchester Guardian.

"The Rev. H. C. Beeching is one of the best editors obtainable for a seventeenth-century work concerned with English clerical life, so that it is almost unnecessary to praise either the preface or the notes with which he has enriched a reprint of the 1813 edition of George Herbert's 'Country Parson'."—Speaker.

"The book is one which should be on the bookshelves of every curate."—Academy.

"The get-up and printing are so good that we regard it as a model reprint.....It is a unique book, and we know of no writer who could have excelled Mr. Beeching as its editor."—Literary World.

"A dainty little volume.....a delightfully quaint little book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A delightful format has been given to the new edition of George Herbert's 'Country Parson'."—Outlook.

"A very attractive little edition. Mr. Beeching contributes a long introduction."—Westminster Gazette.

"A careful reprint of the original edition of a famous book."—Guardian.

"Well and tastefully got up."—Scotsman.

Oxford: B. H. BLACKWELL, 50 and 51, Broad Street.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square.

F. V. WHITE &amp; CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY RICHARD MARSH.

Ready this Day, at all Booksellers' and Bookstalls, price 6s.

IN FULL CRY.

By the Author of "The Beetle."

IN FULL CRY.

IN FULL CRY.

WILLIAM LE QUEUX'S NEW AND POPULAR STORY.

In Illustrated paper cover, price 1s.

SECRETS OF MONTE CARLO.
 SECRETS OF MONTE CARLO.
 SECRETS OF MONTE CARLO.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

Now ready.

THE HONOUR OF VIVIEN BRUCE. By Mrs. J. H. NEEDLE.

A RATIONAL MARRIAGE. By FLORENCE MARRYAT.
 BONNIE MAGGIE LAUDER. By ALAN ST. AUBYN,
 Author of "A Fellow of Trinity," &c.

SAROLTA'S VERDICT: a Romance. By E. YOLLAND,
 Author of "In Days of Strife," &c.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

PARTNERSHIP.—"THE PUBLISHING HOUSE," BOMBAY, a Wholesale House working under exceptionally advantageous arrangements with several leading London Publishers, offers a PARTNERSHIP to a Gentleman with £5,000 or £8,000 available capital, with a view to taking up further Agencies and otherwise developing the Business. Residence two years in India and two in London in alternation with the present Proprietor. Preliminary particulars on application to E. S. H. care of G. Bell & Sons, 5, York Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—THE AUGUST CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW RE-MAINDERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SONS, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
11, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING and PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing all sorts of Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 6812. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS WANTED, at Prices affixed.—"Snob and Gownsmen," 1823-30, £5.—"The Germ," 1855, £2.—"Old Paris," 1878, £2.—"The Lover's Tale," 1831, £5.—"Barrows," 1862, £1.—"Moore's 'Alps in 1864,'" £3.—"Tittmarsh's 'Comic Tales,'" 1841, £5.—"Queen Mab," 1813, £7.—"Alice in Wonderland," 1865, £2.—"Pamela: a Fragment," 1833, £29. 2,000 Books Wanted at fancy prices. List free.—EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.,
89a, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing in foreign languages.

JUST READY,
THE AMBITIONS OF ST. PAUL. By Rev. W. GARRETT HORDER.

CONTENTS: Concerning Ambition—Three, not One—The First Ambition—The Second Ambition—The Third Ambition.

"This little book is laden with many a precious thought."—Christian Age.

"It is full of freshness and suggestion."—Sunday School Chronicle.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d., post free.

CONVICTED OF HEROISM. A Tale of John Penry, Martyr, 1559—1593. By HERBERT M. WHITE, B.A. Illustrated by Frank H. Simpson.

"Excellent, unusual grasp of events, nobility of ideal, vividness, and grace of style."—Rev. ARCHIBALD DUFF, D.D.

"Ought to have a large sale in our schools and churches."—A. E. HUTTON, Esq., M.P.

London: 21 & 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, E.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

LATEST PUBLICATIONS of the ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY of LONDON.

PROCEEDINGS of the ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY of LONDON, 1898. Part II., containing Papers read at the Scientific Meetings held in March and April, 1898. With 11 Plates. Price, to Fellows, 9s.; to the Public, 12s.

TRANSACTIONS. Vol. XV. Part 2, containing a Paper on "THE MARINE COPEPODA of NEW ZEALAND," by G. STEWARDSON BRADY, M.D., D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S., C.M.Z.S. With 5 Plates. Price, to Fellows, 9s.; to the Public, 12s.

To be obtained at the Society's Office (3, Hanover Square, W.), or through any Bookseller.

UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW.

CHAIR of NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

The University Court of the University of Glasgow will at an early date proceed to APPOINT a PROFESSOR to occupy the above Chair in this University, recently rendered vacant. The Professor will be required to enter on his duties as from 1st October next, from which date the appointment will take effect.

The normal salary of the Chair is £1,000, subject to §VIII. (2) and (3) of Ordinance 23. The Chair has an official residence attached to it.

The appointment is made ad vitam et cum pensionem, and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, who will furnish any further information desired, twenty copies of his application and twenty copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit, on or before 15th September next.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,
Secretary to the Glasgow University Court,
91, West Regent Street, Glasgow.

MASON UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.

ASSISTANT LECTURESHIP in CLASSICS.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the above appointment.

Applications, accompanied by testimonials, should be sent to the undersigned, not later than Saturday, the 16th of September.

The Candidate elected will be required to enter upon his duties on October 3rd.

Further particulars may be obtained from
GEO. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

THE MARIA GREY TRAINING COLLEGE, Salisbury Road, Brompton, London, N.W.

A FULL COURSE of TRAINING in preparation for the CAMBRIDGE TEACHERS' CERTIFICATE in the Theory and Practice of Teaching is offered to Ladies who desire to become Teachers.

Kindergarten Teachers are also prepared for the Higher Certificate of the National Froebel Union. Junior Students are prepared for the Cambridge Higher Local Examinations.

Scholarships offered in all Divisions.
COLLEGE YEAR BEGINS SEPTEMBER 13th, 1899.

The Winkworth Hall of Residence for Twenty-one Students will be opened opposite the College in September, 1899.

Address Miss ALICE WOODS, Principal, The Maria Grey Training College, Salisbury Road, Brompton, N.W.

TECHNICAL COLLEGE, HUDDERSFIELD.

PRINCIPAL—S. G. RAWSON, D.Sc.

The LECTURESHIP in ART is VACANT. Salary, £220 per annum. Applications must be sent in not later than August 31st, to the Principal. Statement of duties will be forwarded on application.

T. THORP, Secretary.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency F. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.O.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORTH WALES COAST.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED, and SNOWDON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and Pwllheli.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

SECOND EDITION, ENLARGED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With an additional Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Bookseller.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY (LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

80-84, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria

Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £1.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSBOROUGH, Manager.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 24, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class
Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet
Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated and other Publications and specially-built
Machines for fast folding and covering 4, 16, 24, or 32-page
Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence
New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 60121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS WANTED, at Prices affixed.
—"Snob and Gownsmen," 1829-30, £5.—"The Germ,"
1850, £2.—"Old Paris," 1878, £2.—"The Lover's Tale," 1833, £5.
—"Borrow's" "Wild Wales," 1862, £1.—"Moore's" "Alpen in 1864," £1.
—"Titmarsh's" "Comic Tales," 1841, £5.—"Queen Mab," 1813, £7.
—"Alice in Wonderland," 1865, £2.—"Pauline: a Fragment,"
1832, £20. 2,000 Books Wanted at fancy prices. List free.
EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish. Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.
68a, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing in foreign languages.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on
DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

A THIN COCOA.

EPPS'S

The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa on being jected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the con-
sistence of tea, of which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.
Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 5 stamps.—JAMES ERRS & CO., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.

COCOA
ESSENCE

The Old Series of THE ACADEMY, which ended on October 1st, completed a volume.
The Index can be obtained gratis on application to the Publisher.

UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW.

CHAIR OF HISTORY.

The University Court of the University of Glasgow will at an early date proceed to APPOINT a PROFESSOR to occupy the above Chair in this University, recently rendered vacant.

The Professor will be required to enter on his duties as from 1st October next, from which date the appointment will take effect.

The normal salary of the Chair is £800, subject to § VIII. (2)
and (3) of Ordinance No. 23. The appointment is made ad vitam and ex officio, and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, who will furnish any further information desired, twenty copies of his application and twenty copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit, on or before 18th September next.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,

Secretary of the Glasgow University Court.

1, West Regent Street, Glasgow.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES,
ABERYSTWYTH.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the post of
ASSISTANT LECTURER in the Department of LOGIC and PHILOSOPHY. Applications, together with testimonials, must be forwarded, on or before September 9th, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.

August, 1899.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and
COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

Four Scholarships and One Exhibition worth £150, £75, £75,
£50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 27th, 1899—viz., One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Physics and Chemistry. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Biology and Physiology.
Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London Medical School.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One
Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty years of age (if of sufficient merit) in Physics, Chemistry, Animal Biology, and Vegetable Biology.

The Jefferson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin,
Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of
June, 1899.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to receive to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.

For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—An EXAMINA-TION for FILLING-UP about THIRTY VACANCIES
on the Foundation will be held on the 6th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 11th SEPTEMBER NEXT.
For information apply to the BURSAR of St. Paul's School,
West Kensington.

TO BE SOLD, by TENDER, the old-established PUBLISHING BUSINESS of A. D. INNES
& COMPANY, Limited, of 31 and 32, Bedford Street, Strand, London, W.C., including Leasehold Interest, Goodwill, Copyrights, Trade Fixtures, Furniture, Plant, Machinery and Stock-in-Trade.

The Copyrights include a large number of Works by many noted and popular Authors of the day, a list and full particulars of which may be seen at the undermentioned office of
The Law Investment and Insurance Corporation, Limited.
Tenders to be sent in addressed to the SECRETARY of THE LAW INVESTMENT and INSURANCE CORPORATION, Limited, 9, Serio Street, Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C., before the 15th SEPTEMBER, 1899.

Particulars and Conditions of Sale and Forms of Tender may be obtained gratis of the above-named Secretary, and of the Vendors' Solicitors, Messrs. SHARPE, PARKER, PITCHARDS &
BARHAM, 12, New Court, Carver Street, London, W.C.

MR. HENRY J. DRANE, Publisher,
Salisbury House, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, is prepared to consider MSS. for the coming season. Authors desirous of publishing on their own account can, by applying to
Mr. Drane, receive fair treatment, and avoid all middlemen's profits and commissions. No fees charged for reading, &c.
Magazines and other Periodicals published on a low commission.

DAUNTSEY AGRICULTURAL SCHOOL,
WEST LAVINGTON.

APPOINTMENT OF HEAD MASTER.

The Governors of the School invite applications for the Head Mastership of the Dauntsey Agricultural School, which will be vacated by Christmas next, and the new Head Master will be required to commence his duties on the 1st day of January, 1900.

In addition to the ordinary qualifications, applicants
must be qualified in Science as applied to Agriculture.
Applications will be received up to the 1st day of August next, and all applicants must state their age,
previous experience, and qualifications for the post.

For particulars of duties and emoluments apply to
JOSEPH T. JACKSON,

Clerk to the Governors,
Devizes.

30th June, 1899.

CITY and GUILDS of LONDON
INSTITUTE.

ASSISTANT PROFESSOR IN ENGINEERING.

The Committee of the Institute are prepared to receive Applications for the Appointment of ASSIST-ANT PROFESSOR in the Department of Civil and
Mechanical Engineering at the City and Guilds
Central Technical College. Salary, £500 per annum.

Particulars and terms of the Appointment may be had on application to the HONORARY SECRETARY, City
and Guilds of London Institute, Gresham College, Basinghall Street, London, E.C.

THE ## NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

AUGUST, 1899.—Price 2s. 6d.

CONTAINS:—

WOMAN'S INTERNATIONAL PARLIAMENT

By the COUNTESS OF ABERDEEN and KASHANDRA VIVARIA.

THE CENSORSHIP of the STAGE in ENGLAND.

By G. BERNARD SHA

ATHLETICS for POLITICIANS.

By Sir CHARLES DILKE.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFLICT in FINLAND.

By A MEMBER of the FINNISH DIET

And other Articles.

London:

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months,
and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS
of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE
(Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING
PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

LONDON LIBRARY
ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P., the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON, HERBERT
SPENCER, Esq., the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., D.C.L.

TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon.
Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3
a year; Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room Open from 10 till half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D.,
Secretary and Librarian.

Fcap. 8vo, price 1s. 6d., post free.

THE AMBITIONS of ST. PAUL. By Rev.
W. GARRETT HORDER.

CONTENTS: Concerning Ambition—Three, not One
—The First Ambition—The Second Ambition—The Third Ambition.

"It is full of freshness and suggestion."

Sunday School Chronicle.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d., post free.

CONVICTED of HEROISM. A Tale of
John Pennry, Martyr, 1559—1593. By HERBERT
M. WHITE, B.A. Illustrated by Frank H.
Simpson.

"Excellent, unusual grasp of events, nobility of ideal, vividness, and grace of style."
Rev. ARCHIBALD DUFF, D.D.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD,

21 & 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, London, E.C.

BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY READING.

The Leading Book in America at the present moment, where over 200,000 have been sold.

A Fresh Impression of the English Edition just published.

DAVID HARUM:

A Story of American Life.

By EDWARD NOYES WESTCOTT.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The author was able to create in 'David Harum' a character so original, so true, and so strong, yet withal so delightfully quaint and humorous, that we are at once compelled to admit that here is a new and permanent addition to the long list of American literary portraits."—Extract from Preface by FORBES HEERMANS.

"An engaging specimen of current Transatlantic fiction."—Literature.

AT A WINTER'S FIRE.

By BERNARD CAPES, Author of "The Lake of Wine," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"To those who like 'a grue' in their fiction, and who can appreciate felicity of phrase and distinction of style, we can recommend Mr. Capes's new volume."—Daily News.

ROSALBA.

By OLIVE PRATT RAYNER, Author of "The Typewriter Girl."

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Manchester Courier says:—"The author is too skilful to allow the story to flag. The heroine is as humorous as she is self-conscious; the incidents are droll, and the satirical depletions of character, such as Miss Westmacott and John Stodmarsh, are excellent."

The Scotsman says:—"A very well-told tale, possessing an unconventional air which at once enlists one's interest and appreciation..... Rosalba is a most interesting character study, and one on which the author has worked with great care and success."

THE LITTLE LEGACY,

And Other Stories.

By L. B. WALFORD, Author of "The Archdeacon," "Mr. Smith," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Mrs. Walford could not have written a volume more characteristic of herself."—Pall Mall Gazette.

TRANSGRESSION.

By S. S. THORBURN, Bengal Civil Service, Author of "Asiatic Neighbours," "His Majesty's Greatest Subject," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The author has a thorough knowledge of the ways of Indian officialdom; he handles the delicate domestic scenes cleverly, and in the Colonel's attack on the Afghans he provides a thrilling piece of descriptive writing."—Manchester Courier.

"Any one who wishes to gain a thorough insight into the way our Indian Empire is administered on its borders, both by the Government and by individuals, should read this book."—St. James's Gazette.

A PAUPER MILLIONAIRE.

By AUSTIN FRYERS.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"The reader is carried along by the sheer actuality of the story from first page to last. A book which everyone should read."—Sun.

A MILLIONAIRE'S DAUGHTER.

By PERCY WHITE, Author of "Mr. Bailey-Martin," &c.

SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"As epigrammatic and witty as anything that has come from the hand that penned 'Mr. Bailey-Martin.'"—Outlook.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1423. Established 1869.

12 August, 1899.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

LAST week, in quoting from Mr. Henley's indictment of Mr. Andrew Lang as editor of the "Gadshill Dickens," we did not observe that Mr. Henley made a curious, if a somewhat natural, error. Mr. Lang had said that if he could oblige the dead to break their unending sleep, far rather than Dickens he would meet "him that sleeps in Dryburgh," and "him to whose room came Athos, Porthos, Aramis, and D'Artagnan, with their noiseless swagger." Mr. Henley took the last-named to be Dumas, and we, in our comment, shared his mistake. Mr. Lang's allusion was, of course, to Thackeray, not to Dumas. There is no more familiar passage in the Roundabout Papers than the one in "De Finibus," in which Thackeray reviews his favourite characters in fiction. Here it is:

They used to call the good Sir Walter the "Wizard of the North." What if some writer should appear who can write so enchantingly that he shall be able to call into actual life the people whom he invents? What if Mignon, and Margaret, and Goetz von Berlichingen are alive now (though I don't say they are visible), and Dugald Dalgetty and Ivanhoe were to step in at that open window by the little garden yonder? Suppose Uncas and our noble old Leather-stocking were to glide silently in? Suppose Athos, Porthos, and Aramis should enter with a noiseless swagger, curling their moustaches? And dearest Amelia Booth, on Uncle Toby's arm; and Tittlebat Titmouse, with his hair dyed green; and all the Crummles company of comedians, with the Gil Blas troop; and Sir Roger de Coverley; and the greatest of all crazy gentlemen, the Knight of La Mancha, with his blessed squire?

A letter from Mr. Henley on the subject will be found in our correspondence columns. By-the-by, we may remind Mr. Lang that D'Artagnan was not among the company on the above occasion.

THE series of histories of modern times which Lord Acton is editing is so far advanced that we may expect the first volume next Spring. The period to be covered by the twelve volumes is from the end of the Middle Ages to the present day. In the first volume the Renaissance will be dealt with by several hands. The remaining volumes will be issued, if possible, at the rate of two a year.

PERHAPS it is the hot weather, but we have this week received two letters which we must refrain from printing. The first is from an English lady resident in Austria, offering to prove that one of our popular novelists "purloins" his ideas, plots, and even whole pages of description and dialogue from Polish, Russian, and Hungarian sources. The second letter is from a clever author-artist, who wishes to revive the attack on Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's bookstall monopoly. We have no doubt that this controversy is destined to be perennial. But we suggest that there should be a close time for attacks on Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's monopoly, corresponding with the tourist season.

THE estate of the late Mrs. Emma Marshall, the novelist, has been sworn at £1,379 10s. 11d.

THREE principal alterations in the law of literary copyright are foreshadowed by the new Copyright Bill. These are:

1. A term of thirty years from the date of publication is, in the case of posthumous works, substituted for the term of forty-two years under the existing law.
2. Contributors of articles to periodicals may republish them in a separate form after two years from the time of their appearance in the periodical, instead of after twenty-eight years as under the present law.
3. Any newspaper receiving special and independent news of any fact or event from beyond the limits of the British Islands will enjoy copyright in that news for the space of eighteen hours.

MEANWHILE our knowledge of the law of copyright as it affects newspaper reports of speeches is advanced a stage by Mr. Justice North's decision in Walter v. Lane. We now know—though, perhaps, only tentatively, since Mr. Lane intends to appeal—that a newspaper has copyright in that version of a speech which it has obtained through its own reporter. What we have yet to learn is how much, if any, copyright is enjoyed by the author of the speech. Lord Rosebery's copyright in his own speeches remains beautifully obscure.

A BEACON-LIGHT on Duart Point, near the entrance to the Sound of Mull, is to perpetuate the memory of William Black. A fine monument for any man!

A YEAR and a half ago we printed an autobiographical wail by "Julian Croskey," the author of Max, The Shen's Pigtail, and other stories, which, if they achieved no great popular success, were not without ability. "Julian Croskey's" story showed that he had tried many rôles in life as well as literature, and his article concluded with the following counsel to the aspiring author: "If you would succeed as an author, be one and nothing else. If you can beg, borrow, or steal as much as £50 a year, cut yourself off from everything and write." Thus did "Julian Croskey" advise the beginner in April of last year. As for himself, he was about to try again, and we ventured to offer him a word of encouragement.

HOWBEIT, "Julian Croskey" has tried again, and now from a still higher pinnacle of disgust he wishes, in the August number of the Author, earnestly to warn young authors not to stick to literature, but, after a few failures, to jump out of its deceptive quagmire as quickly as possible and turn their hand to something more lucrative, such as bricklaying.

"Julian Croskey" tells us he is now carrying planks at a sawmill for £3 10s. a month. Authorship, therefore, he has decided, "is a dangerous flame to play with"; but (being still paternally interested in the young author), he adds: "Nevertheless, by all means give it three years during the twenties, if unmarried." We are afraid that "Julian Croskey's" latest advice is rather silly. And even now "Julian Croskey" might reflect that the best writing is usually done by those who do something else for a living.

Are we not in danger of taking Dickens too seriously? Calverley's famous examination paper has usually been called a jeu d'esprit, but we begin to think that it was the unconscious inauguration of a new kind of scholarship which, in the fulness of time, will be systematised in Germany. Here is Mr. Percy Fitzgerald putting forth a volume of Pickwick Studies (New Century Press), in which the Pickwick Papers are dissected and analysed, and in which evidence is gravely amassed on all kinds of propositions. You open the book at random on a sentence like this: "Everything, however, points to show the all but contemptuous opinion held of this Trundle." Again: "A close admeasurement of the distance will disprove the Norwich theory"—this in a discussion as to the identity of Eatanswill. Who was Pott, the editor of the Eatanswill Gazette? Mr. Fitzgerald says Dr. Maginn, but quotes a "well-known eminent littérateur," who told him that "Pott is not shown to be such a blackguard as Maginn, and that Maginn was not such an ass as Pott." Where on the road to Muggleton did Mr. Pickwick drop his whip? And where was Muggleton? Was Mr. Pickwick ever in love? And who was Mr. Pickwick?

THESE are the riddles asked and more or less answered by Mr. Fitzgerald, who, we fancy, could instruct the shade of Dickens on most points in the Pickwickian drama. On p. 87 we read: "There is no doubt that this is the true philosophy of the thing: that, once his ideas are in print, the author has no more to do with them or their meaning than anyone else has." That is where Mr. Fitzgerald comes in.

SOME particulars of the long-looked-for "Memoirs of Victor Hugo" are given by a writer in Literature. The work will appear simultaneously in Paris, London, and New York; the translation of the Anglo-Saxon editions being Mr. John W. Harding. The Memoirs go back to 1825, when Hugo saw the coronation of Charles X. at Rheims. There is a sarcastic chapter on the French Academy, which did not elect Hugo when he first became a candidate. There will be many piquant memories of life at the Tuileries, when Louis Philippe was on the throne. Besides the memoirs, there will be various miscellaneous essays and descriptive pieces, thus:

Some hitherto unpublished details of the execution of Louis XVI., and the arrival of Napoleon I. in Paris, in 1815, which were recounted to the poet by eye-witnesses, are also given. The details of the execution were related to him by an old man. Hugo, from these, has pictured the scene with such inimitable art that one is positively chilled by the cold of that bleak, gloomy January morning, and seems to witness the martyrdom of the King in White as a spectator in the bizarre, lugubrious crowd.

THE Postmaster-General has granted permission for a tablet to be affixed to the new post-office in Carter-lane, E.C., bearing the following inscription:

Upon this site formerly stood the Bell in Carter-lane, from which Richard Quiney wrote the letter to William Shakespeare, dated the 25th October, 1598. This is the only letter extant addressed to Shakespeare, and the original is preserved in the museum at his birth-place, Stratford-upon-Avon. This tablet was placed upon the present building by leave of the Postmaster-General, 1899.

QUINEY's letter is, of course, well known; but in this connexion it may be useful to repeat its terms:

Loving Country man, I am bold of you as of a friend craving your help with £30; upon Mr. Bushell's and my security or Mr. Myttons with me. Mr. Roswell is not come to London as yet and I have special cause. You shall friend me much in helping me out of all the debts I owe in London. I thank God, and much quiet my mind which would not be indebted. I am now towards the Court in hope of answer for the despatch of my business. You shall neither lose credit nor money by me, the Lord willing, and now but persuade yourself so, as I hope, and you shall not need to fear, but with all hearty thankfulness, I will hold my time and content your friend, and, if we bargain further, you shall be the paymaster yourself. My time bids me hasten to an end, and so I commit this to your care, and hope of your help. I fear I shall not be back this night from the Court. Haste. The Lord be with you, and with us all, amen. From The Bell, in Carter Lane, the 25th of October, 1598.—Yours, in all kindness, Richard Quiney. (Address) To my loving good Friend and Countryman, Mr. William Shakespeare, deliver these.

THE London Argus has been feeling about for a word which would describe the lover of London. The choice was soon seen to be a very limited one. "Londonist" was voted uncouth, which it is. "Londonarian," has been adopted as the most descriptive and melodious word. It is not a bad word, yet, somehow, we should hesitate to call our worst foe a Londonarian.

Who has not been in the predicament of being unable to pay for a coveted book on a bookstall? In such a case there are two ways of securing the treasure. The first, and the surest, is to pay a small deposit and have the book reserved. The second is Eugene Field's way. The story, told in the Daily Chronicle, says that once, when he chanced upon a rare copy of Burns, and could not buy it, Mr. Field wrote these lines on the fly-leaf:

Gude friende, for Jesus' sake forbare
To buy ye book thou seest here
For I have gone to earn the pelf—
I meane to buy ye book myselve.

Mr. Field's wish was respected, and the book is now his own.

A BOOKSELLING story:—A lady recently asked, in a bookseller's shop, for Cardinal Manning's Catholic Piety. The book was in stock, but was upstairs. The assistant went to the speaking tube and called, in a sharp, business-like tone: "Man's Cat Pie, one!"

A FEW weeks ago we remarked that every man should make his own anthology. In noticing a poetical collection, "Arthur Pendenys" tells his readers what his own anthology would be like. Here is his list of contents:

I think I should begin my book with The Walrus and the Carpenter, the most exquisite nonsense ever written. Next should follow the first book of Marcus Aurelius, the most dignified thing ever written. Then there would proceed, among other passages, Shelley's "Sensitive Plant," to me the most spiritual poem; and next, Swinburne's "Love and Sleep," the most human sonnet ever penned. I would have Clarendon's character of Lord Falkland and his life at Great Tew, and some parodies printed in the Light Green, an inspired Cambridge print, particularly the one called "The Heathen Pass-ee" (being "the story of a Pass Examination by Bred Hard"). There should be Steele's essay on "Tom Folio" from the Tatler, that being a sketch of the learned Rawlinson in his book-loving habits. I would have passages from Lear's Nonsense side by side with the seventeenth chapter of Gibbon's History. There might be Bishop Berkeley's Querist and Sir H. Savile's Maxims of State, condensing the greatest political wisdom. From the New Republic I would print what follows in Book II., Chapter I., when Dr. Jenkinson, with a gentle smile of benignity playing on his lips, spread open his MS. and commenced his sermon; and I would print from The Green Carnation where, in the Fourteenth Chapter, Esmé, with "a graceful bend of his crimped head," spoke upon the art of being consciously foolish beautifully. All these (with power to add to their number) would I try to include in one well-printed volume, and I should want no other book of extracts.

THIS is the age of big publishing enterprises. Dr. Murray's New English Dictionary, Sir Walter Besant's Survey of London, the Dictionary of National Biography!

To these must now be added the Victoria History of the Counties of England, under the general editorship of Mr. W. Arthur Doubleday and Mr. G. Laurence Gomme. Messrs. Constable will publish this colossal work, which will run to considerably over one hundred and fifty volumes. The governing idea is that the great old county histories are exceedingly rare and costly, others are very imperfect, and all are out of date. The Victoria histories are designed to take the places of these old staggers; and certainly nothing of pomp and circumstance will be wanting to the new dynasty. The Queen has accepted the dedication. An influential advisory committee, which includes the Marquess of Salisbury, the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Rosebery, the Bishops of London and Oxford, Lord Acton, Sir Clements Markham, Sir Archibald Geikie, and many others has been constituted in aid of the enterprise.

THE plan of contents to be followed in the history of each country will be as follows:

Natural History: its influence in forming Modern Scenery.
 Geology.
 Flora.
 Fauna.
 Pre-historic Remains.
 Roman Remains.
 Anglo-Saxon Remains.
 Ethnography: Dialect and Place Names.
 Folk-lore.
 Physical Types.
 Domesday Book and other kindred Records.
 Architecture.
 Ecclesiastical History.
 Political History.
 Maritime History of Coast Counties.
 Topographical Accounts of Parishes and Manors.
 History of the Feudal Baronage.
 Family History.
 Agriculture, Industries, Arts, and Manufactures.
 Persons Eminent in Art, Literature, Science.
 Ancient and Modern Sport.
 Bibliographies.

Each history will be quite complete in itself, an excellent point. As a rule it will be in four volumes, large imperial 8vo, and the price will be six guineas net. Furthermore, each history will be obtainable in parts. Thus a four-volume history will be issued in ten parts at 12s. 6d. each.

A CONTEMPORARY adds to the humours of book catalogues. In the list of a well-known firm of publishers, The Archbishops' Decision as to the Liturgical Use of Incense and the Lawfulness of Carrying Lights in Procession is immediately followed by The Light That Failed!

WE have found fault ere now with Sir Walter Besant's optimistic attitude to literature as a money-making profession, and to the repeated encouragements which he has given to all and sundry to take up the pen. In the August number of the Author Sir Walter prints a vigorous letter in reply to his own remarks in the June issue. It presents an aspect of the case which is at least as true as the rosy one to which readers of Sir Walter Besant's journal are accustomed. "X," the correspondent in question, says:

And, first of all, Literature (with a big L) is a beggarly profession. Who with any tinge of the real stuff in him can make a living out of writing which is literature? It is idle to give as examples such a one as Tennyson, the bourgeois Chrysostom, who succeeded in touching the public by spoiling Sir Thomas Malory, and not by his best work. What of our greatest, indeed our only real, literary novelist? Did he not have to eke out a living by reading for a publisher? No, very few can make a living out of good work. Even according to Sir Walter Besant, the best must scrape odd guineas by journalistic hack-work. The few who make four figures (mostly out of inferior novels) only accent the poverty of the rest. There is no profession of literature. It is an abuse of the term to call it a profession. Every waiting barrister, every idle doctor, every half-pay captain, can come in and make a little out of writing. It would be rather rough on the barrister if every outsider with a tongue could cut into his work. Even if fifty writers make over a thousand a year, how many are writing for a living? . . . I remember a man whose name is known very well indeed having a column to himself in the Times the very morning he bought a red herring and cooked it over a scanty fire in his bedroom. One of our best writers half-starved himself for twelve years. I know this, as I was a great friend of his. Even now his income is a very precarious four hundred a year.

THE multiplication of writers, about which Sir Walter is apt to be cheerful, is thus touched upon by X.:

In every club, says Sir Walter Besant, there are more yearly who attempt the profession. Exactly so, and they attempt it mostly on the basis of an income of their own. . . . In saying all this I do not mean to infer that these men should not write. But their doing so does not make writing a better business, but a worse one, for those who rely on it; and anything that encourages men and women to go into the literary "scrimmage" (for it is nothing but a fight) is harmful to them and us. It is idle for Sir Walter Besant to say he does not encourage the outsider. This paper of his in the June number of the Author is nothing but an encouragement through and through to any poor fool who fancies he has the gift of the pen. Certainly, as Sir Walter says, nothing has been said in the Author about any one person's income, but that is nothing when the whole argument has been again and again that any fairly good writer can make a fairly good income. For that is not true, and never has been true, and it looks as if it never would be true.

THE "penny horrible" will again be blamed as the underlying cause of the escapade of the two boys, aged ten and eleven, who were arrested in Hastings last Saturday. The lads had run away from home, and were wearing slouch hats, and in their waistbelts they carried hunting-knives. They also had good revolvers and a hundred cartridges. The elder boy carried a big black bag containing:

A loaf of bread.
 Four pairs of stockings.
 A pair of bathing drawers.
 A brush and comb bag.

Thus equipped, the boys had roamed the hills and had slept during one night on the beach. To a friendly, but determined, constable they explained that they had both gone home from school, and their mother had said she would get a tutor for them during the holidays, so they had made a bolt for liberty. When the officer in charge of the station asked them what they intended doing with the knives and pistols, Charles, the elder, replied, "If anyone interferes with us we shall make him hold his paws up." The smaller boy thereupon exclaimed, "Rather." As we have said, the "penny horrible" is likely to be blamed. But the fact that the knives belonged to the boys' father, who had used them for hunting in Canada, seems to point to the inspiration of oral tales by the fireside. No harm was done, and the laughable side of the escapade triumphs.

MR. RICHARD LE GALLIENNE is one of those writers who see no necessity to divorce themselves from literature when taking a holiday. Mr. Le Gallienne is, in fact, going through the country on a bicycle, pen in pocket, and his observations are set forth in the Sunday Sun. From Evesham he tells how a shower of rain confined him to an inn which was "a limbo of forgotten furniture and unforgiven steel engravings." And bemoaning his double misery, Mr. Le Gallienne contrives to allude to, or quote from, the writings of Mrs. Meynell, Mr. Meredith, Emile Verhaeren, Washington Irving, Chaucer, and Shakespeare, while ends the chapter with some pretty lines on bread and honey by himself.

THE demolition of the house, No. 7, Fleet-street, until lately occupied by Messrs. Butterworth, the law stationers, is fraught with Shakespearean associations. For although the house presents a Georgian front to the street, parts of it are old enough to have seen the occupancy of Jaggard, Shakespeare's bookseller. Indeed, Mr. J. W. Butterworth maintains that the first edition of "Romeo and Juliet" was printed in the house at the rear, afterwards known as Dick's Coffee-house. This was in Shakespeare's lifetime; hence we are encouraged to believe that Shakespeare crossed the threshold of the house which is now being carted away. If Jaggard printed "Romeo and Juliet" in this house, may he not have printed and sold the first folio on the same premises? Even these rather vague Shakespearean associations are not the oldest which the house can boast. Before Jaggard, Richard Tottel, "printer by Special patent of the bokes of the Common lawe," flourished here, without any doubt, in the reigns of King Edward VI. and the Queens Mary and Elizabeth. Messrs. Butterworth still make decorative use of Tottel's sign of the "Hande and Starre."

AFTER the recent thunderstorms thousands of dead eels were found near Sandwich, floating in the Delf river. We wonder how many people who read of the circumstance were reminded of Shakespeare's line in "Pericles": "I warrant you, mistress, thunder should not so awake the beds of eels," &c. It is Sir Edwin Arnold who draws attention to this further indication of Shakespeare's omniscience.

MELODRAMATIC fiction is again outdone by fact. A French cabman, named Prosper Romieu, has just attended his own funeral. He was hiding from justice in his brother's house when the brother died. So what does Romieu do but obtain a certificate of his own death, and then, personating his afflicted brother, follow the coffin, which was supposed to contain his own remains, to the graveside. There the farce ended.

THE first impact of Mr. Kipling's works upon a Sunday-school at Crawfordsville, Indiana, has resulted in their being banned. It was The Drums of the Fore and Aft that wrought the trouble. This story was supplied to the school by a firm of Cincinnati booksellers. In due course the volume came into the hands of a strict church-member at Crawfordsville, who declared that it "fairly reeked of profanity and the most outrageous slang." He read quotations to the church trustees, who promptly excluded Mr. Kipling's works from the library!

Bibliographical.

To some of us, a widely-circulated paragraph, which announces that certain of our novelists will not be represented by any publication this autumn, comes as tidings of comfort and of joy. The professional reader, it is to be feared, gets weary of the names of the authors for whom, apparently, there is the widest public. Let us take the case of a certain lady novelist, of whom we learn that she certainly will be represented in the autumn book-lists. Well, to go back a little on the path of time, that lady, I find, published in 1889 four novels, in 1890 two, in 1891 one, in 1892 five, in 1893 two, in 1894 three, in 1895 six, in 1896 seven, in 1897 three, and in 1898 four. That is to say, within the limit of ten years, her name has appeared on the title-pages of thirty-nine works of fiction, long or short, to say nothing of new or cheap editions. She published one of the thirty-nine either anonymously or pseudonymously—I forget which. Why did she not adopt that device in many more instances? It would have made her name less monotonously familiar.

Another of those fictionists from whom, it seems, we may depend upon receiving a new novel in the autumn is Maurus Jókai. How steadily that writer's popularity in England has been maintained may be seen from the following list of those books of his which have been translated into English within the past decade:—Timar's Two Worlds (1888), There is no Devil (1891), Dr. Dumany's Wife (1891), Pretty Michal (1892), Eyes Like the Sea (1893), In Love with the Czarina, and Other Tales (1894), 'Midst the Wild Carpathians (1894), Black Diamonds (1896), The Green Book (1897), The Lion of Janina; or, the Last Days of the Janissaries (1897), An Hungarian Nabob (1898), and The Nameless Castle (1898). Three of the above have been translated into English twice—Pretty Michal and 'Midst the Wild Carpathians for the second time in 1897, and Dr. Dumany's Wife in 1898.

Fertility is a characteristic of the modern author as a class. We are an industrious race. Look at the Rev. Dr. Green, who has just retired from his labours in connexion with the Religious Tract Society. Considerable as was his purely editorial and secretarial work, he nevertheless contrived to turn out a number of volumes—not, perhaps, of high literary quality, but very useful and wholesome in their way. He wrote for the R.T.S. such things as Scottish Pictures Drawn with Pen and Pencil (1888), Christian Ministry to the Young (1888), English Pictures (1885), Bible Sketches and Teachings (1888), Grammar of the Greek Testament (1892), Pictures from the German Fatherland (1893), and an Introduction to New Testament Greek (1894). Dr. Green has been further guilty, I believe, of a little volume of verse, published in 1897.

"Library Edition of the Works of Mr. Augustine Birrell"—how fine it sounds, to be sure! The "Works"—consisting of Obiter Dicta (two volumes), Res Judicatae (one volume), and Men, Women, and Books (one volume)—were published, in uniform fashion, two years ago. The "Library Edition," I suppose, will be de luxe in character. Obiter Dicta, first and second series, dates from 1887; Res Judicatae from 1892; and Men, Women, and Books from 1894. Mr. Birrell's lectures on The Law of Employers' Liability and on The Law of Copyright are not, of course, to be counted among his "Works," though in both cases the lecturer managed to impart a literary flavour to his discourses.

We are told that the poem Mr. Swinburne is to give us in the autumn is to be called Rosamond. Will it be a new work, or will it be the "Rosamond" (perhaps altered or enlarged) which was published with The Queen-Mother in 1861? There is no reason, of course, why the promised Rosamond should deal with Henry II.'s Rosamond at all. Indeed, there is one good reason why it should not—the fact that Tennyson portrayed her for us in his Becket, so recently as 1884. Queen Eleanor's rival has had, in truth, almost more than her share of celebration by poets and playwrights. She figures in the anonymous Henry the Second of 1692, in Addison's Fair Rosamond (1749), in the anonymous Henry the Second of 1774, in John Barnett's Fair Rosamond (1837), and in George Darley's Thomas à Becket (1840), to say nothing of having been made the heroine of an equestrian spectacle at Astley's!

Dr. Dabbs, of Shanklin, seems ambitious of recognition as a poet. Mention is made of his having just given to the world the text of a poetic drama called The Blind Singer. It is not so very long ago since he published Dante, a dramatic poem. It would be cruel if posterity, after all, insisted upon remembering Dr. Dabbs only as Tennyson's Isle-of-Wight physician.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Byron and his Wife.

BYRON'S WORKS: Letters and Journals. Vol. III. Edited by R. E. Prothero. (John Murray. 6s.)

THIS volume of the Byron letters and journals contains a very small instalment of the journals, merely an itinerary of the journey through the Alps and Switzerland towards Milan and ultimately Venice. It is of interest particularly because some of the entries in the journal were afterwards incorporated, with slight change, in Manfred. It is characteristic of Byron thus thriftily to "use up" his prose diary in his poetry. Many poets have occasionally transferred prose notes or passages to their verse; but this systematic "making copy" of journalistic jottings for his poems is most idiosyncratic of Byron, with his essential tendency towards eloquence and rhetoric rather than pure poetry. The letters, which form the overwhelming bulk of the volume, are most interesting. The present edition more than doubles the letters previously published during the same period—January 1814 and November 1816. It is to be regretted that Mr. Prothero does not indicate in the text what letters are new. Surely this might have been done without inconvenience. As it is, we are only informed, distinctly, that the letters to Miss Milbanke are new, being printed from copies made by the Earl of Lovelace. They consist partly of holograph letters, partly of extracts, and are very interesting. Apart from those details of the separation which we shall never know certainly, there are certain details impossible to neglect. Lady Byron asserts absolutely, in a letter to the Rev. Mr. Hanson, that Byron married her out of revenge, and declared so to her on the very day of their marriage.

MISS MILBANKE.

From a Miniature by Charles Hayter painted in 1812.

He married me with the deepest determination of revenge, avowed on the day of my marriage, and executed ever since with systematic and unceasing cruelty. . . . My security depended on the total abandonment of every moral and religious principle, against which . . . his hatred and endeavours were uniformly and consistently directed.

In other words, she deliberately accuses Byron of behaving as Jonas Chuzzlewit behaves in Dickens's novel, when he marries poor Mary Pecksniff with the intention of revenging upon her the delays and caprices to which she has subjected him. We are not of those who think it sufficient to reply that Lady Byron was a mathematical woman, unsympathetic, and exaggerated or misremembered matters. Such a declaration, on the day of her marriage, a woman could not well misremember. If her memory could be trusted on any point, surely it must be on what passed between her husband and herself on their marriage day. Either we must accuse Lady Byron of falsehood, or we must accept this as a serious and terrible accusation against Byron. For our part, we believe Byron capable of it. He was vengefully proud, and of his mean selfishness there is plentiful proof. He set up to be a dandy, a lady-killer; and Miss Milbanke had rejected him. That he should turn on her, Jonas Chuzzlewit-fashion, and resolve to win her in order to punish her, and bring her pride low, is only too accordant with his own mean and selfish pride. Do these letters bear out such an idea? To us they do. We are clear that they show ranking gall. They show it by their constant uncalled-for reference to, and repudiation of, pique. When a disputant, without any accusation, repeats that he is quite calm, and not in the least angry, we do not think him precisely tranquil. And this is Byron's way. He is perpetually returning on the unlucky girl's rejection of him, and uneasily assuring her that he is not in the smallest degree piqued. From which an observer of human nature will draw his own conclusion. Further, he tries to minimise the significance of his offer—quite in the style of a man bitterly piqued. He does not deny—he is not able to deny—that Lady Melbourne was commissioned on his behalf. But he says that she was only asked to ascertain whether he might cultivate acquaintance with Miss Milbanke, in the hope of ultimately improving it into something more; and that she exceeded her instructions by converting it into a direct offer of his hand. It may be merely a Byronic attempt to salve over his cruelly wounded pride. But if true, it makes the wound to his pride all the more stinging, since he never (in that case) dreamed of exposing himself to the rebuff he received. And it makes it all the more credible that he should devote himself to the project of revenge by subduing his cold rejecter to a marriage, and then "taking it out of her." Here is one of the letters in which the pique appears:

In arranging papers I have found the first letter you ever wrote me; read it again. You will allow mine appeared a very unpromising case; but I can forgive—that is not the word—I mean I can forget, even the reality of your sentiments then if you do not deceive yourself now. It was this epistle to which I always recurred, which haunted me through all my future correspondence; and now farewell to it.

That slip of "forgive," corrected into "forget," and the confession that the first rejection "haunted him through all his future correspondence," when he was professing his entire freedom from pique, shows how inexpressibly galled the proud man was from the outset. We fear that the poor woman's account of the miserable marriage was only too true. That she all along was attached to Byron, a student of humanity would equally surmise from some of these letters. This cold, mathematical damsel had refused half a dozen suitors, to fall in love with the one man she could have chosen most obviously alien to herself: she mathematical, he hating all exact thought; she conventionally virtuous, he a reckless man about town. Yet that she was in love with him we are clear. Here is a letter, very interesting for its confessions regarding Byron's own character, besides the inferences we draw from it with regard to Miss Milbanke's feelings. We wish its length would allow us to quote it entire:

You don't like my "restless" doctrines—I should be very sorry if you did; but I can't stagnate, nevertheless. . . . "Gay, but not content"—very true . . . you hav detected a laughter "false to the heart"—allowed—yet I have been tolerably sincere with you and I fear sometimes troublesome. To the charge of pride I suspect I must plead guilty, because when a boy, and a very young one, it was the constant reproach of schoolfellows and tutors. I now come to a subject of your inquiry which you must have perceived I always hitherto avoided—an awful one—Religion. I was bred in Scotland among Calvinists during the first part of my life, which gave me a dislike to that persuasion. Since that time I have visited the most bigoted and credulous of countries—Spain, Greece, Turkey. As a spectacle the Catholic is more fascinating than the Greek or the Moslem; but the last is the only believer who practises the precepts of his prophet to the last chapter of his creed. My opinions are quite undecided. I may say so sincerely, since, when given over at Patras in 1810, I rejected and ejected three priest-loads of spiritual consolation by threatening to turn Mussulman if they did not leave me quiet. I was in great pain, and looked upon death as in that respect a relief—without much regret for the past, and few speculations on the future. . . . I believe doubtless in God, and should be happy to be convinced of much more. . . . The moral of Christianity is perfectly beautiful—and the very sublime of virtue—yet even there we find some of its finer precepts in the earlier axioms of the Greeks.

From this it is clear that Miss Milbanke had been remonstrating upon his faults; and one knows what it means when a young woman begins to take an intimate concern in a man's moral improvement.

Ill Monarch of man's heart the maiden who Does not aspire to be High Pontiff too, says Coventry Patmore; and conversely, when a maiden plays the spiritual remonstrator with a male friend, criticises his character, it is a sign that (consciously or not) she aspires to be monarch of his heart. We fear that Miss Milbanke wedded Byron under the vulgar belief that a rake may be reformed by marriage, which has led many a girl to disaster. And Byron, as it seems to us, knowingly played on this weakness of the virtuous female blue-stocking. We cannot find any sincere passion in his letters to her. They are very clever, very skilfully adapted to the girl's character. But he seems often to be quietly mocking at his correspondent, as when he professes an unparticipating admiration for her mathematical abilities:

I know that two and two make four, and should be glad to prove it too, if I could—though, I must say, if by any sort of process I could convert 2 and 2 into 5 it would give me much greater pleasure.

That is quite in Byron's vein, who had an instinctive rebellion against law in every shape—a born anarchist. One letter has something like true feeling:

The truth is, that could I have foreseen that your life was to be linked to mine,—had I even possessed a distinct hope, however distant,—I would have been a different and better being. As it is, I have sometimes doubts, even if I should not disappoint the future nor act hereafter unworthily of you, whether the past ought not to make you still regret me—even that portion of it with which you are not unacquainted.

I did not believe such a woman existed—at least for me;—and I sometimes fear I ought to wish that she had not. . . .

My love, do forgive me if I have written in a spirit that renders you uncomfortable. I cannot embody my feelings in words. I have nothing to desire—nothing I would see altered in you—but so much in myself. I can conceive no misery equal to mine, if I failed in making you happy—and yet how can I hope to do justice to those merits from whose praises there is not a dissentient voice?

Decisive—does it not look? Yet his wife asserts that he told her on their wedding-day that he had married her out of revenge. It would be decisive with anybody save Byron. But we have such examples of the apparent passion with which he could write when circumstances prove him false, that it is unsafe to rely upon it. And his letters to Moore and other friends speak of Miss Milbanke in sufficiently cool language. In particular he sneers at the "universal paragon" business which in the above letter he makes matter of compliment to her. He is undecipherable, in this as in some other respects.

But the letters to Miss Milbanke are full of character. In one he tells her that "the great object of life is sensation—to feel that we exist, even though in pain." Could you have a maxim more Byronic? None the less so that it would equally suit a devil. Again, he declares for "the talents of action" as against the gifts of reflection:

I by no means rank poets or poetry high in the scale of intellect. . . . They say poets never or rarely go mad. . . . It is, however, to be remarked that they rarely do, but are generally so near it that I cannot help thinking rhyme is so far useful in anticipating or preventing the disorder.

Clearly Byron anticipated Max Nordau. For the rest, it is a natural opinion from one who was no true poet, and had no true relish or understanding for poetry. In another letter he alludes to his cold behaviour in Society, and declares: "Those who know me most intimately can tell you that I am, if anything, too childish, with a greater turn for the ridiculous than for anything serious—and, I could hope, not very ill-natured off the stage." Posterity has entirely confirmed the judgment that Byron's gift was for the ridiculous rather than the serious—in a way that he little dreamed when he wrote this passage. The expression "off the stage" is a curious testimony to the affectation of his manners in Society. On this point, everyone should read the exceedingly interesting extract from Stendhal which Mr. Prothero gives in an appendix. It is all the more pitiless an exposure of the man's littleness because it is written by an enthusiastic admirer. The appendices, indeed, are full of interesting matter, including the letters to Byron from Claire Clairmont, which shed a vivid light upon the ill-trained and undisciplined character of a woman celebrated by her connexion both with Byron and Shelley. They do something to excuse Byron by showing that she fairly flung herself at his head. And Byron, the more one reads of him, needs all the excuse he can get.

Science and Theology.

Darwinism and Lamarckism. By Frederick Wollaston Hutton, F.R.S., &c. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d. net.)

THESE lectures, most of which were originally delivered to New Zealand audiences, are really—as they claim to be—"popular expositions of the Darwinian doctrine." Mr. Hutton has an abundant right to be heard on the subject, for—his own biological researches apart—he was one of the first reviewers of The Origin of Species, and received in return a letter of thanks from the great author, which he prints with pardonable pride. Hence he was, as he says, in the thick of the fight which immediately sprang up round the book, and he is able to recall, with much judgment and discretion, the fierceness with which it was assailed as an attack (in spite of Darwin's own distinct assertion to the contrary) on revealed religion, the wholesale conversion of its opponents, and the spread of the doctrine it contained into the dominions of ethics and psychology. That it has been exposed to vicissitude is merely to say that it has shared the lot of all human ideas; but in the end it has triumphed all along the line, and no unprejudiced person can doubt that Mr. Hutton is right when he prophesies that Lord Salisbury's gibes at it in his Presidential Address at Oxford in 1894 will be the last attack made on it from the high places of science. The same thing may be said of the high places of religion, especially since the appearance of Drummond's Ascent of Man; and Mr. Hutton himself writes as a believer who by no means goes beyond his fellows when he pronounces Darwinism to be "intimately connected with our systems of theology, for it forms one of the foundations—perhaps the corner-stone—of Natural Religion." We shall see before we have done, however, that there are still religious writers who view it with distrust, and who, consciously or unconsciously, read into it aims and intentions which its author expressly disclaimed.

Now, the discovery of Darwin, which Mr. Hutton sets forth very well and clearly, was that species are formed by natural selection. To quote Mr. Hutton:

Putting now together the fact of variation and the fact of struggle for existence, he shows that generally those varieties which are best adapted to succeed in life will live the longest, and will leave most offspring, while the others will be killed off. The successful individuals will hand down their useful characters to their offspring, occasionally in a still more useful form; and thus useful variations will tend more and more to improve, and succeeding generations will diverge more and more from the original stock.

Yet he did not consider this advance as regular, or even universal. "Lowly forms would still survive to occupy their appropriate places in the scheme of nature, while some might even retrograde."

Such was Darwin's discovery, and although he afterwards elaborated it by the addition of Sexual Selection, his hypothesis (never proved) of Pangenesis, and the like, he never attempted to enlarge its scope. He never asserted that natural selection was the only factor in evolution. "I am convinced," he said, "that natural selection has been the main but not exclusive means of modification." Nor did he think he had made any guess at the ultimate cause of nature. "Natural selection," he said later, "has no relation whatever to the primary cause of any modification of structure." Later still, he even abandoned in part his views as to the mode of operation of natural selection, and thought it possible that in the regular course of nature more was done by the elimination of those who were unable to reach a certain standard of fitness than by the constant competition of those who have passed it. Yet he was not ignorant that his theory was capable of extension into other sciences than biology. "In the future," he says, in Origin of Species, "I see open fields for far more important researches. Psychology will be securely based on a new foundation—that of the necessary acquirement of each mental power and capacity by gradation." This work has been undertaken by Mr. Herbert Spencer, who seeks to show that man's mental qualities, as also his institutions, are subject to the same law of natural selection as his physical structure; by Bagehot, who applies the same theory to the lesser social questions which he calls politics; and by Mr. Sutherland, who thinks that the emotions have also been "naturally selected." But although it will be news to many, Mr. Hutton is probably right when he thinks that the greatest extension given to the Darwinian theory obtained its impulse from Lord Kelvin, whose discovery of the principle of the dissipation of energy, in 1852, gave proof that the solar system, and probably the whole stellar universe, instead of having been formed by one operation, came into being by a gradual process of development in some respects resembling the evolution of plants and animals. As he very truly says, the metaphysicians who would assert that the two processes are at once identical and to be explained by the hypothesis of the spontaneous generation of living matter, have not given, and cannot give, any proof of the truth of their speculations. Whether characteristics acquired after birth can ever be transmitted to descendants remains also still unproved, though the balance of evidence shows that in the majority of cases they are not. On all these points Mr. Hutton discourses with admirable clearness and brevity, as upon the theory of Lamarck and his followers that all evolutionary changes of structure are to be attributed to changes of environment. Although he does not agree with this theory in toto, he gives it due weight, and goes so far as to admit that "we know of nothing capable of imitating organic [the italics are ours] changes except the action of external forces upon protoplasm." Altogether a very readable and fair-minded book.

From Comte to Benjamin Kidd. By Robert Mackintosh, D.D., &c. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

DR. MACKINTOSH'S book, although not unreadable, is certainly not fair-minded. It is, indeed, written frankly from the point of view of a partisan, and of a partisan who, as we cannot help feeling, thinks he has got rather the worst of the positions. Starting from the purely gratuitous assumption that biology sets itself up as a guide for human conduct, he rushes through the works of Comte, Darwin, Spencer, Leslie Stephen, Bagehot, Alexander, Weissmann, Kidd, and others, and finds them all barren. Darwin's theory, he admits, "holds the field." Yet he is half convinced that it is "only a possible way of putting the process of evolution for purposes of study," while he has "very grave metaphysical objections to the terminology and conceptions with which Darwin went to work." He thinks, too, that natural selection "does not, cannot apply when reason is at work," by which he apparently means when man has evolved into a reasoning being; and that the "wise social philosopher will renounce as fraudulent and absurd the attempt to deduce ethics from schemes of physical or even of biological evolution." Finally, he comes to the conclusion that Christianity alone can ensure the fullest development of man's nature, or, to use his own words, that in this alone "we have the pledge of the human world, fulfilling its destiny"; and he draws a glowing picture of what will happen when it is more generally recognised that natural selection ceased when reason came into the world. Then, he says, "we shall see a return of men's minds to the rejected authorities. Religion, conscience, philosophy, even intuitionism, they will all come back 'trooping all together.' Probably they will all have contributions to make to the social philosophy of the future. Faith in freewill must also return; the ban of ostracism will be cancelled." These seem tremendous results to follow the acceptance of a corollary pretty generally conceded. But one is tempted to ask why they did not immediately follow the appearance of The Origin of Species, before wicked men had dared to apply the Darwinian theory to ethics.

The meaning of all this is, apparently, that Dr. Mackintosh is one of those people who are always looking out for what they call a "conflict between religion and science." The phrase is inept, for a conflict between religion and science is no more possible than a duel between two men who are safely locked up in separate rooms. Science, it can never be too often repeated, is exact knowledge based upon ascertained fact, while religion claims to be based upon intuitions or revelations which by the traditions of all religions do not lead to exact and definite knowledge. But round every religion, and especially round every religion which boasts a body of professional teachers, there grows up a body of doctrine rather obscuring than illustrating its main teaching, and of these side-beliefs science is often most destructive. Thus Galileo upset the theologically-taught theory of the rotation of the sun round the earth, Robertson Smith gave one of the first blows to the verbal inspiration of Scripture, and Darwin has put to sleep the limitless freewill of man which Dr. Mackintosh wants to bring back. Every innovation of the kind produces a tremendous outcry from the theologians who are called by it to revise their system, and has often entailed awkward consequences upon the innovator. But the seeker after truth will not be disconcerted thereby, for he knows the outcome of such commotions. "Give a theory time," said Carlyle; "if it can succeed it is a right theory." And in ideas, as in other matters, the fittest may be trusted to survive.

A Bismarck of the South.

Francesco Crispi. By W. J. Stillman. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d.)

NEEDLESS to say, Mr. Stillman's biography is partisan. Apologia pro Vita Crispi it might have been called, without the least exaggeration of its contents. Unpartisan biography is rare, perhaps unknown, when it is of the dead; of the living, it is impossible. Mr. Stillman, to do him justice, is quite frank as to his purpose. He has been Roman correspondent of the Times, had more favoured relations with Crispi than his newspaper fellows, was a fervid sympathiser with the revolutionary movements in which Crispi played a leading part, and naturally a fervid admirer of Crispi himself. His admiration was naturally not decreased by the brusque minister's favour towards himself, though he denies the intimacy with him which has been generally believed to exist. Under such circumstances, we can hardly form a safe estimate of Crispi from Mr. Stillman, unless we had heard the other side. Yet from his pages we can get something like a glimpse of the other side. In the very thorough-goingness of his partisanship there is something of the enfant terrible about him; and an uncompromising adversary of Mazzini and Crispi might thank Mr. Stillman for some of the admissions in this book. For the rest, his biography is not ambitious, makes no pretensions to thoroughness; but it is useful in its degree, and as a presentment of the "case" for the ex-Minister. We wish we could add that it was well-written. Mr. Stillman's English is not good. Sentences with no construction at all are distressingly frequent; while for grammar—Priscian is not merely "a little scratched" (as Shakespeare has it), he is scarified!

FRANCESCO CRISPI.

A remarkable career, and a sufficiently marked personality, is that of this quasi-Bismarck of the South. His portrait is, in a degree, reminiscent of the German minister, with its heavy moustache, strong jaw, the mastiffwrinkles about eye and mouth, and the bushy brows. It lacks the capacity of front, the build of forehead. And so with character; the man is a vulgared Bismarck: as overbearing, as energetic, with less insight, craft, and mental grasp. In scrupulousness (despite the biographer) we think them much a pair. Neither were choice about the means to an end. But the men's careers were as different as their aims. Crispi ended, like Bismarck, as minister of a king; but he began as a revolutionist, and he was revolutionist all through. He accepted the monarchy to unite Italy; but his heart was as much anti-monarchic in Parliament as when he marched into Palermo with the famous Thousand of Garibaldi. The King loved him not; and (pace Mr. Stillman) the King had reason. Indispensable he might be—the most capable minister in Italy; but his politics did not make for the continuance of the monarchy. He headed the section which ran the Riforma paper; and their aims included the transformation of the army into a national militia, together with financial and other projects, which distinctly tended to pave the way for a republic, and deprive the monarchy of the power of repression, without which no monarchy can exist. Carried out, they would have made the Italian vastly more helpless than the French Government. He had openly threatened the King with deposition if he refused to carry out reforms in his Roman capital as he had done in Turin; and a politician must be responsible for his words. The King might well think that out of the abundance of the heart the mouth had spoken. True, he disclaimed in Parliament the abolition of a standing army; but only as impracticable in the state of Europe: he did not disavow it as an ideal. Republican by conviction, monarchic by opportunism, no king could love such a supporter, or feel his support very reliable if a wind blew strong from the quarter of revolution.

Yet it was his opportunist destiny to suppress, and be called in to suppress, the most dangerous movement which has threatened the monarchy—the revolt in his native Sicily, where he had of old been arch-fermenter of revolt. Upon this ex-plotter the King had to lean, and leaned safely. Traitor Crispi was called by his old associates, yet gained no love or gratitude from Umberto. To think black and act white is not, if you come to think of it, the way to any man's confidence, whatsoever excellent motives you may assign for it. And this is a main reason why Crispi has failed where Bismarck succeeded.

If he had kept to his early party it would, at any rate, have kept to him. He was then the friend of Mazzini, the lieutenant of Garibaldi; he was cradled in plots, a plotter from the beginning, and no scrupulous one. How should any associate of Young Italy be over scrupulous? However you may sympathise with its aims, some of its ways are not just now popular in England, where we have had sore experience of them. Mr. Stillman, with his candid frankness, repudiates the denials of Mazzini's friends, and declares regicide to have been one of his instruments. Like the leaders of the Clan-na-Gael or the Invincibles, he did not go forth a-king-slaying himself, but deputed others to risk their necks and dip their steel in assassination. The principle is the same in all cases. If you admire an Italian assassin, you can make no objection should a Boer, who believes himself called upon to be the saviour of his country (as Mr. Stillman has it), "execute" Mr. Chamberlain "on his private responsibility." Crispi, as he journeyed through Sicily during those conspiratorial days, imparted beneficent instruction whereso he passed in the manufacture of explosive bombs, to be of use in the next revolution. He employed, plainly, the methods of the dynamiter; and whether the aim be a Czar, a petty Italian despotism, or a Tower of London, the means, we repeat, like us not. From an Irishman's standpoint, he has as much right to use them against an English Government as an Italian patriot against a Neapolitan Government. You may approve them. We know a benevolent and sweet-natured lady who would go on her knees to kiss the hand of a king slayer; but if you dislike assassination and bomb-throwing, your condemnation must go all round. We like them not; and our respect for Bismarck would be badly tried had he been guilty of such little youthful indiscretions in the propagation of scientific bomb flinging. It does not materially enhance our admiration for Crispi.

He gave up revolution and the profession of instruction in bombs with the liberation of Sicily, and rallied to the support of the new Italian monarchy and constitutional opposition. He became the leader of the Left in the Italian Parliament. But in this, as in his ministerial career, he was on the whole a failure. Partly for the reasons already set forth, partly through his personal character. He was as masterful as Bismarck, in a Chamber not used to mastery; he was for the strict party-discipline of English politics, among Deputies like unruly school-boys; he had not the art to win love, and he had the devil of a temper. That spoiled him, first and last. Bismarck, too, had a temper; but he leaned on an Imperial master. Crispi was in opposition to the Court, and must lean on his followers or on nothing. He was violent and unprincipled in his political course; he assailed every measure of his enemies with unmeasured abuse, because it was the measure of his enemies. It was not sufficient amends for this that his own principles were consistent. Yet he had many qualities of a party-leader. He knew men, especially Italian politicians; and had formed of them the cynical estimate they deserved. Bismarck found Crispi easy to get on with, because he had such a low estimate of human action. In his last administration, taught by experience, he smoothed over his fierce temper—to the surprise of everyone; and then he showed forth his real capacities, manipulating the corrupt and selfish Italian Chamber with remarkable dexterity, and passing his measures one by one in face of a hostile assembly, after a fashion which could not have been bettered by Disraeli. He fell through the disaster sustained by the Italian army at the hands of Menelek. It was no fault of his. He suspected the rash designs of General Baratieri, he wished to remove him; but Baratieri was protected by the Court party, eager to damage Crispi. At the last moment Baldissera was actually sent out to replace Baratieri, who was suffering severely from "swelled head." But, in spite of all precautions, someone conveyed to the superseded General at the front the news of his supersession; and he was thereby (it must be feared) impelled to make the mad attempt which brought on defeat—the very attempt which Crispi dreaded, and was striving to prevent. After that, all was over for Crispi.

Of his private life, bitterly assailed, Mr. Stillman attempts defence. He seems (so far as one can judge from a necessarily ex parte statement) to clear him from the charge of financial malpractice. It would appear that his faults were confined to imprudent trust of others, and blindness to the malpractices of his wife and friends. It is otherwise with regard to the famous divorce scandal, which so shook his career. On the most favourable statement it comes to this. In early days, imprisoned at Turin, he entered on an intrigue with the daughter of the prison laundress. She followed him in his flight to Malta after his release; and there he married the girl he had seduced. When he became successful, and fairly well-to-do by his legal practice after the establishment of the Italian kingdom, his wife took to vulgar ostentation and drink. Thereupon a comrade showed him a way of getting rid of her. The comrade was prepared to swear that the Maltese marriage was illegal. Unknown to Crispi (according to this gentleman's account), the solemniser of the nuptials was a wandering Jesuit, without licence to perform marriage in Malta, and his certificate was signed with a forged name. So Crispi put away the woman.

One thing stands out prominently from this book, and that is the rottenness of Italian politics. Any chamber can be tricked into voting contrary to its convictions by raising a cross-issue, and snatching a vote under the temporary influence of emotion. In this way Ministers with a majority at their back can be and are daily overthrown. A hopeful state of things for Italy! This, at least, can be said of the questionable Crispi, that he was a man who knew his own mind in a fluctuant mass of intrigues; that he was a man of power, purpose, and ability, among a chamber of mediocrities. A Freethinker, he yet refused to join the celebration in honour of Giordano Bruno, because "he was not an atheist." A republican, he was practical enough to prefer national unity to a political theory. A questionable man, upon whom the last word has yet to be said, but visibly a man. And modern Italy lacks men.

A Lady of Quality.

Lady Louisa Stuart: Selections from Her MSS. Edited by Hon. James A. Home. (Edinburgh: David Douglas. 7s. 6d.)

LADY LOUISA STUART, the youngest of a large family, in 1757 began a life which did not close till the middle of the present century. She never married, but we are assured she had the gift of friendship. Although she began to write when very young, she had a strong prejudice against appearing in print, natural in a day when it was considered infra dig. for a lady of quality to be an advertised author; and the only composition by her that had seen the light before the appearance of the present volume is the chapter of "Introductory Anecdotes" contained in the Life of her grandmother, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. It may be said at once that the selections from her writings which we owe to Mr. Home whet our appetite for a volume of her letters still to come. She joined to a marked ability for narrative that talent for digression which is the soul of the essayist. With a satirical eye she noted the foibles of humanity, and was never tired of observing how impostors may lead the world by the nose. She had, we may believe, no patience with the incomprehensible (unless it were in her religion), and one trembles to think what she would have said of modern symbolism. Providence gave her, however, two much more suitable subjects for her study—the Duchess of Argyll (Jane Warburton that was) and Lady Mary Coke, her youngest daughter. The duchess affords as remarkable an instance as one can cite of a woman's "nameless charm." She came "raw from Cheshire" to be "Maide of Honer" (as her mother spells it) to Queen Anne. The following anecdote exhibits the state of her culture:

The removals of the court (while there was a court) from palace to palace were superintended by a state officer called the Harbinger. As the ladies consulted together about their packages, on a rumour of the Queen's going suddenly to Windsor: "Well, for my part," said Jenny, "I sha'n't trouble myself—must not the scavenger take care of us maids of honour?"

"Jenny" deserves our sympathy under the circumstances in which she made the acquaintance of the Duke of Argyll. "Trained under King William, who gave him a Dutch regiment before he was seventeen," he had acquired a "military reputation inferior to Marlborough's alone." Young and exceedingly handsome as he was, it led to much tittering when Jenny toasted him at the dinner given by the Duke of Shrewsbury to the Maids of Honour on Queen Anne's birthday. She cried, and the incident came before the hero's notice, who forthwith sought her out. Hating, as he did, his legal wife, from whom he was separated, the Duke of Argyll fell passionately in love with Jenny, and was certain he had discovered a paragon when she refused to become his mistress at any price. At last his wife died, and he wished to be reunited immediately, but Jenny obliged him to wait till a decent term had expired. They married in 1717, and she never lost her power over him till he died, although she once bitterly disappointed him. According to Lady Louisa she was not beautiful, she had no mental endowments, and she made his home a nest of toad-eaters and chatterboxes. It was impossible to enjoy his great gifts of conversation there.

Either his Jane came up and took the words out of his mouth without ceremony, or else the clack of her tea-table arose, and some tale of scandal, or history of a game at quadrille, or dissertation about buying dishcloths drowned his harmonious voice.

Lady Louisa speaks of his "infatuation," which long after his marriage "did literally equal what philtres and sorcery were believed to produce of old," and tells us how he carried about with him a beautiful miniature of a lady whom he described as "my Jane," but who bore no resemblance to her. No, he was not a humorist, as the anecdote might imply, he was abjectly in love with his English Dulcinea. What was her charm? Perhaps it was in her touch, a magnetism wholesome and sustaining, which many very foolish women exercise unwittingly. Perhaps also because she had so little love to give that he was never satiated.

Lady Mary Coke married a rake, and sued him for cruel usage. One can hear her answering the lawyers: "Never was any human creature treated as I have been." "That we do not doubt, madam; but the law requires of you a proof. . . . Will you please to enter into particulars?" "It is enough to say that in every respect my usage was most barbarous." "Cannot your ladyship state some one act on some one day?" "O! a thousand acts every day." The poor lady had indeed once been struck, and once, dreadful to relate, Lord Coke had called her an "affected b—" for reading Locke upon the Human Understanding. None the less her case fell to the ground completely.

Chaste as marble was Lady Mary, and vain to the verge of imbecility. She had convinced herself that that ruffianly wag, Edward, Duke of York, was in love with her, and when he died it was unwise to mention Westminster Abbey in her presence. "Child!" she cried once to a youthful offender, "what do you mean? Have you a mind to make me faint away? Did I not forbid you to say anything about the Abbey?" She had travelled a good bit, and had annoyed the Empress Marie Thérèse, from whom she had received gracious treatment, by some indiscretion. The Empress's consequent coldness was actually construed into a feud by the imaginative Lady Mary. Once, in England, she bid at an auction for a chest of drawers. For a prank, as it would seem, a "swarthy, shabby-looking fellow" raised the sum to a "ridiculous height." "The matter being so trifling," quoth Lady Mary, in retailing her adventure, "I protest it had not occurred to me before, but nothing escapes the vigilance of THAT PERSON." "That person" was Marie Thérèse.

The book contains some hitherto unpublished letters of Sir Walter Scott. He had confided to Lady Louisa the secret of his authorship. In 1827 Lord Meadowbank, Sir Walter not objecting, identified him with the Waverley Novels in a speech made in a drawing-room. Whereupon Sir Walter made good the avowal. "My secret," he writes cheerily, "was just in the case of Jack Meggot's monkey, which died just when Jack got completely tired of him. Besides, I was sorry for telling lies which were not believed. A lawyer, like Fag in the Rivals, never cares for telling a lie either to serve himself or his client, but it goes against one's conscience to be found out." There is a pathetic postscript to one of the letters, all of which date shortly after the heavy loss involved by Constable's failure. "You will have difficulty, I fear, in reading this, but my eyes are failing me fast. I cannot charge them with idleness."

Here we must take leave of Mr. Home's fascinating volume. In it the most high born personages may be met on a simple footing, and there is something very enviable in being on such familiar terms with them at so little expense to ourselves. Of Lady Louisa's original compositions in verse—echoes of Pope—little need be said. Here, however, is an enchanting couplet:

But if she smiled, tee-hees awoke
Prophetic of her unborn joke.

This, too, is a great line, sublimely humorous. It refers to the king who was fooled into believing he wore a beautiful mantle when he really had next to nothing on:

In unbeseeing garb succinctly clad.

The Telegraph in the Library.

Essays in Librarianship and Bibliography. By Richard Garnett, C.B., LL.D. (George Allen. 6s.)

It was meet, as well as in accordance with precedent, that the late distinguished Keeper of the Printed Books in the British Museum should himself contribute a volume to that "Library Series" of which he is the editor. He has fulfilled the obligation by bringing together a couple of dozen scattered papers which made their first appearances in magazines and newspapers, or were prepared as essays in practical bibliography for communication to the Library Association and kindred societies. Despite the drawbacks of repetition, which are inevitable from this process of collecting scattered contributions to the literature of one great subject, the volume is not only full of entertainment for the general reader, but contains much handy matter such as the bookman needs often to consult. There is, for instance, an exhaustive account of the printing of the British Museum Catalogue—that crowning achievement of Dr. Garnett's career in Great Russell-street—as well as of the introduction of the sliding press. The one has provided catalogue space for three centuries to come—the calculation is based upon the perhaps too sanguine hope that the printing presses of the world will never be more productive than they are at present—while the other has removed all anxiety about the storage of books for a generation or two.

But although Dr. Garnett is now enjoying his well-earned rest from the active labours of the librarian, his heart, it is clear, is still in Bloomsbury, and he writes a preface to emphasise some of the points he has urged in the collected articles. He satisfied himself long ago that the usefulness of the British Museum Reading-room will never be complete until telegraphy is brought in to the aid of reader, librarian, and attendant. The idea of sitting down at your padded desk and telegraphing for the book you want is a little startling at first; but Dr. Garnett shows that it would be exceedingly simple and practical, and a saving of time and temper to those concerned. The suggestion is that an electrical transmitter connected with a printing telegraph instrument should be fixed upon every desk. The reader would thus "wire" the usual details of the book required, and they would be simultaneously ticked out inside the library. It is quite an idyllic picture which Dr. Garnett calls up of the scene in the Reading-room when the "ticker" is installed: "No more troops of boy attendants, with the inevitable noise and bustle; nothing but the messenger speeding on his silent errand, and the quiet delivery of books at the desks: an unparalleled scene of perfect physical repose in the midst of intense mental activity." We are disappointed to find that, with all his ingenuity, Dr. Garnett is not prepared with any scheme for the circumvention of the infamous and distressing Museum headache—one of the least preventible ills inflicted upon literary flesh and blood. Stale and stagnant in mild weather, muggy and outrageously over-heated in winter, the atmosphere of the famous rotunda is endurable with difficulty even by the regular reader, while to the occasional visitor it means prostration.

It must not be supposed, however, that the whole of the book is devoted to the institution which is necessarily uppermost in the author's mind. The other essays present plenty of variety, and range from a learned discourse upon the bibliography of Argentina and Paraguay (exactly the subject in which the Spanish-book loving Robert Southey would have revelled) to a casual reference to the date of the introduction of blotting-paper. The charming article upon "Some Book-hunters of the Seventeenth Century" is as pleasantly anecdotal as any "general reader" can desire. There is, in especial, a modern story of a lady who beat down a second-hand bookseller from two shillings to eighteenpence for a copy of the first edition of George Meredith's Poems, worth commercially ten or twelve guineas. The lady knew its value, and the bookseller did not (this aboriginal simplicity is as scarce as the particular book), and Dr. Garnett is not quite sure whether he most admires or execrates her. It is clear, at all events, that she has in her the makings of a very knowing second-hand bookseller.

"Dress in Red, and Don't Talk."

Cosimo de' Medici. By K. Dorothea Ewart. "Foreign Statesmen" Series. (Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d.)

THIS is a good contribution to the "Foreign Statesmen" series; good not only for the care and lucidity with which the web of Cosimo de' Medici's foreign and domestic policy has been unravelled, but also for the pains bestowed upon delineating the portrait of the man. Cosimo was the founder of what may be called the Medicean dynasty at Florence, but he was not the first of the Medici. His father, Giovanni, had set on foot before him what became the traditional family policy of championing the popular party of Florence against the narrow rule of the merchant oligarchy. This way rose the Pisistratidæ to tyranny at Athens; this way the Medici. After Giovanni's death, Cosimo was attacked by a rival, Rinaldo degli Albizzi, and banished; but he returned, and set himself to the difficult task of becoming master of the city. He succeeded, through his unparalleled genius for intrigue, of holding every thread in his hands without troubling his head about the semblance of power. Luca Pitti built a vast palace beyond the Arno, and Luca Pitti fell. Cosimo, more wise, waved aside the tempting design of Brunelleschi, and built himself a modest town house in the Via Larga. He let Brunelleschi build the magnificent church of San Lorenzo, and there he lies beneath a plain slab of porphyry, with the high inscription, Cosmus Pater Patriæ. His own taste was not for splendour. He provided Trionfi for the delight of a pageant-loving folk; but he did not care himself to watch the actors and buffoons. He wore the plain red cloak of a citizen. "Dress in red, and don't talk" was his advice to the ambitious politician; and Philippe de Commines notes it as a secret of his rule that "his authority was soft and amiable, and such as is necessary for a free town." The outward aspect of Florence owes him much. Besides San Lorenzo, he built San Marco, where they show you a cell that was his own retreat. And the palazzo in the Via Larga, modest in design as it was, was glorified with the finest decoration of the age of great decorators. Luca della Robbia designed his summer-house, Ghiberti his reliquary; Donatello made medallions for the courtyard. Nor is there anything more exquisite than the dark little chapel with its four walls one continued fresco of rich fancy and jewelled colour by Benozzo Gozzoli:

It represents the journey of the Magi. All round the walls ride in an unbroken cavalcade the kings and their attendants, a gay and motley crowd, like the throng of a mediæval pilgrimage, arrayed in the brightest and most fanciful of Renaissance costume, with hawks and hounds and finely caparisoned horses, yet with something of seriousness in their faces, as if in tribute to the sacred spot in which they find themselves. . . . Cosimo rides in the procession, a soberly attired, unassuming old man, but without the look of foxey cunning which his best known portrait gives him: the lad Lorenzo, crowned with roses, sits jauntily upon his white horse.

For the painters Cosimo's patronage was Catholic. Paolo Uccello and Andrea del Castagno, the realists and lovers of perspective, shared it with the saintly primitive Fra Angelico. The vagrant Filippo Lippi, escaped from his cloister, he housed in his own palace, and said: "One must treat these people of extraordinary genius as if they were celestial spirits, and not like beasts of burden." Cosimo was a great book-collector, too, and many of his treasures have found their way to the Laurentian. He took a singular interest in Platonic or Neo-Platonic philosophy, and with more of mysticism than you would suspect in the keen diplomatist and man of business founded an "Academy" at his villa of Careggi, and had the boy Marsiglio Ficino educated for the express purpose of devoting his life to a great translation of the master. "I owe to Plato much, to Cosimo no less," says Ficino; "he realised for me the virtues of which Plato gave me the conception." Let this, as well as the inscription in San Lorenzo, be his epitaph.

Other New Books.

THE HUMAN BOY.

By EDEN PHILLPOTTS.

THIS volume contains eleven sketches of schoolboy life at Merivale School, and is supposed to be written by one or other of the boys themselves. The plots are simple enough: the boys entrench themselves in one of the dormitories as a protest against being taught by a bounder; or fall in love with the headmaster's daughters; or smoke and are overtaken by the usual Nemesis. But the sketches are funny enough, and we must confess to having laughed a good deal over Freckles, Nubbs, Bradwell, and the rest of them. On the whole, perhaps, "Freckles and Frenchy" has amused us most. Freckles came to Merivale from Australia, cram full of legends of bushrangers. He bush-ranged in the woods about the school, had a belt lined with "human skin, said to be flayed off a chap by cannibals somewhere," a bowie knife, a spirit lamp, a collapsible tin pot, and a bag of tea. "He said tea was the very life of men in the bush." "Nubby" proceeds thus with his description of Freckles:

Lastly, Freckles had a flat lead mask, with holes for the eyes and mouth, which he always fitted on when trespassing. He said it was copied from the helmet Ned Kelly, the King of the Bushrangers, used to wear; but it was not bullet-proof, but only used for a disguise. We were in the same dormitory, and one night, when all the chaps had gone to sleep, he dressed up in these things and stood where some moonlight came in, and certainly looked jolly. Once, as an awful favour—me being smaller than him, and not fast enough to run away from a man—he let me come and see what he did when bushranging on a half-holiday in winter. "I sha'n't run my usual frightful risks with you," he said, "because I might have to open fire to save you, and that would be very disagreeable to me; but we'll trespass a bit, and I'll shoot a few things, if I can. I don't shoot much—only for food."

"Freckles" finally tries to "stick up" the French master who had called him an "aborigine," and the result was disastrous to Freckles.

The sketch, as we have intimated, is funny; but even while we laughed we were conscious of something wrong, as though we were being cheated of our laughter. Mr. Phillpotts knows exactly what schoolboys do, and can lay bare their inmost thoughts; likewise he shows an all-pervading sense of humour which will delight the un-reflecting reader. The reflecting reader, however, remembers that it is not Mr. Phillpotts but a schoolboy who is telling the story, and he knows that a schoolboy is not given to self-analysis, and has no sense of humour at all. The schoolboy is the most serious of beings; he does grotesque things, but does not realise their absurdity. The boy who swears secrecy on crossed knives is amusing, but is quite unconscious that he is amusing. Now and then Mr. Phillpotts really tries to pretend that the lower school boy is writing and puts us off with "innosent" and "strateji." But we are not deceived for a moment, knowing that if the spelling is the spelling of "Nubby" the mind is the mind of Mr. Phillpotts.

The author of Lying Prophets and Children of the Mist cannot be permitted to amuse us under false pretences. And though we do not doubt that many people will laugh at The Human Boy we must point out that it would have been a greater artistic success if the author had changed his personal pronouns. (Methuen & Co. 6s.)

THE STORY OF ECLIPSES. BY GEORGE F. CHAMBERS.

The eclipse of the sun which will take place on May 28 of next year will be visible in its totality no farther away from England than Spain and Portugal. In the United States it will be visible over a very large tract of country. It is partly in view of the fact that so many Anglo-Saxons will be able to see this eclipse that Mr. Chambers has produced this little book, which takes its place in the "Library of Useful Stories." Mr. Chambers appends to his lucid account of eclipses much useful information concerning hotels, steamers, and trains for tourists and astronomers who intend to go to the Peninsula. In a chapter on the literary use of eclipses by poets and writers, Mr. Chambers confesses his inability to find any historic basis for Gloucester's allusion in "King Lear": "These late eclipses in the Sun and Moon portend no good to us." In "Othello" the Moor exclaims:

O, insupportable! O heavy, hour!
Methinks it should be now a huge eclipse
Of Sun and Moon, and that the affrighted globe
Should yawn at alteration.

Milton, of course, has several allusions to eclipses:

It was that fatal and perfidious bark
Built in th' eclipse, and rigg'd with curses dark
That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.

But his finest passage of the kind is the one in which he compares Satan to the Sun in eclipse:

As when the Sun new-risen
Looks through the horizontal misty air
Shorn of his beams, or, from behind the Moon
In dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds
On half the nations, and with fear of change
Perplexes Monarchs.

The book admirably fulfils its purpose, which is to expound the phenomena of eclipses to general readers. (Newnes, Ltd. 1s.)

KING ROBERT THE BRUCE. BY A. F. MURISON.

Prof. Murison has already written a monograph of Sir William Wallace for the "Famous Scots" series. The life of Bruce for the same series has very properly been committed to the same hands. For both stories Prof. Murison has gone to the primary authorities. In considering Bruce Prof. Murison has taken his own line on several controverted points, though space has precluded anything like formal argument. And it begets confidence in the reader to find the author deprecating "the exaggerated pedestal of Patriotism reared for Bruce by the indiscriminating, if not time-serving, eulogies of Barbour and Fordun." The deductions made, "the figure of the Hero remains colossal." In thirteen short and very readable chapters Prof. Murison shows why. (Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier. 1s. 6d.)

SOME ASPECTS OF PRIMITIVE CHURCH LIFE.

BY WILLIAM BRIGHT, D.D.

Canon Bright's book is very different in tone to the foregoing. It is, in fact, a reprint of addresses delivered to "a summer meeting of the clergy"—who must, at any rate, be supposed to know their Church history—and the writer does not, therefore, feel himself called upon to be as popular, while the nature of his audience doubtless prevented him from being as impartial, as Dr. Waterman. For the rest, it covers nearly the same period, and perhaps comes from the same school of thought as the American work. A great part both of the text and of the notes in the earlier chapters are occupied with the exposure of what the author considers the errors of Lightfoot and Hort; but the author gives rather greater prominence to the position of the laity in the Primitive Church than has been assigned to it in certain quarters. Thus, he quotes with approval St. Cyprian's dictum, that the bishop should "do nothing without the presbytery and the concurrence of the people," although he is careful to remind his hearers that the layman of that day was in a much fuller sense a member of the Church, and much better informed on Church questions, than the person who often nowadays calls himself "a lay member of the National Church," because he belongs to none other. For the rest, it goes without saying that the book is well and carefully written, and should be of use in the controversy as to the internal government of the Anglican Church which some think is coming upon us. (Longmans.)

SOME NEW EDITIONS.

The late Sir James Fitzjames Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence (Macmillan) has reached its fifth edition in its twenty-fifth year. The editors, Sir Herbert and Mr. Harry Lushington Stephen, have followed the original edition closely, but they have had to deal with several new Acts of importance—particularly the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, and the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898. For lay readers who do not know this work we may mention that it is no bulky tome, and that its interest may well be appreciated by the unlearned in the law who like to follow law cases.—Another new edition, which is more than a reprint, is the third edition of Sir H. Thompson's Modern Cremation. The latest information about Cremation, and the most matured arguments in its favour, will be found in this volume, which forms a cheap and handy manual on the whole subject.—For the Alpine season Mr. Murray has issued new editions, at three shillings each, of Mr. Whympers's Guides to Zermatt and Chamounix and the Range of Mont Blanc.—In every part of the year boys become ripe for a trade or profession. Hence a new and augmented edition of Messrs. Pechell and Nolan's Professions for Boys. Dr. Welldon's preface to the first edition is reprinted, and we are told that twenty-two new professions have been dealt with, and that the information given throughout has been revised and completed. Here the anxious father may compare the claims of Accountancy and the Bengal Pilot Service, of Art and Tea-planting, as careers for his sons.—Mr. Baring-Gould has prepared a new and revised edition of The Vicar of Morwenstow, under which title we have the biography of Robert Stephen Hawker, the Cornish poet, whose collected works are now exciting so much interest. The extent and nature of the revision are not stated, but we draw attention to the speaking portrait of the poet-parson which forms the frontispiece.—The "Temple Classics" series is as "one that travelleth." Its most interesting recent addition, to our mind, is Thoughts of Divines and Philosophers, selected by Mr. Basil Montagu. Here the sentences of Jeremy Taylor, Dr. South, Dr. Barrow, and Sir Thomas Browne make harmonious thunder.

Fiction.

The Heart of Toil. By Octave Thanet.
(Downey & Co., Ltd. 6s.)

THIS volume of short stories reaches excellence. The tales are so workmanlike, so shapely, so unaffected, so pleasing, that it is not easy to find faults in them. They represent the very best literary art of the American magazines—an art which is at once “popular” and dignified. One can imagine that they are looked forward to month by month, and appreciated as something indigenous, distinctively American. Yet in some mysterious way they fail in the effectiveness which would seem to be the due reward of their merit. They arouse emotions which are only tepid. They leave the reader almost indifferent—and surprised, so obvious is the skill, that he is almost indifferent. Without doubt they are sentimental, and that is against them. But Kipling is sentimental, rankly sentimental sometimes, and many another strong hand. It is not their sentimentality which weakens them. It must be—we arrive at the result by a process of exclusion—a certain restriction of outlook, an always-present inability to see largely. So much for our dispraise, which we admit is neither precise nor satisfactory.

“Octave Thanet” takes her scenes from the life of the American working-man of the upper grade—the working-man who gets good wages, strikes for better, forms himself into leagues of which each member is a “knight,” and goes about, metaphorically, flying the Whitmanesque flag:

“I exist as I am, that is enough.”

The theatre of her drama is not New York, but a comparatively small manufacturing town on the banks of the Mississippi (a Mississippi strangely different from Mark Twain's). The first story in the book, “The Non-Combatant,” is the best. Here the workmen have been on strike for weeks, and the non-combatant is one Race Battles, a small grocer who, out of the goodness of his heart, has risked his friendship with the big wholesale men by giving credit to the strikers. The pathos and insecurity of Battles' position, his admirable courage, his kindness, and his undying pluck are really very well rendered. Mr. Battles has a wife and daughter, both delightfully drawn.

“Will it cheer him up, do you really think, ma?” said she.

“Stella Battles! Don't you know no more of your pa than not to know he'll be tickled to death? There ain't a father in town wouldn't be! I should say!”

Stella placed the bread and the tiny mite of butter—meals did not have their former generous look at the grocer's now. She looked at the table-cloth and spoke in a soft rush, like one who fears the failing of her own courage midway: “Ma, I know he would be pleased, usually; but—he seems so changed and worried all the time now, and—there would be the expense of the graduating dress, the gloves, and ribbons and those things—”

“Don't you fret, lambie,” returned the mother tenderly, as the girl's voice quivered and sank; “if pa can't raise the money for your graduating muslin, your ma can! And you know pa sets the world and all by your learning. But he's so beset and worried now, he don't know which way to turn. But you see how it is, Stella, it's seven weeks now since the boys struck, and the bills are going on and on; and there don't seem no more chance now than there was the first week—not so much, even—that the strike will be settled: and however will the bills get paid? It makes the creeps come up my back when I think of it; I don't wonder there's gray hairs in Race's head, nor that he groans in his sleep. I don't see how pa'd live through it to fail! He said that when he mortgaged the house last week, and I cried when I signed. But he's got the money to pay Wells. He's the worst, that man!”

Mr. Battles ultimately emerges safe from his troubles.

To witness the ruin of such a man would have been intolerable. Nevertheless, “Octave Thanet” might well have spared our sensibilities at a slightly less expense of crude “happiness” at the conclusion. In this, as in all the other stories, the various types of working man are sketched with skill and understanding. Dick Leroy, the “straight” labour leader, who appears in most of the tales, is a charming character, and he would be even more charming were he less perfect.

Giles Ingilby. By W. E. Norris. With 8 Illustrations by Percy F. S. Spence. (Methuen. 6s.)

A POET, with or without knickerbockers and curls, is an interesting creature. The process by which the feeling of poetry is articulated might form the subject of a most valuable inquiry. But although Giles Ingilby is a poet, he does not, unfortunately, find in Mr. Norris an exponent of his temperament. There is just one luminous touch: “He composed the words of the chant to which his feet kept time in a sort of spontaneous nonsense chant, drawn from him by the scenery and the weather, yet with here and there a couplet in it, or a suggestion of one, not unworthy of subsequent remembrance and use.” Apart from that and the conversation of the poet's father, who is an editor, the book is a veritable valentine. All the more, therefore, is it a typical Mudie novel and all the less an important one. In the facility with which Giles is emancipated from the thralldom of trade he pairs with the hero of Young Lives. But the samples of the Muse which Mr. Le Gallienne generously afforded are darkly withheld by Mr. Norris. This is a pity, as Giles seems to have been a kind of Kipling, without the versatility. But the reader is to have his mind agitated, not his ears tickled. The poet staggers against a bar-sinister. How will he reach the heroine across that barrier? He dare not; he flies. It really seems rather late in our tolerant century to ring the curtain up on this situation, and the genial author seems to think that perhaps it is nothing very dreadful after all. For one dazzling moment the heroine is allowed to let every consideration vanish before the fact that she loves her Giles. And really, since she was able to vault the bar, why not let it remain as a monument to her agility? But Mr. Norris, clever man that he is, knows that, in society, to be nice is far more important than to be nimble, and he thoughtfully removes the obstacle. It is quite simple. A man with a living wife contracts in good faith a marriage with a woman with a living husband. So he didn't commit bigamy, and she did. The reader may be assured that she is an unpleasant person, and that her bigamy is not of the slightest consequence. Whereas he—well, at any rate, he is a witty man, for he is as grateful for his son's forgiveness “as a man can be who has just received a shovelful of fiery coals upon the top of his head.” The novel is admirably written in a style that mingles the gentlemanly cynicism of middle life with a sunny appreciation of the charm of youth. The poet's mother is extremely well-drawn. She is consistent all through in her affection and her prejudice. The tea merchant, too, is a life-like, intelligent Briton—a very just rendering of a business man. One or two of the illustrations—notably the frontispiece and that facing p. 129—deserve praise for their animation and the skill they evince in perspective.

The Custom of the Country. By Mrs. Hugh Fraser.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

It was inevitable that Mrs. Hugh Fraser, having made some reputation with A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan, should forthwith collect some short stories and republish them as a book; but it is a little unfair, since there is no outward indication that the volume is made up of five tales, and that "The Custom of the Country" is the title of only one of them, and that not the first; it is also rather a pity. Mrs. Fraser, as she has shown us in her earlier work, knows Japan well, sympathises with its people, and is (we use the phrase in a complimentary sense) an agreeable rattle. But these qualities, though they suffice for a couple of volumes of observant gossip, are not enough for the building of one good short story. Mrs. Fraser, to tell the truth, does not play the game. She breaks the rules with an insouciance which almost disarms criticism. We will take an example from the title-story. We are sitting with Thornton, the hero, on a balcony, watching the father and uncle of the Japanese girl whom he loves. They are talking confidentially in the opposite house, and Thornton and we want to know what they are saying. Obviously Thornton and we should learn no more than we can hear or see. This is how Mrs. Hugh Fraser cheats at the game:

"But now Rinzo San," he said, "will you not ask me why I came?"

"For a good and brotherly purpose, I am sure," replied the other, trying to look unconcerned, and filling up the tea-cups with a trembling hand.

"For a better purpose than yours was when you left us," said his brother. "I come to undo the wrong you did, and to offer you reconciliation and friendship from all the family."

"What am I to pay for such precious things, Kato San?" asked Rinzo, eyeing him suspiciously and stroking his chin. Such an offer from such a quarter seemed more dangerous than a threat.

"There is nothing to pay between brothers."

Kato spoke as loftily as Confucius could have done.

"There will be his hotel bill," thought old Rinzo; but then he was comforted, for Kato evidently wanted something and was disposed to be polite about it.

The points we have italicised could not possibly have been observed by a stranger sitting on the balcony opposite. Mrs. Fraser must really learn the rules and stick to them; for the breach that may pass in a novel is blatant in the short story. Further, we would beg her not to use "praught" as the past tense of "preach," even in fun. And, finally, we must point out that even if there were such a word as "anthrophoby," an "anthrophobic woman" could not denote a female who disliked men. Those who know nothing of the elements should not try to coin words.

The Strange Story of Hester Wynne. By G. Colmore.
(Smith, Elder & Co. 6s)

THIS book has a quality of comeliness seldom seen in novels of which the object is to arouse a curiosity of dread. The author has set herself to write a sensational story which should also be artistic. In the result she has been rather more artistic than sensational—though more than a little sensational. Without descending to the familiar trickeries of the serialist, she has yet contrived at the beginning to communicate a shudder of apprehension, and gradually to intensify and enlarge that shudder as the end approaches. The prologue, describing the death of the drunken ancestor, is very well done, and (very different from the average prologue) legitimately and effectively chosen. The idea of Hester's necklet is neatly exploited; and the pursuit of her by Jesse Pimpernel, that terrible child of a terrible mother, is not only thrilling in its progress, but productive of continual uncertainty as to its ultimate climax. All these things are as they should be. It is just at the finish that, unhappily, "G. Colmore" comes to grief. The concocter of mystery is all the while piling up a debt of explanation and motivation which, if her readers are to be satisfied, must be discharged handsomely at the end of the book. We cannot admit that on p. 355, where she essays to elucidate Jesse's conduct, the author pays twenty shillings in the pound. The facts are crudely and hurriedly stated, and they lack that misty atmosphere of suggestion which alone could make them accord with the vague terrors that precede them. Further, they are not "prepared." The author's nervous fear of giving away her mystery too soon has carried her into an excess of secretive prudence. The reader, when he hears the explanation, should be compelled to call himself an idiot for not having foreseen that explanation from the beginning. That compulsion is part of the mystery-monger's feat. "G. Colmore" has not performed it.

In spite of this, The Strange Story of Hester Wynne is worthy of much praise. Well-written, modest, and not without real imagination, it gives a glimpse of the artistic possibilities of the sensational novel. It would not have suffered had it been more sensational.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

"PUNCHINELLO."

ANON.

This is the story of Anthony Dallas—"Punchinello"—who is represented as a pathetic hunchback ancestor of the editor, Dorothy Dallas. Dorothy finds Anthony's biography—"yellowed pages almost falling apart from stress of years"—in a table in the morning-room at Dane's End. With such a hero the story is necessarily couched in a minor key, but it is pretty and touching throughout. (Bowden. 6s.)

SECRETS OF MONTE CARLO.

BY WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

"With a view to giving the public some idea of the class of adventurers who, disguised in dress-shirts and claw-hammer coats, frequent the Rooms, I have induced Monsieur Antoine Martin, the General Director of the Surveillance Department, to relate one or two of his exciting personal reminiscences." The stories are eleven in number. The first ends abruptly on the Place de la Roquette. (F. V. White & Co. 1s.)

FIVE THOUSAND POUNDS REWARD. BY CHARLES BENNETT.

"Being a true account of the Recovery of the Sezmeer Diamonds." The plot is somewhat original, as the diamonds are found by a respectable householder in his outhouse, and it is from this point that the hue and cry begins. The hue and cry is conducted on land and sea, and we are introduced alternately to the rural Dogberry and to the smartest of Scotland Yard's detectives, men of "basilisk-like gaze." (Warne & Co. 1s.)

THE MYSTERY OF SHELDON BARS. BY INA LEON CASSILIS.

A typical holiday story for the pier-end and the boarding-house bay window. "Her hands were gloveless—one could not think of those slender, delicate hands wielding a murderer's weapon; one could not think of that fragile-looking girl, with her noble face, and pathetic, dark eyes, committing a hideous and cowardly crime." (Henderson. 3d.)

THE HUMBLING OF MARK LESTER. BY BESSIE MARCHANT.

A melodramatic story of married life. Trouble and misunderstanding are piled up, and then . . . "Alice had risen, and was standing before him, the dawn of a half-incredulous happiness in her eyes. . . . 'Then I am not Alice Desart' . . . and so the reconciliation was effected in the old apple-room under the eaves. . . . 'Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.'" (Simpkin Marshall. 2s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Wanted: Good Histories.

THERE is no doubt that popular history is in a bad way. Gibbon, Macaulay, Froude, Green—where are the successors of these men? Apparently they are buried in class-rooms and record offices, where they pore over ancient documents, and produce works which the average man does not recognise as histories. It appears, too, that they are scornful of the old giants, and not in the least inclined to emulate their triumphs. History, they say, is not for the public, it is not legitimate material for literary treatment, and on no account must it be invested with human interest. History is science; history is specialism. The very right of "general history" to exist is disputed. These views are set forth by Messrs. C. V. Langlois and C. S. Seignobos in their Introduction to the Study of History, and are thus interpreted by Mr. Andrew Lang in the current number of Blackwood. Reviewing the same book nearly a year ago under the title, "For Serious Students," we dwelt upon its uncompromising advocacy of scholarly methods in the display of history. The authors themselves describe their book as "an essay on the method of the historical sciences"; and we were led to remark:

Such a critical analysis as is here portrayed would have been impossible half a century ago. History was regarded as a branch of polite literature—picturesque effect rather than truth of actual fact was the aim of the historian. But the critical methods of the scholar and the analytical methods of the student of natural science have been adapted by the students of human history, and it would not be too much to say that the whole craft of the historian has been revolutionised.

It is this revolution which engages the attention of Mr. Andrew Lang, to whose article, "History as She Ought to be Wrote," we wish to draw attention. For we are glad that Mr. Lang has taken up—we were nearly saying his cudgel, but let us call it his effective switch in defence of glowing and readable history. Again reverting to our own review of Messrs. Langlois & Seignobos' book, we said: "What the writers, perhaps, fail to appreciate is this—that, however much the labour of the historian may be indebted to that of the antiquarian specialist, his own work must needs be essentially literary—in other words, that history must always remain a branch of literature." Unfortunately we have no historians using specialists in this way. The historians are themselves specialists, and are working for their own hands, neglecting the public and alternately hugging each other or quarrelling with each other. General history is neglected, because it is voted uncritical and impossible. "Thus," says Mr. Lang, tiny bits of knowledge are to be the special property of a small class; some owning one "poffle or pendicle," some another. Nobody has a right in the general folkland of the past. To vary the metaphor, I venture to conceive that just as rivers exist to feed navigable canals, so monographs and other valuable works of specialists exist as feeders of "general history"; of something that intelligent men and women can read, and thereby be instructed. I am not arguing that the historian ought to be a mass of prejudices, like Froude or Macaulay; still less that he ought to employ the violent rhetoric of Mr. Green. But he should aim at producing a "work of art"; he should—indeed, he must—employ his constructive imagination. The defect of Macaulay's, Froude's, and Mommsen's books is not that they are works of art, but that, as works of art, they are injured by glaring colour and want of keeping and discordant "values."

The public, maybe, do not see the discordant values. But they feel the charm of Froude's and Macaulay's histories, and nothing will wean them from these except histories of equal grip.

People who care for history fall back on Froude and Macaulay, though their works, in every sense, are not "up to date," and would benefit by nota variorum, correcting the errors and adding new material. The truth is, that the books of Macaulay and Froude—nay, even of Mommsen—are literature, while the new schools of historians "despise literature, and insist on producing what they call "science." Thus, though in our universities historical study is infinitely more popular than ever it was; though our young men pore over charters, and our young women (according to Mr. Frederic Harrison) peruse mediæval washing-bills—none the less we have scarcely a historian whom the public reads.

Nor is Mr. Lang the only writer who is conscious of the unsatisfied public hunger for good history. In the current issue of the Speaker, Mr. Quiller-Couch, in discussing the old county histories, points out that history may be interesting for its very lack of art. Mere stupidity and blindness—anything but cold, purse-lipped science—will achieve the readable. Thus he applies the lesson:

If our serious historians were one half so stupid as they insist they ought to be; if they really had no sense of proportion, of the difference between coins and lupins, no "literary" knack, no notion of composition; if they had the extreme courage of their opinions, and would throw the unsorted facts before us in shovelfuls; if, in short, they would write as the old county historians wrote, why, then their histories of Europe might not perhaps have the charm of Clarendon or Gibbon, but they would be, at least, as interesting as the ordinary history of a parish.

But the historians do not want to be interesting. They want to undo each other in accuracy. Nowadays, says Mr. Lang:

Historians are between Scylla and Charybdis, to use a novel phrase. They jump, like Mr. Froude, into a sea of MSS. and bring up a book of absorbing interest—a pearl, but a bizarre pearl, like those so cunningly set in gold by the artists of the Renaissance. Or they pore over their work with a patent double-million magnifying pair of spectacles, and never produce anything worth looking at. Of the two maladies, give me Froude's disease. Measles is better than paralysis. And paralysis it is when, as Von Pflugk Harting says, "The highest branches of historical science are despised: all that is valued is microscopic observations and absolute accuracy in unimportant details." Our authors, nevertheless, applaud the perpetual microscopic criticism which scholars bestow on each other. "Barring the harshness, they are quite right." They "bar the door against the tribe of incapables and charlatans who once infested their profession." But how can a scholar be doing anything worth mentioning if he eternally "gets up and bars the door"? Time, and that promptly, will get rid of humbugs.

Scientific history can never endure because it never trusts itself. Like Master Pliable it is for going back. Before its ink is dry new data are recognised, new conclusions insisted on. Now the historian who hopes to produce a memorable work must bar his door once, and bring his mind to bear on the facts he has acquired up to a given moment. He must make an end of the process of collecting material, and make a beginning of the process of shaping it. To quote Mr. Lang once more:

It is history written as literature, and with regard to style, that does and will remain, ære perennius. Clarendon lasts, Macaulay persists, Hume endures, Carlyle is not superannuated; though fresh facts are discovered, and old stories are disproved. These, and many other great historical writers, survive by their style. A historian, of course, ought to be accurate (as far as mere mortals may); of course he ought to reason correctly ("at least as far as he is able"); but if he wants his book to be read, and if he wants it to go on being read after he is dust, an historian must have style. It is essential. Style is the salt of literature, and history is literature.

It is, of course, only by coincidence that the Atlantic Monthly prints this month an article on "The Vitality of Macaulay." It is a rather slap-dash eulogy, and we can imagine the ironic smiles of the scientific historian who reads it. We smile ourselves when we read that "the story of England outdoes the Waverley Novels." And we could wish that the secret of Macaulay's charm had been more discreetly and more accurately probed. But the very extravagance of the following passage points to certain qualities which can never be divorced from enduring works of history. That Macaulay had them in excess, and that they are here admired in excess, we do not deny. Mr. Sidgwick's article not the less is a sign of the times. He says:

Macaulay's History suits the majority of Englishmen by its virile directness, its honest clearness, its bold definiteness. Macaulay is never afraid; he never shirks; he never dissembles or cloaks; he never says "perhaps" or "maybe," nor "the facts are obscure," nor "authorities differ." He makes the reader know just what effect the evidence has produced on his mind. To be sure, there is danger in that brilliant rhetoric. The glow of declamation disdains the sickly hue of circumspection. The reader of the year 3000, for whom Macaulay winds his horn, cannot hear the shuffling syllables of shambling uncertainties. Men go to the window when a fire-engine gallops through the street; a gentler summons might not fetch them. There is something of martial music about Macaulay's prose. There is that in it which excites a man. It belongs to a great advocate, not to blindfolded Justice holding her cautious scales and doling out "ifs," "buts," "however," as she balances probabilities with all the diffidence of Doubt.

"He makes the reader know just what effect the evidence has produced on his mind." In other words, the literary historian sets himself to build a temple which shall at once contain and adorn the truth, and when he has done this he removes the scaffolding. His edifice may have grave faults, but it has been honestly built and artistically conceived. Whereas the scientific historian's edifice, painfully honest though it be, presents to the eye a world of poles and pulleys and, for its only ornament, a notice that "Business"—the dull necessary business of textual criticism, &c.—is being "carried on as usual."

The Poetry of Amy Levy.

"IMMATURE, imitative, and monotonously sad" is the impression left of Amy Levy's poems from the notices of them that appeared during her life and at the time of her death. It is now ten years since she died, and still the delicacy and matured simplicity of "On the Wye in May," "The Village Garden," "The Lost Friend," and "Straw in the Street" have attracted little attention. Amy Levy's dominant mood, unfortunately for herself, was a sad one; but her sadness shows itself rather as a convinced intellectual attitude than an insistent note of personal despair. The optimism she had known seemed shallow-rooted, and to her, first as last, individual suffering and death and change remain hard, inexplicable facts:

Evil I see and pain; within my heart
There is no voice that whispers: "All is well."

And it is her own feelings which inspire the earlier lines in A Minor Poet:

I lament
The death of youth's ideal in my heart,
And, to be honest, never yet rejoiced
In the world's progress—scarce, indeed, discerned.

Her view of the conventional outlook on life and her protest against it are found in the "Epitaph on a Common-place Person who Died in his Bed":

He will never stretch out his hands in vain
Groping and groping—never again.
Never ask for bread, get a stone instead,
Never pretend that the stone is bread.

"Never to pretend that the stone is bread" was indeed the main principle of her mental life, and it is this principle more than the lyric gift with which it is enforced that gives vitality and weight to poems which she wrote even as a girl of nineteen or twenty.

A glance at these (Xantippe, Cambridge, 1881, and the collected volume, A Minor Poet, 1884) shows who her masters then were. In the two pieces from which the volumes are named there is Browning's rhythm, Browning's method, and here and there even an echo of Browning's words. In others Heine's influence is as clear. And yet in the manner of this open imitation there is something scholarly. She makes no claim to Browning's large humanity or Heine's bitter insight, but, nevertheless, her own power is steadily growing under the influence of each. From Browning she learnt that a subtler combination and a wider range of emotional experience than hitherto belonged to the field of poetry; from Heine, that no feeling is too deep or too painful to find vent in premeditated form.

In these early poems there are already passages of surprising beauty. One may quote, in spite of metrical defect, from the opening lines of Xantippe:

Low burns the lamp of life:
The still morn stays expectant, and my soul,
All weighted with a passive wonderment,
Waiteth and watcheth, waiteth for the dawn.

Xantippe, with her ready self-expression, her conscious demand for intellectual comradeship, may belong rather to Cambridge in the eighties than to the Athens of Socrates. But she has life, and she makes a real lament. Moreover, when at nineteen a poet has written:

Death, holding high his retrospective lamp,
with its fine imagery, or again:
But swiftly in my bosom there arose
A sudden flame, a merciful fury sent
To save me.

With that quick insight into passion, she has made her claim to be heard.

In nearly every page of A Minor Poet there are examples of this masterly touch, and of a certain freshness of view. Her Magdalen, characteristically, is no penitent. She has no desire to be forgiven, and

The outer women's cold regard;
The Pastor's iterated "sin";

are indifferent to her. "All things" she "can endure save one"—the memory of past affection.

Nothing is known or understood
Save only Pain. I have no faith
In God or Devil, Life or Death.

Perhaps in this volume the poem which shows most originality of conception is "Christopher Found." The woman with her poetic gift, her capacity for love, and her bare, inhuman life and death, is drawn with terrible reality.

A London Plane-Tree (1889) shows the same astonishing advance towards maturity in Amy Levy's poetry which was marked in her prose by the publication a year before of Reuben Sachs. It opens with a dedication to Clementina Black, a beautiful and thoughtful sonnet, followed by page after page where verse and feeling alike testify to the development of her power.

A genuine love of London, its varied life, its sights and sounds, has touched the depths of her nature. From the bewildering multitude of city impressions she has chosen those most real to herself.

The London poems are very few in number, and the impressions isolated are very simple. The plane-tree is one, green and fresh where other trees fade and pine, shedding her "recuperative bark" and listening "to the voice on city breezes borne." "London in July" brings before us summer in "the wide waste of square and street." Here, however, the city is only a background for the intensity of personal emotion, except in the last verse:

And who cries out on crowd and mart?
Who prates of stream and sea?
The summer in the city's heart—
That is enough for me."

Four lines from "London Poets" give the feeling and colour of London in autumn and winter:

When, thin and grey, the melancholy snow
Clung to the leafless branches overhead;
Or when the smoke-veiled sky grew stormy-red
In autumn.

But, perhaps, trivial as is the verse form she employs, the most powerful of this series is "Straw in the Street." The subject is the presence of death when the dying is unknown, and when we are thrown back on the simplest human fellowship:

Here, where the pulses of London beat,
Someone strives with the Presence grey;
Ah, is it victory or defeat?

Many passages could be quoted in proof that her love of the city arose from no deadness to the beauty of the country. She knew "the drowsy fragrance of the limes," and had heard "the long slow waves caress the shore"; but London, where, "for all the sunset glory, Pain is king," makes the most intimate appeal to her nature. The "Village Garden" presents with rare directness the combined charm of quiet beauty and long association:

Of many summers are the trees recorders,
The turf a carpet many summers wove;
Old-fashioned blossoms cluster in the borders,
Love-in-a-mist and crimson-hearted clove.

But the lines of farewell which follow are among those which lift her from the crowd of verse writers into the company of poets:

Fain would I bide, but ever in the distance
A ceaseless voice is sounding clear and low;
The city calls me with her old persistence,
The city calls me—I arise and go.

A London Plane-Tree is so small a volume and so imperfectly known that it is difficult not to quote poem after poem. "Impotens" is characteristic in its strength of sorrow:

The pitiless order of things,
Whose laws we may change not nor break,
Alone I could face it—it wrings
My heart for your sake."

"The Lost Friend" is no mere wail of grief. She treasures the memory of joy, and as ever refuses to make terms with pain:

Where sorrow long abides, some be that grow
To hold her dear, but I am not of these;
Joy is my friend, not sorrow; by strange seas,
In some far land we wandered, long ago."

"Captivity" explains still more clearly her passionate revolt against wrong, and her intellectual conviction that wrong is irremediable. The caged lion may be "loosed from the fetter to wander again," but in the years of captivity "there was wrought what was stronger than iron in fetter and bar." She also loves freedom as she loves life, but knows not whether her spirit is by this time bond or free:

I cannot remember my country,
The land whence I came;
Whence they brought me and chained me and made me
Nor wild thing nor tame.

This only I know of my country,

This only repeat:—
It was free as the forest, and sweeter
Than woodland retreat.

When the chain shall at last be broken,
The window set wide;
And I step in the largeness and freedom
Of sunlight outside;

Shall I wander in vain for my country?
Shall I seek and not find?
Shall I cry for the bars that encage me,
The fetters that bind?

Shortly after Amy Levy's death a critic wrote of A London Plane-Tree: "Perhaps the saddest thing about this slim little volume of verse, which for the most part is so pathetic and often so hopeless in tone, is the evidence it affords that the author could never in all probability have achieved fame as a poet."

To me the saddest thought suggested by the volume, the proofs of which were corrected about a week before the author's voluntary death at twenty-seven years of age, is that no one can say what so uncompromising a spirit, combined with so rare a gift, might have achieved. In proof of this conviction I cannot do better than quote the sonnet which I have already mentioned, "On the Wye in May." No analysis can show, as this poem does, her delicacy of feeling, her skill in form, her love of nature, her realisation of passion, and her unconquered idealism:

ON THE WYE IN MAY.

Now is the perfect moment of the year.
Half-naked branches, half a mist of green,
Vivid and delicate the slopes appear:
The cool, soft air is neither fierce nor keen,
And in the temperate sun we feel no fear;
Of all the hours that shall be and have been,
It is the briefest as it is most dear,
It is the dearest as the shortest seen.
O, it was best, beloved, at the first,—
Our hands met gently, and our meeting sight
Was steady; on our senses scarce had burst
The faint, fresh fragrance of the new delight. . . .
I seek that clime, unknown, without a name,
Where first and best and last shall be the same.

ADA WALLAS.

The Governess in Fiction.

THE governess is, or was, well-known to fiction. Once a prominent figure in literature, she is now, perhaps, mainly the invaluable puppet of the penny or threepenny novelette.

Among these older and more imperishable heroines we recall a few: the sweet Miss Raby of Dr. Birch and His Young Friends; Becky Sharp; the audacious, vivacious, melodramatic Miss Gwilt of Armada; the pathetic Catherine George of The Village on the Cliff; Jane Eyre, and Lucy Snowe. All of the same period this little company, but what an assortment of character they present! Miss Raby is but a sketch, yet one from the pen of a master. A chance allusion, a short parenthesis, suffices to make definite that delicate outline, but from these we feel the pleasant glow of "the little school-room" wherein she sits! "She keeps the accounts, writes out the bills, superintends the linen, and sews on the general shirt-buttons. Think of having such a woman at home to sew on one's shirt-buttons!" Happy "old pupil" to whom such happiness befell.

Of another complexion is the sensational Miss Gwilt, with her "mocking laugh," her "symmetrical limbs," her "merciless tyranny" of voice and eye, a private in that regiment of governess-adventuresses of whom the immortal Becky is the chief. The resemblance between them is but a superficial one, their talents were of the same order; the difference between them, both of one calling, both bold sinners as they be, is the difference between humanity and waxwork, between a figure in the National Gallery of Portraiture and an effigy in Madame Tussaud's.

Catherine George, the poor little twenty-year-old governess of The Village on the Cliff, has nothing in common with these arch schemers; she is a dreamer, a hungry child, who has "not yet outgrown the golden age when all things call and beckon, and the apples and the loaves and the cakes cry, 'Come, eat us! Come, eat us!'" and the children wandering in fairyland reply, 'We come, we come!'"

Fairyland was not to be her heritage: the cakes and apples were for other mouths; the time came when dreams had nothing to say to her; when her young life, "part worried, part puzzled, part sad, and part happy too," missed the scant measure of its happiness, and a mistaken marriage turned her gaze from visions to the cheerless maxim, "Ce qui coule le plus pour plaire, c'est de cacher que l'on s'ennuie." She moves through a world of bright colours and snatches of music and patches of sunlight and still shadows, real yet dreamlike—a world to which her creator only can admit us. For Miss Thackeray has lent to none her golden key.

The picture of little Catherine George contrasts oddly with her father's imposing portrait of "Rebecca, Lady Cranley"; and beside them, in this gallery of governesses, hangs "Jane Eyre." While Vanity Fair was born a classic, the legitimacy of Jane Eyre's claim to that title was to be proven. Born before its time, it had yet to win the sanction of society, which proves often to the foundling, like hope, "a timid friend." It is instructive to remember nowadays, when nothing, it seems, is unpermissible to youth, that to the young person of that period Jane Eyre was a forbidden book; we doubt, however, if it was a closed one. We suspect that many a young mentor, while zealously withholding from her pupils that too unfettered, too fervid romance, pored over it in secret, burning her candle low over its pages, weaving from them dreams that were to be the realities of the magic future—that dim, yet brilliant, and all-possible future, the saddest and the happiest fallacy of youth. How many Rochesters loomed there, as unsubstantial as that sorry hero himself, hidden only by the veil of the prosaic present, waiting to storm the easy fortress of their hearts!

Jane Eyre was a revelation, but Villette was yet to come, and it is to Villette we turn for that unique presentment of the governess in literature—Lucy Snowe. It was probably the accident of the author's own experience that determined the setting of that incomparable story, but artistically no finer or fitter environment could have been chosen for Lucy Snowe: the frame was created for the picture by the stroke of genius, or the stroke of fate. In most of those dramas in which the governess plays the rôle of leading lady, we look for her, by the exercise of her own ingenuity or the advent of the inevitable Prince Charming, to be delivered from her bondage in the author's own good time. But Villette was conceived in sterner spirit, its heroine was drawn by a stronger hand. It is in the carré, to the sound of the school-bell, amid all the paraphernalia of the pension in the Rue Fossette, that the drama of that strange creature of ice and fire is played out. It is in the intolerable desolation of that "long vacation" that her inflexible spirit falls upon despair. And with the fruition of hope (how characteristic it is of Charlotte Brontë to have it so!) there is to be no putting away of tasks, no cessation of labour; it is the old atmosphere of friction and of effort, which the aroma of love is to sweeten and rarefy. In yet another sense, Lucy Snowe remains above all the governess of fiction, if we view her through the penetrative eyes of Madame Beck. It was from no emotional point of view that that astute lady regarded her "English teacher"; from a professional one she apprehended that she had landed a fine fish. The English teacher was almost an ideal teacher. She would perform her duties without surveillance and with discrimination, she would endure any discipline, she would exhibit a cynical impartiality and command where she could not persuade; if she lacked sympathy, she possessed that saving grace of a humorous perception, a perception with which her race is but meagerly endowed. Her skirmishes with that exasperating butterfly Ginevra Fanshawe are, after their manner, as unique as the communings of her repressed and impassioned spirit with its fate.

Happy the critic when Villette was young! It will not grow old, but it has passed beyond praise and analysis to the immunity of fame.

Whether the governess is in reality as interesting a figure as she appears in imagination is a question not to be disposed of here. If we are inclined to label her rather a prosaic than romantic personage, she may point with a protesting finger to the precious volumes on our shelves, and call great names to witness that she has not been found unworthy of regard.

But her proof lies mainly in the past. She survives still in the literature of the school library, a personification of all the milder virtues, clothed in the seductive but un-serviceable "plain white gown, with a bunch of roses in her belt," and with the aid of these habiliments she still contrives to satisfy the requirements of the more unsophisticated among her public.

But "these be toys," as Bacon saith.

Mr. Kenneth Grahame, in his Golden Age, in the few pages headed "Exit Tyrannus," has portrayed in his own delicate fashion the mixture of regret and bravado with which his children watch their governess depart. And it is chiefly in such slight sketches that for us our governess reappears. In fact, perhaps she has been our tyrant; in fancy assuredly she has been our friend. Is she in both, in life as in literature, becoming obsolete with the three-volume novel? If so be, so be it.

M.

Things Seen.

A Happy Woman.

THE garden stood on the skirts of the village. It was enclosed by a high wall, and upon the wall stood a further bulwark of trellis-work. The room where I lodged overlooked the garden. My reflection, when I peeped from the window in the early morning, was: "There might a prisoner take exercise." Presently a lady, well-nourished, well-dressed, not ill to look upon, but not attractive—just the typical, well-preserved, hearty British woman, a little anxious about her weight, distressed periodically by the heat—emerged from the house, talking rapidly in a high, strident voice. Her manner was militant and restless. Clearly she had grievances, and since she chose to give them articulate form in her walled garden beneath my window, I smiled and left the room, for the day was fine and the wind temperate, and it was in my mind to sit beneath a tree with a book. When I returned, some hours later, she was still roaming about the garden—still talking. I listened, and smiled no more, for as I listened I learned that she was of those in whom the spirit sleeps, who know not what they are, who being alive are yet dead. Her madness took the form of Vanity. She believed that she was supremely beautiful; that the German Emperor loved her; that her picture was on the line at Burlington House; and that her singing and dancing excelled anything to be seen upon the London or Continental stage. Through all that summer day, through—for aught I know—every day of her healthy life (for the "touched" live long) that poor lady babbled of her loveliness to unheeding walls. Beautiful, rich, accomplished, beloved by a dashing monarch—these delusions were fixed ineradicably in her mind. They were her possession, hers eternally. For the world outside her garden time would range, fruits fail, beauty fade; but she would remain always young, always beautiful, always the desired. Other things might change or wane, but the inviolable dimness of her mind—never.

We give of our pity to this demented lady who lives in a walled garden. We pity those in whom the spirit sleeps—but consider! She has all that half the world pines for and strives at great cost to gain. Do you want wealth? She has it. Love? Adoration? Applause? She has them all, and can never lose them—unless she recovers.

Illumination.

I HAD on very many occasions observed the old man. He had more than once moved me to curiosity and admiration. This evening I determined to address him. His bent figure—an attitude most thoughtful, an air redolent of philosophic speculation—was a landmark, a half-way house to me, and herald of the last three puffs of my post-prandial cigarette. Pipe in mouth, staff in hand, and sun-greened shoulder hard-pressed upon a friendly door-jamb, the old gentleman, quiet as evening, surveyed London from a point to me midway betwixt petit verre and study pipe, pet restaurant and den. He accepted my salutation and a cigar with sober, uneffusive courtesy. So much the more direct, then, my short cut to acquaintance. My questions were merely mine, and merit no quotation. Said my friend, in answer to them:

"No, I've done no regular work these two or three years now, and I'm nothing now but just a translator. What say? Modern languages? Lord love ye, a translator's a sort of a cobbler's assistant—makes boots out of old scraps. A cobbler puts new bottoms to old tops. A translator just fudges up new tops to put on old bottoms. Eh? 'How's that,' you say, sir?"

"Nothing, nothing," I said; "only now I understand what Quince meant when, in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' he said 'Bless thee, Bottom! bless thee! Thou art translated.'"

"Ay, ay, I dessay," replied the old gentleman.

Memoirs of the Moment.

MR. THEODORE SCHREINER repudiates the assumption that his brother, the Cape Premier, and his sister, Miss Olive Schreiner, have been influenced in their attitude towards the Transvaal by their "German parentage." As a matter of fact, their father, though a German by birth, became by choice a British subject, and their mother is an Englishwoman. The senior Mrs. Schreiner survives, and her son, had he liked to go into family affairs, might have said that the Cape Premier had no hotter opponent than his own mother. To tell the truth, the most treasured ornament of the old lady's sitting-room is a portrait of—not President Kruger, but Mr. Rhodes; and her greatest treasure a letter from the ex-Premier at Cape Town telling her that her sympathy with him counts for much.

Is another sign of the general relaxation of manners to be seen in the sale-room? There, every now and then, are put to public auction private letters—private, not necessarily secret, but private in the sense of being intimate and domestic in their interest. Letters that congratulate on a birth or a marriage, or that condole on a death, are sometimes sold as autographs for a few shillings by those closely related to the men and women whom the letters name. Poverty, of course, may sometimes palliate this seeming insensibility to the dictates of an instinctive natural piety. That, however, can hardly be the excuse where the private papers sold belong to a brother-in-law of Lord Salisbury, an uncle of Lord Cranbourne, of Lady Selborne, and of both the Balfours; a father-in-law of Mr. Lowther, M.P., the Chairman of Committees—a sufficiently long recital of relationship, and one that may be left to the reader to extend through a network of ramifications.

Lot 80 at that sale was entitled in the catalogue "Large quantity of letters from titled personages." The title did not seem very promising; but these titled personages included Lord Raglan, fresh from the Crimea, Lord Hardinge, whose hand was shot away at Ligny, and another Commander-in-Chief of our army, Lord Hill, whose twenty-six victories are commemorated on his memorial column at Shrewsbury. All these heroes wrote letters of condolence about the death of Marshal Beresford, the step-father of Beresford-Hope, letters which hail him a hero in terms which, one would imagine, would make these papers precious to anyone who came after him. These are semi-public letters, to be sure; but Lady Beresford's private correspondence was also put into the market. One takes up at random a faded note from Lady Sophia FitzClarence: "Dear Mrs. Hope, why is one's Happiness to be at the mercy of other People's caprices?" That question, remains unsolved by Time—Time which has made void the trembling postscript: "Do not mention the purport of this note to anyone." The purport is lost although the words remain, and the secret is preserved even in the unlooked-for publicity of the Auction Mart.

BISHOP LLOYD OF BANGOR died at Llanarth, in Cardiganshire, the place where he was born. The fifty-six years intervening between his birth and his death had made a difference. Of humble parentage, he served, in early years, behind the counter of a little shop, and his Sundays were passed in a Methodist chapel. That is not the stuff out of which is usually made the occupant of an Anglican See, with a seat in the House of Lords. His cleverness—a cleverness of the schoolmastering kind, as he afterwards discovered—gave him a mastery of detail and an acquisition of facts and figures that carried him through examinations, won scholarships for him, took him to Oxford, and gave him a second in Moderations and in Greats. He was ordained; and the career of a schoolmaster in Bangor and in Brecon paved the way to his elevation to the See of Bangor. His speaking knowledge of Welsh was his great stock-in-trade for a See in a Church that, in the eyes of politicians, had to be national or nothing. The Bishop's career was a satisfactorily salient one, which had its counterparts often in the Church history of past centuries, though not many such are furnished in our own.

As a bishop in a diocese where Dissent prevailed, Dr. Lloyd had fitful missionary experiences, often visiting distant stations where perhaps only three or four of the inhabitants were faithful found. Ten years ago he was encountered on such a quest by the present writer in a hamlet on the coast of Anglesea. His herculean figure, in heavy black, with his orthodox gaiters, made a strange dot upon a stretch of miles of golden sand. There was not enough of a congregation to meet together on Sunday; but the bishop kept the day holy by discarding his black wideawake in favour of the episcopal high hat. Matthew Arnold was the poet of his choice; he carried the volumes about with him as a sort of breviary, which he exchanged that day on the sands for a volume similarly carried by somebody else; and that was the bishop's first introduction to the poetry of Rossetti.

A Fable.

"SUPPOSING we love one another, where's the harm?" said the Land Fairy, as he dangled his feet over the edge of the rock, and gazed down into the pool below.

"Where indeed?" answered the Water Fairy from the pool.

"Again, supposing we love one another, where's the good?" said the Land Fairy, tying his legs into a knot, while he made an explanation.

"What do you mean?" asked the Water Fairy.

"Well, you see, I can't marry you?"

"Why not?" The Water Fairy looked like beginning to cry, and the Land Fairy had to turn his face away while he made an explanation.

"Well, you must be aware—you can't help seeing—in fact, there's a difference of rank between us."

"True," said the Water Fairy, "but love levels all things, does it not?"

"Oh, yes," muttered the Land Fairy gloomily to himself—he was not unkind enough to say it out loud—"it levels down the hills; I never yet heard of it levelling up the valleys."

"What is that you are muttering?" said the Water Fairy. "I shall begin to think you are proud."

"No, no, my peerless queen, but—"

"Oh, yes, you are! And you don't love me a bit, either!"

"Love you! My own, by all that's odd, I—"

"No, you don't. If you did you'd come down here and live among the water fairies. Not that they are anxious to have you! Oh, dear, no!"

The Land Fairy gazed down into the pool again. She looked very beautiful and white in the clear water, and her eyes looked so ready to cry, and her cheek looked so ready to blush, and her lips looked so ready to be kissed, that the Land Fairy untied his legs and jumped into the pool. And there he lived very happily for full five minutes, when he suddenly turned into a bubble and burst; which is a land fairy's way of drowning.

The Water Fairy looked disconsolately up at the place where the bubble had vanished, and then fell to weeping bitterly.

"My poor little girl!" said a sweet, low voice, just behind her, and turning round she saw the Queen of the Fairies. "My poor little girl, I am very sorry for you and for him, but it must always be so. A water fairy cannot live on the land, nor a land fairy in the water. Your poor lover had no gills."

Correspondence.

In a White Sheet.

SIR,—In the St. James's Gazette (August 5, 1899) Mr. W. P. James chastises me, and very properly, for crediting (in the current Pall Mall Magazine) Mr. Andrew Lang with a wish to meet the Ghost of the late M. Alexandre Dumas, when, in fact, the Ghost of Mr. Lang's desire was, and is, that of the late Mr. W. M. Thackeray.

Mr. James, who refers me to a certain Roundabout, is right; and I deserve the worst that (on this point) Mr. Lang will say of me. My blunder is the less pardonable, for that I read De Finibus not very long ago—read it, in fact, in Mrs. Richmond Ritchie's re-issue—and rejoiced in it, as of old.

Permit me here to make such expiation, and to do such penance, as I may.—I am, &c.,

Worthing: August 7, 1899. W. E. HENLEY.

P.S.—Says Mr. James: "Eminent literary critics should know their Roundabout Papers!" Should they? I wonder, why?

Re a Neglected "Lowell."

SIR,—It was with delightful pleasure I read your contributor's note upon this little-known masterpiece, which I already long to possess.

I feel sure many, the same as I, would have dearly liked to have been "one of the ravens" to have offered a Sunday cigar to that dear professor of Greek.

Through your columns, allow me most heartily to thank your contributor.—I am, &c.,

Ipswich: August 8, 1899. T. EDWARDS-JONES.

Cataloguing.

SIR,—A collection of the vagaries of cataloguing would be curious and amusing. I take the following description of the catalogue of the Bibliothèque Nationale (then called the B. du Roi) at Paris from the Gentleman's Magazine for October, 1822:

The English language must needs be unknown in this learned establishment, as the English books occupy strange places in the catalogue; they are frequently placed under the Christian instead of the surname of the author. The consequence is that John, Thomas, and William are authors of uncommon and voluminous celebrity. . . . The following illustrations of the catalogue may serve as examples of their profound knowledge of the English language,—they are taken at random. An author appears here unknown in England, called Herself, under the letter H; and this designates 'The Memoirs of Letitia Pilkington, written by herself.' Another book is titled as follows: 'The following Dialogues are with the highest esteem and gratitude,' 1 vol. The title-page has most probably been lost, and this appears to be part of the dedication."

—I am, &c.,

J. BARNES.

Carlisle: August 8, 1899.

Peccadilloes.

SIR,—Is it not time to call attention to the very general misspelling of the particle "by" in combination? We are not surprised when the County Council placards open spaces with lists of the "bye-laws" and we are getting accustomed to the newspapers' intelligence of "bye-elections"; but a little while ago your Mr. Bookworm wrote "by-and-bye." Is it not dreadful! Dictionaries say this spelling is optional, but that does not make it less incorrect. By-laws, by-elections, and by-the-by we can understand, but what are be-with-ye-laws and be-with-ye-elections, and when is by-the-be-with-ye?

Then, again, there are "fewer" and less." As an incipient journalist I was taught to regard "no less than twenty-two people" as a literary crime, just as if one should write "no fewer than a stone in weight." And yet the Times wrote "no less" in speaking of numbers a little while ago. Is this optional?—I am, &c.,

INTERROGATION.

La Jeune France et le Vieux Shakespeare.

SIR,—Your correspondent, M. Paul Mantoux, in the course of his clever protest against the idea that modern France adheres to the Voltairean view of Shakespeare, has an interesting passage. He says that Gautier "employs many pages to show that the apostrophe, 'Well said, old mole!'—which Mr. Forbes Robertson suppresses on the stage, I believe—is in the last degree sublime." If Mr. Forbes Robertson does suppress it, then he is decidedly wrong, and Théo Gautier decidedly right. The expression is in itself rudely familiar. But it is dramatically sublime. For it renders with splendid psychological truth the condition of a névrosé man, thrown into hysteria by over-tension, and trying to hide from his companions, by ghastly and violent affectation of mirth, how profoundly he has been affected by the awful interview. The false and tasteless levity, rising into unseemly hysterical laughter, behind which an overstrained nervous nature strives to mask its feelings from alien eyes, has never been so profoundly grasped and subtly realised. It is an example of the dramatic, as opposed to the epical or lyrical sublime. I may add that I have not read Théo Gautier's comment (to which your correspondent refers), and am therefore ignorant on what grounds Gautier defends the passage. It should need no defence to an Englishman, and I am sorry that a present-day actor should be so ill-advised as to expunge it.—I am, &c.,

August 8, 1899.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

The High History of the Graal.

SIR,—Dr. Evans is still unconvinced that I can have read the romance he has translated; his sole reason, so far as I can see, being that I have come to a different conclusion from himself respecting its date and nature. In particular, he cannot away with my assertion that the Welsh translation represents an earlier form of the romance than the text printed by Potvin, an assertion for which "there is not the shadow of a foundation." The facts are very simple. There is only one complete MS. of the romance—that preserved in the library of Mons, and printed by C. Potvin as Vol. I. of his Perceval le Gallois. As the editor justly remarks (p. 356), "Ce manuscrit est très fautif." But in the well-known Berne MS., No. 113, are to be found two fragments of the romance corresponding to pp. 1-42, 209-221 of Potvin's edition. M. Potvin has printed the chief variants from the Berne MS. as footnotes to his edition of the Mons text. The most cursory glance at these variants enables one to appreciate his remark that "les fragments de Berne . . . sont beaucoup plus corrects" (p. 355). There also exists a Welsh translation, which, together with an English version, was printed by the late Rev. Robert Williams, London, 1876. The English version occupies pp. 547-720. In nearly every case where the Berne MS. differs from the Mons MS. the Welsh translation sides with the former. I will cite one example. The opening of the romance deals with the hero's genealogy. On p. 3 occurs the following passage: "Cil qui fu chiés du lignage de par sa mère ot nom Nichodemus" (Mons MS.). In the Berne MS. the passage is the same, except that père occurs instead of mère. The Welsh translation has: "The chief one on his father's side was called Nichodemus." That the Berne-Welsh version is preferable to the Mons one was evident even to Dr. Evans, who translates: "He that was head of the lineage on his father's side was named Nichodemus" (High History, I., p. 7). I think this instance will suffice; but, if necessary, I can quote others where Dr. Evans follows the Berne-Welsh reading in preference to the Mons one. Not that he always does so. In the Mons MS. the passage immediately following the one quoted above runs thus: "Gais li gros de la croix des ermites fu pères Julien." The Berne MS. has: "Glais li gros de la croix des ermites fu pères Julien le gros des vaus de Camaalot." The Welsh translation has: "And the name of his father was Earl Evrawg from the head of the vale of Camelot," evidently rendering from an original akin to the Berne and not to the Mons text. Dr. Evans translates: "Gais li Gros of the Hermit's Cross was father of Alain li Gros," substituting, as he has no right to do, a different name from that vouched for by both his texts. He omits, it will be seen, all reference to Camelot. Doubtless he feared undue encouragement to Celtic partisans.

In the face of these facts, which I repeat could easily be multiplied, proving that Dr. Evans knew there was a difference between the Berne and the Mons texts, knew the former to be the better of the two, knew the Welsh translation to agree with it as a rule, it is difficult, save on the hypothesis that he has really forgotten all about the matter, to account for his assertion that there is not "a shadow of foundation" for my statement—a statement demonstrably correct, as to the Welsh representing an earlier form of the romance than the text printed by Potvin, unless he wishes seriously to contend that the more incorrect text is the earlier of the two. The fact is, that Dr. Evans quite misapprehends the points at issue, largely, I take it, because he is unfamiliar with the work of other scholars. Thus he complains that I do not give the "slightest reason" for asserting the lateness of the High History. But (Studies, p. 64) I expressly refer to Birch-Hirschfeld, who not only gives a full summary of the romance, but also (Die Sage vom Graal, pp. 135-143) an exhaustive analysis of its relations to other romances of the cycle. With the result of that analysis I agreed on the whole (though I find on the margin of my Birch-Hirschfeld a note expressly dissenting from his contention that the author of Perceval le Gallois knew and used the Queste); and it was, therefore, unnecessary for me to do more than refer to him. Whenever I dissented from Birch-Hirschfeld, who represented a view of the cycle differing from the one I advocated, I was at great pains to fully set forth the grounds of my dissent; I did not think it needful to particularise when we agreed. But upon Dr. Evans, who dissents from the views of every one of his predecessors without exception, it is surely incumbent to prove that the romance does really occupy that position in the evolution of the legend which he claims for it. Up to the present he has not brought forward one single argument in answer to those by which other scholars have sought to establish the lateness of the High History. What he has done is to elaborate a theory of the legend which undoubtedly does require a very early, if not the earliest, place in the hierarchy of versions for the romance he has translated. But that theory, itself utterly impossible, is no argument in favour of a contention that must be proved on quite different grounds. The assertion that Pride and Prejudice was written before The Vicar of Wakefield receives no support from the contention that both works give an allegorical account of the French Revolution. Dr. Evans's general theory of the Grail legend is even more far-fetched and fantastic than the one I have imagined, even less capable of serving as support to critical opinions advanced in the teeth of every other scholar. Dr. Evans most unjustly accuses me of setting up authority against facts. I never have deferred, never shall defer, to authority unless it make good to my reason its claim to be based upon facts. But if I challenge the authority, I thereby commit myself to disproving the claim; whereas Dr. Evans makes no attempt to disprove the claims of his predecessors, but contents himself with showing that they are inconsistent with his theory, and thereby imagines that he is rid of them. I repeat once again, and, I trust, finally, that until he examines critically all the romances of the cycle, and shows that their evolution is consistent with his theory, no scholar will treat that theory as anything but an amusing (and charming) example of unfettered imagination.—I am, &c.,

August 8, 1899.

ALFRED NUTT.

Announcements.

UNDER the title of The Patroness, Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. will shortly publish a new novel by G. M. George. This new novel deals largely with parochial life in Wales, and it is understood that the Welshmen are not idealised.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish in a few days a novel by Sara Jeannette Duncan, author of A Voyage of Consolation. The scene of the book is laid in Calcutta, and the story is told with the author's usual vivacity and humour.

* * * Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

CHAPTER I.

The Old and the New Mediterranean Trade The Pioneer Steamship—Arrival at Marseilles—The Cholera—Origin of the Crimean War—French Hilarity succeeded by Disappointment.

CHAPTER II.

The Passage to Constantinople—Reminiscences of Antiquity—Ashore in the Dardanelles—Disinterested Kindness of Suleyman Pasha—Constantinople and its Surroundings—The Passage to the Crimea—The Seaports and the Battlegrounds—Starvation at the English Camp—French Economy and Hospitality.

CHAPTER III.

The Mistake of the Allies in Making their Landing—The Commencement of the Siege and the Misery attending it—Another Passage from Marseilles—Narrow Escape from Foundering in a Gale—Arrival at Kamiesh—The Monastery of St. George.

CHAPTER IV.

The American and the French Cuisine—A Trip to the Sea of Azof—Contrasted Scenes of Peace and War—Vandalism of the Allies at Kertch—Trading with a Pasha—The Unsuccessful Attack on Sebastopol—Panic at Kamiesh and Balaklava—Return to Marseilles—Trip to Algeria.

CHAPTER V.

Return Again to the Crimea—Ravages of Disease in the Camps—French Transport System compared with Ours in the Civil War—The Sisters of Charity—The Capture of the Malakoff and Redan—A View of the Ruins—Bombproof Female Curiosity.

CHAPTER VI.

Entering the Turkish Service—The Turk a Man of his Word—Good Pay and Little Work—Our Philosophic Chief Officer—The Pasha's Bedclothes—His Friendship—No Use for a Propeller.

CHAPTER VII.

Hafiz Effendi and his Harem.

CHAPTER VIII.

Mustapha Pasha Wide Awake—We are Hurried Off to Eupatoria—A Rescue in the Black Sea—A British Frigate comes to our Aid—Arrival at Eupatoria.

CHAPTER IX.

The Blunder of a British General—A Post-Mortem held by Mr. Sears and Some of his Religious Ideas—The End of the War and Comments on its Results.

By Capt. CODMAN.

Frontispiece. 198 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London :

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

Selections from Alexander & Shepherd's Publications.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.
THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes ..... full of thought and knowledge and power."
British Weekly.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.
"Forcible, clear, gracious, and suggestive."
Presbyterian.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."
Methodist Times.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.
PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."
New York Observer.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."
North British Daily Mail.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d., post free.
ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN. Containing over 500 beautiful and suggestive illustrations. With a Textual Index and Alphabetical List of Subjects.

Just Published. Price 4d., or 3s. per dozen.
RELIGIOUS EQUALITY. A Lecture by Dr. MACLAREN.

LONDON: 21 AND 22, FURNIVAL STREET, HOLBORN, E.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.O.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEl ISLANDS.
THE NORTH WALES COAST. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
BOSS, TIVERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
LLANDUDNO, BRYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED, and SNOWDON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CROICEITH, and FWLLHILL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

SECOND EDITION, ENLARGED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With an additional Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained; or Complete Sets may be had separately for 3s. 6d.:—

BEN JONSON.
JOHN KEATS.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.
TOM HOOD.
THOMAS GRAY.
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
LEIGH HUNT.
LORD MACAULAY.
ROBERT SOUTHEY.
S. T. COLERIDGE.
CHARLES LAMB.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
SAMUEL PEPYS.
EDMUND WALLER.
WILKIE COLLINS.
JOHN MILTON.

WILLIAM COWPER.
CHARLES DARWIN.
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.
HENRY WADSWORTH
LONGFELLOW.
ANDREW MARVELL.
ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS CARLYLE.
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.
CHARLES DICKENS.
JONATHAN SWIFT.
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE
THACKERAY.
WILLIAM BLAKE.
SIR RICHARD STEELE.
ALEXANDER POPE.
DOUGLAS JERROLD.
FRANCIS BACON.
HENRIK IBSEN.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

Ready immediately, in cloth gilt, price 6s.
JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW NOVEL.
A NAME TO CONJURE WITH.
A NAME TO CONJURE WITH.
A NAME TO CONJURE WITH.
 By the Author of "Bootles' Baby," "Heart and Sword," &c.

NEW BOOK BY RICHARD MARSH.
 Ready this Day, at all Booksellers' and Bookstalls, price 6s.
IN FULL CRY.
 By the Author of "The Beetle."

WILLIAM LE QUEUX'S NEW AND POPULAR STORY.
 In Illustrated paper cover, price 1s.
SECRETS OF MONTE CARLO.
NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

Now ready.
THE HONOUR of VIVIEN BRUCE. By Mrs. J. H. NEEDLE.

A RATIONAL MARRIAGE. By FLORENCE MARRYAT.

BONNIE MAGGIE LAUDER. By ALAN ST. AUBYN,
 Author of "A Fellow of Trinity," &c.

SAROLTA'S VERDICT: a Romance. By E. YOLLAND,
 Author of "In Days of Strife," &c.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

AN AMERICAN TRANSPORT in the CRIMEAN WAR

By Capt. CODMAN.

This work is particularly interesting to students of naval warfare.
 "Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War. The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare."

Frontispiece. 198 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORTH WALES COAST.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRIGHTON, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED, and SNOWDON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

SECOND EDITION, ENLARGED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With an additional Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.

The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S BOOKS.*SECOND PRINTINGS NOW READY

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS' AND LIBRARIES.

THE ETCHINGHAM LETTERS. By

Mrs. FULLER MAITLAND, Author of "Pages from the Day-Book of Bethia Hardacre," &c., and Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK, Bart.

SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, 6s.
ATHENÆUM.—"The book is charming as a revelation of the character of the two delightful people who realise that their own life is done as far as feeling new emotions and new love is concerned, but are still young enough to enter into the lives of the younger people who surround them."

GUARDIAN.—"An entirely original and new kind of book. It might be placed among novels, because it has story and plot and fictitious characters, all very skilfully fitted into an epistolary plan and brought to a happy conclusion. But it is more than a novel, inasmuch that it gives us, by the way, all sorts of charming little scraps of poetry and fancy, subtle criticisms of books, and flying commentary upon men and manners."

THE STRANGE STORY of HESTER

WYNNE. By G. COLMORE. SECOND IMPRESSION. Crown 8vo, 6s.
ATHENÆUM.—"Distinctly a book which will make the most hardened creep."

PUNCH.—"The Strange Story of Hester Wynne" is strange indeed. The incidents of the story have a fascination that makes it difficult to put the book down till the end is reached. Jesse Pimp-pnel is a good, slimy, fly-by-night villain of the melodramatic age. The book is powerfully written."

NEW EDITION OF SIR HENRY THOMPSON'S "MODERN CREMATION."

NOW READY, THIRD EDITION, REVISED, AND MUCH ENLARGED.
 Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s.; or in paper cover, 1s.

MODERN CREMATION.—CREMATION:

its History and Practice to the Present Date. With Information relating to all recently-improved Arrangements made by the Cremation Society of England. By Sir HENRY THOMPSON, Bart., F.R.C.S., M.B. Lond., &c., President of the Society since its Foundation in 1874.

WORLD.—"No reasonable person who studies the arguments so lucidly marshalled in this little work can deny the strength of the cremationists' case."

"Without exception one of the most charming sea-stories which it has been our luck to peruse for many a long day."—WORLD.

FOURTH EDITION, with 8 Illustrations and a Chart, large post 8vo, 8s. 6d.

THE CRUISE of the "CACHALOT"

ROUND the WORLD after SPERM WHALES. By FRANK T. BULLEN, First Mate. The Volume includes a LETTER to the AUTHOR from RUDYARD KIPLING.

BOOKMAN.—"Here is a glorious salt-sea book, true every word of it, and thrilling with adventure. The spirit of daring is there, and plenty of adventure. It is not a juvenile book, but boys will revel in it, and men who have at all some of their boyish sympathies intact will find it as refreshing as an ocean holiday."

"A treasure-house of good things."—MANCHESTER COURIER.

FOURTH EDITION.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

PAGES from a PRIVATE DIARY.

Reprinted from the Cornhill Magazine.

ATHENÆUM.—"Full of happy sayings, of stories, and of pleasant turns of observation. To write more about this pleasant book would be to quote from it, which would be manifestly unfair, as it is short and amusing from cover to cover. Really a model to modern writers of diaries for the public."

DAILY NEWS.—"Hold—enough! We owe a debt of gratitude to the diarist. Though necessarily an egotist, he is strangely modest. Buy the diary, and taste it."

A MODERN MERCENARY. By K. and HESKETH PRICHARD (E. and H. Heron). Crown 8vo, 6s.

BOOKMAN.—"A really first-rate novel. Rallywood is the ideal hero—calm, confident, and unfathomably honourable. The dialogue is cleverly written, and the story goes on without a break in its interest from first page to last. It is undoubtedly one of the best novels of the class that we have read."

POT-POURRI from a SURREY GARDEN.

By Mrs. C. W. EARLE. With an Appendix by Lady CONSTANCE LYTON. SEVENTEENTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Dean HOLDS, in an article upon the work in the NINETEENTH CENTURY, says: "There is not time for further enjoyment of this sweet, spicy 'Pot-Pourri'; no space for further extracts from this clever and comprehensive book; only for two more earnest words to the reader—Buy it!"

BOOKS FOR SEASIDE AND HOLIDAY READING.

* * * MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER & CO. will be happy to send, post free on application, a Copy of their CATALOGUE, containing a List of 2s., 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., 5s., and 6s. Popular Novels, together with a large number of Miscellaneous Works.

Among the Authors whose Works are comprised in several Novel Series are the following:—

Rider Haggard	James Payn	W. E. Norris
Conan Doyle	George Gissing	Hamilton Aide
S. R. Crockett	Mrs. Humphry Ward	Anthony Trollope
Henry Seton Merri-	Mrs. Oliphant	Mrs. Gaskell
man	The Author of	Holme Lee
Stanley J. Weyman	"Molly Bawn"	The Brontë Sisters
F. Anstey	The Author of	&c. &c.
	"John Herring"

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

JUSTIN MCCARTHY'S REMINISCENCES. Third Thousand. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, with Portrait, 24s.
"Poets, painters, and politicians; actors, actresses, and adventurers; Bohemians, exiles, and refugees; editors, novelists, and dramatists—all pass in procession across Mr. McCarthy's bright and sparkling pages. They are in truth a goodly company, a striking series of pen pictures." Pall Mall Gazette.

FLORIZEL'S FOLLY. By John Ashton, Author of "Social Life in the Reign of Queen Anne." With 13 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. "A fascinating record.....Distinctly a book to have in one's library."—New Age.

TRUE TALES of TRAVEL and ADVENTURE. By Harry de Windt. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"Bright, graphic, and amusing writing."—World.

JASON, and OTHER STORIES. By B. M. Croker, Author of "Diana Barrington." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"Her new stories may be pronounced as bright and as fresh as any she has given us."—Echo.

WITH ZOLA in ENGLAND. The Story of his Exile told by Ernest A. Vizetelly. With 4 Portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"The book is a vivacious narrative, interesting for its manner as well as for its matter, and interspersed with some of the Master's luminous criticisms upon English life and habits."—Literature.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S PICCADILLY NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

By GRANT ALLEN.
Strange Stories. This Mortal Coil.
Philitia. Babylon. The Tents of Shem.
In all Shades. At Market Value.
The Beckoning Hand. Blood Royal.
For Maimie's Sake. The Scallywag.
Under Sealed Orders. Dumaresq's Daughter.
The Great Taboo. The Duchess of Powysland.
The Devil's Die. Ivan Greet's Masterpiece.

By ROBERT GARR.
In a Steamer Chair. A Woman Intervenes.
From whose Bourne. Revenge!

By W. BISANT and J. RICE.
My Little Girl. With Harp and Crown.
This Son of Vulcan. The Golden Butterfly.
By Celia's Arkur. The Monks of Thelema.
The creamy Side. 'Twas in Trafalgar's Bay.
Ready-Money Mortiboy. The Ten Years' Tenant.
The Case of Mr. Lucraft. The Chaplain of the Fleet.

By Sir WALTER BESANT.
The Revolt of Man. All Sorts and Conditions
The Captains' Room. of Men.
All in a Garden Fair. The World Went Very Dorothy Forster. Well Then.
Uncle Jack. For Faith and Freedom.
Armored of Lyonesse. The Bell of St. Paul's.
The City of Refuge. St. Katherine's by the Children of Gibeon. Tower.
Herr Paulus. Verbona Camellia Step-
To Call Her Mine. notia.
The Holy Rose. Beyond the Dreams of The Ivory Gate. Avarice.
The Rebel Queen. In Deacon's Orders.
A Fountain Sealed. The Master Craftsman.
The Changeling. The Charm: Plays.

By ROBERT BUCHANAN.
A Child of Nature. The New Abelard.
God and the Man. Forgive Manor.
The Shadow of the Sword. The Master of the Mine.
The Martyrdom of Made- The Heir of Linne. line. Woman and the Man.
Love Me for Ever. Red and White Heather.
Annan Water. Rachel Dene.
Matt: a Story of a Car- Lady Kilpatrick.
van. The Chariotman.

By HALL CAINE.
The Shadow of a Crime. The Deemster.
A Son of Hagar.

By WILKIE COLLINS.
Antonina. | Basil. Queen of Hearts.
Hide and Seek. My Miscellanies.
The Woman in White. The Moonstone.
Armada. | After Dark. Man and Wife.
No Name. | A Rogue's Life. Poor Miss Finch.
The Frozen Deep. Miss or Mrs.?
The Two Destinies. The New Magdalen.
The Haunted Hotel. The Law and the Lady.
The Fallen Leaves. Little Novels.
Jezebel's Daughter. The Legacy of Cain.
The Black Robe. Heart and Science.
"I Say No." The Evil Genius.
The Dead Secret. Blind Love.

By B. M. CROKER.
Pretty Miss Neville. The Rent Lady Hilda.
A Bird of Passage. Married or Single?
Diana Barrington. Two Masters.
Proper Pride. Village Tales and Jungle Interference. Tragedies.
A Third Person. Beyond the Pale.
A Family Likeness. In the Kingdom of
"To Let." | Mr. Jervis. Kerry.

By O. MANVILLE FENN.
Commodore Junk. Cursed by a Fortune.
The New Mistress. The Case of Ailsa Gray.
The Tiger Lily. Master of the Ceremonies.
The White Virgin. The Story of Antony Grace
A Fluttered Dovecote. Witness to the Deed.

By HAROLD FREDERIC.
Seth's Brother's Wife. | The Lawton Girl.

By ERNEST GLANVILLE.
The Lost Heiress. A Fair Colonist.
The Fossicker. The Golden Rock.
Tales from the Veld.

By Rev. S. BARING-GOULD.
Eve. | Red Spider.

By COSMO HAMILTON.
The Glamour of the Im- Through a Keyhole.
possible.

By THOMAS HARDY.
Under the Greenwood Tree.

By BRET HARTE.
A Waif of the Plains. Barker's Luck.
A Ward of the Golden Gate. A Protégé of Jack Ham-
A Sappho of Green Springs. lin's.
Colonel Starbottle's Client. The Bell-Ringer of Angel's
Gabriel Conroy. | Susy. The Crusade of the "Ex-Sally Dows. celsior."
Clarence. Three Partners.
Devil's Ford. Tales of Trail and Town.

By TIGHE HOPKINS.
'Twixt Love and Duty. The Incomplete Ad-
The Nugents of Carriconna venturer.

By Mrs. HUNGERFORD.
Lady Verner's Flight. The Red-House Mystery.
The Three Graces. The Professor's Experiment
Nora Creina. An Anxious Moment.
April's Lady. A Point of Conscience.
Peter's Wife. | Lovice. The Coming of Chloe.

By E. LYNN LINTON.
Patricia Kemball. The One Too Many.
The World Well Lost. Dulcie Everton.
Under which Lord? With a Silken Thread.
"My Love!" | Ione. The Rebel of the Family.
Easton Crew. The Attonement of Leam
Sowing the Wind. Dundas.

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY.
Linley Rochford. The Biddle Ring.
A Fair Saxon. The Dictator.
Dear Lady Disdain. Red Diamonds.
Miss Misanthrope. The Three Disgraces.
Donna Quixote. The Waterdale Neighbours
Maid of Athens. My Enemy's Daughter.
Camila. The Comet of a Season.

By GEORGE MAC DONALD.
Phantastes. | Heather and Snow.

By BERTRAM MITFORD.
The Gun-runner. The King's Assegai.
The Luck of Gerard Renshaw Fanning's Quest Ridgeley.

By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.
A Life's Atonement. In Direct Peril.
Joseph's Coat. Mount Despair.
Coals of Fire. A Capful of Nails.
Val Strange. By the Gate of the Sea.
A Model Father. | Hearts. A Bit of Human Nature.
The Way of the World. First Person Singular.
Cynic Fortune. Bob Martin's Little Girl.
Old Blazer's Hero. Tales in Prose and Verse.
Time's Revenges. A Race for Millions.
A Wasted Crime. This Little World.

By W. E. NORRIS.
St. Anne's. | Billy Bellow. Miss Wentworth's Idea.

By OUIDA.
Held in Bondage. A Village Commune.
Strathmore. | Chandos. In Maromma. | Bimbi.
Under Two Flags. | Italia. Wanda. | Frescoes.
Tricorin. | Puck. Princess Napraxine.
Folle-Farine. Othmar. | Guilderooy
A Day of Flanders. Syrlin. Ruffino.
Paschal. | Signa. Santa Barbara.
In a Winter City. Two Offenders.
Armadine. | Friendship. Cecil Castleman's Gaze.
Moths. | Pipistrello. Two Little Wooden Shoes.

By JAMES PAYN.
Lost Sir Massingberd. The Canon's Ward.
A County Family. Less Black than We're Walter's Word. Painted.
By Proxy. | High Spirits. A Confidential Agent.
Under One Roof. A Grape from a Thorn.
Glow-worm Tales. The Talk of the Town.
Holiday Tasks. The Mystery of Mirbridge.
For Cash Only. The Word and the Will.
The Burnt Million. In Peril and Privation.
Sunny Stories. A Modern Dick Whitting-
A Trying Patient. ton.

By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.
Outlaw and Lawmaker. Mrs. Tregaskiss.
Christina Chard. Nulma.

By CHARLES READE.
Peg Woffington; and The Double Marriage.
Christie Johnstone. Griffith Gaunt.
The Cloister and the Foul Play.
Hearth. A Simpleton.
It is Never Too Late. A Woman-Hater.
The Course of True Love never did Run Smooth. Hard Cash.
Singleheart and Double- Put Yourself in his Place.
face. A Terrible Temptation.
Autobiography of a Thief. The Jilt, and other Jack of all Trades; Hero Stories; and Good and Mary; The Wan- Stories of Man and dering Heir. Other Animals.
Love Me Little, Love Me A Perilous Secret.
Long. Reaiana; and Bible Characters.

By W. CLARK RUSSELL.
Round the Galley Fire. My Shipmate Louise.
In the Middle Watch. The Phantom Death.
On the Fo'k's Head. Is He the Man?
A Voyage to the Cape. The Convict Ship.
A Book for the Hammock. The Tale of the Ten.
The Mystery of the Heart of Oak.
'Ocean Star.' The Last Entry.
The Romance of Jenny Alone on a Wide, Wide Harlowe. Sea.
An Ocean Tragedy. The Good Ship "Mohock."

By ALAN ST. AUBYN.
A Fellow of Trinity. The Master of St. Bene-
The Junior Dean. dict's.
Fortune's Gate. In the Face of the World.
To His Own Master. The Tremlett Diamonds.
Orchard Damerel. Gallantry Bower.

By HAWLEY SMART.
Without Love or Licence. The Master of Rathkel'y.
Long Odds. Beatrice and Benedick.
The Outsider. A Racing Rubber.

By R. L. STEVENSON.
The Suicide Club.

By MARK TWAIN.
Mark Twain's Library of The American Claimant.
Humour. The £1,000,000 Bank-Note.
Mark Twain's Choice The Adventures of Huckle-Works. berry Finn.
A Tramp Abroad. The Adventures of Tom
The Gilded Age. Sawyer.
Pudd'n-head Wilson. Tom Sawyer, Detective.
Tom Sawyer Abroad. The Stolen White Ele-
The Innocents Abroad. phant.
Life on the Mississippi. Roughing It and The
A Yankee at the Court of Innocents at Home.
King Arthur. The Prince and the Pauper.

By WILLIAM WESTALL.
The Phantom City. Trust-Money.
A Queer Race. Sons of Belial.
Ben Clough. Her Two Millions.
Strange Crimes. Nigel Fortescue.
Red Rivington. Ralph Norbreck's Trust.
The Old Factory.

By EMILE ZOLA.
The Fortune of the Rou- The Dream.
The Dram-Shop. | zons. The Downfall.
The Fat and the Thin. Doctor Pascal. | Lourdes.
Money. | His Excellency. Rome. | Paris.

* * The above is a small SELECTION only.

For Novels at 2s., and other prices, see CHATTO & WINDUS'S FICTION CATALOGUE, to be had free upon application.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1424. Established 1869.

19 August, 1899.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE present year, from the publishing point of view, may come to be remembered for its traffic in reference books. The public is being saddled with dictionaries, encyclopædias, atlases, and the "hundred best." The good householder fills up a form, and posts it. Next morning a dray thunders up, and dumps all knowledge on his pavement. The "instalments" are perhaps a trifle wearisome, but the sight of the furniture—we mean the books—heartens him to write his monthly cheque. In one case the distinction between furniture and books need hardly be made, for a bookcase, compounded of the war-worn beams of one of Nelson's ships, is part of an enterprising firm's delivery.

VARIOUS devices are being adopted to mitigate the depression which the buyer feels when he surveys his new-gotten volumes. A very quiet man of our acquaintance was electrified the other day to find his name included in a widely-published list of people who had become purchasers or hire-purchasers of a colossal dictionary. A prince of the blood headed the list, and the names of a duke, a dean, several major-generals, a Colonial judge, and two or three countesses, to say nothing of a Paymaster of colonial police, hustled his own. Meanwhile Messrs. Harper Bros. announce that they have settled the preliminary plans of an encyclopædia which is to be larger than any existing publication of the kind. This is to be an entirely new work.

MR. STEPHEN CRANE will be interested in a new form of criticism applied to certain verses in his book, War is Kind. A writer in the New York Critic suggests that the lines in question may be read from bottom to top without any loss, and invites the reader to say which of the following versions is right side up without referring to the book:

Fast rode the knight
With spurs, hot and reeking,
Ever waving an eager sword,
"To save my lady!"
Fast rode the knight,
And leaped from saddle to
war.
Men of steel flickered and gleamed
Like riot of silver lights,
And the gold of the knight's
good banner
Still waved on a castle wall.
A horse,
Blowing, staggering, bloody thing,
Forgotten at foot of castle
wall.
A horse
Dead at foot of castle wall.

Dead at foot of castle wall.
A horse
Forgotten at foot of castle
wall.
Blowing, staggering, bloody thing,
A horse.
Still waved on a castle wall.
And the gold of the knight's
good banner
Like riot of silver lights,
Men of steel flickered and gleamed
And leaped from saddle to war.
Fast rode the knight,
"To save my lady!"
Ever waving an eager sword,
With spurs, hot and reeking,
Fast rode the knight.

WHAT are the ideal books for children? A competition organised by St. Nicholas has resulted in the following first-prize list of twenty-five works for a young people's library:

Ivanhoe (Scott).	Child's Garden of Verses (Stevenson).
Quentin Durward (Scott).	Tom Brown at Rugby (Hughes).
Pathfinder (Cooper).	Pilgrim's Progress (Bunyan).
Last of the Mohicans (Cooper).	Sketch Book (Irving).
Jungle Book (Kipling).	The Man Without a Country (Hale).
Westward Ho! (Kingsley).	Robinson Crusoe (Defoe).
Arabian Nights.	Gulliver's Travels (Swift).
The Rose and the Ring (Thackeray).	Alice in Wonderland (Carroll).
Wonder Book (Hawthorne).	Uncle Remus (Harris).
A Tale of Two Cities (Dickens).	Jackanapes (Ewing).
Christmas Stories (Dickens).	Wild Animals I Have Known (Thompson).
Poems of Longfellow.
Works of Shakespeare.
Treasure Island (Stevenson).

The list might be improved. Surely not "Works of Shakespeare" for children?

PERHAPS some of our correspondents would like to try their hands at framing a list of the twelve most suitable books for children under twelve years of age.

WE give here a reproduction of the elevation of the William Black Memorial Beacon which it is proposed to erect at Duart Point near the entrance to the sound of Mull. Apropos of literary memorials, a contemporary remarks on the absence of the names of notable men of letters from the subscription list towards raising a fund to place a stained-glass window in memory of Jane Austen in Winchester Cathedral. We cannot explain this; but of forms of monument a "storied window richly dight" strikes us as being—sentimentally and by natural association—not the most appropriate in this instance. Anything gorgeous or even impressive seems a little out of keeping with Jane Austen's simple works and ways.

stance. Anything gorgeous or even impressive seems a little out of keeping with Jane Austen's simple works and ways.

HITHERTO a novel called If has held the record for a brief title, but Miss Marjorie Williamson has this week beaten that record. She calls her first book "I." We have already had She. Who will snap up the remaining personal pronouns?

AMERICA is still true to David Harum, which, we may remark, was refused by six publishers before Messrs. Appleton accepted it. The following are the six books which were most popular across the Atlantic during the past month:

David Harum. E. N. Westcott.
When Knighthood Was in Flower. "E. Caskoden."
Richard Carvel. W. Churchill.
Red Rock. T. N. Page.
No. 5, John-street. R. Whiteing.
From Sea to Sea. R. Kipling.

MISS FRANCES POWER COBBE recently offered to present her library to the town of Barmouth. After due consideration the gift has been accepted.

WE recently made reference to the symbolical mark, the "Swastika," which is found in each volume of the new edition of Mr. Kipling's prose works. A correspondent draws our attention to the very scholarly monograph, "The Swastika, the earliest known symbol, and its migrations," by Mr. Thomas Wilson, of the United States National Museum. Archaeologists, and readers generally, will find this very able work full of interest. It is published in the Annual Report (1894) of the Smithsonian Institution, a copy of which is presented to the British Museum and some of the larger provincial public libraries.

It were monstrous to expect a poet to be always at his best, and Mr. Kipling's poem "Cruisers," contributed to last Monday's Morning Post, is hardly of his best. Its eleven stanzas form an exposition of the functions of cruisers in war. But this expository note is hardly what we love in verse; it is more suited to a prose head-note. With the seventh stanza, however, the poem proper, as we conceive it, begins, for then Mr. Kipling is no longer explaining but is receiving and conveying impressions. Here are three stanzas:

Anon we return, being gathered again,
 Across the grey ridges all drabbed with rain—
 Across the keen ridges all crisped and curled
 To join the long dance round the curve of the world.

The bitter salt spin-drift, the sun-glare likewise—
 The moon on white waters bewilders our eyes
 Where linking and lifting our sisters we hail
 'Twixt roll of beam-surges or wrench of head gale.

What see ye? Their signals or levin afar?
 What hear ye? God's thunder—or guns of our war?
 What make ye? Their smokes or a fog-bank out-blown?
 What chase ye? Their lights or the day-star low down?

THE town of Flint will be full of Shakespearian colour on Monday, when Mr. Benson will give, at the instance of the Mayor and Corporation, an al fresco representation of the surrender of King Richard II. to the Earl of Bolingbroke in 1399, Monday being the quincentenary of the event. The stage on which Mr. Benson and his company will perform will have for its background the very castle towers which frowned on the original drama. On one side the Flintshire hills will be seen, footed by the town, and on the other the low valley where "Deva spreads her wizard stream."

THE Committee which is promoting the interests of the National Burns Memorial at Mauchline have had the pawky ingenuity to issue their latest appeal in a set of Burnsian rhymes in which they embody some of the vicissitudes of the Fund and its present need.

At first we had a fairish start,
 By tryin' every wile an' art
 Our brain could frame, to reach ilk heart,
 An' draw out cash,
 But sune our trials cam' fu' smart,
 Wi' muckle fash.

The "Indian Famine Fund" cam' round,
 To gie to which a' folk were bound;
 An' Abdul Hamid, d—d vile hound,
 Armenians slew;
 For help, his victims had go'd ground,
 An' gat it too.

Our guid Queen's Diamond Jubilee,
 Next brocht a scheme for ilk bawbee
 That could be spared, an' bond or free
 Had each their need;
 Infirmaries, lifeboats, land an' sea
 Some special plead.

Now they're a' past, an' we hae here
 Guid crops, guid trade, and little fear
 O' Strikes, "Lockouts," this present year;
 Then gie's a hand,
 And help us weel our feet to clear,
 Is our demand.

MEANWHILE, the collection at Mauchline has been enriched by some new relics. Mrs. Burns Hutchinson has presented the nursing-chair in which her grandmother, the poet's "Bonnie Jean," reared her family. This chair was made specially for Burns when he removed to Ellisland, and has been preserved in the family since his death. Other relics have come from the Riddell family, with whom Burns foregathered so much and quarrelled so famously. Three cups and saucers, out of which Burns, it is said, drank tea in Mrs. Riddell's drawing-room, and a muffin-dish, will now remind visitors that the poet of the "peck o' maut" was a gentle drawing-room creature on occasion.

THE example of the Indiana Methodists who have turned Mr. Kipling's works out of their Sunday-school library has been followed in another Methodist quarter, and the dual catastrophe has inspired a correspondent of the Daily News to propound the question: "Is Kipling Profane?" and to answer it himself in the negative. These things happen in August. As for the Sunday-school people, their action, apart from their language, is comprehensible enough. A Sunday-school library exists for a definite purpose, and tales of adventure and soldiering in which the characters use the strong language of the fore-castle and the canteen are not the books which anyone would naturally hand out to small boys and girls on Sunday afternoon.

THE matter might well have been disposed of with less gush and spreading than are used by the correspondent of the Daily News. For example, it discomforts a bookman to read such criticism as this: "If Milton had detailed the manners of the cavaliers in his stormy times, he might have done so in the sweet language of the oaten lute. But his story would have been only a rosy half-truth, even if applied to some of Cromwell's soldiers. Only a robust literary style, like Kipling's, can adequately measure our military methods or set to music the rough-and-ready gossip of the canteens." This uncritical association of names and postulation of preposterous "ifs" all about a few damns! Milton could not have drawn the manners of rough soldiers; had he tried, he would not have used the sweet language of the oaten lute; and whatever he had produced, it would not have been a "rosy half-truth." Yet Milton's prose style was one of the most robust in literature. Ah, well, these things are written in August.

THE new musical criticism is fruitful in surprises. Thus, in an article—a clever fantastic article—on Mr. Henry Wood in the current Dome, "Israfel" writes: "In sheer charm and intimacy of emotion, Henry Wood, with his quite feminine intuition and his incomprehensively Slavonic fire, is unrivalled. He has an absolute monopoly of sympathy, and his sense of pathos is most womanly, sincere, and exquisite. Moreover, he has now and then a seductive langour upon him, a something which gives a remote witchery to his art, that lies on his art as the dew on a flower. . . . Who could play the whimsical Casse-Noisette, that we're all so tired of, so daintily as Henry Wood? With the Trepak he gives us a thrill of excitement comparable to that which we feel when we see Tod Sloan win by a short head." Well!

We have received a newly issued catalogue of pictures in the Birmingham Museum and Art Gallery. It is a substantial book of over 200 pages, containing fifty first-rate illustrations, and it is issued at sixpence. Nothing like it has been attempted by the National Gallery, the Tate Gallery, and other London institutions. We suppose that most people know that it is necessary to go to Birmingham to see a really representative collection of the works of David Cox.

In noticing the collected edition of the works of Robert Stephen Hawker a few weeks ago we were able to give only a slight line portrait of this remarkable man. The much more satisfactory portrait here reproduced will, therefore, interest our readers. It forms the frontispiece to the new edition of the Rev. S. Baring-Gould's Vicar of Morwenstow, just issued by Messrs. Methuen. That it exists at all is somewhat remarkable, because for many years the old man had refused to be photographed. He had even told his biographer that he would have inscribed on his tombstone the words: "Here lies the man who was never photographed." However, in the last two years of his life Hawker's views changed, and many will be glad that his features are not lost to us.

ROBERT STEPHEN HAWKER.

The charming little dialogue on the "Pleasures of Poverty" which Max O'Rell contributes to the North American Review is not less charming because it so keenly reminds one of Cousin Bridget's protestations to Elia. Max O'Rell's "wife" says:

"I will tell you this: happy as I am now, I am not sure that I was not happier still when we were quite poor, pulling, struggling together, hand in hand. I have never dreaded poverty; on the contrary, I have enjoyed it, loved it by your side. To poverty I owe the happiest days of my life. Do you remember, for instance, how we enjoyed the play when, once a month, obscure, unknown to everybody, we went to the upper circle? Wasn't it lovely? And how we often yawn now, once a week in the stalls! . . . We were not overfed in those days. You cannot enjoy, even appreciate, anything intellectual after a dinner of six or eight courses; you are only fit for a pantomime or a music-hall. And that's why those pathetic forms of entertainment are so successful now. Why, look at the people in the boxes, indifferent, half sulky, lifting their eyebrows and staring their eyes out—like that—awful!"

Bridget's views were the same. They occur, as every Elia knows, in the inimitable essay, "Old China":

"You are too proud to see a play anywhere now but in the pit or boxes. Do you remember where it was we used to sit when we saw 'The Battle of Hexham' and 'The Surrender of Calais,' and Bannister and Mrs. Bland in 'The Children in the Wood'—when we squeezed out our shilling apiece to sit three or four times in a season in the one-shilling gallery—when you felt all the time that you ought not to have brought me—and more strongly I felt obligation to you for having brought me, and the pleasure was the better for a little shame. You used to say that the gallery was the best place of all for enjoying a play socially. . . . Now we can only pay our money and walk in. You cannot see, you say, in the galleries now. I am sure we saw and heard well enough then; but sight and all, I think, is gone with our poverty."

What is literary malaria? This affection of the brain is lightly diagnosed by Mrs. Earle in the American Book Buyer. Literary malaria is the state of strain and bewilderment, involving an inability to do creative work, which is brought about by poring on old books in search of local colour and illuminating facts. It is a disease most incident to historical novelists. The preliminary dive into history may be delightful, but the result is that the brain is fretted by the search, especially by defeat in the search; and the result of digging in this humus of decayed literature is a "fever an' ague" of the mind. The material is there, and it sends up exhalations that seem of themselves to form shapes and dramas that only require the aid of the pen to record them. But a subtle undermining of the executive power of the brain has been going on, and the old musty styles, which will never do for modern readers, go singing through the brain and obsess it.

Thus, says Mrs. Earle, the historical novelist is apt to forget the real values of language, and, when he begins to execute the story which thrilled him as its outlines took form, he finds all his sentences bedecked with participial and prepositional qualifications. "Then," he writes, "seeing the Indian lurking behind a tree, and, knowing that no mercy could be expected from such a ruthless adversary, with a beating heart—" He stops and takes another piece of paper, feeling that, with so many encumbrances to carry along with it, his sentence will never reach the fact it started for. Next time, perhaps, the overweight of adverbs which have been forced upon his mind escape into the text, and not a step can his sentences take without a fringe of "ly's" flapping on each side of them, like the fly-net on a horse.

We doubt not that this is a real experience with many novelists, and very charmingly and deftly it is described by Mrs. Earle. Only a week or two ago, in reviewing Mr. Caskoden's When Knighthood Was in Flower, we made some remarks which agree with Mrs. Earle's conclusion—viz., that "the writer who wishes to interpret the characters and interests of the past must keep close to the characters and interests of to-day; for life is at all times the same, and is the only absolute specific for malaria of the mind."

No happier literary parallel could be found than the one which Mr. Percy J. Harding contributed to the Daily

News, on Wednesday, apropos of the trial at Rennes. Who does not remember the paper with the copy of verses which the White Rabbit picked up:

"Are they in the prisoner's handwriting?" asked another of the jurymen.

"No, they're not," said the White Rabbit, "and that's the queerest thing about it." (The jury all looked puzzled.)

"He must have imitated somebody else's hand," said the King. (The jury all brightened up again.)

"Please your Majesty," said the Knave, "I didn't write it, and they can't prove that I did: there's no name signed at the end."

"If you didn't sign it," said the King, "that only makes the matter worse. You must have meant some mischief, or else you'd have signed your name like an honest man."

There was a general clapping of hands at this: it was the first really clever thing the King had said that day.

"That proves his guilt, of course," said the Queen: "so, off with—"

Everything, it seems, may be found in Shakespeare and Lewis Carroll.

Bibliographical.

THE appearance of an elaborate treatise on croquet reminds one of the remarkable revival of that most innocent (if not most inane) of games. It seems an age since the late Mr. Cholmondeley Pennell wrote and published his "piece" about croquet, beginning:

Most croquet is cheating,
Most roquet mere folly,
And yet we know
Some belles and beaux
Who fancy it's most jolly.

There is an allusion in one of his stanzas to "Balmorals," which dates the "piece" with some approach to accuracy. I do not remember any other notable "pome" in celebration of the game. There is, of course, Frederick Locker's description of it, in Mr. Placid's Flirtation, as "a dainty but difficult sport in its way," with the accompanying couplet:

Thus I counsel the stage who to play at it stoops,
Belabour thy neighbour, and spoon through thy hoops.

So far, however, Cholmondeley Pennell is par excellence the laureate of the pastime.

Mr. Kipling, it seems, has bought back the copyright of his Departmental Ditties, so far as England and, I suppose, India are concerned; but how about the numerous copies of the work which must still be reposing upon private library shelves in this country? Is Mr. Kipling inclined to buy these up? Some of us, I am sure, would not be inclined to part with our possession—not because the Ditties are very notable effusions from the purely literary point of view, but because they were the first things from Mr. Kipling's pen that came before the English reader, and they are therefore biographically interesting. The third edition was circulated in England in 1888. My own copy is of the fourth edition ("with additional poems") and dated 1890. The book, as most people know, was published here by W. Thacker & Co., as agents of Thacker, Spink & Co., Calcutta. It at least revealed, in parts, an individuality, and prepared one, so to speak, for the Tales. It is pleasant to know that Mr. Kipling is not going to suppress the Ditties altogether. The rhythmic preface, for example, is much too Kiplingish to be lost.

I saw it stated the other day, in a quarter usually trustworthy, that Prof. Edward Dowden had undertaken to edit the text of Shakespeare's plays for Messrs. Methuen. I gather, however, that what Dr. Dowden has really undertaken is the general supervision of an edition of the plays. He will edit the opening volume, which will be devoted to "Hamlet," but I gather that he will not be responsible for all the volumes of the series. If this be so, I can only say I am sorry, for a complete "Dowden Shakespeare" is a thing to wish for. The Professor's Mind and Art of Shakespeare, issued in 1875, was for very many students of the Bard a landmark on their journey. It owed, no doubt, a good deal to its author's familiarity with German criticism on the subject, but it was very suggestive and stimulating, for all that. Then, what a boon and a blessing to thousands was the Professor's Shakespeare Primer! His more recent work as editor of the Sonnets, the Passionate Pilgrim, and so forth, is within the memory of all but the youngest of us.

The volume on American Literature in the series of Literary Histories edited by Mr. Gosse and published by Mr. Heinemann will be from the pen of Prof. W. P. Trent. That gentleman's name is hardly a household word in England; yet some of his publications have found their way to this country. Of these, the one of most general interest is his edition of certain tales by Poe, included last year in the "Riverside Literature" series. Before that came a volume of studies of Southern Statesmen of the Old Régime, which, again, was preceded by "a study of the Gilmer Letters and an account of the English Professors obtained by Jefferson for the University of Virginia," to which the author gave the title of English Culture in Virginia. So long ago as 1881 Prof. Trent contributed to the "American Men of Letters" series a monograph on William Gilmore Simms, another American worthy with whom the English reader is not too well acquainted.

Life is to be made more beautiful for us by the publication of a sort of album of portraits of "stars" of the music-hall attired in "character." And really, this kind of thing has been done so freely for the "legitimate" stage that it is only fair that the "artists" of the "halls" should have what they would call "a look in." Such men as Albert Chevalier and Gus Elen have as much right to be dubbed "artist" as any actor has. And yet how little (apart from fiction) has been written about their engaging performances. Some nine years ago there came, from the pen of Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, a pamphlet, entitled Music-Hall Land: an Account of the Natives, but it had not the air of being written by an expert. The music-hall has had its bards, but no historian or critic of authority.

I notice that Messrs. Chatto & Windus promise a new edition of The Choice Works of Edgar Allan Poe—that edition to which a translation of Charles Beaudelaire's essay is prefixed. I am inclined to think that this volume has, in its time, done more for the popularity of Poe in England than any other edition of his Works, however splendid. It was published in 1872 by John Camden Hotten, and claimed to be the most nearly complete edition that had so far been issued over here, including as it did "some critical essays which will be new to English readers." The English editions of the poems, tales, and essays have since been legion; but Hotten's (which may have been edited by Henry Curwen, who translated the essay by Beaudelaire) still remains (me judice) the best one-volume collection in the market.

To what extent has Marcus Clarke, at this moment, a vogue in these islands? His widow and his son are among us, and are credited with a desire to dispose of some unprinted work of his. In 1897 one of our publishing firms gave us his Stories of Australia in the Early Days, and later in the same year we had from another firm a re-issue of his Australian Tales of the Bush, with a memoir by Hamilton MacKinnon. Heavy Odds had come in 1896, and Chidwick Tichbourne in 1893. Such is the indifference of the public to distinguishing Christian names that I believe Marcus Clarke is often confounded with Charles Carlos Clarke, the author of Which is the Winner? and other sporting novels.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Daniel and Drayton.

Selections from the Poetry of Samuel Daniel and Michael Drayton. With Introduction and Notes by the Rev. H. C. Beeching, M.A. (Dent. 1s. 6d.)

THIS little volume could have found no better editor than Mr. Beeching; who, at home as he is among all poets, is never more at home than in dealing with the Elizabethans and their immediate successors. We have had no reprint in these days of reprints of either Daniel or Drayton, save Mr. Bullen's expensive and now scarce selections from the latter poet. Needing a text-book for his Oxford pupils, Mr. Beeching was moved to undertake the present volume. His selections are judicious, and his introduction a thoroughly understanding piece of criticism. The reader of modest means may now see for himself what minor poets were like at the close of the sixteenth century. For both these poets are representative minor singers, in that terminal period of the Elizabethan school which preceded the outbreak of seventeenth century poetry, with its Donne, Crashaw, Cowley, and the Cavalier lyricists. And both are well worth better knowledge.

To indulge our own predilection, we will reverse Mr. Beeching's order, and speak first of Drayton. More fortunate than Daniel, he is known to every schoolboy (not merely him too famous in Macaulay's pages) by the rousing Ballad of Agincourt; yet, unfortunate enough, he is further known in literary histories chiefly as the author of that very fearsome production—the Polyolbion. Not twenty Charles Lambs could get any unlearned man to read it. In reality he is one of the most masculine and individual among our minor poets. Whatever he does is burly, forthright, with a true English independence. Other ways may be better, he seems to say, but he will do things his own way. And his own way is mostly worth doing.

Yet Drayton, it must grudgingly be confessed, is a clumsy workman. Like most clumsy workmen who have something to say, he offends by awkward or downright unintelligible ellipses. Clumsy workmen who have nothing to say sin in quite other fashion. But inexpert craftsmen who are full of matter almost invariably try to bring their matter within metrical compass by the omission of connecting words—what is technically called ellipsis. It takes a great artist to use ellipsis well. Shakespeare is a master of it; yet even Shakespeare sometimes faults by excessive and crabbed ellipsis. Donne, a very pregnant writer, who, like Drayton, is not a good craftsman, is full of violent and knotty ellipses. But he has at least the palliation that his ellipses are scholarly, and result from an indiscreet imitation of the Latin, where the inflected character of the language permits bold ellipsis inadmissible to an uninflected language like the English. Drayton's ellipses are not scholarly; they are thoroughly indigenous and awkward, as well as crabbed; the mere untaught expedients of a man who finds it difficult to shepherd his thick-coming ideas into the strait pen of a defined stanza. For this reason—whether or not he be at his best poetically—he is least clumsy in expression where he employs continuous metre (as in his pastorals) which permits him to take what compass he pleases in his utterance—gives him, in fact, room to turn round in. And Drayton, like the sturdy, strong, not unbovine Anglo-Saxon he is, needs a good deal of room to turn round in. This lack of adroitness hampers him in his sonnets, which abound in lumbering and quite unclassical ellipses, making them difficult reading. He is still more clod-paced in his Odes, and other poems written in brief stanzas of curt lines. Yet he is curiously fond of such measures—doubtless from his instinctive love of pregnancy. His virile abundance of idea well qualifies him for these stern, short metres—indeed, almost calls for them. But unluckily his indexterity of execution no less disqualifies him. He is like a man of pithy temperament but thick utterance. So that most readers had better take refuge in his pastorals, with their charming simplicity and flowing expression. Those only who are willing to wrestle with maladroitness and knotty expression for the sake of masculine substance—whose teeth are sound enough to crack a tough nut for the sake of a nutritious kernel—should adventure upon the sonnets and the poems in curt stanza form. He declares in one fine sonnet that his mistress has made the dumb to speak—in causing him to write. Whether he were really first urged to write by love or not, it is clear to us that he did to some extent compose invitâ Minervâ—driven on by an inward heat, in spite of a native obtuseness of utterance.

Yet this poet, whom we have in effect compared to a broad-shouldered Saxon farmer, needing much room to “come about” (in nautical phrase), can be delightfully dainty on occasion, full of pretty fancy—nay, even a certain arch caprice. So it was with rough old Ben, but Jonson had a classic elegance and accomplishment in his lighter moods, which is lacking to the less learned Drayton. Charming is the fancy and whimsy of “Nymphidia,” Drayton's mock-heroic fairy poem. Hark how the very metre seems to trip along on little feet, most apt for a fairy story:

Hence shadows, seeming idle shapes,
Of little frisking elves and apes
To earth do make their wanton scapes,
As hope or pastime hastes them;
Which maids think on the hearth they see
When fires well-near consumed be,
There dancing fays by two and three,
Just as their fancy casts them.

He has, indeed, a happy instinct for minor metres; witness the most graceful measure of the song in “The Shepherd's Sirena.” Pity it is these things are flawed at intervals by his awkward twists of expression. His pastorals have a sweet and clean rusticity about them, if they lack the downright realism of Allan Ramsay, and are full of the open air. Old Walton might have quoted his praise of fishing in the “Sixth Nymphal.” There is much that is fine in the ode “To the Virginian Voyage,” with its prophecy fulfilled so splendidly in later times:

And in regions far,
Such heroes bring ye forth
As those from whom we came;
And plant our name
Under that star
Not known unto our North.

One sonnet of Drayton's is famous: “Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part.” But the others are by no means so vastly inferior, for all the faults we have already noted in them. We think more highly of them, indeed, than Mr. Beeching does. Manly and full-sounding is this, for example:

Why should your fair eyes with such sovereign grace
Disperse their rays on every vulgar spirit,
Whilst I in darkness in the self-same place
Get not one glance to recompense my merit?
So doth the ploughman gaze the wandering star,
And only rest contented with the light,
That never learned what constellations are,
Beyond the bent of his unknowing sight.
O, why should beauty, custom to obey,
To their gross sense apply herself so ill!
Would God I were as ignorant as they,
When I am made unhappy by my skill;
Only compelled on this poor good to boast,
Heavens are not kind to them that know them most.

Daniel resembles Drayton only in manliness. His style is very different, extremely clear and carefully finished.

Wordsworth and Coleridge both admired the openness and simplicity of his diction. His characteristic vein is that of grave and dignified reflection. Perhaps his thought is not always so deep as Mr. Beeching would have it; there may be more than a touch of conventional moralising about it, as about Wordsworth himself. Wordsworth borrowed from the "Epistle to the Countess of Cumberland" the final couplet:

Unless above himself he can Erect himself, how poor a thing is man!

He was full of such borrowings, and did not always acknowledge them, as he has done in this case. That great close of a great sonnet:

Who are to judge of danger, which they fear,
And honour, which they do not understand;

is taken literally from Sir Fulke Greville, without statement of the fact. In sententiousness lies much of Daniel's merit; though in "Hymen's Triumph" we have beauty with no lack. But perhaps the finest specimen of him in this book is the chorus from "Cleopatra." Its severe and even language, its elevated thought, the stately movement and cunning structure of the verse, all leave an impression of high admiration. The final stanza may fairly be called great:

O then, all-seeing light,
High President of heaven,
You Magistrates, the stars,
Of that eternal court
Of Providence and Right,
Are these the bounds ye have given,
Th' untranspassable bars
That limit pride so short?
Is greatness of this sort,
That greatness greatness mars,
And wracks itself, self-driven
On rocks of her own might?
Doth Order order so
Disorder's overthrow?

The closeness of both thought and expression is here so great that it needs more than one reading to understand the lines, though the language is precise enough. And in other places a like reason makes Daniel not quite fluent reading, in spite of his clear diction and structure. But he is a worthy companion to Drayton, with whom he makes a happy contrast. We could well do with more such handy little reprints of the older poets.

An Essayist in the Stocks.

Montaigne: Études et Fragments. (Œuvre Posthume publiée par les Soins de M. Auguste Salles. Préface de M. Émile Faguet. (Paris: Hachette.)

EVER since the foundation of the Tower of Babel, fate has been jealous of magna opera. It is melancholy, but therefore not surprising, to learn that the studies of more than twenty years, directed by the late Prof. Guizot towards the achievement of a grand definitive edition of Montaigne's "Essais," were unfruitful as far as their main object was concerned. But what M. Faguet, in a long preface, is pleased to call a "très beau livre" has been compiled by Prof. Auguste Salles out of the snippets in Guizot's laboratory. Let us not be mistaken. The book is "très beau" in the sense of attaining an almost axiomatic neatness of expression and as the fulmination of a generous pro-Christian mind against the imperturbability of a selfish sceptic; but it is feverish and iterative. It nags at Montaigne, as it were. Moreover, while Guizot is turning Montaigne's wisdom inside out to the consternation of Sainte-Beuve (should he be looking on), he seems all the time to be puzzled as to the identity of his victim. "What was Montaigne?" we ask, and the fertility of the reply is amazing. He was "caractère détrempé plutôt que corrompu" (p. 42); "conscience éveillée et éternelle"

(p. 52); "un Ecclésiaste gascon" (p. 57); "un Girondin conservateur" (p. 63); "un pessimiste et un dégoûté en belle humeur" (p. 123); "un positiviste rêveur" (p. 131); "un endormeur" (229). Besides that he was "un aventurier et un habile, un inventeur prime-sautier et un styliste minutieux," and, shocking to state! he was "une des maîtresses plutôt qu'un des maîtres de l'esprit français" (p. 252). Ask, "Who was Montaigne?" and Prof. Guizot is equally communicative. He was "une espèce de Goethe superficiel" (p. 40); "un Socrate incomplet et infécond" (p. 160); "un Plutarque libertin" (p. 162); "le saint François de Sales des esprits profanes et moyens" (p. 171). He was also "cette Célimène gasconne dont nous sommes tous amoureux" (p. 165); he was even the "Hamlet" of France (p. 245). Now there is no mistaking the cleverness of much of this. "A pessimist in a good humour." Could anything be better? But a steady daylight were better than so many flashes of lightning.

Montaigne had the effect on Prof. Guizot of a chameleon, in a closet with looking-glasses on every side, who is so dazzled by the number of his images that he doesn't know himself. The Professor, en revanche, sternly determines to bring his man down to a very common level. As thus:

Montaigne dit dans ses Essais en parlant de ses enfants: "J'en ai perdu en nourrice deux ou trois, sinon sans regret, au moins sans fâcherie." O Montaigne! voilà un mot qui ne te fait point honneur! Il eût mieux valu ne savoir pas faire une distinction subtile entre la fâcherie et le regret, et savoir plus exactement le compte de tes enfants morts.

And again:

Bacon dit quelque part que si Lucrèce avait vu la Saint-Barthélemy, il serait devenu cent fois plus athée qu'il ne l'était. Eh, bien! Montaigne était plus flegmatique: il a vu la Saint-Barthélemy, et elle ne lui a pas arraché un cri.

He was a snob, insinuates the Professor; otherwise why did he write on the Ephemerides of his family that his father was "anterré à Montaigne, au tombeau de ses ancêtres," since the deceased was the first of his race to be interred there?

You incline to think Montaigne was impartial? First swallow this: "En politique Montaigne n'avait guère qu'une idée nette et juste." Then this: "Montaigne est le représentant de l'impartialité qui n'aboutit pas et ne sert à rien."

At any rate, you hold by Montaigne's style? "By all means," says the Professor in effect:

Cette puissance miraculeuse que, selon la Genèse, Adam eut pour nommer chacun des êtres nouvellement créés qu'il passait en revue, il semble que Montaigne l'a reçue à un degré aussi extraordinaire, au lendemain du chaos d'où sortait le monde moderne, pour nommer, définir, dépendre l'un après l'autre les sentiments petits ou grands, les pensées les plus générales ou les plus subtiles . . . qui se pressaient autour de lui.

But you are not to suppose that our Adam of the intellectual world invariably found the inevitable phrase at first. One of his most delicious—in a utilitarian country hardly one of his most popular—utterances originally ran: "Je ne trouve rien si chèrement acheté que ce qui me coûte du soing." You read it now: "Je presterois aussi volontiers mon sang que mon soing." As to his borrowings, the Professor throws up his hands; Montaigne was indeed a Latin scholar!

It seems that the worst of Montaigne's scepticism is that it is a cult. He repeats unceasingly that affirmation is an act of pride; he lives from day to day; his Bible may be reduced to Ecclesiastes. "Knock not, for it would not be opened; seek not, for you would not find; ask not, for it would not be given to you," in Prof. Guizot's bitter parody, is the gospel according to Montaigne.

In preferring the ordures of Rabelais to the sensuality of Montaigne, Prof. Guizot takes a popular line, but one that is fast becoming a cant. Venus emerging from the bath excites an impressionable youth to seek bonnes fortunes; so, let us say, does a dance at the Alhambra. The same youth passes a dung-heap holding his nose. Montaigne writes of love with relish and curiosity; a fairly refined nature can follow his epicureanism with pleasure. Rabelais writes of Gargantua's monstrous snortings and gluttonies, and makes us sick. Is nausea morality?

Montaigne's friendship for Etienne de la Boétie Prof. Guizot considers the "roman" of his life, and he applauds the pages devoted in the "Essais" to the author of the discourse on "La Servitude Volontaire." But he does not lose the opportunity of comparing the two to Montaigne's disadvantage.

In fine, Montaigne is not in the first rank of French writers. Why? Because to put him there implies the impotence of reason, the incomprehensibility of the world, the aimlessness of life, the retrogression of humanity. This strikes one as inconsequent, not to say hysterical. On the other hand, Prof. Guizot admits Montaigne's vast influence on the literature of Europe. He speaks of one known to him who found for two years the consolation of a broken heart in "those pages filled with irony and lassitude." Montaigne has "tout son esprit en un clin d'œil." But "are we here below to chat?" asks the Professor. It is to be assumed that a man with his soul in an eyelash is not going to commit us to anything serious. "Tut, tut," says M. Faguet, if we may venture to paraphrase him, "let us be thankful for his good company."

Wagner as a Letter Writer.

Richard Wagner; Letters to Wesendonck et al. Translated and Indexed by Wm. Ashton Ellis. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

Letters of Richard Wagner to Emil Heckel. With a Brief History of the Bayreuth Festivals. Translated and Indexed by Wm. Ashton Ellis. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

THERE is a tragic mot of Franz Schubert's which runs: "People think they are ever going to one another, and they only go near one another." Paul Pry feels this very acutely when he attempts to obtain an insight into the frame of mind in which great music is written, or when he endeavours to follow the process of composition. The written word touches the secret only to dismiss it: however deeply Mr. Pry dives into the desk of the departed, it is only an approach that he effects, never an arrival. We ourselves have abandoned the hope that letters would disclose for us the fundamental difference between the musician and the man in the street. And so in opening these volumes of Wagner's correspondence we are not disappointed to find that though we get near him we do not get to him. Nor are we chagrined to find that the prattle of a man like Ignatz Moscheles is vastly more "entertaining": the second-rate artist lives among his contemporaries and is the glass of fashion; the first-rate artist lives apart from his contemporaries and is the Narcissus-mirror of himself.

Mordant wit, a playfulness exuberant as a kitten's, a profound belief in his own need and worthiness to be subsidised, are perhaps the most characteristic features of Wagner's letters. The first thing we turn to is naturally ourselves. In the letters to Herr Wesendonck (a wealthy merchant whose acquaintance he made in 1852) we find the following passages:

No one here [in London] arrives at any kind of interest in a thing unwonted. . . . True art is something utterly strange to them, and they assuredly are not to be caught by anything but its incomings and outgoings. The equanimity with which these persons [the Philharmonic audience] listened to the singing of a wearisome duet [by Marschner], for instance, just thirty seconds after the close of the "Eroica," was an altogether new experience to me: all the world assured me that no one took the least offence at it, and exactly as the symphony, so was the duet applauded. . . . Anything more objectionable than the genuine English stamp . . . I cannot conceive: they one and all have the type of the sheep; and just as certain as the instinct of the sheep for finding out its fodder on the meadow is the Englishman's practical sense; his fodder he finds, to be sure, but the whole lovely field, with the blue heavens above it, unfortunately is non-existent for his organ of perception. [March, 1855.]

And again:

The real delight of the English is Oratorio; there their music becomes the interpreter of their religion—puissez moi le mot! Four hours long do they sit in Exeter Hall, listening to one fugue after another in perfect confidence that they have discharged a good deed, in reward for which they will get nothing whatever to hear in heaven but the loveliest Italian operatic arias. It was this deep fervour of the English public that Mendelssohn gauged so well when he composed and conducted oratorios. . . . Mendelssohn is to the English completely what their Jehovah is to the Jews. And Jehovah's wrath now strikes the unbelieving one; for you know that, among other great qualities, the dear God of the Jews is also credited with very much rancour. [April 5, 1855.]

"To think that he put up with us!" one is inclined to exclaim, for there is no superfluous charity in these observations. Can it be that, as Chopin says, "the English are the only people who pay well"? Considerations of hard cash might, indeed, have led to the founding of the Bayreuth festival in London, for we and Chicago were quite willing; but the King of Bavaria countermanded, as it were, these coals of fire. In extenuation of his bitterness it must be remembered that Wagner suffered keenly, like all epoch-makers, from a sense of isolation from the life of the world. There are moments when the enthusiasm of a whole population of posterity may not seem to the artist as valuable as the ignorant applause of a handful of Exeter Hallites. Here is a cri du cœur:

That I am alive, is the ground of every cry; that I am thus; that my whole being and doing place me so entirely out of all relation with the actual world, and yet I have to keep on living in this world, in it to satisfy my needs. . . . With all my thoughts and schemes I stand, and remain, too far outside all present possibility! Lest I should abandon everything and quite despair, just rarely now and then a tiny smile, is cast on me by my surrounding, which surprises me the more and produces the greater effect on me, as it comes so unexpectedly and from amid the coldest strangeness. . . . But I have grown accustomed to fix my eye no longer piercingly and lastingly upon this smile: nothing earnest, nothing decisive to be awaited from it; it remains but just a smile, and only meant to cheer one for a moment. [October 25, 1859.]

Then, after an amusing account of the indolence of Roger, the Paris Tannhäuser, who seized the first pretence to steal away from the pianoforte to the domino-table ("Yet—I see well enough that I must try to find myself in Roger too," adds Wagner), he bursts forth:

Now I am bracing myself to get air again for the last act of "Siegfried": breathe I but that once more, then everything is alike to me. For this I see: I am entirely what I am, only when I am creating. . . . My most congenial art-friends have nothing beyond astonishment for any new works; everyone who stands at all near to our public art life feels too feeble for hope. . . . And they really are right! Nothing teaches me better how terribly I have overleapt all around me than a good sharp look—down from myself—as those who stand between me and just that world. So let me work myself completely out: oh, had I nothing, nothing else to do upon the earth! Rest! Rest! that the inner torch may burn soft and bright, which flickers so wildly under the breath of this life of want, and—soon must be extinct. Let me but create the works I there was given, in peaceful, glorious Switzerland. . . . Let me finish them: then am I done with and redeemed! But ask nothing, nothing else from me.

It is to be hoped they did not, for Wagner had not much else to give, and what he gave were indeed "wonder works." It must not be lost sight of that the artist is essentially an utterer of a message—one of the predestined, in short—and that to reproach him with "Skimpoleism" is not fair. It is only when the soul surrounds itself with oblivion that it can create the forms of genius. Wagner stands alone, in a singular definiteness of intention. He sees his life mapped out, and, fearfully extravagant as we believe him to have been, there is no doubt as to his exclusive reverence for his art. "Purely and entirely for money I could not sell myself," he writes (June 5, 1860) by way of explanation for refusing an offer to conduct in Russia for 50,000 francs.

The "tiny smile" of circumstance expanded as we know, in spite of his fastidiousness, and in its excessive beamishness the artist felt afraid. Writing to Frau Eliza Wille (May 4, 1864), he says of Ludwig II. of Bavaria, his patron: "Alas! he is so handsome and intelligent, so splendid and so full of soul, that I fear lest his life should vanish like a fleeting dream of gods in this vulgar world." And on the 26th of May he writes to the same lady of "the fearful labour pains of my good fortune"; and with Teutonic devotion to metaphor, dubs her his "midwife." Why did it come with such "drastic swift-ness" this good fortune? It came at all, Wagner would have us believe, because amid "deepest humbling" he stayed "meek and kindly." We have our doots, but none of the good fortune. "I simply am thought an all-powerful minion," writes Wagner, September 9, 1864, "the other day the orphans of a female poisoner appealed to me."

He calls Frau Wille "dear, precious friend, and again "Precious!" tout court. Consequently it leaves a rather nasty taste in the mouth when he confides to her, May or June, 1864, that "my having so petted and spoilt my own wife by excessive indulgence, that at last she lost all power of rendering me a little justice, has become to me a Nemesis."

To Herr Emil Heckel, founder of the very earliest Wagner Society, and still a member of the Bayreuth Council of Administration, the composer displays a very playful disposition:

My dear friend Heckel,
my work-pot's Deckel [lid] is his definition of him, and Silas Wegg is offered much cause to look to his laurels. The whole tedious business of getting the Bayreuth Theatre built is enlivened with much amiable jocosity that displays Wagner in a very sympathetic light. Like all egoists of genius he was an epitome of men, and in spending himself he became diffusive. He could get the best out of executants because he fascinated them. On the last occasion that he conducted (the work was "Parsifal") Reichmann said: "A thing like that, one can only go through once. To such an expenditure of breath, such a tax on one's strength of voice in general, only the master himself can pin one." Again, at one of the rehearsals of the Ninth Symphony, in the old Margrave's Opera House:

Niemann called down to him [at the beginning of the quartet] from the so-called "trumpeters' box" where the soloists were stationed: "Master, if you don't beat time for me here I cannot sing." Wagner answered: "I shall not beat time, for it would make the rendering stiff. You must sing this passage with absolute freedom. . . . I paint it for you in the air." At the unison for the 'celli and double-basses, he said: "Gentlemen, you must know this by heart now. Look at me; there is no beating time; I draw it for you in the air. It must speak like a recitative." The effect was marvellous.

In closing these fascinating volumes we are conscious that we have not got "to" Wagner, but we have had a rare gossip with him in which he has assisted. It would be unreasonable to ask more.

Sheer Entertainment.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Edited by Dr. James A. H. Murray. Vol. V.: Horizontality—Hywe. (Clarendon Press. 5s.)

"With his legs horizontalised on his lodging-house sofa." This is almost the first quotation in the new part of Volume V. of the New English Dictionary. It occurs to us that a great many of our readers who are now horizontalising their legs on rural and seaside sofas could wish for no more entertaining reading than Dr. Murray's great dictionary affords. We are quite serious. Before now we have shown how easily enjoyment may be sucked from its pages. And although the size and make of the parts in which the dictionary is issued do not precisely recommend it for the shingle or a nest in the heather, yet if entertainingness is the important quality of holiday reading, then you have it here without stint or doubt. Besides which, the work affords to the resting man the spectacle of an industry so colossal that his sense of idle anchorage and of release from the hurly-burly must be deepened as he runs his eye down these wonderful columns, ranging through abstruse philological inquiry to gay quotation and curious analogy.

We have just used the word hurly-burly. It is one of the words dealt with in the present instalment, and its history is curious enough. In all reasonableness it ought to be nothing more than a sort of "initially-varied reduplication" of the word "hurly," meaning a commotion, an uproar. The odd thing is that "hurly-burly" is found in English literature more than half a century earlier than "hurly." Thus "hurly" first starts up in 1596 in The Taming of the Shrew. Petruchio says:

Ay, and amid this hurly I intend
That all is done in reverent care of her.

Whereas "hurly-burly" occurs as early as 1539 and 1545. Hall (1548) writes in his Chronicle: "In this time of insurrection and in the rage of horley-borley." As a verb the word is found in a political ballad of 1678:

This hurly-burly all the town
Makes Smith and Harris prattle.

Lindley Murray admonished his young grammarians to avoid "low expressions such as topsy-turvy, hurly-burly, and pell-mell," forgetting, perhaps, that Shakespeare had written:

When the hurly-burly's done,
When the battle's lost and won,

and not foreseeing that De Quincey, that verbal epicurean, would write six years later: "In the very uttermost hurly-burly of the storm."

In the same column "Hurrah" catches the eye. It is a later substitute for "Huzza." We are told that "hurrah" was the battle-cry of the Prussian soldiers in the War of Liberation (1812-13), from which time it became a cry of exultation, though in practice "hooray" is the word that is shouted. Yet "hurrah" is found in Addison's "Drummer" (1716) as "whurra!" and in "She Stoops to Conquer," someone shouts "Hurree, hurree, bravo!" Earlier than this, "hurrah" was used to denote a cry of joy, but the actual exclamation in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was "Huzza!" Thus, in Farquhar's "Recruiting Officer": "Huzza then! huzza for the queen and the honour of Shropshire." "Huzza!" is thought to have been originally a seaman's word. In a London Gazette of 1679 we may read: "At his passing over the Bridge the Castle saluted him with . . . three Hussaws, Seamen like," and various early writers connect the word with the sea. Dr. Murray suggests a connexion with "heisau!" "hissa!" which were hauling or hoisting cries. One is only surprised that the sibilant in "Huzza" was tolerated so long. In a short-lived allusive sense "huzza" stood for a riotous young fellow and a gallant.

Thus Wycherley's Dancing Master says: "We are for the brisk huzzas of seventeen or eighteen." And the party politics of Defoe's time crystallised one of its phases in "huzza-men," men paid to shout "huzza." An entry in a Flying Post of 1715 says: "For scores of huzza-men £40."

Less jubilant, though not less eager, kinds of shouting are those connected with the word "hue" in hue-and-cry. "Hue" stood alone once. As late as 1779 we read in the Gentleman's Magazine: "As soon as M. Lally appeared a hue was set up by the whole assembly, hisses, pointing, threats, and every abusive name." Poor M. Lally! And Drayton wrote:

Like as a Heard of over-heated Deere
With Hues and Hounds recov'ed every where.

Dr. Murray says there is some reason to believe that hue, as distinct from cry, originally meant inarticulate sound, including that of a horn or trumpet, as well as of the voice. This seems to be borne out by Blackstone, who, in his Commentaries, says: "An hue . . . and cry, hutesium et clamor, is the old common law process of pursuing, with horn and with voice, all felons." And until 1839 the English Police Gazette used the phrase in its sub-title, which still survives in the Police Gazette; or, Hue-and-Cry, published every Tuesday and Friday for Ireland. Dickens often used the phrase, and every one knows how "six gentlemen upon the road" raised the hue-and-cry against poor Gilpin. In 1734 a critic of the Northern Examiner said he had "made hue-and-cry" all over some unlucky author's book, but found not what he sought. Reviewers might note the phrase.

"Humbug" is an instance of a word which sprang no one knows whence, and has survived by its own vitality. It dates from about 1750, when, in a paper of the time, it was noted:

There is a word very much in vogue with the people of taste and fashion, which though it has not even the "penumbra" of a meaning, yet makes up the sum total of the wit, sense, and judgment of the aforesaid people of taste and fashion! . . . I will venture to affirm that this Humbug is neither an English word, nor a derivative from any other language. It is indeed a blackguard sound, made use of by most people of distinction! It is a fine make-weight in conversation, and some great men deceive themselves so egregiously as to think they mean something by it!

Three years later, in the Connoisseur, Earl Orrery wrote: "Single words, indeed, now and then broke forth—such as odious, horrible, detestable, shocking, Humbug. The last new-coined expression, which is only to be found in the nonsensical vocabulary, sounds absurd and disagreeable whenever it is pronounced." Evidently the new word hit hard. It was jeered at as belonging only to the pretenders to wit. And for a time the word was used to denote a witticism. Killigrew's Universal Jester (1754) contained "a choice collection of . . . bon-mots and humbugs," and elsewhere we read of "sprightly humbugs and practical jokes." And in the north, and in Gloucestershire, a humbug was a sweetmeat.

Disraeli wrote in Coningsby: "A government of statesmen or of clerks? Of Humbug or of Humdrum?" The words are subtly antithetical, humdrum being always allied to respectability and lack of enterprise. It is doubtful, says Dr. Murray, whether the "drum" has any connexion with "hum" except by a very usual reduplicating process. "Humtrum" occurs as early as 1553; but the word begins to be frequent only in the eighteenth century. Its meaning is admirably suggested by Addison in his ninth Spectator: "The Hum-Drum Club . . . was made up of very honest Gentlemen, of peaceable Dispositions, that used to sit together, smooke their Pipes, and say nothing till Mid-night." As a noun, denoting a dull person, the word occurs in Jonson's Every Man in His Humour, and Mr. Blackmore says, in Perly-cross: "There are none but hum-drums and jug-trots." "Humdrum" seems to have been suggested by the humming and sleeping of a top, and by low buzzing sounds conducive to slumber. The odd thing is that the same associations of rapid indistinct sound have caused the word "hum" to carry the opposite sense of activity. Mr. Kipling writes in Many Inventions: "The whole country was humming with Dacoits," and in America, and now in England, the significance of the word has been so forced up that to "make things hum" is to make them very lively indeed. Thus a new meaning becomes hostile to an older one. To "hum and ha," to hem and stroke one's beard, is to provoke the antagonist who wants to "make things hum." The question arises, did this intensification of the word hum take place in America? As in so many cases the answer is no! It is but a return to an old English sense. For while "hum" kept its associations of sleepiness and hesitation, or, at the most, a suppressed activity, the participle "humming" quite early detached itself for other duty. Thus, "caught in a humming lie" occurs in Gayton's Notes (1654), and a century later Horace Walpole notes that "Humming is a cant word for vast. A person meaning to describe a very large bird, said 'It was a Humming Bird.'" Could there be a quainter instance of the quarrels and divergences of words of the same family? Humming as applied to liquor meant effervescing and hence strong, intoxicating. "The wine was humming strong" says Sir Harry Wildair. But here the child had been forestalled by the parent. "Hum" meant strong or double ale long before Sir Harry Wildair's days. It is so used in Ben Jonson's The Devil an Ass, and Cotton writes in 1670: "The best Cheshire hum e'er drank in his life." Hence "hum-cap" a cant word for old, mellow beer, and—possibly—humpty-dumpty in its old meaning of ale boiled with brandy.

A phrase with a curious history is "humble pie." Why humble pie? Pies are not humble dishes, nor do most people feel humble when they are helped to pie. Eating the leek is quite another matter. We may not all be, like Pistol, "qualmish" at the smell of that wholesome vegetable, but his swallowing it under the blows of Fluellen is a picture which will for ever elucidate and consecrate the phrase. The explanation of "humble pie" may still be new to many. "Umbles" are the heart, liver, and other inward parts of the deer, and were the huntsman's perquisites. Dr. Brewer says: "When the lord and his household dined the venison pasty was served on the dais, but the humbles were made into a pie for the huntsman and his fellows." It seems reasonable, and Dr. Murray suggests that "humble pie" combines the two notions in a jocular way. According to Peacock, in Maid Marian, Robin Hood helped the sheriff to "numble pie . . . and other dainties of his table," but our impression has always been that the sheriff received on his platter the choicest cuts, and was made to eat "humble pie" only when his stomach was rejoiced and full.

It is interesting to find that "hush" as a substantive, meaning silence, was rarely used before this century. Dr. Murray suggests that Byron popularised this poetic use of the word. Thus in Childe Harold:

It is the hush of night, and all between
Thy margin and the mountains, dusk, yet clear,
Mellow'd and mingling, yet distinctly seen,
Save darken'd Jura, whose cap heights appear
Precipitously steep, etc.

Before Byron only two such examples are given, but later there are many. One might ramble on for hours in this well-ordered garden of words, facts, legends, and conceits. It is a harvesting of the past that Dr. Murray has undertaken, and not an ear of his gathered corn is empty or useless. But having set out to entertain, it becomes us not to weary. Abruptly, therefore, we horizontalise our pen.

An Aftermath of Jowett.

Letters of Benjamin Jowett. Edited by Evelyn Abbott and Lewis Campbell. (Murray.)

THIS volume contains miscellaneous letters and documents concerning Jowett, which did not find a place in the Life and Letters of this remarkable man published two years ago by the same editors. They are arranged roughly under subjects, and reflect several of Jowett's leading interests. The first section is headed "Church Reform." Among its contents are a series of excerpts from Jowett's evidence before the 1871 Committee on Religious Tests—curious dialectic this—a scheme submitted to Stanley in 1853 for the reform of cathedral institutions in general and Canterbury in particular, and a rather noticeable letter "To a Friend, who was hesitating about accepting a living." This is a plea—casuistical, one must think—for signing the Thirty-nine Articles without weighing too closely your liberal acceptance of them. "Do you think religious scruples are a thing to be encouraged?" asks Jowett; and it is interesting to observe the close resemblance of the solutions to the problem of "tests" devised by the extreme High Church and the extreme Broad Church champions respectively. Newman would sign the Articles in "a non-natural sense"; Jowett would sign them "in a large and liberal spirit."

After the theology comes a long letter to Sir Charles Trevelyan, containing some valuable suggestions on Civil Service organisation; and this is followed by a number of letters on European Politics and on India. Many of these are written to Sir Robert Morier, in whose diplomatic career Jowett took the closest interest. "If all the letters to Morier," says Dr. Abbott, "were collected together, they would form the record of a watchful, unwearied friendship, outspoken yet sympathetic, to which it would be difficult to find a parallel." The volume concludes with a section of miscellaneous letters, and with a few "Notes and Sayings" collected from various sources. Mainly from these latter pages we put together a few remarks of critical value upon some of Jowett's contemporaries. Thus of Tait he writes:

I read through the Archbishop of Canterbury's charge yesterday. A very weak and, I think, foolish production, of which the effect will last for six months at the utmost. He assumes a certain air of moderation, but he calls everybody who differs from him scoffers and unbelievers. He inclines more than formerly to the High Church, and wants to make a league of all Christians against unbelievers on the basis of the supernatural. I respect him for his hard work and earnestness, but I feel almost a contempt for him when I read his writings.

Of Herbert Spencer:

There is a fellow named Herbert Spencer . . . who knows a little of physical science, and gives back to the scientific men their own notions in a more general form. Of course, they worship him as a god; and instead of being thought an empty sciolist, he is regarded by them as the philosopher of the future. I hope that we shall some day put a spoke in his wheel at Oxford, but at present he is rather swaggering and triumphant.

Of Matthew Arnold:

Mat Arnold is a great loss to me. He was one of my firmest and dearest and best friends. Every year I had a higher opinion of him. No one ever united so much kindness and light-heartedness with so much strength. He was the most sensible man of genius whom I have ever known, and the most free from personality; and his mind was very far from being exhausted.

Finally there is an interesting appreciation of Tennyson, written in 1861, after one of Jowett's annual visits to the poet's home:

The more I see of him the more I respect his character, notwithstanding a superficial irritability and uneasiness about all things. I have a pleasure in repeating this about him, because I find he is so greatly mistaken by those who don't know him or only know him a little. No one is more honest, truthful, manly, or a warmer friend; but he is as open as the day, and, like a child, tells to any chance comer what is passing in his mind. He sometimes talks of going on with King Arthur. For my own part I hope he won't; he has made as much of it as the subject admits. Twenty years ago he formed a scheme for an epic poem on King Arthur in ten books: it is perhaps fortunate for himself that circumstances have prevented the completion of it. He dislikes Byron, but speaks very generously and warmly of Wordsworth. The subject on which I think he is most ready to converse—sometimes over a pipe—is (what do you think?) a future state, of which he always talks with a passionate conviction. He is the shyest person I ever knew, feeling sympathy and needing it to a degree quite painful. Please not to repeat this to the vulgar, who can never be made to understand that great mental troubles necessarily accompany such powers as he possesses. I should not tell it to you if I did not think you would comprehend it.

We do not think that the present book, any more than The Life and Letters, quite lets one into the "secret of Jowett." That, indeed, seems to have been an incommunicable thing, an affair of temperament and the personal relation, which the written word never quite managed to capture or convey. There have been such instances before—Sidney, for instance. The effect of Sidney upon the poets and men of action among whom he moved is certainly not adequately represented by some enigmatic sonnets and a frigid pastoral. And so it was with Jowett. The Jowett of the "Letters" is a busy man of the world, interested in many matters both practical and mental; a bit of a casuist, as we think; and certainly not averse to compromise. For the idealist you imagined you look in vain. There is sound common sense in every word; but hardly spiritual insight, hardly even the keener intellectual analysis. Yet that he was a spiritual force we know, from his friends and pupils. It was in the man then, and evaporated between pen and paper. On the other hand, of the morale of Jowett we are led to think more and more highly as we read. His steadfastness of purpose and sincere desire to do right are unmistakable. Thus he writes to Sir Robert Morier upon the double loss of Sir Robert's son and of poor Lewis Nettleship:

I think that sorrow should produce some good fruit in us, even though we are both rather tending to some kind of agnosticism. Tell me, old friend—it is a question that I ask myself—do I feel more desire to do good to others, more love of truth, more interest in important truths than formerly? Do I get better as I get older, or only keep on the accustomed tenor of my way? I think that sorrow should in some way be turned to good.

And there is a touching story in a footnote how, when Stanley lay dying, Jowett called at the Deanery to see him. Stanley, however, was already unconscious. Jowett, in considerable agitation, begged Canon Hugh Pearson to express to the Dean, should he recover, his "deep regret for having done so little, of late years, in support of his friend's continued efforts towards obtaining a greater latitude of opinion for the clergy."

DARK to its nest the light has gone;
An unseen force prevails,
And hands of storm lay hold upon
The rigging and the sails.

High heaves the heart of night, and loud
The water sobs and breaks,
And overhead one helmet-cloud
Its cap of darkness makes.

Strong wants whereto the welkin moves,
They are but waifs like me;
And all a storm of severed loves
That strain across the sea!

Laurence Housman in the "Dome."

A Master of Medicine.

Claude Bernard. By Sir Michael Foster, M.A., M.D., D.C.L., &c. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

THE "Masters of Medicine" series is a new step in the direction of popularising science. The list of names included in it—Hunter, Harvey, Simpson (the inventor of chloroform), Brodie, Helmholtz, Vesalius, &c.—places it on a higher range than the usual run of merely edifying biographies; and if the volume under notice be typical of the rest, it is plain that prominence will be given to the scientific achievements rather than the social side of the men selected. In the case of Bernard this may be partly due to lack of data as to his external life. Born on a vineyard in the St. Julien district of Beaujolais, he began his career in a chemist's dispensary at Lyons. The insight into the practice of medicine afforded him by this establishment, where all shop-sweepings were converted (like Mr. W. S. Gilbert's "bones and cold potatoes and broken pie-crusts and candle-ends") into a panacea for the deserving poor, drove him into literature, and on the profits of a one-act comedy he went up to Paris to seek his fortune with a maturer full-blown play in his pocket. The first advice he received, however, was to drop literature and stick to medicine, which he did, entering as a student in anatomy and physiology. His extraordinary dexterity in manipulation caused him to be appointed assistant to the great Magendie at the Collège de France, and here, in 1841, at the age of twenty-eight, he began those physiological studies which have made his name famous. Physiology at the time was practically under a ban. No proper laboratories or appliances existed for it; it was in a rudimentary state so far as knowledge went; and the experiments, performed under far less humane conditions than at present, were looked askance at by the police. Hampered as he was, however, Bernard speedily began to carry out important researches, first, as to the action and function of certain nerves, and, secondly, as to the digestive processes. The action of the pancreatic juice and the glycogenic function of the liver were his two main discoveries arising out of the latter investigation, and both were revolutionary in their influence over contemporary thought and knowledge. Sir Michael Foster gives, as a prelude to this branch of his subject, an account of the rival "vitalistic" and "physico-chemical" theories of organic life which prevailed at the time, and which Bernard's labours practically settled. Those were days when a man of original ideas and experimental skill could make great basic discoveries, and lay the foundations of future knowledge. Bernard, however, did even more than this. In his work on the liver and its functions he not only laid the foundations but built up the whole structure of knowledge, which has scarcely been added to materially since. His next great subject of investigation carried him back to the earliest of his published researches, on the chorda tympani, in which he had been led to examine the action of nerves on blood-vessels and glands. It is a curious point that although no man was ever more systematic and logical in his experiments than Bernard, or less addicted to "fishing" for results, yet his great discoveries were mostly due to some side issue arising out of his work, which he had the genius to appreciate and follow up. The glycogenic function of the liver, for instance, was a discovery arising out of an inquiry into the causes and possible cure of diabetes. So, in his next investigation, which had for its immediate object to determine the influence of the nervous system on animal heat, by far the most important outcome was his discovery of the vaso-motor function of nerves. The value of this discovery was instantly appreciated and taken up by physiologists all over the world; but Bernard himself, in this case, though fully aware of its importance, did not follow it up to the end himself, being more interested in his calorific experiments.

CLAUDE BERNARD.

Of Bernard's other work—his experiments on the physiological effect of poisons, especially of curare, the arrow-poison of the South American Indians, and his unfinished enquiry into fermentation, which partly corrected the magnificent work of Pasteur—Sir Michael Foster has much to say in a clear and lucid manner. Nor does he omit to point out how Bernard's record alone is a refutation of the calumny that physiologists have found out nothing important, urged by people who dislike their work on sentimental grounds. In this connexion it is interesting to note that all Bernard's experiments were undertaken with the object of explaining some obscure disease and discovering its cure. He was a physician first, and a physiological explorer second.

Personally, Bernard was one of those absorbed and reserved workers who take little interest in the political world outside them, and to whom fame comes without their seeking it. Of tall and splendid appearance, courteous, brilliant, and original, he was idolised by his students and much sought after by friends. Unhappily he married an ambitious and unsympathetic woman, whose only desire was for him to grow rich. His two daughters shared her shortcomings, and eventually retired with her into separation. At his death, in 1877, Bernard was honoured with a public funeral, and with almost national mourning, as one of the greatest men whose names adorned "La Patrie Reconnaissante." He was the first man of science to be so distinguished by his country, and Sir Michael Foster has done well to present in a book for English readers the true facts of his life and work, which are but little known, except in a form distorted to suit the purposes of the anti-vivisection propaganda.

Modern Aphorisms.

REWARD is its own virtue.

A living friend is better than a dead love.

Ye cannot serve God and women.

There's no fool like an old maid.

Of two evils choose the prettier.

Never put off till to-morrow what you can wear to-night.

Where there's a won't there's a way.

Nonsense makes the heart grow fonder.

Whosoever thy hand findeth to do, do with thy might.

The wages of sin is alimony.

He who loves and runs away may live to love another day.

Carolyn Wells in the "Criterion."

Other New Books.

FOLK-LORE IN BORNEO. BY WILLIAM HENRY FURNESS.

This is an unpretentious and attractive little monograph on the folk-lore of Borneo. The author aspires to present no more than a sketch of the curious beliefs held by some of the many tribes, differing from each other and separated by feuds and language, which make up the population of the island. The Borneans are savages of a rather high order, but their "fad" of head-hunting, as Mr. Furness calls it, makes them their own greatest enemies. This is the story of the Creation known to the Kayans of North-Western Borneo:

In the old, old days, when there was nothing but water and sky, there fell from the heavens an enormous rock; that part of it which protruded from the water was hard, slippery, and quite bare, with no soil nor plants upon it of any kind. After a long time, however, the rains produced slime upon the rock, and little worms, called halang, were bred in this slime, and they bored into the rock, and left fine sand outside of their burrows; this sand eventually became soil and covered the rock. Again years passed and the rock remained barren of all other life until suddenly there dropped from the Sun a huge wooden handle of a Parang (or sword) known as Haup Malat. This parang-handle sank deep into the rock, and, taking root in the soil, it sprouted and grew into a great tree, named Batang Utar Tatei, whose branches stretched out over the new land in every direction. When this tree was fully grown, there dropped from the Moon a long rope-like vine known as the Jikwan Tali. This vine quickly clung to the tree and took root in the rock. Now the vine, Jikwan Tali, from the Moon became the husband of the tree, Batang Utar Tatei, from the Sun, and Batang Utar Tatei gave birth to twins, a male and a female, not of the nature of a tree, but more or less like human beings.

The head-hunting rests its continuance on the belief that the taking of a head is necessary in order to reach the Bornean heaven.

The Kayan Hades is believed to be under ground, and like the Hades of the ancient Greeks, there is a guide to the entrance who corresponds to a certain extent to Charon. But their river Styx is not a stream, but a deep and wide ditch, through which flow ooze and slime swarming with worms and maggots; the souls of the departed must cross over this ditch, not by a ferry, but by means of a fallen tree-trunk, guarded by the great demon Maligang, who challenges all comers, and if they have no record of bravery he shakes the tree-trunk until they fall into the ditch below and are eternally tortured by the devouring worm that dieth not. Over the land of spirits presides the great demon Laki Tenangan, who assigns the souls to their proper place, and sees that they get their deserts, whether good or bad.

This Hades is divided into five regions, one of which is the joyless abode of suicides. In the Ling Yang region dwell the spirits of the drowned, who soon become exceedingly rich. "All the goods lost in rivers by the capsizing of boats in the rapids, or when they run foul of a snag in deep water, go into the coffers of the dwellers in Ling Yang."

Mr. Furness concludes with this human touch. He tells how he heard a Bornean mother crooning to her child the equivalent of "Hush thee my baby!" Thus:

From the River's mouth the birds are straying,
And the Baiyo's topmost leaves are swaying;
The little chicks cheep,
Now my little one sleep,
For the black house-lizard, with glittering eye,
And the gray-haired Laki Laieng are nigh!
Sleep, dear little one, sleep!

A few admirable photographs are scattered through Mr. Furness's pages. (Privately printed, Wallingford, Pennsylvania.)

THE ADVENTURES OF LOUIS DE ROUGEMONT.

BY HIMSELF.

The reader must make what he can of this book in the light of its contents and of the controversies which have raged around M. de Rougemont's narrative. The words, "As Told by Himself," on the title-page, seem to be the only concession which the editor and publishers make to public incredulity and scientific protest. Mr. Fitzgerald, the discoverer of M. de Rougemont, is his champion still. He tells us that "the Swiss Cantons glowed with pride on his account, and the great journals of France, pointing to the great world-renowned man, threw back at us our old jibe that a Frenchman cannot successfully colonise or rule savage races. There are many men in England who know Australia. Most of these wanted to get at de Rougemont, in order to overwhelm him. Many had the opportunity, and were soon converted into devoted adherents. The man was, in fact, a veritable Mahdi among the sceptics—those sceptics, that is, who had opportunities of conversing with him." The last phrase would seem to indicate that even Mr. Fitzgerald doubts whether the bare narrative can carry conviction. The opportunity of conversing with M. de Rougemont is not sold with the book. (Newnes, Ltd. 6s.)

J. CHAMBERLAIN.

PAR ACHILLE VIALATE.

We do not gather that M. Viallate has any affection for his hero; but he treats him, at any rate so far as English domestic politics are concerned, in the dry light of the scientific spirit, and the resultant portrait seems to us, on the whole, a very fair one. Some modification of this judgment is, however, required when we come to the later chapters of the book which deal with Mr. Chamberlain as the Colonial Secretary of the present Government. Like most of his fellow-countrymen, M. Viallate is smarting under the sting of Fashoda, and he is inclined to see the statesman whom he believes to have been the instigator of England's attitude with regard to that affair a little in the black.

It is to be observed, too, that M. Viallate has no hesitation as to the part played by Mr. Chamberlain in the Jameson Raid. He says:

Certainly the English Government has denied that it had any knowledge of that immoral attempt before it took place; but the singularly contemptuous attitude of the Colonial Secretary before the Parliamentary Committee appointed to investigate the affair permits the assumption that Mr. Chamberlain would have thought himself remarkably clumsy, and perhaps even remarkably blameworthy, if he had been so ill-informed. It is true that, as soon as Jameson's departure was officially known, he did not lose a second in telegraphing to the Cape to stop it by every possible expedient. But, most unfortunately, it just happened that the telegraph wire between the Cape and Pitsani had been cut. Who could have expected it?

M. Viallate's uncharitable view is also that taken by no less learned a student of English politics than M. Boutmy himself. M. Boutmy says outright of Mr. Chamberlain: "He conceived and prepared the Jameson expedition against the Transvaal, the result of which is notorious." Neither writer appears to think that the matter is one upon which there can be two opinions; and the bias which we cannot but feel that they show, when compared with the reasonable and impartial tone of the larger part of the book, is only another illustration of the extraordinary difficulty of arriving at a scientific treatment of events and personalities which are still the focus of controversy. Obviously any book attempting to sum up Mr. Chamberlain is a "little previous." (Paris: Alcan.)

Fiction.

The Virgins of the Rocks. Translated from the Italian of Gabriele D'Annunzio by Agatha Hughes. (Heinemann. 6s.)

DECIDEDLY this is the best of D'Annunzio's novels yet translated into English. Free from the sinister and obscene characteristics of the trilogy strangely called The Romances of the Rose, it exists in a purer and more lofty air; and, though one is conscious of a certain ebb and flow in the fundamental imaginative power, the sum and quality of beauty obtained is immeasurably finer, richer, more considerable, than in any previous work. Realistic, of course—for D'Annunzio would be the last man in Europe to trifle sentimentally with fact—The Virgins of the Rocks is, nevertheless, the fruit of an implacable reaction against the realism of French schools, that realism which we in England have apparently just discovered. It is a spiritual novel. The trivialities of daily corporeal life have no place in it: they are assumed. Even time and place seem to be ignored as inessential. The period is vaguely suggested by political reference, and we are told of an ancient palace furnished with mirrors wherein the three cloistered and beautiful heroines behold their own sorrow, but beyond this the action of the drama moves almost unfettered by physical limitation. There is nothing like it in English fiction, and very little in French; Maurice Barrès' Le Jardin de Bérénice alone occurs to us as having points of similarity in the manner of conception. It shows that the novel, as a form of imaginative art, has not yet reached the zenith of serious significance; that there are in it not only æsthetic but philosophic and even didactic possibilities which remain to be generally exploited. That such an exploitation when it happens will demand from novel readers an increased mental activity and a more complete surrender, and will therefore encounter an opposition of ridicule, is beyond question. Nevertheless it will happen, is indeed now happening. Hitherto the novel has been regarded (if you look the fact squarely in the face) as an aid to digestion. The public has said to its novelists: "We have dined. Now divert us." And even a Balzac has not disdained to comply. To its poets the public would never dare to offer such effrontery. A change will come. The time approaches when we shall have to "tackle" our novels as we tackle Paradise Lost, or The Ring and the Book, or the score of Tristan und Isolde.

We do not imply that The Virgins of the Rocks is, to use the slang term, difficult. It is not difficult. But it is grave, weightily philosophic. It is far from being a "story," and its beauty, while full of enchantment, is profoundly austere. Briefly expressed, the book is a relation of the adventures of a man's soul among the souls of three women. Claudio is an egotist in the best and sternest sense; his one aim is to cultivate himself. By descent and by conviction he is an aristocrat. Here is one of his axioms:

The world represents the sensibility and the thought of a few superior men who created it, and in the course of time have enlarged and adorned it, and who in the future will continue to enlarge and adorn it more and more. The world, as it appears to us to-day, is a magnificent gift from the few to the many, from free men to slaves, from those who think and feel to those who work. . . . I recognised my own highest ambition in the desire to bring some ornament, to add some new value to this human world which is being eternally embellished by beauty and sorrow.

And this is his aim:

Thou, therefore, shalt labour to carry out thy own destiny and that of thy race. Thou shalt have before thy eyes at the same time the premeditated plan of thy existence and the vision of an existence superior to thine own. Thou shalt live in the idea that each life being the sum-total of past lives is the condition of future lives. Thou shalt not, therefore, look upon thyself only as the beginning, aim, and end of thy own destiny, but thou shalt feel the whole value and the whole weight of the inheritance received from thy ancestors, which thou must transmit to thy descendant countersigned with the stamp of thy most vigorous characteristics. Let the supreme conception of thy dignity be founded on the certainty, so sure in thee, that thou art the preserving link of a multifold energy which to-morrow, or after the lapse of a century, or at some indefinite time, may reassert itself in a sublime manifestation. But hope that it may be to-morrow!

The words which we have italicised are specially important, since the theme of the book is Claudio's savouring of the souls of the three sisters, Massimilla, Anatolia, and Violante, in order to choose his proper mate. Upon the drawing of these women, the first—type of the adoring slave, the second—type of the mother and healer, the third—type of the imperial sovereign, D'Annunzio has lavished all his powers. He has striven here to create the loftiest beauty, and he has created it. These rare creatures, sad with the melancholy of a race about to decay, radiant with the final splendour which precedes dissolution, wistful by reason of a destiny never to be satisfied, move through the drama with a feminine perfection of bodily and spiritual elegance seldom equalled and certainly never surpassed in any previous prose fiction. The imaginary utterances by which each, to Claudio's secret fancy, reveals herself are shaped in a manner which is simply masterly:

"A boundless desire for slavery makes me suffer," says Massimilla silently, as she sits on the stone seat, her hands, with fingers interwoven, clasped round her weary knee. "I have not the gift of communicating happiness; but my whole being, more than any other creature, more than any inanimate thing, is ready to become the perfect and perpetual possession of a master."

A boundless desire for slavery makes me suffer. I am devoured by an unquenchable yearning to give myself up entirely, to belong to a higher and stronger being, to dissolve myself in his will, to burn like a holocaust in the fire of his great soul. . . .

I am she who listens, admires, and is silent.

From my birth I bear on my forehead between my eyebrows the sign of attention.

I have learned from the calm and intensity of statues the immobility of harmonious attitude. I can keep my eyes open and turned upwards for a long time, because my eyelids are light.

The shape of my lips forms the living and visible image of the word 'Amen.'"

Claudio, after an interlude with Massimilla, turns by right instinct to Anatolia, who was assuredly born to be the mother of great men. But Anatolia, glowing with the consciousness of duty to her venerable father, her mad mother, and her fragile brothers, refuses him. She was wrong, because she loved him; but she was a woman. So the book ends, inconclusively, demanding a sequel. We shall look forward to the succeeding parts of the trilogy, La Grazia and L'Annunziata, which in due course are to appear in English. If these are translated as well as The Virgins of the Rocks they will be models of good translation.

Dead Oppressors. By Thomas Pinkerton.
(Swan Sonnenschein.)

MR. PINKERTON deserves a wider popularity than has hitherto been his portion. Some nine or ten novels stand to his name, but that name is not familiar to the public. Yet Mr. Pinkerton has a most engaging and original wit, and a very genuine imagination. We anticipated excellence in Dead Oppressors. We were not disappointed. Indeed, the quality of its excellence, despite certain shortcomings, surprised us. Mr. Pinkerton deals with the fortunes of an old aristocratic family, and an old town intimately connected therewith. The Birlingfords and Old Millington were alike rotten, impoverished, eaten up with inherited vice and present malpractice, existing feebly under the sinister shadow of those "dead oppressors" their ancestors. Here is a characteristic description of the town:

The chief feature of Old Millington was a triangular space in the centre of the town, known as "The Stallage," perhaps from some old market-stall impost that had used to be levied there centuries ago. It was bordered by the chief public buildings, the estate office, and the dens of the leading solicitors, who lived sparsely on what was left of Old Millington, like moths upon an old rug. These buildings were so alike in a sort of bald, hapless decrepitude and liability to sudden collapse as to floor or stairs or ceiling, that it seemed almost as if they were the product of some sort of architectural commingling of first cousins. There was more appearance than stability about them. They were old houses, with bad circulations and constitutions, but new fronts. Now and then one of them had some disastrous internal complaint, not too easy to diagnose, though the term dry-rot might cover much; just as every now and then one of their occupiers would put out a limb through weakness, or settle down to a two months' dozy illness, for no apparent reason except, perhaps, that he was connected by marriage with nearly every other occupant of "The Stallage," and that he was the result of generations of such close connexion. The rest might, and probably did, congratulate themselves on such occasions, just as the skipper of one of an unseaworthy fleet of worn-out coasters might be glad, when he saw a colleague lose a spar, that it was not him this time.

The hero of the tale is Lord Eric Langdon, second son of the old Marquis, a young man of noble impulses, but thin-blooded and unsure of himself at a crisis. Lord Eric falls in love with Dalica Desmond, beautiful daughter of the pugnacious and scholarly Irish rector, a girl nourished on Greek and trout-fishing. Dalica caught trout for a living, and also wrote for Radical newspapers. She was a creature in every way superior to Eric; nevertheless, she loved him, and Dalica in love is superb. Mr. Pinkerton makes a real triumph in his love-scenes. They have the beat of a sane animal passion that would have pleased Théophile Gautier. Dalica might have been derived from Mademoiselle de Maupin.

It was inevitable that Lord Eric should come into the title, as it was also inevitable that he should, yielding once only to atavism, throw over Dalica and marry a couple of millions. Such happenings, though conventional, are excusable in a book whose strength and interest are not in its plot. But we think that Mr. Pinkerton exceeded his proper license when he made Lord Eric's son by his wife fall in love with Lord Eric's daughter by Dalica. The trick is stale and ineffective. It merely annoys. The culminating disaster, which swallows up the line of Langdon, is, however, well managed and compels sympathy.

Without exception the characters are finely and firmly drawn. The old Marquis is a sketch such as we seldom get in modern fiction. The analysis of Dalica's mother and the racial forces at work in her (pp. 175-179) is simply masterly. Mr. Desmond himself is an admirable creation.

Dead Oppressors is a notable novel. Had it been written with a little more dignity (and, let us add, grammatical correctness), and with a little more patient building-up of detail, it would have counted among the best novels of the year. Its spirit, its originality, and its imagination are indubitable.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

SIREN CITY.

BY BENJAMIN SWIFT.

A new volume by the author of Nancy Noon, The Tormentor, and The Destroyer is a welcome incident. As we stated a fortnight ago, Siren City deals with the disillusion of an international marriage. The hero is an Englishman, and the "Siren City," where the chief characters foregather, is Naples. (Methuen. 6s.)

A SON OF THE STATE.

BY W. PETT RIDGE.

This is the last addition to the sixpenny "Novelist" Library. It is a close study of the humours of low life in London. "The round white September moon lighted up Pitfield-street from end to end." Now Pitfield-street is in Hoxton, and Mr. Ridge has aforetime proved that he knows his "Oxton." (Methuen. 6d.)

THE HACIENDA ON THE HILL.

BY RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

The histories of the Spanish-American War have been many: the novels, we suppose, will now begin. This story, by the author of My Official Wife, introduces us to the Spanish and Cuban armies, and includes General Weyler in its list of characters. (Routledge. 2s. 6d.)

A SON OF RIMMON.

BY ATHOL FORBES.

This novel, by the author of Cassock and Comedy, takes its colour from the following proposition in the preface: "The belief in witchcraft is not dead. The next question follows naturally, Is there anything in witchcraft? To this I unhesitatingly reply, I believe there is; and this idea has moulded the character of the priest in the present volume." (Jarrold. 3s.)

I.

BY MARJORIE WILLIAMSON.

Confessedly a first book. It is a very short story, filling sixty-nine tiny pages. Fragile, sentimental, but not unpromising. (Arrowsmith. 6d.)

LOVE SHALL REIGN SUPREME.

BY G. S. ASTINS.

We read that Lucy Brookfield was clad in a loose-fitting garment that graced her perfect figure with charming easiness, and as she rested her head upon her lily-hued hand, she appeared to Geoffrey as some beautiful statue: too lovely to be of the living, too divine to lay claim to the essence of mortality; yet her bosom throbbed beneath the silky wavelets of her dress, and her face was suffused with the roseate hues of life; silently they bore witness to the fact that her loveliness was in very truth a living reality.

Gracious! Mr. Astins should study everyday people and things. (North Herefordshire Publishing Co.)

MATTHEW QUIN, WILD BEAST AGENT.

BY W. MURRAY GRAYDON.

Red-hot reading for boys. Quin gives his experiences in successive chapters, with such taking titles as these: The Outwitting of Tharadeen, the Dacoit—The Mystery of the Wrecked Circus Train, &c. We were boys once, and it does us good to find the old note rung again on the toccin of melodrama:

On and on through the fleet night air, to the music of galloping hoofs and the clank of arms. Mile after mile slipped behind, and the Indians were gaining steadily. Then a silver gleam flashed close ahead, and the fugitives drew rein on the brink of the Rio Gila. But now the river was full and flowing swiftly—there must have been heavy rains near its head. In the middle of the three-hundred-yard current rose a little island, covered with stones and bushes.

"It's all right," said Calkins. "This ford is passable in high water; and it's the only one that is for fifty miles in both directions."

The horses plunged into the surging tide, and without once getting off their feet they carried their riders safely to the island. It was shaped somewhat like a bowl, the rim of which was formed of loose rocks and bushes. Quin examined the spot with a critical eye—with a plan taking form in his mind.

(James Henderson. 3d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Love of Jeremy Taylor.

THE phrase is Charles Lamb's. He felt that a love of Jeremy Taylor's works is one of the good things of life, and he would not have his friends miss it. In 1796 he had not awakened to this need. The postscript to a letter to Coleridge in that year runs: "I will get Nature and Art: have not seen it yet, nor any of Jeremy Taylor's works." Three years later, writing to Manning, Lamb refers to Taylor casually, lightly. But in 1801 he wrote two long letters about Jeremy Taylor to his young Quaker friend—one might almost say his pupil in literary taste—Robert Lloyd. He deals with an inquiry of Lloyd's as to a selection from Jeremy Taylor's works, replying plumply: "It cannot be done, and if it could it would not take with John Bull. It cannot be done, for who can disentangle and unthread the rich texture of Nature and Poetry, sewn so thick into a stout coat of theology, without spoiling both lace and coat?" And then, with instances pat, and similes all Elia, he seeks to show the folly of the task.

We do not doubt that Elia was right. Still, the doctrine of the indivisibility of Taylor's, of Shakespeare's, and of our best writers' works is somewhat of a counsel of perfection; and Lamb's own Selections from the Old Dramatists countenance an easier view. It is significant that Lloyd did want a selection, and significant that very soon, to be precise, in 1805, a Selection of Thoughts of Divines and Philosophers was published, wherein Jeremy Taylor is regnant over a third of the pages. This was compiled by Basil Montagu, a writer on legal subjects, who brought to his task excellent moral intentions, but little taste or sense of artistic arrangement. However, his book ran through several editions, and the author's hope that it would contain "the slip for use, and part of the root for growth" has no doubt been fulfilled, since no set of selections from Jeremy Taylor could fail to furnish passages of fine teaching. It is, however, as a treasury of English prose, and not, we imagine, as a guide to conduct or an incentive to piety, that Montagu's book has just been reprinted by Mr. Dent in the "Temple Classics" series." In an age which has no time to pore over folios, and is shy of anything like dusty divinity, the collection may "take with John Bull," but we could wish that a new editor had been asked to select and arrange the best passages of Taylor, South, Latimer, and Hall.

It was on April 6, 1801, that Charles Lamb sent to Robert Lloyd the glowing panegyric on Taylor, which Mr. Lucas had the privilege to make public property last year in his Charles Lamb and the Lloyds. In this letter Lamb glories in inducting Lloyd into the presence of "Doctor Jeremy Taylor, Late Lord Bishop of Down and Connor in Ireland, and Administrator of the See of Dromore. Such are the titles which his sounding title-pages give him, and I love the man, and I love his paraphernalia, and I like to name him with all his attributions and additions." And then Lamb directs his friend to passage after passage. And first to "a simile of a rose, or, more truly, many similes within simile," in the first chapter of Holy Dying. Here it is:

It is a mighty change that is made by the death of every person, and it is visible to us who are alive. Reckon but from the spritfulness of youth and the fair cheeks and the full eyes of childhood, from the vigorousness and strong flexure of the joints of five-and-twenty to the hollowness and dead paleness, to the loathsomeness and horror of a three days' burial, and we shall perceive the distance to be very great and very strange. But so I have seen a rose newly springing from the clefts of its hood, and at first it was fair as the morning, and full with the dew of heaven, as a lamb's fleece: but when a ruder breath had forced open its virgin modesty, and dismantled its too youthful and unripe retirements, it began to put on darkness, and to decline to softness and the symptoms of a sickly age; it bowed the head, and broke its stalk; and at night, having lost some of its leaves and all its beauty, it fell into the portion of weeds and outworn faces. The same is the portion of every man and every woman.

Will it be believed that in Basil Montagu's page the passage ends thus:

and at night, having lost some of its leaves and all its beauty, it fell, &c.

and that the editor of the "Temple Classics" permits this mutilated version to stand?

"Or for another specimen," continues Lamb—and with what a sober certainty of true guidance we await his word—"turn to the story of the Ephesian matron in the second section of the fifth chapter of the same Holy Dying." "Read it to yourself," he goes on, "and show it to Plumstead (with my Love, and bid him write to me), and ask him if WILLY himself has ever told a story with more circumstances of FANCY and HUMOUR." We obey, and find the bishop is discoursing on grief. "But that which is to be faulted in this particular is, when the grief is immoderate and unreasonable," which excess, he says, soon exhausts the very ability to grieve, and opens the door to contrary affections, "while a sorrow that is even and temperate goes on to . . . the distances of a past time." Which proposition he supports with this story:

The Ephesian woman that the soldier told of in Petronius was the talk of all the town, and the rarest example of a dear affection to her husband. She descended with the corpse into the vault, and there being attended with her maiden, resolved to weep to death, or die with famine or a distempered sorrow: from which resolution, nor his nor her friends, nor the reverence of the principal citizens, who used the entreaties of their charity and their power, could persuade her. But a soldier that watched seven dead bodies hanging upon trees just over against this monument, crept in, and a while stared upon the silent and comely disorders of the sorrow: and having let the wonder awhile breathe out at each other's eyes, at last he fetched his supper and a bottle of wine, with purpose to eat and drink, and still to feed himself with that sad prettiness. His pity and first draught of wine made him bold and curious to try if the maid would drink; who, having many hours since felt her resolution faint as her wearied body, took his kindness, and the light returned into her eyes, and danced like boys in a festival: and fearing lest the pertinaciousness of her mistress's sorrows should cause her evil to revert, or her shame to approach, assayed whether she would endure to bear an argument to persuade her to drink and live. The violent passion had laid all her spirits in wildness and dissolution, and the maid found them willing to be gathered into order at the arrest of any new object, being weary of the first, of which like leeches they had sucked their fill till they fell down and burst. The weeping woman took her cordial, and was not angry with her maid, and heard the soldier talk. And he was so pleased with the change, that he, who at first loved the silence of the sorrow, was more in love with the musick of her returning voice, especially which himself had strung and put in tune; and the man began to talk amorously, and the woman's weak head and heart were soon possessed with a little wine, and grew gay, and talked, and fell in love; and that very night, in the morning of her passion, in the grave of her husband, in the pomps of mourning, and in her funeral garments, married her new and stranger guest.

A prudent as well as a partial counsellor, Lamb warns Lloyd to read Bishop Taylor with allowances, and to skip or "patiently endure" his tedious discourses on rites and ceremonies, the Clerical function, the Eucharist, and other doctrinal and polemical matters. But he is, "above all," to try to get Taylor's tract on Measures and Offices of Friendship. In Basil Montagu's collection the extracts from this opusculum fill about ten pages—pages written in gold. We select a single passage:

I will love a worthy friend that can delight me as well as profit me, rather than him who cannot delight me at all, and profit me no more; but yet I will not weigh the gayest flowers, or the wings of butterflies, against wheat; but when I have to choose wheat, I may take that which looks the brightest. I had rather see thyme and roses, marjorum and July flowers that are fair and sweet and medicinal, than the prettiest tulips that are good for nothing: and my sheep and kine are better servants than racehorses and greyhounds. And I shall rather furnish my study with Plutarch and Cicero, with Livy and Polybius, than with Cassandra and Ibrahim Bassa; and if I do give an hour to these for divertisement or pleasure, yet I will dwell with them that can instruct me, and make me wise and eloquent, severe and useful to myself and others.

Said not Charles Lamb truly that Jeremy Taylor's similes and allusions "are taken, as the bees take honey, from all the youngest, greenest, exquisest parts of nature, from plants, and flowers, and fruit, young boys and virgins, from little children perpetually, from sucking infants, babies' similes, roses, gardens . . . where no foul thoughts keep leets and holydays."

And although Jeremy Taylor often rose to the empyrean of contemplation, or was often concerned with the nearness of death, yet he was sometimes the smiling and practical counsellor, enlarging on friendship, nature, conversation, and on the pleasures of marriage. Of marriage the Bishop gives this account:

Marriage is the proper scene of piety and patience, of the duty of parents and the charity of relations; here kindness is spread abroad, and love is united and made firm as a centre; marriage is the nursery of heaven. The virgin sends prayers to God; but she carries but one soul to Him; but the state of marriage fills up the numbers of the elect, and hath in it the labour of love, and the delicacies of friendship, the blessing of society, and the union of hands and hearts. It hath in it less of beauty, but more of safety than the single life; it hath more care, but less danger; it is more merry, and more sad; is fuller of sorrows, and fuller of joys; it lies under more burdens, but is supported by all the strengths of love and charity, and those burdens are delightful.

Jeremy Taylor was far too ripe a gentleman to be a traducer of life and its good things. Well did George Rust, Bishop of Dromore, say over his grave: "He was a rare humanist . . . hugely versed in all the polite parts of learning . . . not unacquainted with the refined wits of the later ages, whether French or Italian . . . courteous, and affable, and of easy access." Quoth Lamb, "I love the man." How could he choose but love the stately divine—Late Lord Bishop of Down and Connor in Ireland, and Administrator of the See of Dromore—who could temper instruction with words like these:

Here is pleasure enough for a christian at present; and, if a facete discourse, and an amicable, friendly mirth can refresh the spirit, and take it off from the vile temptation of peevish, despairing, uncomplaining melancholy, it must needs be innocent and commendable. And we may as well be refreshed by a clean and a brisk discourse, as by the air of Campanian wines; and our faces and our heads may as well be anointed and look pleasant with wit and friendly intercourse, as with the fat of the balsam-tree; and such a conversation no wise man ever did or ought to improve.

There Jeremy Taylor spoke in Charles Lamb's ear.

Things Seen.

A City That Was: Her Past.

THE teeth of Winchelsea are drawn, her claws are pared. Archers no longer man the battlements of this Gibraltar of the plains. Kings and queens visit her no more. Never again will her harbour give asylum to the entire British fleet. Her harbour? It is no more! Once the sea washed three sides of Winchelsea. The sea is now a blue streak on the horizon. Where the British fleet rocked at anchor, the arms of the commanders embroidered on the sails, the red cross blazoned on the white shirts of the mariners, are now green fields and corn lands, little dykes, and rambling rivers, patient kine, innumerable sheep, and white winding roads. Perched three hundred feet above the roaming plains, perched on her arable and wooded rock, very old, very content, Winchelsea dozes. A thousand years of triumphant life are behind her. Great things were done within her walls. But—finis. She makes no more history. "I was!"—that should be the motto carved on her crumbling gates. To-day I stand on her grass-grown battlements: I close my eyes, and straight the splendid past of the two Wincheseas—the Old and the New—streams ghostlike through the lanes of history. The Winchelsea on whose grass-grown battlements I stand musing is the New, a child of six hundred years. Old Winchelsea fished and fought and failed down there in the marshes where Camber Castle sprawls like a fungus on the plains.

Six hundred years ago Old Winchelsea fell asleep in the arms of the sea. Her fate was her fate—preordained, inevitable. She was never a land city. The sea was her foster-mother. To the sea she belonged, and one day of masterful storm the old longing became too strong, and Old Winchelsea went back to the sea.

"I will go back to the great sweet mother,
Mother and lover of men, the sea.
I will go down to her, I and none other,
Close with her, kiss her and mix her with me."

But the sea was the Ancient Foe, not the foster-mother, of the sailormen of Old Winchelsea. So when the waves roared down the streets and spat at their hearths, they shook their matted locks from their eyes, and climbing this rock, grass-grown and wooded, squatted on the height far out of reach of the sea, and prayed for help: sure, being sailormen and pious, that help would come. It came: royal help. Edward the First built New Winchelsea on this rock, 300 feet above the sea. He divided the land (there were 150 acres within its walls) into thirty-nine spaces of equal size, and in the chiefest he reared a great church, some of which Time has spared to this day. Through the city east and west, north and south, he drove broad, straight streets, and for two hundred years New Winchelsea was second to no seaport town in England.

One day in the year 1350 rises before me. Citizens and archers hustle one another on the walls; the streets are aflame with banners; men in armour peer through the gates; for out there in the bay a roaring fight is in progress, and Edward the Third and the Black Prince are each commanding ships of the Winchelsea squadron. That fight went well for England: the capture of twenty-six Spanish galleons was what the men of Winchelsea had to show; and sitting here on the grass-grown battlements this lazy summer afternoon, looking over the sun-steeped marshes, I hear, I think, the shouting as Edward and the Black Prince, stained with blood, tumbled by battle, climb the hill, and swagger through the shouting, joyous people. But it was the French this old city fought oftenest. Three times was Winchelsea burnt and sacked, and bitter and many were her reprisals. She lived amid fire and slaughter, for might was right, and all who were not of our breed were against us. And throughout all those perils of conquest and retaliation, in a green field beyond the city wall, stark against the sky, stood the Holy Rood of Winchelsea—the Holy Rood—gaunt, bare, minatory, comforting, guarded by two friars who lived close by in the home of the Holy Cross. It confronted travellers as they approached the town from the land side; that great, grave symbol stayed in their memory after they had left the portcullised gate far behind. In the evening its shadow crossed the city, in the morning its shadow fell upon the sea. The sea! Ah! it was the sea, not the fury of the French, nor the Spaniards, nor the Dutch, nor the inconsistency of kings that brought New Winchelsea low. The sea conquered Old Winchelsea by an embrace. She overcame New Winchelsea by deserting her.

Her Present.

I stand upon a mound of stones, once the northern angle of the city wall. These few stones are all that remain of the tower, whence the harbour master commanded the great haven. Again and again he saw his monarch, an army aboard his ships, sail forth to victory. I see only the sun-steeped plain, encompassing three sides of this ancient city—the plain of corn lands, and green lands, and dwarf bushes dark against the rich grasses; the plain of white, winding roads, little dykes, and bright rivers; the plain where innumerable sheep, scattered and patient, graze, and, day by day, the temperate breezes blow. On the west stretch the green hills of Udimore. Far away to the east the thin emerald belt of the sea curves and clasps the land. Up here, where the ancient city dozes in the sunshine and men are hale at ninety, nothing ever happens. King Edward's church still dominates the little houses that nestle about her. Sheep graze in the churchyard. In the corner where stood the campanile whose bells the French captured and carried away a painter sits. The sails of a windmill flap leisurely on the site of the outlook castle. Nothing happens at Winchelsea now. It is a place people pass through. They call her sweet, and photograph her—that is all. She lingers, a veteran on the stage of history. But who would have her changed? Sedate, peaceful, beautiful is she in her old age. As day declines, and the setting sun touches the waterways, and the flocks of homing birds pick themselves out black against the luminous sky, a great peace falls on the old city, and on those who have chosen her—that peace which is the attribute of lands where the eye can roam from horizon to horizon. Here, in later times, came Thackeray to write Dennis Duval, Millais to paint a picture, and Coventry Patmore to brood his thoughts into a little volume, quiet and suggestive as the ancient city herself—quiet as her night mood, the great, felt darkness over her plains—dark, dark, save for the lights on Dungeness, the swift-passing lamps of the distant liners, and all the stars.

Pierre Loti's Outlook

Loti's new book, Reflets sur la Sombre Route (Paris: Calman Lévy), is no story, but the desultory, broken record of a vagabond-soul's saunterings in those shadowy aisles and dusky groves which lie so far away from the glaring well-trodden high-road along which the average novelist methodically jogs. Fugitive impressions of atmosphere, melting nuances of mood are captured, more with a view to please the author's own taste than the reader's. The subdued musical chant of Loti's prose (heard in all his pages, but never stale) gives something like artistic harmony and form to the disjointed matter. Little is new in the new Loti, for Loti is always Loti, even when he masquerades as a Mohammedan to make love to Aziyadé, or as the Japanese lover de Madame Chrysanthème. Again, in Reflets sur la Sombre Route we have the same sailor of sentiment and emotion sucking melancholy from every landscape, flying from the commonplace of everyday material life to the realms of phantastic illusion. He is an æsthetic coquette who seeks ever a pose from which he views all things through a glamour, loses sight of reality in a mirage, and thus is saved from himself—more haunted than ever by his horror of the barren, unchanging monotony of the eternal.

Loti shrinks, too, from the universality of annihilation, from the "Triumph of Death." With the acute sensibility of some of d'Annunzio's heroes, he is a slave in the bondage of sensuous impressions. The tempo of modern life irritates him, and his subtle receptivity rebels against it. His nerves are swept like the strings of a harp with a pervading pity, the sense of tears in mortal things. Death paints itself for him in the fading colours of autumnal scenery in foreign zones, pictures of silence and coming nothingness. Out of this mood grows a sympathy, tender and Buddha-esque, with all groaning and traving creation, compassion for the weary and toilworn and for the aged, bent under the burden of existence. There is nothing active or philanthropic in such wide sympathy. It is the fellowship merely of one whose soul recoils and freezes to inaction at the misery he sees. Characteristic of this attitude is the fact that his sympathies are more keenly aroused for the sufferings of beasts than of men. In the Reflets Loti tells us of his last hunt; how the expression of death in the eyes of the baited brute moved him to anguish and to the resolve never to hunt again.

Here he devotes a whole chapter to cats and dogs, and the theme rouses him from his dreamy apathy. Physically robust, full-blooded men of action, says Loti, choose the dog for their comrade, but men of intellect and nerves favour the graceful, supple cat. It is not the first time by any means that Loti has paid his tribute to the charms of the feline race. Who that has read Aziyadé will forget the silent part played by a cat in the lovers' bower of Stamboul? Every fibre of Loti vibrates to the subject in this dog and cat chapter. Full of gentle drollery he jests over the dog's grotesque mode of social intercourse: his pompous buffoonery, the air of official importance he adopts in affairs, that men from their superior vantage ground regard as impropriety. Loti laughs over it all with the gaiety of a child.

This reminds me of a passage in Turgenev's Prose Poems, where he describes himself sitting alone with his dog, and meeting his canine gaze:

We are the same creatures; in both of us glows the same tremulous little flame. Death is hurrying onwards to sweep us away with one flap of his cold broad wing. . . . And then all will be over. Who will then decide what was the difference between my flame and yours? No, it is not man and brute who are exchanging glances, but two pairs of equal eyes looking into each other.

Loti might have been the author of such a reflection, just as Loti might have written that page "On the Sea," when Turgenev found himself without human companionship on the deck of a steamer with a small monkey: "The captain, a taciturn man, smoked his short pipe, and spat angrily into the calm sea." Taking the paw of the miserable, shivering little monkey in his hand, he goes on: "The little fellow ceased his whimpers and shivered no more. . . . The mist enveloped us like a soothing wrap, and we sat side by side as if we had been near relations. . . ." More and more has Loti wandered of late from that great panorama of his youth, La Grande monotone de la mer, that he painted on such a gigantic scale with a fresco brush to the intimate analysis of subjective reflection. And as quiet hermit on the shores of the Bidassoa the bizarre dream-blossoms he cultivates appeal to me perhaps more nearly than those brilliant exotic blooms which once as voyager in distant seas he gathered from all the enchanted gardens of the earth.

B

A Plea for Bad Taste.

SOMEONE has rather aptly described the animal paintings of a venerable artist as "designs for sheep and cows." There was actually no need to inscribe "Sheep" or "Cows" under his work, though that he generally did: the species, if unfamiliar, and perhaps impossible, was at least sufficiently patent. Most writers who deal with the life of the present century are guilty of the same unconvincingness. They give us, not life, not men and women, but designs for men and women, a design for life. Read any novel, descriptive, putatively, of the life of modern men and women of the better sort: you shall find yourself, not in England, but in a country of temperate climate, with more or fewer English place-names, and a capital London, inhabited by folk of the race called Anglo-Saxon, but of mental origin unknown. They are possibly men and brothers, but by no means even our cousins.

Let us figure ourselves of a sudden translated into such a book. Between us and these strangers would upraise itself the impenetrable barrier of incomprehension: we should be dumb before them, dumb as we must always be when face to face with men of different genesis of mind. We could touch, at times, in grief and laughter, in danger, in sport, in small talk, in the comedies of manners, in all matters not coloured by the century, but there our traffic must end. The reason is of the simplest. We have not read the same books, seen the same pictures, read the same newspapers, yawned at the same plays; we have not concerned ourselves with the same problems. These people are like the folk of the theatre, monsters, with minds of the dark mid-century in bodies of our own date. Such people are all but universal, alas! in life, though in life we select; and fiction hardly offers us a wiser choice.

Not that one speaks always or often of books and problems, except in novels that deal with "literary society"; yet books are at once our experience and our touchstone. The divergence between a man who has read, between the ages, say, of seventeen and twenty-five, Keats, Browning, Morris, Swinburne, Rossetti, Thoreau, Whitman, Darwin, and the man who has not, is a divergence greater than the racial. And how are we to know if the men and women in novels have read what we have read, if they do not, as unobtrusively as you please, inform us? Again, there are many who do not, intimately, class men as soldiers, sailors, barristers, stock-brokers, Conservatives or Liberals, but as men who love or do not love certain books, certain things; it is our way, not of comprehending them, but of representing to ourselves the extent of our incomprehension.

We do not want our inhabitants of fiction to be always in the library, but merely to know that they, too, have read the last poet, the last philosopher, the last novelist; to know that their minds do sometimes play with the subjects that are in the air—in short, that they inhabit our atmosphere. For only so may we know to what extent we do not know them.

And here enters the matter of taste. There is a canon unwritten, undefined, and therefore (such is our noble wilfulness) seldom controverted, that no criticism, no mention of any author or any public character of less than semi-historic standing may be made by the personage of a novel. And the canon is so duteously observed that violations thereof do actually offend; such are fragments of rude unreticent life thrust into our design for men and women, like a passage of school-study in a wall-paper. That the violation offends by rarity is for me proved by the unladylike vividness of a story, not otherwise more than uncommon, of which the two characters were constantly reading the poems of Mr. Swinburne. That a longer story, in which Mr. Swinburne's poems figured very prominently, did not possess this vividness was presumably due to the patency of the fact that the poems were dragged in for the vituperation of the writer, not of the characters.

There is also another canon, formulated, one can only suppose, by critics of the more robustious sort: that in a novel no man may truly think or reason, may be careful and troubled by matters of tragic import to humanity—for no better reason that appears, than that these gentry are content to air their little wits and eat their little dinners as all men, therefore, and not only well-bred reviewers, should be content. Thought, to them, is a defilement of art; as though the province of art were not the universe. But perhaps it is that they have not discovered man to think. Be it as it may, who dare depict a man not an ignoramus? Who dare let it appear that, for his personages, the thought and history of the last fifty years has not been in vain? "Tract" is the horrible anathema pronounced against the work of him that dares—of her, I should rather say; for women, to their credit, have rushed in where fools have feared to tread.

Thus do we cheat art of the best of life. To rescue the "novel of society" from its present position, wherein it is chiefly a decivilised and popular form of entertainment, but one remove in degradation above the drama, and to reconstitute it—what it was in the days of the great stupidity—a living art, we have to do—how little! To state, dramatically, and so without offence, what all may at present state personally, not always without offence, and even savagely, in the shape of quotidian criticism. That we do not so is one reason why the cultivated classes of the novel, like the cultivated classes of the theatre, have lagged fifty years in mental development behind their living equivalents; so that the drama has become almost exclusively a people's pastime, and the novel an ephemeral six-penn'orth. This, again, is one explanation of the fact that the best of living talent goes to presenting such people as perforce, in real life, could not think and would not read; for only so may talent convince without offending. That people honestly dislike the life of their equals or superiors in mind or character or "earnestness" to be portrayed vividly was proved by the recent outcry against Mr. Hardy, and the attitude, now venerable, of the superior and the genteel—one can use no other word—to the plays of Ibsen.

But what is to gain by this violation of taste? At the least amusement, a discrimination of temperament, a sense of reality, of kinship. And we should gain this, too—and we cannot exaggerate the value of such a thing—that nine-tenths of the world, deluded by the bait of considerable names, might learn, protesting if they please, how the other tenth thinks.

There is certainly one kind of author who admits the contemporary to the present, and he is most of all exasperating. He is the man who introduces imaginary writers and imaginary great men. He offends our dignities. What, these matters are great, and we have never heard of them! How shall we have patience with a hero whose favourite novelist is the brilliant N. M., whose adored statesman Sir M. N.? Have we heard of these? How, then, shall we suffer one who thinks them brilliant? Go to! the fellow is none of our kin.

A. BERNARD MIALL.

Memoirs of the Moment.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM BUTLER'S return from the Cape command is the most ominously warlike symptom in our controversy with the Boers. It is said that a soldier should have no opinions of his own; but when a soldier has to take also the part of Acting Governor, as General Butler took it during Sir Alfred Milner's absence in England, the formula fails. The soldier has then to prove his possession of a personality; and if he thinks his country is pushing its interests too arrogantly, he has even to say as much in his despatches home. Perhaps his view is not accepted at home, and he has to become a chief engine in carrying out as a soldier the very policy he has condemned as an administrator. The position has its obvious strain; and Sir William Butler is to be congratulated on his resignation of a position which must have become more than irksome, even galling, to him.

AN actress who has lived in public as has Mrs. Langtry ever since Millais painted her (without, by the way, greatly admiring her) finds a little secrecy at last an almost piquant thing. That seems to be the only reason why she was Mrs. de Bathe for twenty days before the public knew it. It is thus that the law of reaction—that far too little recognised factor in the life of men and of nations—works.

THE Quarterly reviewer of Modern Mysticism, who somewhat fearlessly classes together Mme. Krudener and Mme. Blavatsky, has been made, in one minute particular, the victim of a slip of the pen or of a printer's error. "Annie" Kingsford she never was. Mary Queen of Scots and other interesting personages she imagined she might have been in previous incarnations; but here she was "Anna"; and she would have felt less the prophetess and the mother in Israel than she did if fate had given her the name which the Quarterly assigns her.

AN interesting chapter in the history of modern beliefs in what is popularly spoken of as mesmerism has yet to be written. In the 'forties, literary men and women were strangely stirred by it. Harriet Martineau wrote letters on the subject which Mrs. Browning and Mrs. Jameson read with much more sympathy than did, for instance, an Athenæum reviewer, whose article was a little sensation of the day. Bulwer, whom Mrs. Browning thought a "genius" and Mr. Browning did not, was full of specifics by which mortal ills were to be vanquished, even if the elixir of immortality itself was not to be found; and Mr. Browning, the creator of Mr. Sludge, was himself gently reprimanded by the Times for making a magician his hero in Paracelsus. Mrs. Browning, who did not quite know what to think, took refuge in the creed of her cousin, Mr. Kenyon: "I believe in mesmerism, but not in mesmerists."

THE special reporter may be so very "special" as to allow the simple details of life, such as the letter-rates of postage, to lie outside his ken. Speaking of the attempt on Labori, and of the impression created in London on Monday afternoon by the news, one enthusiastic reporter declares: "So great was the feeling stirred that an evening paper was posted at letter-rate to a leading ambassador in the country." The letter-rate of an evening newspaper is one penny.

SIR LAWRENCE ALMA TADEMA, though born a Dutchman, has felt very much on his own ground at Antwerp, where he did in fact receive his early training in art. Uninfluenced as he is by Van Dyck in his profession, there are vague personal resemblances between the two men which made Sir Lawrence a particularly fit representative of our own Royal Academy at the opening, the other day, of the Van Dyck Tercentenary Exhibition. Both men won high honours in England and Belgium; both were knighted by English sovereigns, and held also the favour of the Belgian Court, at which Sir Lawrence figures to-day as a Knight of the Order of Leopold. In London the two painters took a like pride in the homes they made for themselves. Van Dyck had his apartments at Blackfriars, royally assigned to him, and his country house at Eltham. Charles I. used to be rowed in a barge down to Blackfriars to visit the painter, and to lounge in the studio, a proceeding in which he had, of course, innumerable imitators. Those were the days of real "private views"; and Van Dyck, with service and a table that exceeded in splendour anything attempted by any modern artist, used to ask his sitters to stay and dine with him, so that he might the better learn their expressions. The modern English artist has lost the habit of mere display; men like Lord Leighton were great diners-out rather than great dinner-givers; but the amount spent by Leighton in the artistic decoration of his house was such as might have made even Van Dyck stare. Sir Lawrence Alma Tadema follows the modern method. To the decoration of his house at St. John's Wood (his old fellow-student, Mr. Whistler, might and does demur to this use of the word decoration) the naturalised Dutch painter has devoted an expenditure of time, taste, and money without any parallel among painters now living in England.

THE few members of the Athenæum Club left in London are to be seen occasionally hovering near to the Paradise from which they are temporarily banished. Uneasy is the eye that is kept on the new storey by which the club-house is adding to its stature. The first purpose of a club-house is to accommodate its members with comfort, no doubt. But let that be frankly said, without any attempt to suggest that the extensions now in progress do not disfigure the building for the man in the street. At the Carlton, by the way, two members—Lord Ormawhaye and Mr. Leonard Portal—celebrate this year the golden jubilee of their membership.

Correspondence.

A Correction.

SIR,—The reviewer of Darwinism and Lamarckism has been led into an error by quoting a remark which Mr. Darwin made before he was aware of the facts. The passage runs:

"In the future," he says, in Origin of Species, "I see open fields for far more important researches. Psychology will be securely based on a new foundation—that of the necessary acquirement of each mental power and capacity by gradation." This work has been undertaken by Mr. Herbert Spencer, who seeks to show that man's mental qualities, as also his institutions, are subject to the same law of natural selection as his physical structure.

The facts are that the first edition of the Principles of Psychology was published in July, 1855, and that the Origin of Species was first published in November, 1859.

It is needful to add that mental evolution, as delineated in the Principles of Psychology, is not ascribed to natural selection, but is ascribed to the inheritance of acquired characters.

HERBERT SPENCER.

Brighton: August 14, 1899.

"A Neglected Lowell."

SIR,—The correspondent who calls attention to the early volume of essays by Lowell, Fireside Travel, and that other who desires to make their acquaintance, may be glad to know, from one who knew Lowell intimately during the period in which they were produced, that of all his literary work these essays reproduce best the man as we knew him. They speak as he used to speak: they reproduce his happy extempore outpouring of erudition, wit, humour, and veiled pathos, and to read them now is like listening to him in his study as he used to talk to us. "Edelman Storg" was the late W. W. Story, the sculptor, but the failing memory of an old man who was a young man then does not respond to the names which correspond to the initials.

I believe that Lowell was returning after his professorial life, and the more ponderous manner of the then written works, to the old and more natural manner of the Fireside Travels, when he was interrupted by his entry into the diplomatic career which, though it honoured the country which he represented and gave him a cosmopolitan position, deprived the world of better results in his own vein. Lowell was careless of his work though not careless in it. He wrote—he told me—the Sir Launfol in two evenings and never retouched it prior to printing. I remember his saying to me when he came back from his term of study at Dresden, “I must study more before I produce any more.”

The essays in the Fireside Travels are, I judge (for I have given away my copy of the book) distributed with no indication of their belongings through the volumes of the complete works (Boston 1892)—if not they will be found in the first volume of the prose works in that collection, but possibly revised. We who knew Lowell in the pre-diplomatic days recognise the justice of the opinion of your correspondent, seeing in those essays more of the man we knew when most himself.—I am, &c.,

Frimley Green, Surrey :

W. G. STILLMAN.

August 13, 1899.

The High History.

SIR,—With all that extensive portion of Mr. Nutt's letter which repeats what I have already said in my Translator's Epilogue I cordially agree. The main difference between us is apparently due to Mr. Nutt's exceedingly loose use of language. If I understand him rightly, he employs the words “form of the romance” as synonymous with “text of the romance.” If he simply means that the text of the romance from which the Welshman translated is earlier than that of the Mons MS., I am disposed to agree with him. But this is not his statement. What he says is, that it “represents an earlier form of the romance,” which it does not. It represents simply a possibly earlier text of the same romance.

The instances he quotes from my translation, I am glad to note, bear witness to my editorial diligence in preparing it. The Mons scribe, in reciting Perceval's lineage, inadvertently writes mère instead of père in one passage, the result being that he gives his hero a brace of pedigrees on his mother's side and none at all on his father's. If the story really gave Perceval two mothers, I should myself entertain no doubt as to its Celtic origin; but to quote an obvious slip of the pen as evidence that the Welsh represents an earlier form of the romance is hardly worthy of so “serious” a scholar as Mr. Nutt. Not being a “serious” scholar, I contented myself with making the necessary alteration and saying nothing about it.

His next case is equally “serious.” I have corrected the name of Julien li Gros into Alain li Gros in the passage quoted by Mr. Nutt, who says that I had no right to do so, because the name Julien appears in both the Welsh translation and the Berne fragments. So it does, and wrongly. If Mr. Nutt had read all the passages which refer to Julien and Alain, he would have found that they one and all refer to the same person. In order to avoid confusion arising from calling the same person by two different names, I, as I had a perfect right to do, altered the name where it was incorrectly given, the original mistake having obviously arisen from the scribe reading “Alain” as “Julien.” Mr. Nutt is mistaken in saying that I have omitted all reference to Camelot. I have simply relegated Camelot to its right place; and if he will compare my translation throughout with the original, he will find a number of other cases in which I have exercised a similar discretion.

The real question is not the relative age of the Berne fragments, the text used by the Welsh translator on the Mons MS. On this question, I fancy, there would be but little substantial difference between Mr. Nutt and myself. The crucial point on which we differ is the position of the High History with regard to the other versions of the Graal legend. I hold it to be the earliest of any; Mr. Nutt holds it to be “late and unoriginal.” It is on this point that Mr. Nutt, if I understand him, alleges that I “differ from every one of my predecessors without exception.” If this be, as I believe, his real contention, I am happily able to traverse the allegation on evidence he will hardly be disposed to repudiate. In his Studies he writes (p. 104): “From 1868 to 1870 M. Potvin brought out his edition of the Conte du Graal and the prose Perceval le Gallois from Mons MSS. In the afterwords, priority is claimed for the latter romance [the original of the High History] over all the other members of the cycle, and three stages are distinguished in the development of the legend—Welsh national, militant Christian, knightly—the prose romance belonging to the second stage, and dating substantially from the eleventh century.”

Now, I disagree with M. Potvin on many points. I cannot accept quite so early a date as he assigns to the romance, and although the circumstances of its production connect it with Welsh history at an important crisis, I fail to find any evidence of any Welsh national legend at all resembling it. But the point on which I do agree with him is the very one on which M. Potvin of all men is best qualified to express an authoritative opinion. He not only edited the French original of the High History, carefully collating the text with the Berne fragments, but also the poems on the Graal by Chrestien de Troyes, Gautier de Douleus, Manessier, and other continuators of this story. As regards the true position, therefore, of the High History in the Graal cycle, his “expert” conclusions are of the highest value, and I am glad to know that my own opinion, formed on quite independent grounds, coincides on this important point with that of the distinguished scholar to whom all students of the Graal legend are so deeply indebted.—I am, &c., SEBASTIAN EVANS.

Peccadilloes.

SIR,—Notwithstanding all that your correspondent “Interrogation” has to say to the contrary, most of us are satisfied that “by-the-bye” is right. The spelling is classic. And as to his “no fewer” and “no less,” they are both bad as style, however accurate they may be as syntax. Every penny-a-liner tells us that “no fewer” than so many thousands of people have done so and so. It is an atrocity. If “Interrogation” be really anxious to purify the English language, why does he not keep his scorn for the unspeakable people who talk and write about “two weeks” when they mean a fortnight? And what of the wretches who write “a £100” when they mean a hundred pounds?—I am, &c.

J. P. B.

Our “Hard” Reviewer.

SIR,—Surely your reviewer is rather hard on Lord Byron in his review of Life and Letters, Vol. III.? The Countess Guiccioli, in her Life of Byron, makes him out a most noble character in many ways. Personally, I believe that his was a fine character originally, warped by circumstances; such as his extreme sensibility, his lameness, his treatment by his own countrymen, &c. In his marriage I firmly believe that it was his wife who was to blame for all the misery of it. She knew she was marrying a great poet—and what a poet he was!—and an immense, though eccentric genius, and such a man is not to be judged by ordinary standards.

He hath outsoared the shadow of our night,
Envy and malice, calumny and pain,
And that unrest which men miscall delight
Can touch him not, or torture him again.

—I am, &c.,

F. B. DOVETON.

Karsfield, Torquay, August 16, 1899.

A Statement.

SIR,—A work on the Hudson's Bay Company, by Mr. Beckles Willson, has just been announced for publication in the autumn. Another work on the same subject, by my friend, the Rev. Prof. Bryce, LL.D., of Winnipeg, will also appear shortly.

As is well known to many friends and correspondents on both sides of the Atlantic, I have been engaged for more than ten years in collecting material for an exhaustive and authoritative History of the Hudson's Bay Company. For the purposes of this work I have personally made researches in all the best sources of information (official and otherwise) in England, France, and Canada, and have been granted access to the records of the Company.

In view of these facts, I think it desirable to state that I have in no way abandoned my intention to publish my History; that I am now actively at work upon it; and that it will, I hope, be ready for publication in a year or eighteen months.

I have not the least desire to disparage either of the works referred to above (indeed, I have reason to know already that that of Prof. Bryce's will be excellent); but, from information which has reached me, I believe I am justified in stating that, from the more purely historical point of view, neither writer has aimed at producing a work on this extremely large and interesting subject anything like so detailed and comprehensive as that I contemplate; nor will either of their works be in any sense a more "authorised" History than my own.—I am, &c., Broomfield, near Chelmsford. MILLER CHRISTY.

August 16, 1899.

Copyright in Reports of Speeches.

MR. MURRAY'S VIEWS.

THE discussion which is proceeding in various quarters on Mr. Justice North's decision in the famous newspaper copyright case shows that the decision has caused a good deal of bewilderment. The circumstance that Lord Rosebery's claim to copyright in his own speeches appears to be ignored by the decision, or at least greatly obscured, is an element in the confusion. The letter which Mr. John Murray contributed to Thursday's Times on the subject deals so lucidly with this point that we take leave to quote the following extracts:

"Now one of the leading facts in the case is that Lord Rosebery himself was no party to the suit. Had he been so, and had he desired to republish his speeches in book form, there were several courses open to him for the protection of his rights. He might have taken the statutory means of announcing that his lectures were copyright; he might have excluded reporters; he might have rewritten or dictated the speeches privately, from memory; or he might have taken any newspaper report and revised it for the Press. We can hardly be surprised that he did not adopt some of these expedients, but as a matter of fact he did adopt none of them, and we are free to assume that, though he gave his assent to the publication of his collected speeches, he was not a prime mover in it and took no personal trouble in the matter. . . .

"When the first Sir Robert Peel made an important speech it was the custom for my grandfather and my father to have a newspaper report of it pasted down on foolscap paper, and Sir Robert then revised it with the greatest care and labour for republication in pamphlet form. I have several of these revised reports in my possession, and in some of them there is scarcely a single line of the newspaper version left unaltered. Had Lord Rosebery done as Sir Robert Peel did, and published a record of his speeches prepared by himself, it is safe to say that we should never have heard of this case.

"Having, so to speak, eliminated Lord Rosebery, we come to the true facts of the case. Any one who has had experience of shorthand reporting of long speeches must be aware that no two full-length reports taken down by different individuals will exactly correspond, verbatim et literatim, with each other; we may go a step further and say that no such report of a long speech corresponds thus accurately with the words as originally spoken.

"I can see no intention on the part of the Times—implicit or explicit—to claim a copyright in the speeches to the exclusion of Lord Rosebery, should he have desired, or should he now desire, to reproduce his ipsissima verba; all that they claim is that a third party should not be allowed to take their version of the speech and republish it word for word without permission.

"Viewed in this light it seems to me that the decision is just what anyone conversant with copyright questions would have expected.

"It does not really touch the main issue of a speaker's copyright in his own speech, and if Lord Rosebery desired, now, to bring out his speeches, restored by him to their original form, as delivered, I will venture to say that neither the Times nor anyone else would claim any right to them."

Books Received.

Week ending Thursday, August 17.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- Ayles (H. H. B.) Destination, Date and Authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews ..... (Clay) 5/0
 Gilbert (G. H.) Student's Life of Jesus ..... (Macmillan) net 5/0

POETRY, &amp;c.

- Mott (F. T.) The Benscliffe Ballads ..... (Gay & Bird) 2/6
 Griffiths (W.) The House of Dreams ..... (Hudson-Kimberley Pub. Co., Kansas) 1 dol.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- De Rougemont (L.), Adventures ..... (Newnes) 6/0

EDUCATIONAL.

- Blackwood's Literature Readers. Books I., II., III., and IV. (Blackwood)
 Weekley (E.), Le Roi des Montagnes, par E. About ..... (Macmillan) 2/3
 Atkinson (H. W.), The Foreign Empire ..... (Black) 2/0
 Wardlaw (J. T.), Examination Papers on Constitutional and General History of England ..... (Methuen) 2/3
 Stout (G. F.), Manual of Psychology. Vol. II. ..... (Clive)
 Lyde (L. W.), Age of Blake ("Sea Dog" Readers) ..... (Black) net 1/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Mendes (H. P.), Looking Ahead ..... (Neely) 5/0
 Proceedings of the Psychical Research Society ..... (Kegan Paul) 5/0
 Slater (J. H.), Illustrated Sporting Books ..... (Gill) 2/3
 Pilling (W.), Affinity ..... (Bowden)
A Catalogue of Sculptured and Inscribed Stones in the Cathedral Library, Durham ..... (Caldcleugh) net 5/0

NEW EDITIONS.

- Scott (Sir W.), Castle Dangerous, and Count Robert of Paris. (Dent) each 1/8
 Veale (H.), The Devotions of Bishop Andrewes ..... (Deighton, Bell & Co.) 7/6

Announcements.

MR. HERBERT P. HORNE'S work on Botticelli is nearing completion. The volume is being printed on hand-made paper; it will contain upwards of forty photogravure plates, will be entitled The Art of Botticelli, and will be published by Messrs. Bell.

THE autobiography of the Rev. W. J. Stillman, who is in his seventy-first year, is in the printers' hands. Before publication in book form a portion of the veteran littérateur's life-story will appear in the Atlantic Monthly.

JOHN JAMES PIATT, well known as the author of Idylls and Lyrics of the Ohio Valley, will publish late in the autumn a work entitled The Hesperian Tree, an Annual of the Ohio Valley (1900), through George C. Shaw, Cincinnati, Ohio. The book will be issued in a limited edition to subscribers. It will consist of original contributions in prose and verse by William Dean Howells, James Lane Allen, Col. John Hay (late Ambassador of the United States to Great Britain), James Whitcomb Riley, Mrs. Piatt, Mrs. Catherwood, and others. The book will be illustrated with reproductions from paintings by well-known American artists.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.
DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

IMPORTANT—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class
Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have especially-built Rotary and other fast Machines
for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built
Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page
Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence
New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments connected.

Telephone 6511. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS WANTED, at Prices affixed.
—"Snob and Gownsmen," 1829-30, £5.—"The Germ,"
1859, £2.—"Old Paris," 1873, £2.—"The Love's Tale," 1833, £5.
—"Burrows," "Wild Wales," 1862, £1.—"Moore's 'Alpina' 1884," £5.
—"Tittmarsh's 'Comic Tales,' 1841, £5.—"Queen Mab," 1813, £7.
—"Alice in Wonderland," 1865, £2.—"Pauline: a Fragment,"
1831, £20. 2,000 Books Wanted at fancy prices. List free.—
EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss E. M. 13, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.,
68a, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS., intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing
in foreign languages.

BOOKS OUT-OF-PRINT SUPPLIED
—Please state wants. Catalogues free. We offer
"CASSELL'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA DICTIONARY," 14 Vols.,
New, 50s., pub. £7 7s. WANTED, "SOLDIERS THREE,"
1888.—HOLLAND CO., Book Merchants, Birmingham.

ESTABLISHED 1831.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on
DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums
on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY"

Can still be obtained separately, or the Complete
Set for 3s. 6d.

BEN JONSON.	JOHN MILTON.
JOHN KEATS.	WILLIAM COWPER.
SIR JOHN BUCKLING.	CHARLES DARWIN.
TOM HOOD.	ALFRED, LORD
THOMAS GRAY.	TENNYSON.
ROBERT L. STEVENSON.	HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.	ANDREW MARVELL.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.	ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.	THOMAS CARLYLE.
LEIGH HUNT.	PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.
LORD MACAULAY.	CHARLES DICKENS.
ROBERT SOUTHLEY.	JONATHAN SWIFT.
S. T. COLERIDGE.	WM. M. THACKERAY.
CHARLES LAMB.	WILLIAM BLAKE.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.	SIR RICHARD STEELE.
WALTER S. LANDOR.	ALEXANDER POPE.
SAMUEL PEPYS.	DOUGLAS JERROLD.
EDMUND WALLER.	FRANCIS BACON.
WILKIE COLLINS.	HENRIK IBSEN.

HAKLUYT SOCIETY (President, Sir CLEMENTS MARKHAM, K.C.B.)—The first two of the Publications for 1899—viz., "THE EMBASSY OF SIR
THOMAS ROE, 1600-1605," and "THE EMBASSY OF SIR WILLIAM FORSTER, 1602-1604," Edited by Mr. QUARITCH.
The Annual Subscription is One Guinea. A New 8 rises commences with these volumes.
WILLIAM FOSTER, Honorary Secretary.
Bordean, Holly Road, Wauwata, N.E.

UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW.

CHAIR OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

The University Court of the University of Glasgow will at an early date proceed to APPOINT a PROFESSOR to occupy the above Chair in this University, recently vacated by
The Professor will be required to enter on his duties as from 1st October next, from which date the appointment will take effect.

The normal salary of the Chair is £1,000, subject to § VIII. (2) and (3) of Ordinance 25. The Chair has an official residence attached to it.

The appointment is made ad vitam et culpam, and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned who will furnish any further information desired, twenty copies of his application and twenty copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit, on or before 15th September next.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,
Secretary to the Glasgow University Court.
91, West Regent Street, Glasgow.

MASON UNIVERSITY COLLEGE,
BIRMINGHAM.

ASSISTANT LECTURESHIP IN CLASSICS.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the above appointment.

Applications, accompanied by testimonials, should be sent to the undersigned, not later than Saturday, the 16th of September.

The Candidate elected will be required to enter upon his duties on October 3rd.

Further particulars may be obtained from
GEO. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

THE YORKSHIRE COLLEGE, LEEDS.

The 26th Session of the Department of Science, Technology, and Arts will begin on October 3rd, and the 6th Session of the School of Medicine on October 2nd, 1899.

The Classes prepare for the following Professions: Chemistry,
Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, and Sanitary Engineering,
Mining, Textile Industries, Dyeing, Art, Leather Manufacture,
Agriculture, School Teaching, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.
University Degrees are also conferred in the Faculties of Arts,
Science, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.

Lyddon Hall has been established for Students' residence.
Prospectus of any of the above may be had from the Registrar.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES
ABERYSTWYTH.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the post of
ASSISTANT LECTURER in the Department of LOGIC and PHILOSOPHY. Applications, together with testimonials, must be forwarded, on or before September 9th, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.

August, 1899.

TECHNICAL COLLEGE,
HUDDERSFIELD.

PRINCIPAL—S. G. RAWSON, D.Sc.

The LECTURESHIP in ART is VACANT. Salary, £250 per annum. Applications must be sent in not later than August 31st, to the PRINCIPAL. Statement of duties will be forwarded on application.

T. THORP, Secretary.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

Four Scholarships and One Exhibition, worth £150, £75, £75,
£50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 27th, 1899—viz., One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Physics and Chemistry. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Biology and Physiology.
Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London Medical School.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One
Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty years of age (if of sufficient merit) in Physics, Chemistry, Animal Biology, and Vegetable Biology.

The Jeaffreson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin,
Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—
Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of
June, 1899.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.
For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and
COLLEGE.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS.

Systematic Courses of Lectures and Laboratory Work in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc.
Examinations of the University of London will commence on October 2nd and continue to July, 1900. Attendance on this Class counts as part of the five years' curriculum.
Fees for the whole Course, £25, or £15 for Students of the Hospital; or single subjects may be taken.

There is a Special Class for the January Examination.
For further particulars apply to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE,
St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C.
A Handbook forwarded on application.

TO BE SOLD, by TENDER, the old-established PUBLISHING BUSINESS of A. D. INNES
& COMPANY, Limited, of 31 and 32, Bedford Street, Strand,
London, W.C., including Leasehold interest, Goodwill, Copyrights, Trade Fixtures, Furniture, Plant, Machinery and Stock-
in-Trade.

The Copyrights include a large number of Works by many noted and popular Authors of the day, a list and full particulars of which may be seen at the undermentioned office of
The Law Investment and Insurance Corporation, Limited.

Tenders to be sent in addressed to the SECRETARY of THE LAW INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE CORPORATION, Limited, 9, Serle Street, Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C., before the 15th September, 1899.

Particulars and Conditions of Sale and Forms of Tender may be obtained gratis of the above-named Secretary, and of the Vendors' Solicitors, Messrs. SHARPE, PARKER, FRITCHARDS &
BARHAM, 12, New Court, Carey Street, London, W.C.

THE MARIA GREY TRAINING COL-
LEGE, Salisbury Road, Brondesbury, London, N.W.

A FULL COURSE of TRAINING in preparation for the
CAMBRIDGE TEACHERS' CERTIFICATE in the Theory
and Practice of Teaching is offered to Ladies who desire to become Teachers.

Kindergarten Teachers are also prepared for the Higher Certificate of the National Froebel Union. Junior Students are prepared for the Cambridge Higher Local Examinations.

Scholarships offered in all Divisions.

COLLEGE YEAR BEGINS SEPTEMBER 12th, 1899.

The Winkworth Hall of Residence for Twenty-one Students
will be opened opposite the College in September, 1899.
Address Miss ALICE WOODS, Principal, The Maria Grey
Training College, Salisbury Road, Brondesbury, N.W.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED),

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of
all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books
at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS
per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUB-
SCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis
and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in
TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY,
SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SUR-
PLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 43, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

LONDON LIBRARY
ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P., the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON, HERBERT
SPENCER, Esq.; the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., D.C.L.

TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon.
Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 20,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3
a year: Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room Open from 10 till half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D.,
Secretary and Librarian.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

DEIGHTON, BELL & CO., CAMBRIDGE.

Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

RONALD AND I.

By ALFRED PRETOR.

"We had finished Mr. Pretor's book, and had been refreshed by the knowledge and humour and tenderness underlying his descriptions of 'Our Rector,' 'Our Professor,' and 'Bindo.'"—Literature.

"Mr. Pretor's power for delicate delineation is unequalled. His style is alone a charm. We have read the book with genuine delight, and we think it appeals to all cultivated people who care for simple yet well-drawn pictures of genuine life."

Cambridge Review.

"A series of studies, grim and humorous, fanciful and pathetic.....The pleasant mixture is dedicated to Mrs. Thomas Hardy."—Academy.

"A volume of clever sketches. Indeed, there is more than cleverness in them. There is feeling, often expressed with no little subtlety and skill, and plenty of humour. Some of the stories are of the strangest."—Spectator.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

SEXTUS EMPIRICUS AND GREEK SCEPTICISM.

With a Translation from the Greek of the First Book of the PYRRHONIC SKETCHES by Sextus Empiricus.

By MARY MILLS PATRICK.

"Miss Patrick has discussed the position of Sextus Empiricus as a philosopher with great critical insight. The volume is full of curious learning."

Westminster Review.

"A very excellent philosophical monograph. Would that all home degrees in philosophy were given for as good and deserving work."—Glasgow Herald.

"A short scholarly monograph.....It deals with the subject critically and historically, and includes a clearly written account of Zeno and of Pyrrho, the patriarch of the sceptic school."—Literature.

"The inquirer into Pyrrhonism and the development of Greek scepticism will be grateful for this study."—St. James's Gazette.

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE DEVOTIONS OF BISHOP ANDREWES.

(Grace et Latine.)

Carefully Edited and Arranged in SECTIONAL PARAGRAPHS.

By the Rev. HENRY VEALE,
SECOND EDITION, Revised and Enlarged.

FOURTH EDITION REVISED.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

CHOICE AND CHANCE:

An Elementary Treatise on Permutations,
Combinations, and Probability.

With 610 Exercises.

By W. A. WHITWORTH, M.A.,
Late Fellow of St John's College, Cambridge.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

DCC EXERCISES.

Including Hints for the Solution of all the Questions in "Choice and Chance."

With a Chapter on the Summation of Certain Series, and a Gresham Lecture on Some Points in the Philosophy of Chance.

Cambridge: DEIGHTON, BELL & CO.
London: GEORGE BELL & SONS.

Ready October 2nd, 1899.

Subscriptions now being received.

HOMES AND HAUNTS OF THE PILGRIM FATHERS

LETTERPRESS BY

ALEXANDER MACKENNAI, D.D.

Secretary of the International Congregational
Council of 1891, and President of the Free
Church Council of England and Wales, 1899; Author of "The English
Separatists," &c.

Illustrations (over 100 in Number)

From Original Drawings and Photographs by CHARLES WHYMPER.

A handsome 4to volume of at least 224 pages, printed on fine art paper.

THE purpose of this book is to present to the reader, by means of a series of carefully planned illustrations, buildings, places, objects, and portraits in England and Holland indubitably associated with the Pilgrim Fathers. The artist's purpose has been to reproduce, wherever possible, structures and objects of interest which it is practically certain that the Pilgrim Fathers must have themselves seen, and representations of the towns and villages where they are known to have resided, and the buildings where they undoubtedly worshipped. The local views have been chosen mainly with reference to those features of landscape which are to-day much the same as they were in the seventeenth century.

No work on this subject in recent years has appeared, illustrated in the style or in the profusion of examples contained in this volume. Drawings are given from Scrooby, Amsterdam, Boston, Gainsborough, Standish and Duxbury Halls, York, Plymouth, Northampton, Bristol, Cambridge, Lincoln, and many other places in England. The buildings and places in Holland associated with the Churches at Leyden and Amsterdam have been reproduced either from drawings or from original photographs taken expressly for use in this work.

THE EDITION will consist of—

1. ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES for Great Britain, and fifty copies for the United States, numbered 1 to 150 English Edition, and 1 to 50 American Edition. This edition will contain four coloured plates, and will also have first impressions of all the illustrations, and will be bound in white vellum, with silk ties:

PRICE TO SUBSCRIBERS UNTIL
OCT. 2nd ... .. £2 2 0 net.
On and after Oct. 2nd the price will be raised to ... .. 2 12 6 "

2. EIGHT HUNDRED COPIES, with a coloured Frontispiece, and bound in a handsome cloth binding:

PRICE TO SUBSCRIBERS UNTIL
OCT. 2nd ... .. £1 5 0 net.
On and after Oct. 2nd the price will
be raised to ... .. 1 10 0 "

No. 1 of the English Edition is reserved for
Her Majesty the Queen.

No 1 of the American Edition is reserved for the President of the United States

ORDER FORM.

HOMES AND HAUNTS OF THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

18

To the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
55, Paternoster Row, London.

Please supply me, when ready, with—cop of the Edition de Luxe at £2 2 0 net.

cop of the Ordinary Edition at £1 5 0 net.

Name

Address

N.B.—This order may be sent through any Local Bookseller or direct to the Publishers.

London:

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
55, Paternoster Row.

MACMILLAN & CO'S NEW BOOKS.

VOLUMES III. and IV. NOW READY.
UNIFORM EDITION OF THE

PROSE WRITINGS OF RUDYARD KIPLING.

In 10 vols., extra crown 8vo, red cloth, gilt top,
6s. each.

THE LIGHT THAT FAILED. MANY INVENTIONS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE ADVENTURES OF FRANCOIS,"
CHARACTERISTICS. By S. Weir
MITCHELL, M.D., LL.D. (Harvard). Sixth
Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.
SPECTATOR.—"Very well worth reading."

BY HENRY ARTHUR JONES.
CARNAC SAHIB. An Original
Play in Four Acts. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

SEPTEMBER.—Price 1s.—CONTENTS.

1. VALDA HANEM (the Romance of a Turkish Harim). Conclusion.
2. THE DERBYSHIRE at DARGAI (a Chapter of Regional History). By Captain SLESSOR.
3. LADY LOUISE STUART. By STEPHEN GWYN.
4. THE FLIGHT of the JUNGLE FOLK. By HUGH CLIFFORD
5. THE BLOCKADE of BREST. By DAVID HANNAH.
6. THE FUTURE of the TRANSVAAL. By C. W. BOYD.
7. SAVROLA (a Military and Political Romance). By WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL. Chapters XII.—XIV.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE

SEPTEMBER.—Price 1s.—CONTENTS.

1. DONNA TERESA. By F. M. PEARD. Chaps. XI.—XIII.
2. LITERATURE in CAPTIVITY.
3. A LORD of CREATION.
4. SHERIDAN'S SISTERS.
5. THE CHINA BOWL.
6. MRS. SAMUEL PEPPYS.
7. THE PHYSICS of AIR and SUNSHINE.
8. ON ENCHANTED GROUND.
9. POETRY and PIPES (No. 2).
10. OUTSIDERS. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. Chapters VI.—IX.

THE ARGOSY.

SEPTEMBER.—Price 1s.—CONTENTS.

1. THE TOWER GARDENS. Chapters XXXII.—XXXV. Illustrated.
2. THE RUSTLE of the LEAVES. By JUNIATA STAFFORD.
3. NELSON'S BIRTHPLACE.
4. VANISHED. By INA GARVEY.
5. WATCHMAN, WHAT of the NIGHT?
6. RISING EARLY and MARRYING EARLY.
7. A SOLDIER'S WEDDING. By C. E. C. WEJLAIL.
8. OLD and NEW OUTLINES. By CHARLES W. WOOD. F.R.G.S. Illustrated.
9. OTTERBURN'S HEIR. By Captain A. de L. KIRKPATRICK.
10. OIL. By C. W. MASON.
11. A SPROUT in a STUNTED LIFE. By A. M. PROTHERO.
12. "LOVE KNOWS NO CASTE." By L. ALLEN HARKER.

Also Ready, Volume LXVIII, May to August, 1899.
Price 5s.

SALT-WATER NUMBER.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated.—Price 1s. 4d.—Annual Subscription, post free 16s.

The SEPTEMBER NUMBER contains:—

- "THE WAY of a SHIP." By the Author of "The Cruise of the 'Cachalot,'" FRANK T. BULLEN.
THE SEA-GULL. By S. WEIR MITCHELL.
AN AMERICAN FORERUNNER of DREYFUS. By JAMES MORRIS MORGAN.
SAILING ALONE AROUND the WORLD—
1. Twice Across the Atlantic. By JOSHUA SLOCUM.
And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Illustrated.—Price 1s.—Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The SEPTEMBER NUMBER contains:—

- ARKICHTA. A Tale of an Indian Detective. By Lieut. W. C. BENNETT, U.S.A.
WHAT DIDN'T HAPPEN to THOMAS. Story. By HENRY WALLACE PHILLIPS.
TRINITY BELLS. Serial. Chapter VI. By AMELIA E. BAIR
And numerous other Stories for the Young

MACMILLAN &amp; CO., LTD., London.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

FICTION.

THE PATH of a STAR. By Sara Jeanette Duncan, Author of "A Voyage of Consolation." Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A GENTLEMAN PLAYER. By R. N. Stephens, Author of "An Enemy to the King." Crown 8vo, 6s.

SIREN CITY. By Benjamin Swift, Author of "Nancy Noon." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The dialogue is brisk and entertaining."—Daily Mail.

FOR ENGLISH BOYS AND PARENTS.

THE HUMAN BOY. By Eden Phillpotts, Author of "Children of the Mist." With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A Series of English Schoolboy Stories, the result of keen observation and of a most engaging wit.

"Mr. Phillpotts knows exactly what schoolboys do, and can lay bare their inmost thoughts; likewise he shows an all-pervading sense of humour."—Academy.

"An unrestrained fund of humour ripples through every page."—World. "Quite a delightful book."—Fall Mail Gazette.

GILES INGILBY. By W. E. Norris. Second Edition. Illustrated by Percy Spence. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Giles Ingilby" perfectly sustains its author's reputation."—Daily Mail.

"We meet real men and women."—Speaker.

"Few writers could handle a history with so much freshness, cleverness, and pleasant-flavoured wit as Mr. Norris."—Scotsman.

"Clever, bright and entertaining."—Vanity Fair.

THE FOURTH NUMBER OF

THE NOVELIST—A SON of the STATE, by W. Pett Ridge—is now ready, price 6d.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

A NEW VOLUME OF "THE LITTLE GUIDES."

SHAKESPEARE'S COUNTRY. By B. O. Windle, M.A., F.R.S. Illustrated by E. H. New. Pott 8vo, cloth, 3s; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

"One of the most charming guide-books. Both for the library and as a travelling companion the book is equally choice and serviceable."—Academy.

THE HEART of ASIA. By F. H. Skrine and E. D. Ross. With Maps, and many Illustrations by Verestchagin. Large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"This volume will form a landmark in our knowledge of Central Asia. . . . Illuminating and convincing. For the first time we are enabled clearly to understand not only how Russia has established her rule in Central Asia, but what that rule actually means to the Central Asian peoples. This book is not only felic opportunitate, but of enduring value."—Times.

A BOOK of the WEST. By S. Baring-Gould. With numerous Illustrations. 2 vols., crown 8vo, 6s. each.

Vol. I. DEVON. Vol. II. CORNWALL.

A description of the counties of Devon and Cornwall, in which the scenery, folk-lore, history, and antiquities of the two counties are treated with full knowledge and high interest.

THE VICAR of MORWENSTOW. By S. Baring-Gould. With Portrait. New and Revised Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A completely new edition of the well-known life of R. S. HAWKER.

THE WORKS of SHAKESPEARE.—General Editor, EDWARD DOWDEN, Litt.D.

Messrs. METHUEN have in preparation an Edition of Shakespeare in single Plays. Each Play will be edited with a full Introduction, Textual Notes, and a Commentary at the foot of the page.

THE FIRST VOLUME WILL BE—

HAMLET. Edited by Edward Dowden. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d.

[Shortly.]

THE NOVELS of CHARLES DICKENS.—Crown 8vo, each volume cloth, 3s.; also in leather, 4s. net.

Messrs. METHUEN have in preparation an edition of those novels of Charles Dickens which have now passed out of copyright. Mr. George Gissing, whose critical study of Dickens is both sympathetic and acute, has written an Introduction to each of the books, and a very attractive feature of this edition will be the illustrations of the old houses, inns, and buildings, which Dickens described, and which have now in many instances disappeared under the touch of modern civilisation. A another valuable feature will be a series of topographical and general notes to each book by Mr. F. G. Kitton. The books will be produced with the greatest care as to printing, paper, and binding.

THE FIRST VOLUME WILL BE—

THE PICKWICK PAPERS. With Illustrations by E. H. New. 2 vols.

[Shortly.]

A CONSTITUTIONAL and POLITICAL HISTORY of ROME. By T. M. Taylor, M.A., Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, Senior Chancellor's Medalist for Classics, Porson University Scholar, &c., &c. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

An account of the origin and growth of the Roman Institutions, and a discussion of the various political movements in Rome from the earliest times to the death of Augustus.

PONS ASINORUM; or, a Guide to Bridge. By A. Hulme Beaman. Fcap. 8vo, 2s.

A practical guide, with many specimen games, to the new game of Bridge.

THE LIBRARY of DEVOTION.—Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

THE TEMPLE. By George Herbert. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by E. C. S. Gibson, D.D., Vicar of Leeds.

This edition contains Walton's Life of Herbert, and the text is that of the first edition.

[Shortly.]

ST. PAUL, the MASTER-BUILDER. By Walter Lock, D.D., Warden of Keble College. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

An attempt to popularise the recent additions to our knowledge of St. Paul as a missionary, a statesman, and an ethical teacher.

[Shortly.]

THE CHURCHMAN'S BIBLE.—General Editor, J. H. BURN, B.D., Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Aberdeen.

Messrs. METHUEN propose to issue a series of expositions upon most of the books of the Bible. The volumes will be practical and devotional rather than critical in their purpose, and the text of the Authorised Version will be explained in sections or paragraphs, which will correspond as far as possible with the divisions of the Church Lectionary. The volumes will be produced in a very handy and tasteful form, and may be obtained in cloth or leather bindings.

[Shortly.]

THE FIRST VOLUME WILL BE—

THE EPISTLE of ST. PAUL to the GALATIANS. Explained by A. W. Robinson, B.D., Vicar of All Hallows, Barking. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

EXAMINATION PAPERS in ENGLISH HISTORY. By J. Tait Wardlaw, B.A., King's College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

[SCHOOL EXAMINATION SERIES.]

A GREEK ANTHOLOGY. Selected by E. C. Marchant, M.A., Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, and Assistant Master at St. Paul's School. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

CICERO DE OFFICIIS. Translated by G. B. Gardiner, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

[CLASSICAL TRANSLATIONS. [Shortly.]]

METHUEN & CO., Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1425. Established 1869.

26 August, 1899.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

ALTHOUGH literary production is just now at its lowest ebb, herald signs of the autumn season are not wanting. Several firms have already issued their lists of announcements. Mr. Arnold White's study of The Modern Jew, which is to be published this week, may be regarded as the leader of the great procession which is forming. Mr. Sidney Colvin's collection of Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson stands up high in the crowd—none higher.

MR. RAGHUNATH PURUSHOTTAM PARANJPE, this year's senior wrangler, has pledged himself to teach mathematics at the Fergusson College, at Poona, for twenty years, at a salary of not more than seventy rupees a month. On this the Theosophical Review comments: "In this shines brightly out the old Indian ideal that the duty of the learned man is to teach, not to turn his learning into a means of gaining wealth; and Mr. Paranjpe has done more to raise India in the eyes of the world by his surrender of the prizes within his reach than by his brilliant University success."

OUR poets so far have been dumb on the Dreyfus case, but this week Mr. Stephen Phillips boldly addresses France through the columns of the Daily Chronicle. The following lines are from his invocation:

O by that soldier whom thou couldst not shake,
That ever-breaking heart thou couldst not break;
That dying body that refused the dust,
That solitary brain that would not rust;
With Suicide an opiate put by,
And Madness a rejected luxury;
And by that woman sleepless for a sail,
That widow with no grave whereon to wail;
By all the flaming injury, and sense
Of most intolerable innocence;
Arise! Arise! O be thou swift and fell!
Of burning liars be thyself the hell!

APROPOS of the prophetic similarity of the trial scene in Alice in Wonderland to that now being enacted at Rennes, Miss Charlotte M. Mew writes to us: "To-day, in looking through Cosmo di Medici, by Richard Horne, a tragedy which hardly deserves the oblivion into which it has fallen, I came across this striking passage, one which might well proceed from the mouth of the man, if guilty, on whom the eyes of Europe are now so intently bent:

My trial
Exceeds all condemnation; what is this?
Methought I had pass'd the worst. Why, so I have!
Naught now remains but idle repetition,
Queries, conjectures, probabilities.
These blows do harden me and make me dead.
Appalling once, seem common as a cloud
Wherein great faces frown and fade; my heart
Is as a stone that's on the highway broken
By wheels, men, cattle; and I almost feel
With like occasion I could do't again:
Terror hath dashed his torch before my eyes

Till Hell seems ashes; paralysed despair
Lies, carved in ice, outstretched before my path;
Remorse is beggared; scarcely grief remains;
And of concealment I am grown so sick
That on my coffin I would gladly sit,
Saying: "Cease all this prate—'twas I!"

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL has joined the ranks of the novelists with

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL

with "big circulations." Over twenty thousand copies of his Richard Carvel have sold in America. Oddly enough fewer copies have been sold in St. Louis, his native town, than in any other city. Mr. Churchill has wealth and leisure, but he writes laboriously all the same. When he wrote Richard Carvel he hired an office, and going down to it every day, worked as steadily as a clerk. He also went to Virginia and Maryland, to procure the right materials for his novel. Richard Carvel has not been particularly popular in this country.

MR. LIONEL DECLE, whose book, Trooper 3809, we review this week, is well known already to English readers as the author of Three Years in Savage Africa. At the present time he is about to journey through Africa along the route of Mr. Rhodes's Cape-to-Cairo Railway, on behalf of the Daily Telegraph. Mr. Decle is a naturalised Englishman.

THE Nottingham Guardian prints an interesting letter which Lord Tennyson wrote to Mr. Edward Campbell Tainsh, explaining several obscure passages in his poems. Thus "the bar of Michael Angelo" signified, not the meeting of the eyebrows (as Mr. Tainsh surmised), but "that broad bar of frontal bone over the eyes for which he (Michael Angelo) was remarkable."

THE 150th anniversary of Goethe's birth is to be celebrated on Monday at Frankfort-on-Main with great fervour. There will be a "grand academical festival" and much oratory and singing. A procession past the Goethe statue, a torchlight gathering, and Goethe programmes at the theatres will take place on successive days, and nothing will be omitted that can fitly enhance the fame of Goethe in his birthplace.

APPROPOS of Goethe, there has just died in Germany a cultivated man, Dr. Gille, who was present at Weimar when Goethe died. His account of the scene is thus translated in the Daily News:

Everyone was naturally in the greatest excitement, and, unhindered, I ran up the steps and into the poet's study, which was open. Here I found Goethe's daughter-in-law, Ottila, his two grandsons, Walter and Wolf, his physician, Dr. Vogel, and a great many of his friends. I stood in the background, and through the open door could see the bedroom. There the immortal poet sat in his easy chair beside the bed, clothed in his dressing-gown, and covered up to the breast with a counterpane. His hands were folded, his majestic head rested upright on the chair-back. His features were unchanged, and it seemed as though he had fallen asleep while looking up to Heaven. On his brow there were no wrinkles but those engraved there by mental exertion.

That night Dr. Gille took part in the guard of honour, and he used to tell how he could not bring himself to turn his eyes from Goethe's silent figure.

DR. GILLE's picture of Goethe dead reminds one of a striking passage in Eckermann's Conversations. There we have a very similar impression of Goethe in the breathing majesty of his old age. Eckermann, who was a young man when he met his "master," says, under date June 10, 1823:

We sat a long while together, in a tranquil, affectionate mood. I was close to him; I forgot to speak for looking at him—I could not look enough. His face is so powerful and brown! full of wrinkles, and each wrinkle full of expression! And everywhere there is such nobleness and firmness, such repose and greatness! He spoke in a slow, composed manner, such as you would expect from an aged monarch. You perceive by his air that he reposes upon himself, and is elevated far above praise and blame. I was extremely happy near him; I felt becalmed, like one who, after many toils and tedious expectations, finally sees his dearest wishes gratified.

This may be rather young-mannish, but any young man of fine sentiments would probably have expressed himself in similar terms after such an interview.

APPROPOS of the recent sale of a set of the United Services College Chronicle, from No. 4 to No. 48, for £101, it may be mentioned that these contain upwards of thirty original contributions from Mr. Kipling's pen while he was at school and editor of the U.S.C. Chronicle. Other sets, more or less incomplete, have been sold since then to American enthusiasts for prices ranging between £35 and £65. Unluckily no copy of No. 1 exists, except that which is bound up in the volume in the College library, but as it contains nothing by Kipling its loss is not important.

No. 4 is a highly interesting number, containing five original "Kiplings"—viz., two poems, "Disappointment" and "The Excursion"; an article on "Life in the Corridors," descriptive of the ways of a small boy at school; a mock Baconian article, "Concernynge Swaggers," and an editorial. No. 5 has an article, "Life in the Studies," and a long poem, "De Profundis, a Ballade of Bitternesse." No. 5 has two poems, "Index Malorum" and "A Mistake, by R. . . . t B. . . . . g." No. 7 contains a poem "Waytinge," and Nos. 8 and 9 a serial story entitled "Ibbetson Dun"—a legend of Devonshire seafaring life.

No. 10 has a poem in Devonshire dialect, "Donec Gratus Eram." All these numbers, moreover, are full of interesting notes about young Kipling—his first and only appearance as an actor as Sir Anthony in "The Rivals," his motions at the Debating Society, and so forth. In 1882 he left the U.S. College, and henceforth his appearances in the Chronicle are either as an author being reviewed, or an O.U.S.C. contributor. Many reprints, too, from his early Indian publications occur in its pages. In No. 16 is a long poem by "Gigs"—Kipling's school nickname—entitled "A Song of the Exiles," descriptive of the life of O.U.S.C.s after leaving school, and their thoughts of the old college. In No. 36 (March, 1888) is a long original article, signed R. K., and entitled "East and West," and in No. 41 (March, 1889) a dedicatory poem, inscribed in a copy of "Echoes," which Mr. Kipling in that year presented to the Common Room of the United Services College.

It must be confessed that since Charles Lamb welcomed the firstfruits of Australian poetry Australia has bred more cricketers than poets. However, we believe that a fine poet has only to arise in Australia to be helped on his way as few poets in this country have ever been helped. Australia is keen on its talent. It subsidises its cricketers, and has lately been stirred to the depths of its heart and pocket by the advent of a new concert singer, on whose future considerable hopes are hung.

MEANWHILE nothing is neglected by the Sydney Bulletin, from the office of which we have received the first of a series of "Bulletin Booklets." The object of the series, we imagine, is to lift on to a slightly higher plane of publication any work of exceptional merit which has appeared in the parent paper. In the booklet before us we have sixteen poems, varying as to length and subject, but inclining most to the ballad, grouped under the title The Hidden Tide. That their author, Mr. Roderic Quinn, has ability is to be seen in "A Song of Winds." Here are some stanzas:

Cleaving the air with his chill grey shoulders
And trampling the sea to foam beneath,
The Wolf of the South goes howling nor'ard,
A mastless hull in his long white teeth.

And flying high, a far faint phalanx
Wings its way to a northern clime,
Sending feathers of sad sound downward,
Singing songs of an evil time—

An evil time, for the black Night chases,
And darkness swallows the trailing flock;
An evil season of wild white weather,
And foam and tumult on reef and rock;

Of yellow floods on the northern rivers,
And fierce waves swaying from crest to trough;
Of creaking schooners wearing seaward,
And signals crying—Stand off! Stand off!

Of frothy flakes on the wild waste flying,
And anxious faces and fateful news;
Of close-reefed topsails and battened hatches,
And straining engines and racing screws.

Of pumice-stone and brown weeds riven,
Riven and flung on the hissing sand;
Of squadroned waves and their mighty charging
And the stern repulse of the frowning land.

Of whipped white faces faring stormward
With smothered words and wrecked replies;
Of trees blown down on the windy ridges,
And stormy shoutings and tempest cries;

Of eyes that dance to the wild wind's music,
Of strange sweet thrills through the calm-sick form;
Of Storm, throned king on the mad white ocean,
Of Storm the Monarch—all hail to Storm.

We hope the Bulletin will send us more booklets, and—print them in black ink instead of violet.

SIR WALTER BESANT.

From the Copyright Series of Portraits of Contributors to the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

THERE is one field, however, in which young Australia is running neck and neck with young England. The Australian schoolboy can produce "howlers" equal to any yet raised in the mother country. In the Young Man for September some amusing specimens of antipodeal examination humours are given. Thus:

"Give the meaning of 'athletic.'"—"Strong." "Give an instance."—"There is an athletic smell in the asphalted quadrangle." "What happened at Calais in 1588?"—"The Thirty-nine Articles of belief were put in the Bible." "A Papal bull is a document from the Pope which got its name because it was so strong and harsh that it was called a bull." Again, "A monopoly is a big house where monks and nuns live, and are not allowed to marry." "Comparative theology is the medium taken where theologians differ." "Savonarola, Voltaire, and Dante were the three men who built St. Peter's Cathedral. Savonarola was the sculptor, Voltaire the painter, and Dante the poet." "Areopagus lived in the year 56 A.D. He was one of Rome's greatest poets. Paul read a lot of his writings, and quoted them in his sermon on Mars Hill." "The Good Samaritan was the person who was fed by the birds of the air." "Hydrogen is made by taking a lot of chemicals and mixing them together."

SIR WALTER BESANT is one of our novelists from whom no new story is to be expected this autumn. This is not a matter for wonder considering that Sir Walter is more than ever absorbed in his Survey of London. We understand that there is no prospect of our seeing the first volume of this gigantic work until next spring. Sentimentally speaking, it would have been interesting if the publication of the new Survey had begun this year, just 300 years after John Stow's Survey appeared. But the difficulties of the task are great. Not the least is the constant arrival of fresh data. London refuses to stand still to be "surveyed"; and it is certain that the period during which Sir Walter Besant has been engaged on his task has been exceptionally marked by changes and vanishings in London. One satisfaction which Sir Walter Besant must feel in his task is that a work so gigantic must necessarily be long-lived, and carry his name far down the corridors of time. Even Stow's little one-volume Survey was edited and increased time after time, until like a snowball it gathered the accumulated lore of 150 years, and finally came to a stop in 1756 in the two enormous folios of Strype's last edition. Since then no work commensurate with the size of London has been undertaken. The expectation of Londonarians—the newly-coined designation of those who love London—is therefore fastened on Sir Walter's volumes.

To the readers of the ACADEMY the name of Showell Rogers, M.A., LL.D., may not be very familiar, though all who are interested in the literature of the law must frequently have seen it in the Law Quarterly Review. Dr. Rogers, though not an author in the strict sense of the word, was a great literary influence in Birmingham, his native place, and among a large circle of private friends he enjoyed considerable repute as poet and essayist. He was "never foolish enough to publish a volume of poems," he used to say; but every Christmas his friends received a dainty book of verses and lyrics from him. His lectures were reprinted, and his articles on "Mountaineering" (for he was an enthusiastic climber, and had no mean record of exploits accomplished at considerable peril) were much enjoyed. Dr. Rogers's chief essays were: "The Pursuits of the Book Collector and the Spoils of the Chase," "Michael Drayton," "The Warwickshire Scenery of George Eliot," "Dr. Parr," and "The Ethics of Advocacy," the last-named being printed in the current number of the Law Quarterly Review. He was a vice-president of the Midland Institute, and a member of most of the literary societies in Birmingham. His unexpected death, at the age of forty-four, took place a few days ago, and excited keen regret.

MR. JOHN MUIR has unearthed, and reproduced in the Glasgow Evening News, an interesting after-dinner speech of Carlyle's on Burns. The occasion was a dinner at Dumfries, in 1831, given in honour of Allan Cunningham. The most interesting portion of Carlyle's speech was that in which he spoke as follows:

"I may mention a circumstance which is, perhaps, known to few in this room—namely, that within the last two months I have learned from Goethe, the greatest living German poet, that the works of our immortal bard are under translation in Berlin, so that foreign countries will speedily be as happy with them as ourselves. His life was undoubtedly a dark tragedy; penury and cold neglect curbed the flow of his noble soul. It is plain that we possess only a tithe of what was in him, for his genius was universal; he was the first man to strike the seven-stringed lyre to ecstacy, for he was equally the minstrel, the poet, and the philosopher. Alas, that such a master-soul should have been crushed! Alas, that we can only reflect, while we are thus celebrating Allan Cunningham's worth, that Burns was never so honoured while in life!" Mr. Carlyle then begged that the memory of Robert Burns should be drunk in solemn silence, as much might be thought that could not be uttered. The toast was drunk standing, and in silence.

Bibliographical.

OF course the coming season will be distinguished by the issue of a number of reprints. I wish I could believe that in the selection of these the publishing fraternity would be likely to exhibit any independence in initiative. It seems to me that we go on reproducing the same things over and over again, in different forms and at different prices. Apparently there are only two ever-welcome novelists—Mrs. Gaskell and Miss Austen. Already we are promised for this autumn a new edition of Cranford and a new edition of Pride and Prejudice. Now, of Cranford the editions are already legion. No fewer than three came out only last year—one prefaced by Mrs. Ritchie and illustrated by Mr. Hugh Thomson; another illustrated by H. M. Brock, and a third in the series of "Nineteenth Century Classics." In 1877 there was an edition prefaced by Prof. Herford, and in 1896 there was one illustrated by F. H. Robinson. Mrs. Ritchie's preface appeared originally in a reprint dated 1891. Then, of Pride and Prejudice there were two editions last year, published by Messrs. Dent and Mr. Grant Richards respectively. There was one in 1895-6, prefaced by Mr. Dobson, and illustrated by E. F. Brock; another in 1894, prefaced by Mr. Saintsbury, and illustrated by Mr. Hugh Thomson; and a third in 1893, illustrated by W. C. Cooke.

Another announcement for the autumn is a new edition of Law's Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, and this, in spite of the fact that three separate reprints of the work appeared last year, from the houses of Messrs. Macmillan, Messrs. Dent, and Mr. Griffith. For the recent reprint of Cavendish's Life of Wolsey there is much more to be said, though the work cannot be regarded as inaccessible, seeing that it figured in 1885 in Henry Morley's "Universal Library." New editions of John Halifax, Gentleman, and Tom Brown's School-days are likely to be called for till the crack of doom; so let them all come. There cannot well be too many editions of Thackeray's works or of Tennyson's poems; but why cannot we have such excellent things as these without the interposition of "editor," "prefacer," or "introducer"? How can Tennyson or Thackeray possibly need introduction even to the youngest reader? Present-day littérateurs are far too fond of patting their betters on the back. It is to be hoped that the great writers of the past are unable to revisit the glimpses of the moon. What would be the feelings of Charles Dickens if he could see his works alternately patronised and pecked at by Mr. Andrew Lang?

The Life and Letters of George Selwyn, which we are told to look for soon, should be an acceptable addition to our libraries. It is some years since I handled Jesse's book on George Selwyn and His Contemporaries, but if my memory serves me, it was rather a flimsy publication. Up to now, indeed, the most valuable thing written about Selwyn has been Abraham Hayward's well-known essay, which contains some of the best specimens of Selwyn's ready wit. (Others, you may remember, are recorded by Walpole and by Rogers.) Selwyn, however, was something more than a maker of clever sayings, and no doubt the forthcoming volume will bring clearly before us the more serious side of his character. The Letters should be especially interesting.

We are to have from Mr. A. D. Godley a volume to be entitled Lyra Frivola. Is this to be an original work or an anthology? The title recalls to one the Musa Jocosæ of Mr. G. H. Powell—a little book of selections published in '94. There has been many a Lyra in our day. To go no further back than 1887, we have had Lyra Christiana, Lyra Heroica, Lyra Christi, Lyra Sacra (two of this), Lyra Piscatoria, Lyra Hieratica, Lyra Collica, and so forth. Who set all these lyres a-twanging? Was it Keble, with his Lyra Innocentium? or Locker, with his Lyra Elegantiarum?

"Lady Duntze," wrote a gossip the other day, "has written a novel which Mr. John Long will publish. It has the title Infelix." Now, the Infelix of Lady Duntze was issued nearly seven years ago—a not very important fact, but we should try to be correct even in trifles.

Mr. Clement Shorter, describing the riches of his bookshelves in the matter of Matthew Arnold's works, includes in them a privately printed pamphlet, entitled "Hamlet Once More, by an Old Playgoer." This was reprinted from an article contributed by Mr. Arnold to the Pall Mall Gazette for October 23, 1884. It is well known that Mr. Arnold contributed to the Gazette from time to time a number of such articles, many of which are referred to in the volumes containing the Letters. I wonder if those in whom the copyright of the "Old Playgoer" articles is vested would be willing to allow them to be reprinted in volume form? The identity of Mr. Arnold with the "Old Playgoer" has long been an open secret, and I am sure there are many theatre lovers who would be glad to possess these characteristic bits of criticism in a handy shape. It is not so long ago since "Mr. Matthew Arnold as a Dramatic Critic" was the subject of a paper in the Theatre magazine (now defunct).

The announcement that Mr. Langdon Mitchell has based a play upon Vanity Fair, and that the production of that play in America is imminent, has a literary interest. It seems to be generally supposed that Thackeray's masterpiece has not hitherto been dramatised. That is a mistake. So long ago as 1882 a comedy founded on the novel was produced at Leeds—with what success I do not know. It is not so very long, again, since Miss Janet Achurch appeared at Terry's Theatre in a one-act sketch by Mr. J. M. Barrie, called "Becky Sharp." "Becky Sharp," by the way, is the title which Mr. Mitchell proposes to give to his drama. In America, Mr. Mitchell has had at least two predecessors in the dramatisation of Vanity Fair—the well-known actor-playwright, John Brougham, and the scarcely less well-known playwright-actor, George Fawcett Rowe. Brougham's version was performed in 1849.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Life in the French Army.

Trooper 3809 : a Private Soldier of the Third Republic. By Lionel Decle. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE application of this book lies in the bearings of it put forth avowedly as a commentary on the Dreyfus case. Mr. Decle's narrative may appear at first sight to have only such a connexion with the drama of Rennes as an enterprising publisher, with an eye to advertisement, might construct in the way of business. For Mr. Decle's personal sufferings as a private in the French Army are twenty years old. In the interval many reforms, tending to improve the French soldier's lot, have been introduced; and, again, some of Mr. Decle's worst sufferings in the way of punishment were deserved. On both these points Mr. Decle makes frank admissions. It is difficult, indeed, to read his story without feeling that he might have had a more comfortable time if he had used more tact, and shouldered a year's discomforts with more philosophy. But when these deductions are made, and when a possible note of exaggeration has been allowed for, the narrative remains a striking exposure of the system which has brought about the Dreyfus impassé.

THE PLANK BED IN THE "SALLE DE POLICE."

Everywhere in these pages we find the principle of the chose jugée. The stupid and brutal corporal is backed up by his sergeant, the sergeant by the lieutenant; and punishments which began in lies and injustice are not only ratified but increased as the appeal ascends the ladder of rank. And although under a rule, promulgated by General Boulanger (whose name is curiously fragrant in these pages as synonymous with barrack reform), no mere corporal may now send a private to the Salle de Police, yet the corporal can still work his vindictive will through the sergeant. Mr. Decle declares, on the authority of personal friends, that "the bullying of privates by corporals and sergeants is as bad as in my time, the officers are jealous of each other, and, instead of encouraging privates so as to make them love their métier, they plot and scheme to get promotion, while the corporals and sergeants chiefly strive to find or manufacture defaulters, well knowing that by so doing they will attract their chiefs' attention, and thus get advancement." It cannot be irrelevant to point out that no later than last Monday the Paris correspondent of the Times related two stories of gross bullying similar in kind to scores which Mr. Decle fetches from his past. And Mr. de Blowitz pointed out that the grand obstacle to justice in the Dreyfus case is just that hypnotisation of each rank by the rank above it, which is the lasting impression one receives from Mr. Decle's story. The French military code and French traditions of discipline are inhumanly inflexible. They seek to expel human nature rather than mould it. They are softened by little of that esprit de corps and natural companionship in arms which are conspicuous in the least happy of British regiments. Even among the French officers lines of social distinction are drawn which are unknown at our cheery regimental mess-tables. Captains will not eat with lieutenants and sub-lieutenants, and majors must needs mess separately. Moreover, in the French Army an officer changes his regiment whenever he rises in rank. So that the faster he rises the more homeless he becomes; and when at last he obtains his colonelcy he has probably served in six different regiments, and has formed strong ties to none.

Turning now to Mr. Decle's actual experiences, we find that he entered the French Army in 1879 as a volontaire. A volontaire was one of those young men who, in virtue of a university degree and the payment of £60, could have the five years' service then exacted from every young Frenchman commuted to one year. Decle was drafted to the 50th Dragoons at Noilly. His annoyances began at once. The sergeant-major who took down particulars of Decle to be registered in his livret (regimental book) asked him whether he could read and write, and how many times he had been convicted. Stupid questions, perhaps, but they were only official, and Private Decle had better have taken them as a sensible new boy takes annoying questions when he enters a public school. Instead of this, he protested energetically against the last question, and provoked the sergeant-major to exclaim: "You're too much of a fine gentleman for my taste, so I fancy it won't be long before you get into trouble." In truth, the volontaires, with their money and short service prospects, were wretchedly received by the officers. One day the colonel came to see his gilded conscripts. They were mustered in the riding-school.

When he appeared he walked past us, surveying each one of us with a disgusted look on his face. He was a harsh, stout, sulky-looking officer. For a few minutes he walked up and down in front of us, talking with our captain and striking his boot with his riding-stick. Then, suddenly turning towards us with one hand in his pocket and the other on the handle of his riding-whip, which was stuck under his arm, he addressed us: "So," he said, "you're the volontaires who have been sent to demoralise my regiment. Well, there are a few things I want you to remember: you are serving five times less than other troopers; you will therefore have five times more work, five times more punishments, and five times less leave than the rest." Then turning towards the non-commissioned officer: "Dismiss your men," he said, and at the same time he walked away with our captain. Before dismissing us our sergeant also saw fit to address us: "You are now going to be under my orders," he began, "and you may have been told that the volontaires who served last year had a good time of it, but if you think you are going to be treated as they were you are jolly well mistaken. I mean to make you work, and to make you work hard too. There are a few hard-mouthed ones among you. I will use the curb with them so as to soon break them in."

The breaking-in process began forthwith. The little band of volontaires, seven or eight in all, were introduced to a daily routine which left them two hours a day for their meals, and none for other leisure. Private Decle was the first to receive punishment. He had early been warned that it would be a physical impossibility for him to make his own bed and clean his clothes and weapons in the time at his disposal. He accordingly employed two troopers at ten francs a week to take these irksome duties off his hands, a course which was contrary to regulations. It was for accepting the services of one of these troopers in saddling a vicious mare that the drill-sergeant of the volontaires sent Decle to the Salle de Police for eight days. We soon become familiar with the Salle de Police. The narrative reeks of its foul air, its must and slime, its cantering rats, and its drunken men. Yet even here the human comedy smiles, and we are grateful for the portrait of the great, dull, faithful Breton conscript, Trooper Piatte, who in a midnight wrestling scene, by candle-light, in the Salle de Police, floors a gigantic conscript, previously known as "Jeannot the Butcher, the Terror of Belleville." Again and again Decle was haled to the Salle de Police by his unspeakable sergeant, Legros. This man, who was known as "one of the sulkiest brutes in the whole regiment," had such ideas of justice that before any offence had been committed, he would tell his awkward squad: "I am going to stick four of you in the Salle de Police to-night, so you had better look out"; and in such cases he always found a way of keeping his word. At one time never a week elapsed without Private Decle being sent to lie amid the lice and stench of the Salle de Police. Legros would say to him in the morning: "I am in a bad temper to-day, and you will get two days' Salle de Police—you'll find out why later on." But even Legros was mild compared with the man who succeeded him, Sergeant de Cormet. This man was reputed the most severe sergeant in the regiment, and as an example of his methods Mr. Decle tells a shocking story. De Cormet was in charge of a peloton de chasse (punishment company):

It was bitterly cold, and he was drilling the prisoners, making them do the sword exercise and keeping the troopers for five or ten minutes in the same position. He had ordered the second position of the "coup de sabre vers la droite," which consists in holding the sword extended to the right at arm's length; at the end of a few minutes the troopers became so tired that none of them were able to hold their bodies straight, and had to put their left shoulders down, and let the points of their swords drop. De Cormet, as usual, walked behind them, coolly saying, "Trooper Gabier, four days more for not holding yourself straight; Trooper Chirac, your sword is not straight, you will have two days more," and so on.

All of a sudden, one of the prisoners, a poor, weak fellow, said to him:

"Sergeant, my hands are frozen; will you allow me to blow into them for one minute? I can't hold my sword any longer."

"Four days for speaking in the ranks," answered Cormet, in his monotonous voice.

The trooper's fingers were as white as wax, and he soon repeated his request with a similar result. At last, unable to stand the pain any longer, the trooper put his sword under his arm and blew on his fingers.

"Hold your sword in position at once," said the sergeant. "I shall report you to the colonel."

"But, sergeant, I can't," cried the trooper.

"You refuse to obey?" said the sergeant.

"I can't, I can't," said the trooper, sobbing with pain, and at the same time trying to grasp his sword, but finding himself unable to close his benumbed fingers.

Again the sergeant ordered him to hold his sword out, but the man burst into tears, and once more sobbed, "I can't, I can't!" Thereupon the sergeant commanded another prisoner to carry the sword, and calling out to one of the troopers on guard, ordered him to fetch the corporal, and when the latter came he had the poor fellow conveyed to the cells, and reported him for refusal to obey orders. The trooper was, therefore, tried by court-martial, and sentenced to two years' hard labour!

Here a real echo of the Dreyfus trial is caught. But that tissue of false and forced evidence finds its closest parallel in another incident. A certain Sergeant-major Vaillant, Decle's very good friend, had deserted across the frontier, taking with him some clothes which Decle had lent him, but carefully repaying Decle a sum of £35 which he had been keeping for him during his detention in prison. Decle was asked to perjure himself by declaring his clothes to have been stolen, this construction being necessary to procure Vaillant's extradition. Decle's refusal to charge his friend with theft brought on him threats and abuse; and when he was examined at the gendarmerie the following dialogue took place between himself and the corporal in charge:

"You had a suit of clothes which has been stolen from you by the Sergeant-major Vaillant?"

"No," I said, "I have had no suit of clothes stolen from me. I lent Sergeant-major Vaillant a suit of clothes, if that is what you are driving at." . . .

"What am I to do?" said the old corporal, turning helplessly to his subordinate. "This is a most serious matter. How on earth can I write down that a Dragoon swears that he has had no clothes stolen when his captain says they have been stolen? That is what discipline has come to nowadays," he went on. "When I was in the Guards, if my captain had said to me, 'Bouchard, someone has stolen your clothes,' I should have said, 'Yes, sir!' But now, if the colonel himself were to say to a trooper, 'You're a nigger,' the fellow would reply that he was a white man. And these are the men who are going to lick the Prussians! It breaks my old heart to see such goings on."

In the end Private Decle was allowed to depose the truth. Again and again, in his spirited independence and his love of truth, Private Decle seems to have been already a natural, as he is now a naturalised, Englishman in an environment essentially un-English. Take, now, the opposite instance of the corporal who swore away Trooper Piatte's promotion, and destroyed his self-respect as a soldier. Piatte had been nominated for a corporalship, and would have received his stripes after the manoeuvres. But, all in an evening, Piatte's future was blasted. While he was sleeping with three comrades in a barn full of straw a Hussar corporal entered, smoking. As he did so he heard an officer's step, and, instantly hiding his pipe, called out: "Who's been smoking here? Now look sharp; are you going to tell me or not?" Piatte was not asleep, and he saw through the corporal's dirty trick. The result was that the officer pitched on Piatte as the smoker, and gave him eight days' Salle de Police, the corporal keeping his own counsel. When the officer had gone, Piatte taxed the corporal with his treachery, and got two days more Salle de Police for "insulting" him. The matter became known, and caused friction between the officers of Piatte's regiment and the Hussars, but in no wise to Piatte's advantage, for when the smoking incident reached the General's ears he was furious and gave the innocent Piatte fifteen days in prison. This punishment was doubled when Piatte, who was now beside himself, tried to "take it out" of some Hussars. In the end he went to solitary confinement with his heart broken and all chance of promotion gone. Here, again, it is not so much the scoundrelism of petty officers as the system which makes that scoundrelism effective in ruining decent soldiers, that is so deplorable. Again and again Mr. Decle shows us how men who would make good soldiers under just treatment are turned into indifferent dare-devils. "When my serjeant, after asking me how I liked the Salle de Police, added 'You will soon get accustomed to it,' he condensed in those words all the reasons which make a blindly rigid system of discipline a complete failure."

Speaking now as an Englishman by naturalisation and by sympathy, but with a want of good taste which it is impossible to overlook, Mr. Decle bids his readers to make hopeful comparisons between our own "little army" and the "bloated armaments" of his native land. France can put a million men into the field; but Mr. Decle describes them as a crowd of half-taught lads, lacking in thews as well as training, and led—or driven—to battle by officers whom either they have never seen until the day of conflict, or whom they know—and hate.

There, we think, Mr. Decle comes nigh to talking nonsense.

Experiments.

Sir Paul Pindar, and Other Plays. By Harry Neville Maugham. (Grant Richards.)

THIS has the outward air and bearing of quite an imposing book. The liberal pages with their broad margins, the hand-made paper and Chiswick Press type, prepare you for masterpieces. But nascitur ridiculus mus: disillusion is not slow in coming; and you realise that fine feathers do not make fine birds, and that the printer's frippery may handsomely cover a very third-rate achievement. Mr. Maugham is not altogether without talent, but he is in the experimental stage, and, with one possible exception, these essays "in the most beautiful but most difficult of all the arts" should have found discreet oblivion in the bottom drawer of the author's writing-table. We think it quite possible that he may do better some day, and, if so, we feel sure that he will regret this premature publication of chips from his workshop.

The volume contains five pieces. Three of these are in prose: "Sir Paul Pindar," a Jacobean comedy; "The Old and the New," a comedy of modern life; and "The Landslip," a "drama," or perhaps a "melodrama," in one act. Mr. Maugham seems to us least successful in this sphere of his endeavour. His comedy has certain merits of ornament. The dialogue is tolerable and occasionally witty.

Russell: Yes, Master Bertie—Mister Bertie, I should say. I was so glad you got here in time for dinner. Master was fretted terrible. In the days when Master used to come down from Lunnon, there was only one train a day, but it came in punctual.

Herbert: What one might call the "constant service of the antique world."

But in drama ornament is apt to be irrelevance, and both "Sir Paul Pindar" and "The Old and the New" are of irrelevancies all compact. In the former, Mr. Maugham has attempted to reproduce the atmosphere of a London merchant's house in 1621; in the latter he has accumulated illustrations of the opposing views of life held by the present generation and the last. And in both cases he has forgotten that the essential thing in a play is the presence of a dramatic motive, the gradual evolution of which provides the unity of the piece. Mr. Maugham's scenes are not held together. They succeed each other, that is all. The actions of his puppets carry no conviction and excite no interest; they are but pegs to hang the ornament upon, and you hardly recognise that the trivial plot has begun before it has come to a desultory end.

The two remaining plays are in blank verse. "The Husband of Poverty" is based upon the Fioretti and the early lives of St. Francis. It shares the qualities of the comedies. The mere writing is quite fair, and a rather pleasing variety is afforded by the unrhymed, semi-lyrical verse in which some of the speeches of Francis are cast. But here, too, the construction is weak. An attempt is made to provide a central idea in the sentimental relations of St. Francis and St. Clare, but the motive is timidly introduced and fails to dominate the play. The result is a somewhat incoherent chronicle. Moreover, some of the episodes do not explain themselves. The position of Elias, for instance, is unintelligible without a knowledge of Franciscan history, on which Mr. Maugham has no right to count in his audience. A Greek dramatist dealing with familiar mythological subjects, or Shakespeare, dealing with well-known characters from English history, might introduce allusions to matters strictly outside his canvas, but the method is not capable of general extension.

Finally we come to Mr. Maugham's best endeavour, in the tragedy called "The Mystery of Men." We call this his best endeavour, because in it alone he has succeeded in some measure in subordinating the ornamentation to the development of the central theme. This theme is a Nietzschean one. Hatasu, Queen of Egypt, is the incarnation of the Uebermensch, the lust for power, the "will to live." Thus she describes herself:

How little do you move me, poor bound mass
Of maxims learnt from caution and the rules
Of wizened prudery. I am a law
Unto myself; what reason has our doing
Save the desire that prompts it? I would live
A thousand lives, as does the mutable,
The eager thrill and stir of rich red blood
Empassion me; for I am all I know,
I am man, woman, beast, reptile, and flower,
I am the fire, I am the limpid wave,
I am the breath of spring, and morning dew.
But while I can be virginal and sweet,
There yet are pulses in me that declare
A kinship with the vile and low that is Beauty in making. In this fleeting hour
Between the two eternal silences,
Guarded by the grim yawning janitors,
The lions of the Past and the To-be,
I cry "I live! I live!" and with my hands
Snatch at all passions, marvels and delights
To the last gasp of the attainable.
I am the human-flower that has its roots
In the disdained earth of vulgar lives,
But from that rank luxuriance I draw
The sap which I transmute to vermeil hues,
And the fair miracle of flesh and blood
Which leans to ravishment of every wind;
Thus may men's hearts grow glad that of the travail,
The hunger and the fret of sordid griefs,
One work of wonder takes its bounteous bloom
With all the world well lost to fashion me.

Hatasu slays her husband, Tehutimes or Thothmes, puts on the male beard, and reigns as king, until she meets one stronger than herself in a younger Tehutimes, brother of the dead king. It is in the clash of these two personalities, and the final surrender of the woman to the strength greater than her own, to which she does reverence, that the dramatic force of the play consists. And, on the whole, the motive is kept well to the front, though Mr. Maugham's craftsmanship is not yet equal to the task of winding-up neatly and providing his tragedy with an effective close. In fact, he calls in, literally, the primitive deus ex machina.

As a further sample of Mr. Maugham's blank verse may be taken the following soliloquy, which has some genuine poetic qualities:

Calm is the night and silent are the heavens
Which nurse the echoes of the loud applause
Of what I was. Grave deity of the moon,
Thy lamp is bright; I see thee sit and smooth
Thy great papyrus out to write a tale
Such as the story-tellers wondrous weave
At hush of sunset to the motley crowd
Beside the banks of Nile. There is a queen
Who wears a beard. A prince who brings to light
The mummy of her husband, and bids the queen
Prepare for death; when, lo! an ancient nurse
Bears her an army of gods in her old hand;
And what must next befall? I will not use
My power as yet, but give mine enemies
A little further time. We live our hour,
Then the full page is rolled and put aside;
But thou, eternal winter, dost go on
To enumerate the sorrows of the world,
The hope, the hate, the strife, and the despair
That we call Egypt.—Oh, the little lasting
Of all we do! how pitiable a jest,
And transient as the winds upon the hills,
That passeth to the land that loveth silence!
Is that a cry of victory on the air?

Mr. Maugham has not succeeded in stirring us very deeply, but we recognise an honest artistic endeavour in his work, and we trust that he will go on and prosper. We fear, however, that the reconciliation of the stage to literature is, under present conditions, a more difficult task than he has quite realised.

An Honest Man.

Saint Louis. By Marius Sepet. With a Preface by George Tyrrell, S.J. (Duckworth.)

M. SEPET's book is not so much a history as a series of historic pictures from the writings of Geoffrey of Beaulieu, the king's confessor, of William of Chartres, and of the Boswellian seneschal, the Sire de Joinville. Out of the mouth of these contemporary witnesses is skilfully built up the figure of a man very strange to our century, by reason of the qualities which dominated his own.

For his was an age when the notion of an imminent immediate providence had not become obscured by the perception of the science of mediate causes. Good works and asceticism found none to doubt their meritoriousness. The value attributed to prayer was of the most material kind, and in their devotion to the Heaven that was so close men could be extravagant without affectation. Almsdeeds were not yet discredited by political economy, and the empirical treatment of the sick was ineffectual enough to compare disadvantageously with the insanitary complaisances of devoted personal service. Add the estimation in which kingship was held as an office of a quasi-sacerdotal character. For between the secular and the spiritual power the line of cleavage was not yet clearly to be discerned. In a word, the Christian state was still a theocracy when, at the age of twelve, the son of Louis VIII. and of Blanche of Castile began to reign.

"Madame Blanche" during his minority ruled the state and trained her son with rigorous maternal governance. She married him early to Margaret, eldest daughter of Raimond Berenger Count of Provence; but regulated their relations with severity; so that, as we learn from Seneschal de Joinville:

The house in which the king and queen liked best to live was at Pontoise, because the king's room was above and the queen's room below. And they had so arranged matters that they held converse on a winding staircase which led from one room to the other. And they had so settled matters that when the ushers saw the queen coming into the chamber of the king her son, they rapped the door with their wands, and the king came running into his chamber; and so, in their turn, did the ushers of the Queen Margaret's chamber when the Queen Blanche was going there, so that she might find the Queen Margaret.

His ardour was soon brought reasonably into subjection; but to the end Margaret seems to have been a modern and moderating influence in the ordering of his daily life. She remonstrated with him when he notably neglected his dress, and in his grey years withheld him from the life of religion into which he desired to enter. But few monks surpassed him either in the regularity of their devotional exercises or in ascetical severity. The details of the former handed down by the queen's confessor are infinite. Besides the night and diurnal offices for each day, at which he assisted regularly at the canonical hours, repeating alternately with his chaplain the verses that were sung by the clergy, he said every day a votive office either of the Blessed Virgin or some other. He was wont to hear three or four masses, and his love for ecclesiastical music was so great that he carried always with him, even on military expeditions, a complete choir with the necessary instruments for the fit rendering of the psalmody. He wore a hair-belt always, and his fasting and abstinence far exceeded the precept. Every Friday, after his confession, he caused himself to be scourged by his confessor, and would suffer no mitigation of his self-imposed penance. This practice he commended to his children.

The pious king [says the Queen Margaret's confessor] sent to his daughter of Navarre two or three ivory boxes; and at the bottom of those boxes there was a little iron nail, to which he had attached small iron rings of an ell long or thereabouts; these chains were enclosed in each of the boxes, and the said Queen of Navarre would discipline and scourge herself with them sometimes, as she told her confessor when she was nearing death. And the pious king sent, moreover, to his same daughter a horse-hair belt as wide as the palm of a man's hand, with which she girded herself occasionally, as she told her confessor at the same time. And withal the pious king sent to the said queen a letter written with his own hand, in which it was stated that he was sending her by Brother John of Mons . . . a discipline contained in each of the said boxes, as is said above, and he begged her in that letter often to use these disciplines for her own sins and for the sins of her poor father.

He was profuse in almsdeeds, and knew no repugnance in the presence of loathsome suffering. One Good Friday, before the eyes of all men, he halted on his barefoot way to embrace a leper. He would visit time after time a leprous monk, and with his own fingers place food from his own table between his putrescent lips. His studies were in the Holy Scriptures and in the Fathers; he had a principal attachment to St. Augustine. Once he came into personal contact with St. Thomas Aquinas. The Angelic Doctor dined with him. They talked, perhaps—at any rate it was a favourite subject—of the malignancy of sin. The saint's mind wandered. The pious king, far from being indignant at the slight to his royalty and to the charm of his conversation, sent at once for secretaries to write down, there and then, at the offender's dictation the argument against the Manichæan heresy which had hatched itself thus untimely. In the conduct of his kingdom his indignation against moral offences manifested itself in such severity of punishment that the Holy See itself remonstrated:

The king loved God and His sweet Mother so well [writes the good seneschal] that all those convicted of speaking dishonourably of God or His Mother, or of some vile oath, were grievously punished by him. Thus, I saw him place a goldsmith on a ladder at Cæsarea in shirt and drawers, with a pig's entrails round his neck in such abundance that they reached his nose. I have heard that, after I returned from Cæsarea, he caused the lip and nose of a citizen of Paris to be burnt with a hot iron kept for this purpose. . . . And in reply to the murmurs caused by this punishment, the holy king said: "I would myself be branded with a hot iron if thereby my kingdom might be delivered from all vile oaths."

Of a piece with his indignation against blasphemers was his deep mistrust of the Jews. "Do what you can," he told his son, "to expel heretics from the land as well as other evil people, so that it may be thoroughly purged." The authenticity of those other words, "Keep the Jews in great subjection," is disputed. In the case of a lady who had colluded with her paramour for the taking off of her injured husband neither the intercession of the Countess of Poitiers and other great ladies, nor that of the queen herself availed to save her, though repentant; for, writes de Joinville, "the pious king ordered the said woman to be burned at Pontoise in despite of all prayers; and so she was, and justice was done in public."

Yet he was not deficient in the military spirit. It is his distinction to have glorified himself in the two Crusades which he conducted, not so much by successes in the field as by the heroism of his bearing in defeat and capture. It might have seemed to others that the God whom he had served with diligence had forsaken him in a campaign thus undertaken for His honour and glory. But the Christian champion's faith never failed him; it bred even in the bosoms of his followers, as appears from Joinville's narrative, a conviction of very present help in trouble manifesting itself day by day in miraculous aids.

The Bull of Canonisation was published in 1297, after an elaborate investigation. But he himself had been content with another name. "Master Robert," said he to Richard de Sorbon, "I had rather be called an honest man [prud'homme], if such I am, than a devout; . . . for this name of honest man is so great a thing, so good a thing, that it fills the mouth even to speak it."

Mediæval Climbers.

The Early Mountaineers. By Francis Gribble. (Fisher Unwin. 21s.)

MANY mountain lovers will agree with Mr. Gribble that, the chapter in the Badminton Mountaineering, and the recent monograph on Mont Blanc notwithstanding, there was room for his book. How far he is indebted to the former for inspiration, and to what extent he has taken advantage of its "clues for the guidance of those who wish to pursue the subject further," he does not tell us. We merely notice that whereas in his preface he returns thanks to many other well-known authorities, to Sir Frederick Pollock he returns none.

For the initiated it will be enough to say that the 338 pages of The Early Mountaineers do not offer us much more than an acceptable amplification of the 38 pages of The Early History of Mountaineering, but for the uninitiated a more informing statement seems necessary.

It may be premised that mountaineering in the modern sense—the climbing of difficult mountains, that is, for the sake chiefly of emotion and brave adventure—is commonly held to date from the first ascent of Mont Blanc in 1786, though the heroes of that achievement—De Saussure, Balmat, Paccard, and the rest—were by no means the first pioneers, nor by any means the last. Here and there men with an original turn had, for this reason and for that, toiled to mountain tops before them; many others—"just for the obvious human bliss"—have made it their delight ever since to find access to inaccessible peaks. In his early mountaineers Mr. Gribble includes all the former and some few of the latter, and finds interesting things to tell about both, though the interest in the one case is rather of the antiquarian order, and if it stirs us at all, stirs us chiefly as all faithful records of the past stir us—by their testimony to the steady growth of the human mind.

Of the genuine ancients—from Noah on Ararat to the Emperor Hadrian on Etna—Mr. Gribble records little, but in that little nothing unworthy. Of his mediæval group the same can hardly be said. A search for hidden treasure, for instance, is scarcely a worthy purpose, even in the eleventh century, for the earliest recorded climb—that of the Roche Melon (nearly 12,000 ft.), in Savoy. The attempt failed, as it perhaps deserved to do. Even the monkish chronicler is glad to turn to "more worthy matters." Have we not improved, too, on the monk of Canterbury who, finding himself—professionally, it is to be presumed—on the Great Saint Bernard in 1118, can only pray that his "brethren come not to this place of torment"? And what are we to think of so great a man as Peter III. of Arragon, who, more than a hundred years later, ascends alone the Pic Canigou (about 9,000 ft.), in the Pyrenees, only to find on or near the top "a horrible dragon of enormous size"? It is only fair, however, to Peter to add that mountain-dragons were encountered by credible witnesses as late as 1649, just as ghosts, Mr. Gribble insinuates, are encountered by the Society for Psychical Research to-day.

From such trivial, fond records it is a relief to pass to Petrarch, "the first sentimental mountaineer," who, in 1335, at the time when he was living in retirement at Vaucluse, made his way to the top of Mont Ventoux (about 6,000 ft.), and straightway sent an account of the experience and his reflections thereon, to his spiritual father. "The life of the blest is indeed set on a high place," he exclaims on the way up; "straight is the path which leads to it; many are the hills which intervene; and the pilgrim must advance with great strides from virtue to virtue." On arriving at the summit, it occurs to him, after duly enjoying the view, to open at hazard his pocket copy of St. Augustine's Confessions, "a volume of small dimensions, though of great sweetness." He does so, and happens on the following somewhat disconcerting sentiment: "There are men who go to admire the high places of mountains, the great waves of the sea, the wide currents of rivers, the circuit of the ocean, the orbits of the stars—and who neglect themselves." Taking the reproof deeply to heart, he walks the whole way down in silence, "thinking at every step that if it cost so much sweet toil to bring the body a little nearer to heaven, great indeed must be the cross, the dungeon, and the sting which should terrify the soul as it draws nigh unto God." If the indictment could thus give Petrarch pause, how is it with nous autres? And yet

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small.

Another great name in Mr. Gribble's list is that of Leonardo da Vinci, who records that he once went up "Monboso, a peak of the Alps that separates France from Italy"—a description that has caused as much puzzlement as his remarkable discovery that "snow seldom falls there, but only hail in the summer when the clouds are highest."

Of the other pre-1786 pioneers—not more than a dozen in all—the most notable is Conrad Gesner, Professor of Philosophy in Zurich, who in 1543 made a resolve that will win the hearts of all who have ever set reverent foot upon the everlasting hills: "I have resolved for the future, so long as God suffers me to live, to climb mountains, or, at all events, to climb one mountain every year, at the season when vegetation is at its best, partly for the sake of studying botany, and partly for the delight of the mind and the proper exercise of the body." For more than twenty years, we are told, Gesner kept this resolve, though, in the absence of Alpine journals, he recorded little of his experiences. His description of Pilatus, however, which occurs as an appendix to his Treatise on Milk, published in 1555, inclines us to agree with Mr. Gribble, that "Gesner was a man with whom any modern mountaineer would be glad to climb."

The literature—not the practice—of snow-craft begins in 1574 with Simler's De Alpihus Commentarius, a chapter of which deals with the means of overcoming the difficulties of snow and ice. From the references to "shoes with three sharp spikes in them"; "sticks tipped with iron"; "guides who tie ropes round their waists, to which those who follow them are attached, the leader sounding the path with a long pole, and carefully looking out for the crevices in the snow"; "glass spectacles for the eyes"; and similar devices, we can see, as Mr. Gribble is careful to point out, "how much older snow-craft is than the specialised mountaineering, which consists in climbing things for the sake of getting to the top of them." We know, moreover, from other sources, that long before Simler's time the Col du Géant and other ice passes had been highways for traders.

Scheuchzer (born 1672), of glacier and dragon fame, and de Luc (1727), "the pioneer of snow peaks," lead up to the familiar Mont Blanc story, which, "to avoid the charge of incompleteness," Mr. Gribble tells once again.

Of the after pioneers, Father Placidus à Spescha (Tödi group) and Ramond de Carbonnière (Pyrenees) interest us most. Both, as Petrarch might have said, accomplished great journeys of the soul no less than great journeys of the feet, and both live, and suffer, and conquer in Mr. Gribble's pages.

We will only add that the book, good as it is, would be improved by a revision of the French accents and other misprints, by more attention to the æsthetic quality of the quaint illustrations—though Paccard's face, as it stands, is fine enough to prejudice us strongly in his favour—and, more than all, by the removal of certain blemishes of style. "To negotiate some frightful precipice" would be scarcely tolerable from the mouth of a modern mountaineer; it is altogether intolerable from the pen of a translator of sixteenth century writers. We are none the less grateful to Mr. Gribble.

The Key to South Africa.

The Key to South Africa: Delagoa Bay. By Montague George Jessett. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

It may as well be said at once that this is a disappointing work. The student of South African affairs expects, when he takes up a volume with such a title, a really serious contribution to Imperial politics, well-written and exhaustive. Instead of this he finds an indifferent piece of bookmaking, largely quotations and margins, written in amateurish style, and not at all adequate as a presentation of the subject at the present crisis. Still, there is a great deal to be said in Mr. Jessett's favour. In the first place, he is a sound and honest politician, who looks at the question in a thoroughly English spirit. Next, he has visited Delagoa Bay and speaks with knowledge of its possibilities and of the misuse hitherto made of it by the Portuguese. It is, perhaps, not Mr. Jessett's fault that he has not been able to rise to the height of his subject: that would require a combination of qualities; and he has more excuse than most bookmakers in the necessity which exists for rousing sluggish opinion in England to the value of the Bay to us and to our future in South Africa. Therefore, in dealing with the book, it will be well to take the intention for the deed.

Delagoa Bay is the finest natural harbour in Africa, as it has a length of nearly seventy miles from north to south, and a width varying from sixteen to twenty-five miles. It offers a safe anchorage for vessels of almost any tonnage; and although, like nearly every South African port, it suffers from the inconvenience of a bar, the navigable channels made by the mouths of the English River render this drawback of but little consequence. It is the natural port of call for all ships coming from India or Australia, and is the harbour for all that great country lying north of the Cape Colony and south of the Zambesi. Its value can hardly be estimated, and yet the Portuguese, who are at present its owners, have made next to no attempt to profit by its advantages in all the years they have exercised a nominal control over it. As an example of the Portuguese method of not doing it, Mr. Jessett quotes the Boletim Oficial of the Province No. 3 of January 31 last:

On the beach, close to the Custom House piers, merchandise of a difficult sale is piled up, and passengers only manage to enter the town by crossing labyrinths formed by heaps of cases and bales, jumping over rails, knocking themselves against waggons, and being overthrown by carriers! These carriers drop the packages where it is most convenient, according to the orders received, as under Article 117 of the Customs Regulations the discharge and stowing away of packages in the Custom House must be executed by labourers paid by their employers. . . . The Custom House of Lourenco Marques is a sea Custom House of the utmost importance, and still it does not possess a single boat!

The English may be somewhat "as she is wrote," but the meaning is clear enough, and this is the testimony of a Portuguese.

The experiences of an English traveller are contained in another of Mr. Jessett's many quotations:

The main, or Customs pier, where passengers and cargo are landed, I found was a splendid panorama for an observant man. Everything seemed at sixes and sevens. Portuguese soldiers, native men and women, Greek boatmen and fishermen, all seemed mixed up. . . . The gruff man sat down beside me and recounted some experiences. He told me about some supposed rotten potatoes in cases being thrown overboard from a lighter in midstream, which afterwards proved to be a consignment of Yost typewriters. Like many other consignments landed at Delagoa Bay, this consignment cannot be accounted for since leaving the ship's side. He went on, pointing to a man searching among a huge heap of cases on the wharf: "That man," he said, "is a German from Johannesburg. Some time ago he imported four hundred cases of tallow candles; he is still looking for them. I can tell you all about them. When landed they were left outside in the sun for months. You see that heap there covered with coal-dust? That's the tallow which melted and ran out of the cases. When the boxes were removed the bottoms fell out, and only the wicks were left."

And this is the way the Portuguese do business in the Key to South Africa.

It is the unanimous opinion of all authorities that this miserable state of things would be quickly altered under British rule, and that Delagoa Bay would take its proper position as one of the great harbours of the world. And the Bay actually was ours for a short time at the beginning of the century. In 1822 Captain Owen arrived in Delagoa Bay for the purpose of making a survey, and having been told by the Portuguese that they had no control over the native chiefs, who were in no way subject to Portuguese rule, made a treaty with the natives by which the country was placed under British protection. In 1861 H.M.S. Narcissus hoisted the British flag in Delagoa Bay, with the result that the Portuguese protested, and in 1869 signed a commercial treaty with the South African Republic. At that time the Portuguese Government might have been bought out for £12,000, but we lost the opportunity. We have, however, an option of purchase over the country; but, thanks to the ineptitude of the Ministers of 1872, we should now have to give many millions for what we might then have had for a few thousands.

Other New Books.

ON FENLAND REEDS.

BY FRANK HAROLD CLARKE.

It is always agreeable to find a beginner selecting concrete themes for his verse. Indeed, within the limits of "minor" verse a halting treatment of a definite subject is often preferable to a more finished attempt of which the subject belongs to the hackneyed-abstract order. In a little paper-covered book of sonnets called On Fenland Reeds, by Frank Harold Clarke, we find a sonnet called "Yarmouth Beach," with its enormous Cockney tumult in August. Here we, at least, have a poem which is not caught out of the air or echoed from books. In such a case faults of execution are more than half condoned by the freshness of the poetic intention displayed. These are Mr. Clarke's lines:

YARMOUTH BEACH.

'Tis London's tide that thunders on the sand,
Turbid as restless—London's voice we hear,
In many keys, shouting from pier to pier;
Vast Cockneydom at ease, or brusque, or bland,
An omnipresence on the sea and land,
Joyous and rude, tuneful as chanticleer,
Bursting with chorus, ruddy with good cheer,
Holds fearful revel on the Yarmouth Strand.
But in the darkness these would turn to day,
Sad with foreboding, voices on the shore
Moan for man's fate and all his dreams gone by:
And London fades as Corton's blood-red ray
Flashes the signal of a hope before,
'Mid gloom of waves, 'neath wastes of low'ring sky.

Unfortunately, most of Mr. Clarke's other subjects are less distinctive. And they might have been sung on other than Fenland reeds. (Wisbech: Poyser. 1s.)

A CONSTITUTIONAL AND POLITICAL HISTORY OF ROME.

BY T. M. TAYLOR, M.A.

To the student of modern politics there are two really interesting epochs in the history of Rome. They are when Rome changed from a monarchy to a republic, and again when she changed from a republic back to a monarchy. As Mr. Taylor covers the period from the earliest times to the reign of Domitian he deals with both these points. The expulsion of the kings is unfortunately lost in obscurity; but it was not a rebellion of the people, but of the aristocracy, and followed the evolution from monarchy to aristocracy which was usual in the ancient world. The Roman Constitution was a thing of gradual growth; the changes that took place were almost unnoticed; but the Tribune of 133 B.C. was very different from the Tribune of 494 B.C., and yet so far as is known no laws had been passed during those three hundred and sixty years which definitely extended the powers of the Tribune. Alone of the States of the ancient world Rome is of use to modern politicians. The empire was led up to by gradual and easy stages from the time when Rome began to absorb her neighbours, and from the time of Marius the city was gradually becoming accustomed to the idea of the supreme power being wielded by one man with an army at his back. The political history of Rome is of far more interest than its wars, but it is on the latter that most of us have been brought up. Mr. Taylor is, therefore, doing a real service by bringing together in a handy English form the best ideas of the leading foreign writers, especially the Germans, on the subject. He has done his work well, and has compressed it within very reasonable compass, his account of the struggle for the crown being as clear as any that has appeared. Plenty of hard fighting was done before Octavius settled down as Augustus Cæsar, but even more was done by intrigue and diplomacy, and the Roman Senate played the part of a modern Parliament in a strangely prophetic manner. Mr. Taylor has produced a text-book which all students of history will have to read, as it gives them in a condensed form what they will have some difficulty in finding elsewhere. (Methuen & Co.)

THE MAKING OF HAWAII.

BY W. F. BLACKMAN.

THE Hawaiian Islands have recently been incorporated among the territories of the United States, and as their annexation will probably form the starting-point of a momentous change in the world's history, they are certainly entitled to a volume, or, indeed, several volumes, of their own. Mr. Blackman is a member of Yale College, which, it has been remarked, "runs" the government of Hawaii, and naturally he writes from a Yale point of view. He divides the social and political history of Hawaii into three periods—the Early, prior to the discovery of the islands by Captain Cook in 1778; the Middle, from 1778 to the arrival of American missionaries in 1820; and the Late, from that date to the present time. The third period chiefly occupies Mr. Blackman, and he has done his work very thoroughly and carefully. In his account of the Early period he describes the condition of the Hawaiian people when first brought to the knowledge of the civilised world, and gives an excellent account of their manners and customs. With the Late period he, of course, deals more fully, and here he contrives to give a mass of the most valuable information in a readable form. The appendices, too, are very instructive, and the bibliography with which the volume closes provides the student with an exhaustive list of works to be studied on the subject. Unfortunately, Hawaii is not of absorbing interest to many Englishmen, but it is well worth attention, as it really introduced the United States to mankind as a world-power, and it is not too much to say that it will bring about a complete change in the relationship of the Old and the New World. (Macmillan & Co.)

EMBROIDERY.

BY W. G. P. TOWNSEND.

THIS is a very useful text-book on its subject. The art of embroidery has been revived of late, and its students have multiplied. The Royal School of Art-Needlework is doing good work, and the subject is now recognised by the Technical Education Board of the London County Council. Mr. Townsend's book, which contains a preface by Mr. Walter Crane, and is admirably illustrated, will be of real value both to the practical embroiderer and the designer. (Truslove, Hanson, & Comber. 3s. 6d. net.)

Fiction.

Punchinello. (James Bowden. 6s.)

THE anonymous author is almost certainly a woman. She has produced a strong (not virile), clever, and well-written novel, the scene of which, so far as we can gather, is laid in the early part of the present century. The hero, Anthony Dallas, whose autobiographical MS. is introduced in quite the usual way by a descendant, was a hunchback and a musician of renown—so famous, in fact, as to have been already the subject of a biography. The MS. purports to give the intimate story of Anthony's heart, the record of his love and of his jealousy.

The whole book shows skill, vigour, and a rather nice literary conscience. It is out of the ordinary. It has promise. It may be read. But, nevertheless, we might criticise it with severity and yet do no injustice. It has two grave faults, noticeable passim: it is sentimental, and the author is for ever "forcing the note." The incidents throughout are saturated with sentimentality, and, moreover, they are presented (to use the author's own phrase) with "a picturesque completeness that wakes unkind criticism." Take this passage from the Introduction:

In one of the morning-rooms at Dane's End, where Dallas was born and lived the first part of his life, and where I have so far followed his lines, there is an old square table, riddled, I may say, with drawers, pigeon-holes, and manifold receptacles for papers. Here, goes the legend, Anthony was found dead with his head lying on his arms, and a manuscript scarcely dried before him. For the truth of this I cannot vouch . . .

The idea of Anthony first discovering his deformity in the mirror of a willow-sheltered pond (with the indispensable "gigantic water-lily floating on it . . . gold heart bared to the blaze of sunshine") is prettily sentimental, but completely impossible.

The first important scene between Anthony and Nancy, his cousin and love, is another orgy of sentimentality, and not at all original either. Anthony "played on, revelling in my own music," and then the girl approaches:

"She looked like a swaying flower in her scarlet gown, her face flushed with eagerness, her eyes sparkling with excitement; and I had imagined her cooped within the house, shedding salt tears in tribute to a reprehensible memory. She discovered that I had detected her and waved her hand in greeting. 'Quicken, quicken!' The light gay voice floated to me, and I obediently played quicker, and Nan danced. And in that hour, although I knew it not, she danced my heart away. When it was over she came and perched herself on the seat beside me, and looked at me with something in her face that I had never seen before. . . ."

Anthony may not have seen that "something" before, but the reader of modern novels has seen it times without number. He has also seen this sufficiently often:

"I shall never forget her—the flying skirts, the clustering curls, flecked here and there with gold where the sun pierced the foliage overhead. She danced till she was forced to pause for dearth of breath, and then, all panting, she clapped her hands, and tossed me a kiss. . . ."

Despite such exhausted conventionalities, however, Nan is upon the whole drawn with unquestionable charm.

The death-bed of the organist, Anthony's tutor and mentor, is a further example of sentimentality unbridled:

"She was my wife a week," he wept. "Jess—my pretty Jess! I wanted to forget her, and now I shall never see her more—so base am I." The room was littered with evidence of his late libertinage, and now in the supreme hour his mind, as if slipped from a leash, was back with the only pure love he had ever known. "Jess—Jess," he cried, ever weaker, till death stilled his crying, and he slept with cold lips pressed to the smiling miniature.

It would be easy to quote many similar examples, for as the story proceeds they multiply at an astonishing rate. There are, further, faults of construction which cannot be passed over. The leading events are brought about by a fire in a church—surely a clumsy expedient. The ultimate catastrophe is due to the folly of a drunken man accidentally encountered. These happenings lack the inevitability which ought to mark the progress of a tragedy. The worst clumsiness is that of making the final explanation by means of a MS. left by the heroine. To cast the main story in the form of a MS. was an indiscretion; to conceal a second MS. within the first was inexcusable.

We have occupied ourselves chiefly with censure; but there are cases in which to be severe is to be not only kind but encomiastic. This is one of them. Few novels that deserve censure are worth the trouble of disapproval. In Punchinello there is the raw material of respectable literature. We trust that the finished article may ultimately emerge.

And yet, so adroit is the mere writing, we should not be surprised to hear that Punchinello is the work of some practised hand that yearned for a new sensation from its press cuttings.

Jaspar Tristram: a Story. By A. W. Clarke.
(William Heinemann. 6s.)

THIS, which is one of the most unpleasant books we have read for a long time, has the countervailing quality of cleverness. And those who dislike such work, we advertise at once of the fact that it is a study of a temperament. Jaspar is a born pariah. He is precocious; he is already a watcher of his own spiritual processes at an age when the male of man has, as a rule, hardly become conscious of his moi. He is a worshipper of ideals, as a saint may be; but he clothes them in flesh and blood, and supposes himself to discern them incarnate in his commonplace comrades. But there is that in him which severs him perpetually from the object of his affections: a shyness, a self-love, unhappily masked beneath a misplaced tactless humility. He is clever, he is good-looking, he is capable enough in the playing-fields; yet though he thirsts for affection, and is ready to give himself away time after time to win it, he is always solitary, or, at best, the centre of a second-rate throng who—even they—look upon him rather as a wonder than as a hero or a friend. That is nothing to him; he would refrain altogether from competition rather than expose himself to the ignominy of a good second. And he reconciles himself but too quickly to failure, for he scents the worthlessness of the prize even as it comes within his reach. He must take refuge in his dreams against the sickening jar of actuality—even of actual success. From the sheltering roof of his guardian—a vulgar, greedy parson—he passes to the atmosphere of a large private school; and there first he meets Els, who becomes at once his idol and his curse. Together they go later to a public school, and together out into the world. Els, from being the pet of boys and masters, develops into the carpet-knight of society chivalry. Jaspar, the wretched egoist, in his pursuit of Nita, is no more fortunate than in his schooldays he had been in his efforts to win the affection of her brother.

"What an awful crowd!" he said, "how hot it is! Are you going anywhere?"

And as he uttered these commonplaces his clear-cut tones appeared to him to have acquired a power of stabbing quite independent of what he meant, while his eyes were ablaze with scorn. He could never remember what more either he or she had said till at last he had heard her asking: "What's that you've got?" as she pointed to a handkerchief he held in his hand.

"Oh, that?" he cried, and looked at it; "I found it the other day when I was turning over some old drawers. I rather think it's what they call a gage d'amour, but I've forgotten whose it was. You don't happen to know by any chance?" and he held it out.

"Oh," she exclaimed, "why —," and stopped.

"I beg your pardon?" he said with elaborate politeness. "What did you say?"

But she answered never a word. For a moment he hesitated, and then with a gesture of sudden fury tore it in two; the sound of the tear seemed to him to symbolise the breaking of his heart; and, turning, he disappeared in the crowd.

The story has but little incident to enliven it; there are in it many faults of taste; but there is no room for doubt that essentially it is true. It seems to be one of those books of which every man's life affords him the material for one.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE PATRONESS.

By G. M. GEORGE.

A story of Welsh Congregational life. The heroine becomes, by the death of her father, Squire Llewellyn, the patron of the living; and her conscience and intelligence lead her to set aside the choice which her father had practically made. This act of courage and its results are the staple of the story. (Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

THE ROSE OF JUDAH.

By GEORGE GRIFFITHS

This story deals with the love of Belshazzar for a Jewish girl, Miriam, the peerless daughter of Misael and Judith. In the first chapter Belshazzar is consulting Daniel about his love for the girl, whom he has seen bathing. The rivalry of Miriam's lover, Arax, captain of the Queen's Guard, and other incidents founded on the Bible narrative, bring the story forward to its climax—"Mene, mene, tekel upharsin," and the sack of Babylon by the Persians. (Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

FOR A GOD DISHONoured.

ANON.

Dedicated to the "dear and deathless memory of a just man." Justice is the virtue which the story seeks to exalt, but it does this at the expense of probabilities, seeing that the heroine forces her way into the House of Lords and, hypnotising their lordships by her eloquence, takes her seat as a peeress by no one's leave. (John Long. 6s.)

THE ARCHDEACON'S DAUGHTER, AND OTHER STORIES.

By G. A. MUSGRAVE.

The story which gives its title to the book is amusing, with its cautious archdeacon, and his go-ahead daughters who have been to Paris to learn French and have come back unable to speak English. Says the Archdeacon, reading a letter: "How Colonel Anson, a man of good family, can write and say that if 'Ahmen' is substituted for 'Amen,' he will, as a matter of principle, withdraw all his subscriptions! I myself was brought up to say 'Amen,' but, without being a Ritualist, I like to go with the times." (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

DID I keep a seraglio, as Dr. Johnson contemplated doing (a seraglio of the fancy), it would contain

Elizabeth Bennet,
Marianne Dashwood,
Anne Elliot,

out of Miss Austen's lot.

Mr. Andrew Lang in "Longman's Magazine."

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Girls' Novels in France and England.

ENGLAND invented the modern novel for girls. During the Second Empire the Parisians began to learn English, and the English novel for girls was used as a school text-book. It achieved popularity—a popularity which it has retained, for it still forms the staple of French girls' reading. Imitation was inevitable, and the selfpistas of Italy are not more indubitably of Anglo-Saxon derivation than that school of French writers which acknowledges Mme. Craven as its head and the Récit d'une Sœur as its chief work. The net result of the whole movement, now some sixty years old, is widespread unhappiness for a nation of jeunes filles who have been mischievously taught by its agency to regard future husbands as lovers instead of as the mere "embodiment of marriage and the family." Such, stated afresh, is the conclusion of Mme. Yetta Blaze de Bury, who, under the title "Girls' Novels in France," contributes to the North American Review a literary essay in the style of Anatole France, at once acute, witty, cynical, and graciously malign.

Mme. de Bury is unmerciful towards the author of the Récit d'une Sœur, that blameless volume of which the fortieth edition is now on sale. We cannot but rejoice at her courageous and uncompromising attitude. With our English ideas, we might forgive Mme. Craven for having rendered two generations of French girls miserable by means of a romantic inoculation, but we could not excuse her monstrous snobbishness (Mme. de Bury with exquisite tact refers to her "vigorous tones of the spirit of caste"), nor her fanatical religiosity. In certain ways Mme. Craven surpassed the worst excesses of her English exemplars. We are reminded by Mme. de Bury of the Marchioness de Livernois, who said that "a gentleman cannot fall lower than in becoming a manufacturer," and of the young Marquis, who broke off his engagement with a beautiful English girl because the child made fun of a priest on Good Friday. Who will dissent from the verdict that "such books as these are written for a special public, a public composed of fossils, a public which since 1830 has given up everything excepting the admiration of its own obstinacy?" Even the Sunday-school which cast out Kipling might agree that the religion inculcated by such literature "is not the religion of the Gospel, but of a coterie; and the representation of human duty is just as false in these books, where honour and honesty turn their backs upon each other." It is with a gaiety only half hidden that our critic adds: "The duchesses in France for whom Mme. Craven wrote have for a long time now come chiefly from the manufacturing classes."

After Mme. Craven comes Mme. Gréville, the apostle of the "Sainte Bourgeoise," with a snobbishness even more outrageous, in that it works in both directions, both upwards and downwards, not only against the proletariat, but against Mme. Craven's duchesses themselves. Mme. de Bury seems scarcely to catch the irony of this situation. But, in truth, she does not expend many words upon the author of Le Fiancé de Sylvie, who is little more than a link between Mme. Craven and those more modern and infinitely more excellent writers, Mme. Caro and Mme. Th. Bentzon, both of whom, if we mistake not, have, like Mme. Craven, been translated into English.

Mme. de Bury is generous in praise of Mmes. Caro and Bentzon. And she is right. The former's Roman de Jeune Fille is probably, judged as literature, the best and strongest "story for girls" ever written; and judged as a moral influence, it must also take high rank. As for Mme. Bentzon, it may be said that she has won the admiration of girls, and of critics like Mr. Andrew Lang. She is, in a word, an artist, though with perhaps less sheer imaginative strength than Mme. Caro. Not all her books, however, would commend themselves to the British matron. Tony, for instance, is what the British matron, if she expressed herself in French, would probably call shoking. To prove the charge we need only say that the heroine's father—her mother is dead—makes a mistress of one of his servants, and that the heroine lives on terms of familiarity with the fruit of this irregular union—Master Tony. Such a plot for such a book would be impossible in England. Yet are we not given to understand that the art of keeping young girls innocent reaches its highest perfection in France? If there are many girls' novels containing situations similar to that in Tony, the existence of Marcel Prévost's Demi-Vierges may conceivably be explained by the very fact!

With Mme. de Bury's final paragraph upon the ideal characteristics of the novel written for French girls we concur. She says:

In our opinion, the true "girls' novel" is the one that accentuates the rôle of personal responsibility instead of diminishing it, the novel, in fine, such as it is conceived by Mme. Caro and Mme. Bentzon, the novel which enables girls to see clearly into their own hearts. The taste for the things of the soul, the preference the Frenchwoman has for seeking to know what is going on in the heart, is peculiarly manifest in the child, who among us will be much more interested in Cinderella's thoughts and feelings than in the splendour of the godmother's coach.

A sense of personal responsibility is exactly what the "young person" lacks, especially in France, where nothing but marriage gives to a woman the licence to think for herself. Therefore, if the young person's novels are to be didactic, let them be didactic in fostering this sense. Here springs up a larger question: Should the young person's novels be didactic? Why must the young person, any more than the emancipated wife, be compelled to eat bread with her cake? Why should she learn out of school hours? Why, in her special case, should fiction be strained beyond the simple sincere presentation of life, or part of life? We fancy that Mme. de Bury, had she chosen to touch these points with precision, would have declared against any sort of overt or covert didacticism; her phrase, "accentuate the rôle," might mean anything or nothing. But, the fact is, Mme. de Bury is not disposed to take the girls' novels of France, even the best, too seriously. Her concern for them is strictly that of the disinterested observer, as would be expected from a lady who is not afraid to satisfy a more jaded taste. Nearly at the beginning of her article she inquires: "What necessity is there for a girl to read novels?" We should reply, "In France, none." In France, where girls not only act but think at the word of parental command, it would certainly be simpler to forbid all girls' novels by general social edict. No revolution would follow.

But in England, where the girl is a force, and in America, where the girl is paramount, the question of girls' novels has, or should have, an authentic importance. It would richly repay consideration, and, like most questions which would richly repay consideration, it is neglected by sociologists. If Mme. de Bury had written, for instance, on "Girls' Novels in America," she would have performed a service instead of merely producing a diversion. Who, except American girls, knows anything exact of girls' novels in America—one of the great influences everlastingly at work in the formation of the national character? Probably, since in the republic of letters the United States form a suburb of London, the girls' novels of America are much like the girls' novels of England. If so, we take them to be sufficiently feeble. The immediate future of the girls' novel in England is not more rosy than its immediate past. We still have Charlotte M. Yonge; but Miss Yonge is no longer producing things like the Heir of Redclyffe, a work which remains, despite faults and limitations, a powerful book, standing in England as Roman de Jeune Fille in France. There is no girls' author of to-day with half the prestige which Miss Yonge enjoyed in the seventies. The single recent recruit of promise is Mrs. Tynan Hinkson, whose fiction for girls has delicacy, unusual breadth, unusual wit, and a real literary flavour. Of the "practised hands," Mrs. L. T. Meade has discovered that she can write sensational tales for the man in the street as well as anyone in the three kingdoms, and naturally she does little else. Mrs. Molesworth usually caters for the quite small girl. Miss Rosa N. Carey, Miss Evelyn Everett-Green, Miss Hesba Stretton—these ladies do not excite us by leaving the trodden ways.

Turn to the periodicals which devote themselves to girls, and there is perceptible no brilliant light in the east. The most expensive and luxurious of all, The Girls' Realm—may we say that it appeals to the English equivalent of Mme. Craven's duchesses?—has in its current number an instalment of a serial by Miss Carey. In quoting the following passage from it we should like to ask whether "the vigorous tones of the spirit of caste" were ever more implacably struck by Mme. Craven herself:

This question had been asked several years before, but as she grew older Bonnie had not interested herself in her mother's fate. Somehow she had taken it for granted that her father had married beneath him, and that her mother was not a lady; and having a proud spirit she was quite willing to ignore the existence of a humbly born, uneducated parent.

At the other end of the scale is The Girls' Friend, with twelve pages for a halfpenny, "three grand, long serial tales," and probably a tremendous circulation. Here is an extract from a summary of the principal serial, the author being Miss Mabel St. John:

Maurice Ainslie, really the Earl of Rothdale, and his friend John Beaumont are touring the country in the disguise of artists. The former rescues a young lady who has slipped into the river. Her beauty and charm of manner at once impress the mind of the young earl.

The two friends visit a local theatre, and, to Maurice's astonishment, the young lady of his adventure appears on the stage. Her professional name is Claire Alaine.

Beaumont taunts Maurice about losing his heart over an actress, and the latter promptly knocks his friend down.

Maurice proposes to Claire, and is accepted. Beaumont does not relish the news, and, with a sinister purpose in view, drugs Maurice's coffee. He then meets Claire, and endeavours to persuade her to forget his friend. She promises.

If any English renaissance of literature for girls were to occur, a searching and unprejudiced investigation of their literary tastes ought, if this world were Utopia, to precede it. Very little is actually known of girls' real tastes, even by their mothers. We are apt to assume that they are what we think they ought to be—an absurd and perilous assumption. We may be sure that whatever the literary taste of the average girl is, it is not catholic. In this connexion there never was a wilder theory than that which says: "Turn the average healthy girl into a good library and she will instinctively choose what is good for her." She will do nothing of the kind, for girls are human beings, though we use every effort to conceal the fact from them and from ourselves. It is doubtful, too, whether the average girl veritably prefers a love story to any other sort of story. It may be so in France—Mme. de Bury says it is—but there is no question that many English girls prefer boys' books to girls' books.

Their Golden Wedding.

From the French of Edouard Rod.

THEY had settled, five or six years ago, at the top of Lafontaine-street, at Auteuil, coming heaven knows from where. They were called "Walter"—one of those cosmopolitan names that betray no origin; and their strange appearance afforded the peaceful suburb talk, where gossip is rife as in a provincial town. Many a day, at eleven o'clock and at five, M. Walter might be seen going out for his constitutional, very erect, his step light in spite of his seventy-five years, his face of the artificial freshness of a preserved apple, tightly buttoned in a correct double-breasted coat, with a foreign order in his buttonhole. On rainy days he shortened his walk, entered a café, looked over the papers, and exchanged a few words with the customers. His voice was brief, with a certain accent as discreet as his name, in which there were slight guttural sounds that might be German, diphthongs that might be English, and aspirations that perhaps came from the Russian. "Where on earth does he hail from?" the people asked behind his back, and speculation went apace; he may perhaps be a German who is hiding his nationality, or an Englishman who does not mention it because "it is nobody else's affair"; or even a Russian, who plays at mystery for the love of mystery.

As for Mme. Walter, she only went out on messages, and never forgot herself so far as to gossip with the shopkeepers. A few years younger than her husband, she was more broken-down: white-haired, muddied-skinned; she had the bent figure, the faded eyes, and in her bearing, in her walk, all about her, that indefinable something of suffering that those who have grown old in pain possess. Her sole domestic assistance was a charwoman called Marianne, the wife of a workman upholsterer, who came in the morning and left at noon, at the moment M. Walter returned from his constitutional to lunch. Marianne only cleaned the rooms and did the rough work. Mme. Walter herself did the cooking—middle-class cooking, well prepared, which comprised a few outlandish dishes: Milanese "risottos" with fowl's liver, cock-combs and white truffles, curry, skewered bits of mutton such as are eaten at Constantinople under the name of "chops," fried anchovies, and white cheese called "sphinx" in Sicily—in short, cosmopolitan dishes which as little as the rest betrayed the origin of the married pair. Of their life Marianne saw nothing. Once, returning by chance, she heard the irritated voice of M. Walter thundering in the dining-room. Two or three days later, again returning, under some pretext or other, again she heard the scolding voice. But as Mme. Walter gave her to understand that if she ever entered the flat except at the settled hours she would be sent away, she repressed her curiosity. From the little she saw, however, she concluded that M. Walter was greedy and exacting, and that his wife condemned herself to solitude with him to hide their quarrels from strangers. So she was much astonished when one day Mme. Walter said to her:

"Could you stay all day to-morrow, Marianne? I have a special dinner to prepare, so I need you."

Marianne knew that her questions generally were left without response, yet she ventured to ask in a burst of curiosity:

"Madame expects guests?"

Instead of crushing her with a glance, Mme. Walter explained:

"No, but we celebrate our golden wedding, and we are treating ourselves to a little feast. On this occasion I wish to dine without getting up from table, you understand?"

Marianne understood; her peasant quickness, that instinctively unravelled the complicated problems of a neighbour's conduct, told her at once that there was a mystery here, and that this golden wedding would be original.

The idea of the golden wedding came, of course, from M. Walter. One day, after some disagreeable remarks about a dish that he did not find sufficiently spiced, he said to his wife:

"By the way, you know it will soon be the 14th of October."

For a long time she had ceased to celebrate any anniversary, and even the great feasts of Easter, Christmas, and the New Year hardly broke the monotony of her days.

"Well?" she said, without understanding.

"What! Well? The date says nothing to you? Ah, how I recognise you in that—as little heart as head. The 14th October is the anniversary of our wedding—the fiftieth, my dear; our golden wedding. Why, we must, of course, celebrate it, eh? A nice little dinner, you can cook one on your good days, with a bottle of champagne at dessert. Ah, you'll see, that'll freshen us up a bit."

A nice little dinner, with champagne at dessert—that was all M. Walter saw in the date. It suggested gluttony to him—no more. As he never troubled about his wife, he did not remark that she paled and ate nothing more. And tranquilly he awaited "the great day."

But she, Mme. Walter, was upset. Fifty years! God! was it possible? For fifty years, half a century, the length of two generations, she had dragged out this sad sacrifice of her life; for fifty years during which she had aged, waiting ever for the ray of happiness or of affection that never burst forth; for fifty years ideas of revolt had secretly taken germ and then died in the depths of her being. Fifty years ago, young, fair, pretty, with mind alert and open heart, she had placed her hand in that man's hand. That was far away, no matter where, in a southern country, on a day of sunshine, a day of warmth, amid the smiles of nature in bloom, with song and laughter and gaiety and dance. He was young. She loved him, she believed in him; before them a bright and easy future unrolled its blue horizons. Alas! deception came the very day after the wedding, when in the heart of the man she had adorned with every delicacy of feeling she found nothing but a monstrous egoism. From day to day, from month to month, from year to year, his selfishness threw its shadows across her life. He dragged her off from one end of the world to the other. In what should have been common sorrows he did not share, so clever was he in casting from his path every obstacle to his well-being; and, nevertheless, in spite of the anguish that prolongs the hours of every day, in spite of tears slow to fall, time had moved on—moved that life, now practically ended, concealed nothing in the remnant of life that remained. She had now no other hopes than those of the mysterious Beyond! Even those supreme hopes the selfishness of the man had destroyed like the rest. Had he not dulled her faith with the very same raillery with which he had scoffed at her young girl's dreams; and now, indifferent to the regrets of the past as to the menaces of the future, he asked for a good dinner, with champagne at dessert. Ah! that dinner! If it might be a vengeance! If the poor woman could only serve up all her bitterness, all the poison absorbed drop by drop! If it might be the last of their life together! If only she had the courage to realise at last the project so often sketched, to shake off her chain, and go away, and leave him alone, and live her remaining days far away from him!

M. Walter was in a good humour all the day of his golden wedding while waiting for the little dinner as his wife knew how to cook it. To tell the truth, his good humour was worse than the other; it showed itself in jokes of quite a special taste, bitter, bilious, which he accentuated with the little rasping laugh of a rattle which seemed to her like exact expression of his soul. Three or four times in the course of the day he said to his wife, in the same tone, in words he believed to be witty and veiled, that he never much liked her, that she was only fit to mind the house, and other such pretty phrases which lashed more than gross insults. Following her habit, she made no other reply than a broken-hearted glance, the dolorous reproach of which he had never understood; and the hours passed on.

When the old Empire clock, which had accompanied them everywhere throughout their wanderings, was on the stroke of six, M. Walter, who came back from his constitutional with the regularity of a palate hostile to burnt sauce, opened the door of the dining-room. The table was not laid.

At the aspect of the empty chamber that threatened a long delay, M. Walter at once went into a rage. Agitated, red with anger, he rushed into the kitchen, where he found Marianne alone.

"And Madame?"

"Madame is out."

"How? Out! Where? What did she say?"

"Madame said that to-day dinner would be at seven o'clock."

"Seven o'clock! An hour to wait! And out? Why?"

The hour was long. M. Walter had never felt a keener vexation. He walked up and down and round about his study, pondering the unsolvable enigma that held possession of his mind. Why had his wife gone out on that very day. Why had she changed the hour of dinner? The enigma increased, became more aggravating, till at length he, the least imaginative of men, ended by imagining the wildest solutions. Had his wife suddenly gone mad? When the clock struck seven, and she did not appear, he felt his study too narrow, and strode through all the rooms of the flat, opening and shutting doors, counting his steps to divert his attention; he finished by returning to the kitchen. Marianne took care not to tell him anything. She glanced slyly at him, with a mocking air, which fortunately escaped him. He questioned her.

"Well, she is not hurrying?"

"Ah! I forgot to tell Monsieur. . . . Madame told me to tell Monsieur that he was not to be uneasy if Madame were a little late. . . ."

A little late! An hour and twenty minutes beyond the ordinary hour! And the dinner, the festive dinner, the dinner of this golden wedding, confided to a charwoman whose cooking he knew nothing about! He asked angrily:

"What is there for dinner?"

And Marianne, always sly:

"Madame told me to say nothing to Monsieur, because there were surprises."

Surprises! The word was a ray of light. No doubt his wife had gone out to look for something exquisite for him, something rare, coming from afar, perhaps by an afternoon train, and not to be had earlier. . . . Good woman, all the same! And his anger melted in a vague affection that sharpened his large appetite.

A step on the stairs, the door opens, Mme. Walter is there, a little pale, out of breath after the four flights. . . . Her hands are empty; there is no surprise.

"Ah, there you are at last! It is nearly eight. What does it mean?"

"Nothing. I preferred to dine late to-day. You may serve dinner, Marianne."

Having assumed his grandest air of despot in a fury, the unaccustomed calm of the reply disconcerted him. They sat down to table in silence. Marianne brought in the steaming soup.

"Pumpkin soup! Pumpkin! And you know that I detest it."

"I like it, and it is more than thirty years since I have eaten any." It was said in a measured, reflected tone that admitted of no reply. M. Walter, stunned, remained with mouth open, without a word to say, while his wife ate slowly, with an effort, a few spoonfuls. . . .

"Here is the fish."

"Ah! are you making fun of me? A pike! and Dutch sauce! As if you did not know that I only like sea-fish."

"And I only like fresh-water fish." And yet she did not touch the portion she had given herself. With a vague glance she stared into the void, into the great void behind her, into the void that had engulfed her youth, her beauty, her mind, her love and her strength, into the void of those fifty years of slavery that made all her life. Her heart was full of hate, and when her glance fell upon her husband astounded, humiliated, frightened with a vague fear, she enjoyed his childish annoyance, which was her sole revolt and all her vengeance.

"It is gay, the golden wedding," said Marianne to herself, bringing in the juggled hare. M. Walter looked and shouted:

"But it is hare! You have selected everything I detest."

"And everything I like."

"One would say you had done it on purpose."

"You perceive it at last? Yes, I have done it on purpose." He was standing now, his face congested, his fist lifted, while she repeated in her dead voice:

"Yes, I did it on purpose."

And this revolt, this tranquillity, seemed to him so colossal that he sat down again.

"Look here," he said, "explain it. I don't understand. Have you gone mad? Do you know what you are saying? Isn't it my golden wedding?"

"Mine also, alas! I have not gone mad, there! And if you want to know what I was thinking of, I will tell you. . . . For fifty years I have had to submit to all your whims; you have imposed your will upon me in all things, without ever supposing that I had an idea of my own. For fifty years I have been your slave. I wanted you to be mine—for an hour, only for an hour, and in only the smallest matters of life. After to-night you will resume your liberty, and I will take up my chain again. I would have liked to throw it off altogether, to go away and leave you alone, but I could not. I am too old; I should be afraid; you understand now?"

She trembled in every limb. Her eyes already implored pardon for her audacity. While she was speaking M. Walter's face brightened again. It was only that! A crisis that would not recur; even now, he had the intuition that it had passed, that he could fly out, scold, shout, and that his wife would ask his pardon. For the first time in his life, because, no doubt, of the strain upon his nerves, shaken by vague fears, he was generous; he smiled almost amiably, and murmured:

"Women will be women to the end!"

A few tears rolled from Mme. Walter's lids upon her empty plate. She wiped her eyes, and asked timidly:

"Shall I ring for the rest? There is something that won't displease you—a duck paté."

M. Walter's glance became quite jovial:

"From Amiens?" And on an affirmative sign. "You had taken away my appetite, but it will return, I hope. And the champagne, did you forget it?"

"No, it is here iced."

The old fellow's face positively beamed:

"Iced!" he cried joyously. "Ah, this time I recognise you! I'm not angry. I forgive you."

Things Seen.

The Intruder.

LIFE to Prince meant sticks. The game was simple. You threw a stick a few yards, Prince recovered it, brought it to your feet, and, after a solemn pantomime suggesting that he would never again part with it, the stick was dropped and you were expected to throw it again. The village where Prince lived was an ideal village for the playing at sticks. The road was white and dusty, with here and there oases of cool cobble stones on which a dog could rest his nose; and there was hardly any traffic. Facing one side of the road was a seat, and behind the seat the churchyard wall. As the village stood on a hill, travellers and idlers often sat awhile on the seat. That was Prince's opportunity: that was why this village was so good a place for playing sticks, why Prince liked living there. For if, when you have reached the top of a hill and are comfortably seated, a great shaggy colley dog drops a piece of stick at your feet, and lies down just behind it, with front paws tucked in under his chest, asking you, begging you to throw the stick—could you resist the appeal? Well, I had been playing sticks with Prince intermittently through a Sunday afternoon. When the bell calling to evening service ceased I threw the stick for the last time, entered the little church, and found a seat near the door. The service progressed slowly: the vicar had lived forty years in the village: he was old, short-sighted, but benign: no gabbler: a lover of his calling: a stickler for punctilious propriety in the observance of the rubric. The first hymn (We Love Thy House, O Lord) had begun; the vicar, his gentle eyes peering into the hymn-book, had given himself up to the influence of the hour, when I heard a slight scuffling in the porch beyond the open door of the church. I glanced over my shoulder to see Prince pick a piece of stick from the ground. He paused a moment, as if selecting a playmate among the congregation. Then he advanced solemnly up the aisle. He ascended the chancel steps—slowly, seriously—halted in front of the old vicar, settled himself, tucked his front paws beneath him, dropped a piece of wet stick on the ground—and waited.

The Newspaper.

THE tale had been easy to read, even had I not gathered, from her words with her father, who had stood at the window to see the last of her, that she was on her way to London, to study music. Her blue serge frock was short at the sleeves, and old; and there was the violin on the rack, and the gallant effort not to cry before strangers.

And indeed she held her tears, but with a treacherous endurance; so she set her face to the window (being seated in a corner), and the disorder of her hair hid at least her eyes. She was no more than fifteen, and beautiful. All of us that saw her had one hope: that she would not break down. We were nine men, of all ages, all Scots but myself, and all strangers.

The silence, all but unendurable—for the tears were soon discovered, though unfallen—was altogether too much for my neighbour, a young and very pink commercial. He drew a prodigious breath, and rolled a determined eye. So—it was our salvation—he espied, on the rack above him, a paper: hesitated, rose, and seized it. Then came a very pretty piece of acting. He glanced it over (without, as events proved, seeing it), grunted, and muttered, quite audibly: "Eh, I have seen it a'ready!" Then he leaned suddenly forward to the girl, who shrank back, at the limit of her self-control. "Will ye like to see the paper?" he said, very civilly and gently.

I envied him her sudden look of comprehension. She took the sheet in silence, and shook it out in front of her; pressing back into her corner, so that she was cut off from the carriage securely as by a screen. Who knows how we breathed, and envied the hero of our rescue!

And then there sounded, loud above our talk—for we were suddenly speaking of this and that: golf, and seals, and ministers—the splash of a tear on paper. Five of us involuntarily looked towards the girl. Nothing of her was visible above her waist but her finger-tips. But what we did see, with tragic distinctness, was the heavy headline of the paper. It was—what do you think?—the Financial Times.

A Library for Children.

IN quoting last week a "first prize list" of the twenty-five best books for children, we suggested that the list could be improved upon; and we invited any of our readers to frame lists of the twelve most suitable books for a children's library.

Our remarks have brought us several letters. Two of these convey such useful information, and are so evidently the outcome of observation and parental thought, that we give them in extenso, although, as will be seen, the first gaily throws over our idea of "twelve best books."

Mrs. E. J. L. Atkinson, of Penarth, writes:

"It is too hard a task to attempt a list of only twelve books suitable for children under twelve years of age. There is that dreadful period between three and five, where the mother has to read the same tale over a dozen times a day!

I am sending you a list of books which my twin girls, who are now 11½ years, have read—and love. When they first began to have paper books—and not linen or glazed calico, home-made ones—my husband and I tried to teach them to love and care for books: so we only allowed one book at a time to lie on the shelf in the nursery; the others were carefully locked by, not to hurt their 'faces' (covers), their 'bones' (edges and back), or their 'insides' (leaves).

The children got to look upon books as things that could feel; and although the very earliest of their books have suffered in a measure, and have been patched and gummed, yet they are presentable, and are in their library in the schoolroom.

My husband makes a rule of buying good editions, well illustrated; and we never allow them to be lent to other children out of the house. Any little friend, however, is welcome to read them here.

THREE YEARS TO FOUR YEARS.

The Owl and the Pussy Cat. Lear.

The Duck and the Kangaroo. Lear.

Jack the Giant Killer and other Stories.

Little Red Riding Hood and other Stories.

(The last two should be simply told, and may be based on the tales in the Blue Fairy Book.)

FOUR YEARS TO FIVE YEARS.

Nonsense Songs and Stories. Lear.

English Fairy Tales. Jacob.

Young England's Nursery Tales. Warne & Co.

Fairyland. Tom Hood. Warne & Co.

Lady Goodchild's Fairy Ring.

FIVE YEARS TO SIX YEARS.

Blue Fairy Book. Lang.

Red Fairy Book. Lang.

Any-How Stories. Mrs. Kingdon Clifford.

Eight Tales of Fairyland. Poirer. Leadenhall Press.

The Rose and the Ring. Thackeray.

SIX YEARS TO SEVEN YEARS.

Terra Cotta Plays. Prevost.

Der Ball der Thiery.

Struwwelpeter.

Kinder- und Haus-Märchen. Brüder Grimm.

(The last three were read over and over again until they knew them by heart.)

A China Cup.

Story of a Puppet.

Stories from Fairyland.

(These three in Fisher Unwin's 'Children's Library'.)

Mrs. Craig's Fairy Tales.

(In this book they picked out a wrongly translated word from the German, and came to me laughing merrily about it. 'Geislein' translated 'goslings,' instead of 'little goats,' or kids.)

SEVEN YEARS TO EIGHT YEARS.

Alice in Wonderland.

Through the Looking-Glass.

Church's Story of the Odyssey.

Church's Story of the Iliad.

The Heroes. Kingsley.

Jackdaw of Rheims. Ingoldsby. Printed by Raphael

Tuck & Sons.

Parables from Nature. Mrs. Gaskell.

EIGHT YEARS TO NINE YEARS.

Jungle Books, 1 and 2.

Goblin Market. Christina Rossetti.

Sing-Song. Christina Rossetti.

Vicar of Wakefield. Illustrated by H. Thomson.

Struwwelpeter.

Harold, Last of the Saxons.

Sprechende Thiery.

Die verkehrte Welt.

NINE YEARS TO TEN YEARS.

Jackanapes. Mrs. Ewing.

History of England. Dickens.

Midsummer Night's Dream. Illustrated by Robert Anning Bell.

The Lady of the Lake.

Quentin Durward.

Anne of Geierstein.

Water Babies.

Tom Brown's Schooldays.

Ivanhoe.

The Abbott.

As You Like It.

Merchant of Venice.

The Tempest.

TEN YEARS TO ELEVEN AND A HALF YEARS.

(Their Present Age.)

Silas Marner.

Hereward the Wake.

King Robert of Paris.

Nicholas Nickleby.

Dombey & Son.

Barnaby Rudge.

Pride and Prejudice. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson.

Our Village. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson.

Cranford. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson.

Bab Ballads.

Treasure Island.

Pilgrim's Progress.

The Forsaken Merman.

Daddy Darwin's Dove-cot.

All these books they still have and cherish. In many cases they can quote pages. They have picked up reading, both English and German, by watching and looking as I read to them. They have learned German side by side with English, having a German nurse.

They will not listen to 'Westward Ho!' 'Robinson Crusoe,' and 'The Days of Bruce.' They say, 'It fidgets us!'

The other reply which we wish to quote this week is sent to us by Mrs. H. A. D. Seymour, who writes from her husband's official residence at the Royal Mint. Mrs. Seymour gives the following list of twelve books suitable for children:

Struwwelpeter.
 Alice in Wonderland and Through the Looking-Glass.
 Uncle Remus.
 Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales.
 Grimm's Fairy Tales.
 The Water Babies.
 The Pilgrim's Progress.
 Holiday House.
 Masterman Ready.
 Talisman.
 Child's Garden of Verses.
 Longfellow's Poems—particularly "Hiawatha."

Mrs. Seymour explains that the above list has been compiled by her from experience gained from the tastes of her own six children. Mrs. Seymour adds: "No doubt every family would make out different lists, and some of the above books are only suitable for reading out loud. Uncle Remus was most popular when read by anyone who could grapple with the spelling, but no child under twelve would be able to do this for himself. Hiawatha might not be generally popular, but was so in a most marked degree with a boy of about seven, when read aloud. Many children under twelve delight in Shakespeare and Scott, but except Julius Caesar in the one case and the Talisman in the other they are more suitable for older children."

Essays in Enthusiastic Journalism.

I.—The "Lark."

"It is not likely that you will forget an April morning in the studio, here on the Barbary coast, when we demolished Decadence and picked Hope out of the dust-heap, and, with a fine enthusiasm, took her to lunch with us at the Restaurant aux Gourmets; nor how there the Lark was named, in a baptism of vin ordinaire; and while we, as sponsors, kindled and flamed, the ouvrier of the Quarter fed stolidly at the next table, little guessing, as he has not yet learned, the splendour of the moment!"

So wrote Mr. Bruce Porter, my intellectual mentor, when the Lark died. Ah, no! I shall not forget that day. The California spring was at its green high tide, and our hare-brained youth was in the heyday of its enthusiasm. I had found my people, and when a man has once learned the grand hailing sign of his clan he comes to himself and begins to live.

It was in San Francisco that we, as les jeunes, put forth our first venture. San Francisco, the city of miracles! Whose voice is the babbling clatter of ten thousand pulley wheels slapped by the cables where the rope slackens in the valleys of the little streets between the hills, whose mantle is the sea fog that packs in through the Golden Gate, and piles over the coast range, tumbling upon the shabby wooden town, garbing it in a robe of romantic mystery. For her holiday dress she flings about her hilly shoulders a robe of sunshine, fringed with a violet haze, which sweeps the borders of the barren slopes that lock her in beside the bay. Nothing is impossible within her domain.

In such a place it was not hard to be optimistic. The Latin Quarter of the city, peopled with castaways from every corner of Christendom, was a literary inspiration; Chinatown, with its perpetual feasts of colour, was an artistic delight. The town had already a spirited and picturesque history, for Aztec, American Indian, Spaniard, and Argonaut had been there before us, and the English tourist still walked at large in a cricket cap, and wondered at Tar Flat, the Mission, and the Barbary Coast, whose very names are alluring. As for the Presidio slopes, the dunes by the shoreside, the cliffs, and the waters of the Gate, and Mount Tamalpais sleeping in the north—there Nature came to our very doorsteps and bade us be of good cheer. As the hills changed from green to yellow, and from yellow to dun red, we sped past the equinox and thanked God that we were alive!—indeed, one cannot write of San Francisco save with exclamation points and dashes!

What did we care for the old rituals? We were isolate, remote. What did we know of them, indeed, if the truth be told? Not too much! If the Révue Blanche, the Yellow Book, and the Chap Book represented the acme of modern culture, then we would have done with that at least, and go back to clean child's play—we would strike for freedom and sanity, and to the devil with those who had no caste-mark of our own sense of humour, which we worshipped as a fetish. What had we to say? Nothing. We were in the mood for song rather, and hence for that and the pun of the thing we named our amateur output the Lark!

Never was a periodical better named, and for long we so oscillated between gravity and nonsense that our readers doubted our purpose. But we agreed to count the magazine a success if but one in every ten understood how such extremes could meet. The make-up was heretic, from the Chinese wrapping-paper that we used, to the non-"justified" lines in which we set our type. We printed on but one side of the sheet, and folded it à la japonaise; we eschewed advertisements, page numbers, tables of contents, signatures—everything but what the newspapers call "pure reading matter." And lastly, in an ungenerous spirit of revolt, for a year we forbade contributions from women!

It is harder to confess the other indiscretions, but to make a clean breast of it—we ran the gamut of French forms, from Virelai to Glose and Sestina, with two imperfect Chants Royal thrown in, for good measure: these, however, with but a rhyme gone wrong—they were not so bad. We resurrected obsolete definitions in cold blood, but we did not split infinitives, we were still too "precious" for that. Still, with it all, our poetry was serious, and so was a good hard third of our prose. There was neither satire nor parody from one year's end to another, nor was there "local colour" either; we aimed pointblank at Boston and New York, with a hope, at times, that we might hit even London by some clever chance.

The "one-in-ten" it seems, however, was of the literary coterie, and he showed our birds to his friends, as a sly delicacy, too rare a treat for public relish. It seemed that there were other jeunes in the world, and this was our reward. Now, conceit aside—and surely one may be conceited who has done as he pleased for two whole years—we could endure flattery, but the accusation of having a "purpose" was too much for us. Before we knew it we had a sort of policy, at least—if that was only not to whine at the world's ways, and let other better, older, wiser, stupider persons have to do with the tragedy of sorrow. Should the Lark be stuffed? Jamais de la vie! It should go up and wait for us on the nearest cloud.

So we came to an end with a presto movement while our eagerness had not yet cooled. That "one-in-ten" should never say that les jeunes had grown old, that they had lost their fire! We would not dwell over long with gaiety, but be up from our play, and at the world's work.

We did not take ourselves seriously—ah! you should have visited the Lark office during the second year (after ladies were allowed to contribute), and see!—but, such as it was, les jeunes had formed a "centre" and, in a way of speaking, a cult, if but a newer cult of nonsense. Ah! Nonsense, what crimes have been committed in thy name!

But it is all over now; all save one doggerel verse which tossed our creation into prominence, and the fact that the two volumes of the Lark are now sold for thirty shillings.

GELETT BURGESS.

Charles Kingsley as a Novelist.

FEW boys, perhaps, have read Westward Ho! for the first time without thinking its author the greatest novelist of the age, and fewer still have not reversed their boyish judgment in more discreet years. For Westward Ho!—although very much against the author's intention—is above all things a boys' book. The slightness of the love interest, the frequent and daring adventures scattered through the book, and the fights, both duel and melée, described in it are nothing but so many appeals to the boyish mind. As for the hero Amyas, brave, resourceful, and of superhuman strength, hating subtlety and punctilio, he is that beau idéal of the boys, the popular fourth form master, in slightly different circumstances of time and place. But, as time went on, Kingsley's own idea of what a hero should be seems to have altered. In Hypatia—by far the most correct in form and ambitious in aim of all his novels—we find Amyas Leigh again, but Amyas Leigh with the vices which, as men of the world, we know a man of his temperament and of his adventurous life must have acquired before he was five-and-twenty. Animal, brutal, and stupid, “a mere wild bull and soulless gladiator,” the author rightly relegates him to the second place, and takes as hero the Jew Aben-Ezra, the blasé and all-accomplished man about town whom the prayers of a noble Roman maiden and the arguments of St. Augustine convert to the Christian faith. While in Two Years Ago, Amyas Leigh is, so to speak, split in two, his virtues going to Gentleman Gun and his vices to Trebooze, and the part of hero is conferred on Tom Thurnall, a personage as freethinking and as cunning (in the best sense) as Aben-Ezra, but withal, as his creator confesses, what would in modern phrase be called “a bit of a bounder.” It was, no doubt, the desire to hold the mirror up to Nature which led the author thus to exhibit successively lower and lower types, but only a cynic can gracefully portray a hero in whom his author sees faults, and Kingsley was, of all things, no cynic.

CHARLES KINGSLEY.

A worse fault, however, in a critic's eyes than this desire to show the spots in his marble is the intolerable love of preaching which Kingsley's characters display. Alton

Locke and Yeast are professedly didactic, for which reason we can leave them out of the account; and it is such a sermon-ridden age that is depicted in Hypatia that the four or five pages of sermon put into the mouth of Cyril may pass as local colour. But why should we endure besides preachments more or less long from Hypatia, Aben-Ezra, Pambo, and, most unexpectedly, from Miriam? As for Old Wulf, a sort of prototype of Major Campbell, the Dobbins of Two Years Ago, civilisation compels us to bear with such people, but to ask us to believe that a party of Goths bent on enjoying themselves would long have stood the company of such a determined spoil-sport is to put a considerable strain on our credulity. The explanation of which is that Kingsley was a popular preacher before he became a novelist, and that like all men whose heart is in their work, he found it difficult to get beyond his last.

But with this the quiver of the devil's advocate is well-nigh exhausted, and for the other qualities of his work one can have nearly unqualified praise. No writer, perhaps, has ever had a greater power of dramatic presentation than Kingsley; no one has ever succeeded in bringing a scene more vividly before the reader; and no one has ever made his dramatis personæ so reveal their characters in a few words. Will Cary, who seems introduced into Westward Ho! merely to give the cue to Amyas, we know as if we had met him, and Eudaimon, the little porter at the museum, who hardly speaks a page in the whole course of Hypatia, and Fray Gerundio, who appears but once, are characters which live; while if we want a spirited scene enacted before us, can we do better than read the taking of the gold train or of the galleon in Westward Ho! the “murder grim and great” of the mob of Alexandria by the Goths, or even the shipwreck in Two Years Ago? So powerful is the illusion in the first two cases, that the unlikelihood of the whole story, of the impossibility of a handful of men always conquering against overwhelming odds, never occurs to us. Can there be any greater test of dramatic power?

And with this Kingsley combined a gift even rarer—the power of poetic description. We say poetic advisedly, because in his pictures of the tropics and of ancient Alexandria he was painting that which he had not seen. Yet can there be a finer or, in fact, more truthful rendering of the gorgeous scenery of the West Indies than that which we get from Westward Ho!? As for Egypt, take this sunrise:

... a long arrow of level light flashed down the gorge from crag to crag, awakening every crack and slab to vividness and life. The great crimson sun rose swiftly through the dim night mist of the desert, and as he poured his glory down the glen, the haze rose in threads and plumes, and vanished, leaving the stream to sparkle round the rocks, like the living, twinkling eye of the whole scene. Swallows flocked by hundreds out of the cliff, and began their air-dance for the day; the jerboa hopped stealthily homeward on his stilts from his stolen meal in the monastery garden; the brown sand-lizards underneath the stones opened one eyelid each, and having satisfied themselves that it was day, dragged their bloated bodies and whip-like tails out into the most burning patch of gravel which they could find, and nestling together as a further protection against cold, fell fast asleep again; the buzzard, who considered himself lord of the valley, awoke with a long querulous bark, and rising aloft in two or three vast rings, to stretch himself after his night's sleep, hung motionless, watching every lark which chirruped on the cliffs; while from the far-off Nile below the awakening croak of pelicans, the clang of geese, the whistle of the godwit and curlew, came ringing up the windings of the glen; and last of all the voices of the monks rose chanting a morning hymn to some wild Eastern air. . . .

Poetical and dramatic power, the art of expressing character, earnest purpose, and the love of high ideals—these are gifts which fall to few, and which should make Kingsley's works live when his preaching is forgotten.

F. L.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE Earl of Mexborough had lately entered on his ninetyeth year when he died the other day at Brighton. Time had been kind to him in many ways by merely leaving him alone. He kept up old interests without weariness, and as an octogenarian he made new ones. Witness his reception into the Roman Catholic Church when he was eighty-five, an episode which his friends did not forbear to attribute to the impetuosity of youth. It is rather difficult then to begin to confess, to say your Rosary, and the rest, after more than fourscore years of conscious Protestantism. But Lord Mexborough's flexibility was equal to the strain.

EVEN in the political world, Lord Mexborough found himself made almost famous by time. He sat for Gatton in a Parliament which passed Lord John Russell's Reform Bill, disfranchising Gatton, and he was a silent member. Even when Gatton went by the board, its representative did not rise to defend its political existence. Once only in the House of Commons was the voice of Viscount Pollington—as he then was—heard. It was when he asked the House's permission—necessary in those days—for a short absence of his father, the third Earl of Mexborough (whose Irish peerage did not carry with it a seat in the House of Lords, and who was with his son in the House of Commons). Mr. O'Connell opposed the permission, and Lord Pollington collapsed. That was his only lip-service in that famous Parliament; and almost the only occasion on which father and son found themselves in the division lobby was when they voted against Reform. He could not have had much less of a career; yet Time made it unique. For during the last year or two of his life he was a political survival—the only man left who had sat in the Unreformed Parliament, a man to whom, senatorially, the Gladstones and the Disraelis were as upstarts. The distinction which only the lapse of time—friendly for once—conferred on Lord Mexborough the politician belonged to him by right, however, in various other departments of life—as a linguist, a traveller, a connoisseur; but to these points allusions have not been wanting in the daily press.

SIR EDMUND ANTROBUS will hardly persuade the Government to give him £125,000 for Stonehenge and its surrounding 1,300 acres, though the Times, in fair return for having the first news, may lend a smiling countenance to the proposal. Sir Edmund talks of the high price paid for works of art of late years. Yes, but they are works that can be removed at pleasure. They are "liquid assets" in every capital of Europe. They can be deposited with Sir Edmund himself at Coutts's Bank. Stonehenge is stationary, all rumoured offers of American millionaires to the contrary. The man who carts away Stonehenge destroys it. Once severed from its own environment and its unbroken tradition, the wonder will cease to work. Its re-erection will take away all the mystery of its erection: what man does now, man of old ought to have been able to do. So, on another continent, would the sightseer of the future think—that is, if he does not smile away the early history of the stones as a legend. Equally inimical to Sir Edmund's claim is the fact that Stonehenge could never be really used by "the advertiser," who is thrown at us in company with "the speculator." The charm of the spectacle is dependent on its freedom. Stonehenge enclosed would be another story: it would not pay by gate-money the bankers' rate of interest on a quarter the sum Sir Edmund asks.

It is an odd freak that has this week transformed Stonehenge, for the first time in its history, into journalism. The mystery that is greater than the mystery hid Underneath the pyramid has become topical. One note may be added to those supplied by so many busy pens this week. Inigo Jones, who knew nearly as much as Vanbrugh himself how to move masses of masonry, had no elucidation here to offer. He made great friends with those unblabbing blocks of stone (at a guess he inclined to assign them to the Romans) while he was building for the Earl of Pembroke the noble front at Wilton—the Wilton where Sir Philip Sidney wrote his Arcadia, where Van Dyck was in his best form, where Holbein helped Inigo Jones with his architectural imaginings. "Wanting was what?" Something, evidently; for Lord Pembroke had that very conventional thing—a quarrel with his architect; and it was on a copy of a book on Stonehenge that the Earl, strangely enough, scribbled down his random remarks, accusations, and witticisms at the expense of "Iniquity Jones."

A CURIOUS little ceremony was enacted the other day when the Guardians of Byker, a particularly forlorn portion of Newcastle-on-Tyne, met together in their Sunday best to place a wreath of flowers upon a grave in a local cemetery in that land which the smoke of furnaces and pit-mouths puts perpetually into mourning. There was something incongruous in the rite, unpossessed of either Pagan gaiety or Pagan gravity: yet it had its own meaning. For the grave was that of one Lewis Thompson, who died eleven years ago, leaving the poor of Byker the interest on £15,000—£417 a year—and asking in return that their Guardians should place yearly on his tomb a wreath that should cost (he seems to have been a little in dread of possible economies) "not less than two shillings." Who was Lewis Thompson? Very few people know. He passed through life strangely, pursuing science with some skill, known to chemists in London (where he lived in a poor lodging in Bermondsey, so as to be one with the humble); known also to scientists in Paris, but unknown even to his next-door neighbours in Newcastle. These lines, if they meet the eyes of former comrades, and invite to speech, will be the means of adding an interesting passage to local history. Other loves, it seems, than those for the poor and the laboratory Lewis Thompson had: he attended Tyne boatraces, and he had a delight in looking at boxing.

ONE of the strange group of men who brought the flowers the other day expressed surprise at the privacy of the ceremony. Why had Lewis Thompson no friends to gather at his grave? Well, he had none, it seems, or had only one still living in the neighbourhood, Mr. Joseph Cowen, and from him the Guardian in question had a letter in his breast-pocket—a characteristic letter, excusing himself for not attending a ceremony "calculated," as he says in tones still in the recollection of the House of Commons he strangely deserted, "to raise the minds of the thoughtful above the occupations of the hour, lead them to look before and after, and meditate on the inwoven mysteries of life and death." He proceeds:

Lewis Thompson's career verifies the correctness of the familiar line "the world knows nothing of its greatest men." He was a man of pre-eminent ability and encyclopedic knowledge, with all the generous temper of genius. He was as conversant with the ways of men as the contents of books—had studied much and seen more. . . . He did not advertise, had a contempt for display, shunned notoriety, and led an erratic life. He was a sturdy individualist, and did not accept prescriptive opinions or adopt conventional practices. He was genial though abstracted, sincere though prejudiced, always however in great causes and usually on the right side. Mr. Thompson, in short, was a typical specimen of those attributes which are associated with the name of "Englishman" as Eliza Cook has sung and Emerson described him. He had been bruised by adversity and crossed with misfortune, but it had not soured his disposition. His "heart had learn'd to glow for others' good and melt at others' woe." Such men fan the flame of public spirit and raise the standard of civil virtue.

Correspondence.

Chambers's New Dictionary and Mr. Herbert Spencer.

SIR,—In a recent issue of the ACADEMY I pointed out the inaccurate and unfair treatment accorded to Mr. Herbert Spencer in the pages of Chambers's New English Dictionary. As this Dictionary professes to be compiled by a lexicographer, and a lexicographer is defined in the preface as a "harmless drudge," I was not disposed to be too severe on the errors of such an individual, who, having entered the regions of philosophy and got beyond his depth, was unable to distinguish between an abstract formula and a motor car. I find, however, that I was under a mistake, and that quite innocently and inadvertently I was bringing to light something of far more importance than I at first imagined. For several Scottish newspapers have taken up the matter, and, forgetting for the moment the deepening interest attached to the Dreyfus case and the latest news from the Transvaal, have been writing leaders in defence of Mr. Herbert Spencer and saying very hard things about Chambers's Dictionary. Further examination of the Dictionary reveals the fact that in addition to the instances I gave of absurd statements of Mr. Spencer's teaching and emphatic condemnation of his views on a certain question, innuendo is indulged in about Mr. Spencer where innuendo is entirely uncalled for and out of place. Thus we have the "so-called philosophy of Herbert Spencer," and other things of a like nature. What can it all mean? A whole army of writers and teachers, men like Comte, Swedenborg, Berkeley, E. B. Tylor, Huxley, and Darwin are treated fairly and impartially, and their particular views and "isms" are stated in a way that none of their adherents could object to. Only in the case of Mr. Spencer has the compiler forgotten his task and gone out of his way to indulge in misrepresentation and ridicule. Some explanation is called for. The individual who compiled the dictionary and his colleagues are quite capable of defining Mr. Spencer's teaching, and I cannot believe that they deliberately set themselves to the task of turning the masked batteries of a dictionary on a man who, alone and unaided, has given us the philosophic doctrine of evolution, a far more stupendous achievement than the limited work of Darwin. The publishers of the dictionary, Messrs. W. & R. Chambers, have had a long and honourable career, and they owe it to themselves and to Mr. Spencer to look into this matter at once and take steps to rectify what is nothing short of a great blot on a book which has found much favour and is enjoying a wide circulation. There is a definite enough theory abroad about the origin of these literary atrocities, but I hesitate to give publicity to it. The publishers are, however, quite capable of doing all that is necessary in the meantime, and I now appeal to them through your columns to make the necessary honourable amend for a piece of gross injustice.—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM C. McBAIN.

Glasgow: August 18, 1899.

The High History.

SIR,—I am satisfied with having brought Dr. Evans to recognise the true facts of the relation between the Welsh version and the text printed by Potvin, and do not care to complain of the somewhat grudging manner of the recognition. But I must, I fear, notice one or two points in his last letter. The Berne MS. styles a certain person Julien le gros des vaus de Camaalot; the Welsh translation styles him "Earl Evrawg from the head of the vale of Camelot"; the Mons MS. styles him simply Julien; Dr. Evans styles him Alain li Gros. I described Dr. Evans as omitting all reference to Camelot. This is literally exact, as anyone can see by referring to p. 7 of his translation. For some reason which I cannot fathom Dr. Evans declares I am "mistaken," and that "he has simply relegated Camelot to its right place." This is a delightful euphemism for "omission," but I prefer my description.

Now for a still more amazing example of Dr. Evans's capacity both for seeing on the printed page things which are not there and for entirely misconceiving the point at issue. He says "the name Julien appears in both the Welsh translation and the Berne fragments," although I had quoted (and have requoted above) the passage from the Welsh translation, in which the latter styles Perceval's father Evrawg. Julien, an obvious error for the Alain of other romances, occurs in both texts of the French original, in the earlier Berne fragments, as well as in the later Mons MS.; and it occurs not once, but three times. Thus the very romance which Dr. Evans believes to be the earliest in date of all the Grail cycle makes a gross blunder as regards the name of the hero's father. I do not wish to lay undue stress upon what is, compared with other proofs of the lateness of the romance, a very small matter; but, small though the error be, Dr. Evans had no right to conceal it by correcting his original and substituting the genuine form Alain for the bogus form Julien. Let me suppose the discovery of a new Greek poem which its first editor imagined to be the earliest draft of the Iliad; what would be said if the only two MSS. both styled Achilles' mother Phutis instead of Thetis, and if the editor, nevertheless, took it upon himself to suppress the MS. reading and print Thetis?

Dr. Evans maintains an artistic gradation in his communications, and in each successive paragraph exhibits a fresh marvel of "ingenious" reasoning. He is proud of the fact that, like himself, Potvin held the prose romance of Perceval le Gallois (Dr. Evans's High History) to be the earliest in date of the Grail romances. It is surely pertinent to ask why Potvin did so. He has set forth his reasons at some length, and if any one of them deserves the smallest weight Dr. Evans's interpretation of the Grail legend (the sole ground upon which he urges the priority of the romance) collapses at once. If two people believe the same thing for reasons which are diametrically contradictory, what possible weight can be attached to their common belief? Dr. Evans disbelieves, and is bound to disbelieve, every single argument by which his predecessor, Potvin, essayed to prove the priority of The High History, and yet, whilst rejecting all that entitles the contention to the slightest consideration, he triumphantly cites it as a support of his own theory, a theory more opposed to Potvin's view than to that of almost any other scholar. I ought not to be astonished, but I confess I am.—I am, &c.

ALFRED NUTT.

Peccadilloes.

SIR,—Surely if language, good or bad, is a means of expressing ideas, there can be no great harm in spelling in a different way words which have the same sound, even if some of them may originally have been contractions.

The word bye, for instance, has had for many years a distinct meaning in coursing, and, in fact, in any sport where pairs of competitors are drawn and the numbers odd.

A bye law would be distinct from other matters, "by law established," and the meet of a pack of hounds advertised with the note, "bye day," would preclude the idea that the remainder of the week's sports took place by night.

Possibly we are all more or less inclined to go to "bye bye," sub tegmine fagi, in the present hot weather, and are a trifle captious if aroused.

Would not a literary "close time" be a blessing in August? There are patent evidences of uphill work to be observed and a tendency to forget the words of Dr. Watts: "Your little tongues were never made to—well—be personal to each other's eyes."—I am, &c., E. H.

TO BE SOLD, by TENDER, the old-established PUBLISHING BUSINESS of A. D. INNES & COMPANY, LIMITED, of 31 and 32, Bedford Street, Strand, London, W.C., including Leasehold Interest, Goodwill, Copyrights, Trade Fixtures, Furniture, Plant, Machinery and Stock-in-Trade.

The Copyrights include a large number of Works by many noted and popular Authors of the day, a list and full particulars of which may be seen at the undermentioned office of The Law Investment and Insurance Corporation, Limited.

Tenders to be sent in addressed to the Secretary of THE LAW INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE CORPORATION, Limited, 9, Serle Street, Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C., before the 14th SEPTEMBER, 1899.

Particulars and Conditions of Sale and Forms of Tender may be obtained gratis of the above-named Secretary, and of the Vendors' Solicitors, Messrs. SHARPE, PARKES, FRITCHARDS & BARNHAM, 12, New Court, Carey Street, London, W.C.

NOW READY.—SEPTEMBER.—Price SIXPENCE.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

PARSON KELLY. By A. E. W. MASON and ANDREW L. G. Chapters XXI.-XXII.

SOME MAKERS OF SWEET SOUNDS. By Miss S. M. CHAWLEY BURY.

"HITHERTO SHALT THOU COME." By D. J. ROBERTSON.

THE BLIND MARE'S WARNING. By W. H. L.

A FARMER'S YEAR.—XIII. By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

AN ELK-CHASSE. By FRED. WHISHAW.

THE USE OF SIMPLES. By the Rev. JOHN VAUGHAN, M.A.

AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1007.—SEPTEMBER, 1899.—2s. 6d.

UMMER-TIDE IN A SCOTTISH FOREST.

By Sir HERBERT MAXWELL BART., M.P.

NELSON AT COPENHAGEN.

By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.

ON TRIAL. CHAPS. XIX.-XXIII. By ZACK.

ST. COLUMBA, THE POET. By E. M.

AN EXCITING DAY AFTER BEARS.

By Lieut.-Colonel C. H. POWELL, 1st GOORKHA RIFLES.

THE "RUNNER." By BERNARD CAPE.

WILLIAM LAUDER, THE LITERARY FORGER: AN UNRECORDED EPISODE IN HIS LIFE.

By A. H. MILLAR.

A BEDQUIN'S VENGEANCE. CHAP. V.

THE SAILOR-MAN. By MOIRA O'NEILL.

IN PROVENCE. By HANNAH LYNN.

BRITISH BULLETS AND THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

By Major W. BROADFOOT, R.E.

THE LOOKER-ON.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS

promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.

—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class

Printers and Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet

Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing all other Publications and specially-built

Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page

Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence

New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS WANTED, at Prices affixed.

"Snob and Gownsmen," 1829-30, £5.—"The Germ,"

1850, £2.—"Old Paris," 1878, £2.—"The Lover's Tale," 1833, £5.

"Borrow's "Wild Wales," 1862, £1.—"Moore's "Alps in 1864," £3.

"Pittmarsh's "Comic Tales," 1841, £5.—"Queen Mab," 1818, £7.

"Alice in Wonderland," 1866, £2.—"Pauline: a Fragment,"

1833, £20. 2,000 Books Wanted at fancy prices. List free.

EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.,

68a, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS. In-tellegibly and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing

in foreign languages.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on

DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

MONTHLY per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums

on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

UNIVERSITY of ST. ANDREWS.

CHANCELLOR.—HIS GRACE THE DUKE of ARGYLL, K.T., LL.D.

RECTOR.—JAMES STUART, LL.D., M.P.

PRINCIPAL.—JAMES DONALDSON, M.A., LL.D.

OPENING OF SESSION, 1899-1900.

UNITED COLLEGE,
(Arts, Science, and Medicine.)

This College will be formally opened on Tuesday, 10th October, and the Winter Session will begin on Wednesday, 11th October.

The Preliminary Examinations, with which the Examinations for Bursaries are combined, will commence on 29th September. Schedules of admission will be supplied by the Secretary up to 14th September.

There are sixty-four Bursaries vacant (three of which are open to second year students and one to fourth year students only) ranging in value from £40 to £215. Of these forty-six (of which twelve are restricted to male medical students) are tenable by men only, fourteen (restricted to students who intend to enter the Medical Profession) by women only, and four (two Bursaries of £40 each and two of £20 each) by either men or women.

In the course of the Session eleven Scholarships will be completed, six of which are open to both sexes. They range in value from £100 to £250.

ST. MARY'S COLLEGE.
(Divinity.)

This College will be opened on Tuesday, 21st October. The Examinations for Bursaries will be held on 20th and 21st October. Intimation of candidature is not necessary. There are eleven competitive Bursaries vacant, ranging in value from £40 to £65. At the close of the Session two Scholarships of £100 each, one of £21, and one of £14, will be open to competition.

The Classes in the University are open to students of both sexes, and include Latin, Greek, English, French, Hebrew, Syriac, Sanskrit, and Comparative Philology, Modern Greek, Logic and Metaphysics, Moral Philosophy, Political Economy, Education, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, Zoology, Embryology, Botany, History, Ancient History and Political Philosophy, Physiology, Anatomy, Materia Medica, Systematic Theology, Biblical Criticism and Church History.

Specimen Examination Papers and full particulars respecting the Courses of Instruction, Fees, Examinations for Degrees, &c., will be found in the CALENDAR of the UNIVERSITY, published by Messrs. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, 45, George Street, Edinburgh, price 2s. 6d.—by post, 3s. 10d.

A general Prospectus for the coming Winter Session, as well as detailed information regarding any department of the University, may be obtained on application to

JNO. E. WILLIAMS, Secretary.
University of St. Andrews,
21st August, 1899.

UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW.

CHAIR OF HISTORY.

The University Court of the University of Glasgow will at an early date proceed to appoint a PROFESSOR to occupy the above Chair in this University, recently rendered vacant.

The Professor will be required to enter on his duties as from 1st October next, from which date the appointment will take effect.

The normal salary of the Chair is £900, subject to § VIII. (2) and (3) of Ordinance No. 25. The appointment is a vacation and carriage, and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, who will furnish any further information desired, twenty copies of his application and twenty copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit, on or before 18th September next.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,
Secretary of the Glasgow University Court.
1, West Regent Street, Glasgow.

MASON UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.

ASSISTANT LECTURESHIP IN CLASSICS

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the above appointment.

Applications, accompanied by testimonials, should be sent to the undersigned, not later than Saturday, the 16th of September.

The Candidate elected will be required to enter upon his duties on October 3rd.

Further particulars may be obtained from
GEO. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

THE YORKSHIRE COLLEGE, LEEDS

The 26th Session of the Department of Science, Technology, and Arts will begin on OCTOBER 3rd, and the 69th Session of the School of Medicine on OCTOBER 2nd, 1899.

The Classes prepare for the following Professions: Chemistry, Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, and Sanitary Engineering, Mining, Textile Industries, Dyeing, Art, Leather Manufacture, Agriculture, School Teaching, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.

University Degrees are also conferred in the Faculties of Arts, Science, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.

Lyddon Hall has been established for Students' residence.

Prospectuses of any of the above may be had from the REGISTRAR.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES, ABERYSTWYTH.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER in the Department of LOGIC and PHILOSOPHY. Applications, together with testimonials, must be forwarded, on or before September 9th, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.

August, 1899.

TECHNICAL COLLEGE, HUDDERSFIELD.

PRINCIPAL.—S. G. RAWSON, D.Sc.

THE LECTURESHIP in ART is VACANT. Salary, £250 per annum. Applications must be sent in not later than August 31st, to the PRINCIPAL. Statement of duties will be forwarded on application.

T THORP Secretary.

MOUNT VIEW, HAMPSTEAD.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

THE NEXT TERM will begin on THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21. Reference is kindly allowed to Mrs. BENSON, Colonel LITTLE, Professor JOHN RUSKIN, Miss MADEIRA SHAW LEFAYRE, and others.

For Prospectus apply to Miss HELEN E. BAYNES.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

THE READING ROOM will be CLOSED from FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 1st, to TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 5th, inclusive.

E. MAUNDE THOMPSON,

Director and Principal Librarian.

British Museum, August 22nd, 1899.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

Four Scholarships and One Exhibition, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £30 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 27th, 1899-viz. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Physics and Chemistry. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Biology and Physiology. Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London Medical School.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty years of age (if of sufficient merit) in Physics, Chemistry, Animal Biology, and Vegetable Biology.

The Jefferson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of June, 1899.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.

For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS.

Systematic Courses of Lectures and Laboratory Work in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc. Examinations of the University of London will commence on OCTOBER 2nd and continue to July, 1900. Attendance on this Class counts as part of the five years' curriculum.

Fees for the whole Course, £21, or £18 18s. to Students of the Hospital; or single subjects may be taken.

There is a Special Class for the January Examination.

For further particulars apply to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C.

A Handbook forwarded on application.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE (Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;
And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

A THIN COCOA.

EPPS'S

The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistency of tea, of which it is now with many beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—JAMES EPPS & Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.

COCOA ESSENCE

CHAMBERS'S NEW LARGE TYPE ENGLISH DICTIONARY

Pronouncing, Explanatory, Etymological.

Edited by THOMAS DAVIDSON.

WORLD says:

"Alike in scope, in careful accuracy, in convenience of arrangement, and in general 'get-up' and appearance, this Dictionary is a veritable masterpiece of its kind, and seems assured of the widespread popularity to which on every ground it is entitled."

STANDARD.

"Quite one of the best works of reference of its kind is 'Chambers's English Dictionary,' an imperial 8vo volume of twelve hundred and fifty admirably arranged and boldly printed pages."

Complete in one handsome Volume of 1,264 pages, cloth, 12s. 6d.; half-morocco, 18s.

W. & R. CHAMBERS, LTD., London and Edinburgh.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORTH WALES COAST. THE ISLE of WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED, and SNOWDON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

SECOND EDITION, ENLARGED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With an additional Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., LTD.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'

Monthly, price Half-a-Crown.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER.

THE ARCHBISHOPS and the RITUALISTS. By J. GUINNESS ROGERS, D.D.

THE WHITE MAN'S BURDEN in CHINA. By SENEX.

THE HOUSE of LORDS. By WILLIAM CLARKE.

SOME PRAIRIE CHUMS of MINE. By WOODS HUTCHINSON, M.D.

FIVE LETTERS by CARDINAL NEWMAN. By J. R. MOZLEY.

THE SEA the ONLY ROAD for TRADE. By T. G. BOWLES, M.P.

AN EXPERIMENT in PUBLIC-HOUSE MANAGEMENT. By CHARLES BOOTH.

IRELAND BEWITCHED. By W. B. YEATS.

THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES. By the Rev. J. O. JOHNSTON.

GLINKA the FATHER of RUSSIAN OPERA. By A. E. KEETON.

THE JEWISH IMMIGRANT. By JOHN SMITH.

BUT IS GOD SILENT! By RICHARD HEATH.

London: ISBISTER & CO., LIMITED, Covent Garden, W.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

No. 271.—SEPTEMBER, 1899.

ARE WE TO LOSE SOUTH AFRICA?—a Rejoinder. By Sir SIDNEY SHIPFARD, K.C.M.G. (late Administrator and Chief Magistrate of British Bechuanaland).

THE IMPERIAL FUNCTION of TRADE. By HENRY BIRCHENROUGH.

RIFLE-SHOOTING as a NATIONAL SPORT. By W. A. BAILLIE-GROHMAN.

THE FUTURE of the GREAT ARMIES. By SIDNEY LOW.

A VISIT to the CRAIG BROOK SALMON HATCHERY. By MORETON FREWEN.

AN INDIAN PLAGUE STORY. By CORNELIA SORABJI.

THE FATHER of LETTERS. By HERBERT PAUL.

ROWTON HOUSES—FROM a RESIDENT. By W. A. SOMMERVILLE.

A WOMAN'S CRITICISM of the WOMEN'S CONGRESS: a Reply. By Mrs. GAFFNEY (President of the National Council of Women of the United States).

THE AMERICAN NEGRO and his PLACE. By Miss ELIZABETH L. BANKS.

THE SIERRA LEONE DISTURBANCES. By HARRY L. STEPHEN.

AN ALL-BRITISH RAILWAY to CHINA. (With a Map.) By C. A. MORRING.

CARLYLE as an HISTORIAN. By GEORGE MACAULAY TREVELYAN.

THE PHILOSOPHY of POETRY. By the Hon. MARTIN MORRIS.

THE FUTURE of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION. By the Rev. Dr. PERCIVAL (Presbyter of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, U.S.A.).

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

LONDON LIBRARY, ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

President—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.; the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON; HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.; the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., D.C.L.

Trustees—Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., F.R.S.; Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY, K.G.; Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.

Committee—Rev. Canon AINGER; Dr. J. H. BRIDGES; Sir F. W. BURTON; Prof. LEWIS CAMPBELL; J. W. COURTTHORPE, Esq., C.B.; EARL of CREWE; Austin DOBSON, Esq.; SYDNEY GEDGE, Esq., M.P.; Sir R. GIFFEN, K.C.B., F.R.S.; EDMUND GOOSE, Esq., LL.D.; Mrs. J. R. GREEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; Sir C. P. LEBERT, K.C.S.I.; Sir C. M. KENNEDY, C.B., K.C.M.G.; Rev. STANLEY LEACHES, D.D.; SYDNEY LEE, Esq.; W. S. LILLY, Esq.; SYDNEY J. LOW, Esq.; FRANK T. MARZIALS, Esq.; St. GEORGE MIVART, Esq., F.R.S.; Sir F. POLLOCK, Bart.; Rev. Dr. RICE; H. R. TEDDER, Esq.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. CATALOGUE, FIFTH EDITION, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D.,

Secretary and Librarian.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

Now ready, in cloth gilt, price 6s.
JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S
NEW NOVEL.

A NAME TO CONJURE WITH.
A NAME TO CONJURE WITH.
A NAME TO CONJURE WITH.

By the Author of "Bootes' Baby," "Heart and Sword," &c.

NEW BOOK BY RICHARD MARSH.
Ready this Day, at all Booksellers' and Bookstalls,
price 6s.

IN FULL CRY.

By the Author of "The Beetle."

WILLIAM LE QUEUX'S
NEW AND POPULAR STORY.

In Illustrated paper cover, price 1s.

SECRETS OF MONTE CARLO.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

NOW READY.

THE HONOUR OF VIVIEN BRUCE. By Mrs. J. H. NEEDLE.

A RATIONAL MARRIAGE. By FLORENCE
MARRYAT.

BONNIE MAGGIE LAUDER. By ALAN ST. AUBYN, Author of "A Fellow of Trinity," &c.

SAROLTA'S VERDICT: a Romance. By E. YOLLAND, Author of "In Days of Strife," &c.

F. V. WHITE & CO.,
14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY"

*The following have appeared, and some of the numbers containing them can still be obtained;
or Complete Sets may be had separately.*

BEN JONSON.
JOHN KEATS.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.
TOM HOOD.
THOMAS GRAY.
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
LEIGH HUNT.
LORD MACAULAY.
ROBERT SOUTHNEY.
S. T. COLERIDGE.
CHARLES LAMB.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
SAMUEL PEPYS.
EDMUND WALLER.
WILKIE COLLINS.
JOHN MILTON.
WILLIAM COWPER.
CHARLES DARWIN.
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.
ANDREW MARVELL.
ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS CARLYLE.
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.
CHARLES DICKENS.
JONATHAN SWIFT.
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.
WILLIAM BLAKE.
SIR RICHARD STEELE.
ALEXANDER POPE.
DOUGLAS JERROLD.
FRANCIS BACON.
HENRIK IBSEN.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

CHAPTER I.

The Old and the New Mediterranean Trade—The Pioneer Steamship—Arrival at Marseilles—The Cholera—Origin of the Crimean War—French
Hilarity succeeded by Disappointment.

CHAPTER II.

The Passage to Constantinople—Reminiscences of Antiquity—Ashore in the Dardanelles—Disinterested Kindness of Suleyman Pasha—Constantinople and its Surroundings—The Passage to the Crimea—The Seaports and the Battlegrounds —Starvation at the English Camp—French
Economy and Hospitality.

CHAPTER III.

The Mistake of the Allies in Making their Landing—
The Commencement of the Siege and the Misery attending it—Another Passage from Marseilles—
Narrow Escape from Foundering in a Gale—
Arrival at Kamiesh—The Monastery of St.
George.

CHAPTER IV.

The American and the French Cuisine—A Trip to the Sea of Azof—Contrasted Scenes of Peace and War —Vandalism of the Allies at Kerich—Trading with a Pasha—The Unsuccessful Attack on Sebastopol—Panic at Kamiesh and Balaklava—
Return to Marseilles—Trip to Algeria.

CHAPTER V.

Return Again to the Crimea—Ravages of Disease in the Camps—French Transport System compared with Ours in the Civil War—The Sisters of Charity
—The Capture of the Malakoff and Redan—A View of the Ruins—Bombproof Female Curiosity.

CHAPTER VI.

Entering the Turkish Service—The Turk a Man of his Word—Good Pay and Little Work—Our Philosophic Chief Officer—The Pasha's Bedclothes —His Friendship—No Use for a Propeller.

CHAPTER VII.

Hafiz Effendi and his Harem.

CHAPTER VIII.

Mustapha Pasha Wide Awake—We are Hurried Off to Eupatoria—A Rescue in the Black Sea—A British Frigate comes to our Aid—Arrival at Eupatoria.

CHAPTER IX.

The Blunder of a British General—A Post-Mortem held by Mr. Sears and Some of his Religious Ideas —The End of the War and Comments on its Results.

By Capt. CODMAN.

Frontispiece. 198 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London :

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

SELECTIONS FROM
CASSELL & COMPANY'S
FIRST LIST OF
NEW AND FORTHCOMING VOLUMES.

A BITTER HERITAGE.

By J. BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.
Price 6s. [Ready shortly.]

"A Bitter Heritage," Mr. John Bloundelle-Burton's new novel, is the first modern story he has written for ten years, his last of this nature having been "His Own Enemy"; but, with other romances, it is his twelfth story up to now. The scene of this novel, which is one containing a strong plot difficult of unravelling until the end, is laid in British Honduras, the hero being a young naval officer who proceeds to that colony with a view to discovering what is the true secret of his birth. The narrative is full of strength and weird adventure; while a charming English heroine, a French woman from New Orleans, and a semi-savage half-caste girl supply the feminine interest.

PURPLE and FINE LINEN.

By WILLIAM PIGOTT. Price 6s.
[Ready shortly.]

The Story relates the singular adventures of two young men fresh from Oxford on an unfrequented island off the north-west coast of Scotland. They go there to clear up a mystery, and in clearing up the mystery they have experiences which at first are diverting, but soon become desperate.

THE LITTLE NOVICE.

By ALIX KING. Price 6s.
[Ready shortly.]

This is the story of two English girls educated in a French convent, one of whom decides to become a nun. Just before taking the veil she is seen by Paul Gervais, a medical student, who vainly tries to dissuade her from renouncing the world. This event brings in its train the series of remarkable and romantic incidents related in the book.

CHEAP EDITION.

THE STORY of FRANCIS CLUDDE.

By STANLEY WEYMAN. Price 3s. 6d.
[Now ready.]

"There is one book among all these new books which kept a weary reviewer from his bed. That book is 'Francis Cludde.'"

Mr. ANDREW LANG, in the New Review.

REVISED EDITION.

STAR-LAND.

By Sir ROBERT STAWELL BALL,
LL.D., F.R.S., F.R.A.S. Being Talks with Young People about the Wonders of the Heavens. With Rembrandt Frontispiece and 94 Illustrations in Text.
Price 7s. 6d. [Ready shortly.]

* * This Work has been revised throughout and entirely reset in handsome new type, and six new illustrations added.

MASTER CHARLIE:

Painter, Poet, Novelist, and Teacher.

With numerous Examples of his Work collected by C. S. HARRISON and S. H.
HAMER. Picture boards, 1s. 6d.

[Ready shortly.]

This Volume contains a complete collection of the works of the celebrated "Master Charlie," who has attracted so much attention by his contributions which have appeared in the pages of Little Folks Magazine. A large part of the book is handsomely printed in colours, and the work includes "Leaves from Master Charlie's Sketch-book," "Easy Lessons in French and German," &c.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., London, Paris,
New York, and Melbourne.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1426. Established 1869.

2 September, 1899.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE attempt to fix upon Mr. J. M. Barrie an ambition to cut a figure in Parliament has no real foundation. Mr. Barrie is not like that. He has no intention of contesting any seat, or of ever becoming a little minister, either Cabinet or Prime.

THE September instalment of Stevenson's Letters in Scribner's belongs to the period 1887-8, when Stevenson was at Saranac Lake, in the Adirondacks. We give extracts. These are from a letter to Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson:

Wealth is only useful for two things: a yacht and a string quartette. For these two I will sell my soul.

I know a little about fame now; it is no good compared to a yacht; and anyway there is more fame in a yacht, more genuine fame; to cross the Atlantic and come to anchor in Newport (say) with the Union Jack, and go ashore for your letters and hang about the pier, among the holiday yachtsmen—that's fame, that's glory, and nobody can take it away.

To Mr. Gosse:

I had some experience of American appreciation; I liked a little of it, but there is too much; a little of that would go a long way to spoil a man; and I like myself better in the woods. I am so damned candid and ingenuous (for a cynic), and so much of a "cweatu' of impulse—aw'" (if you remember that admirable Leech), that I begin to shirk any more taffy; I think I begin to like it too well. But let us trust the Gods; they have a rod in pickle; reverently I doff my trousers, and with screwed eyes await the amiri aliquid of the great God Busby.

To Mr. Crockett:

I am no great kirkgoer, for many reasons—and the sermon's one of them, and the first prayer another; but the chief and effectual reason is the stuffiness.

Don't put "N.B." in your paper, put Scotland, and be done with it. Alas, that I should be thus stabbed in the home of my friends! The name of my native land is not North Britain, whatever may be the name of yours.

And here is an account of another scheme of fiction which never came off:

A Mutiny novel on hand—The White Nigger—a tremendous work—so we are all at Indian books. The idea of the novel is Lloyd's: I call it a novel. 'Tis a tragic romance, of the most tragic sort: I believe the end will be almost too much for human endurance—when the White Nigger was thrown to the ground with one of his own (Sepoy) soldier's knees upon his chest, and the cries begin in the Beebeeghar. Oh, truly, you know it is a howler! The whole last part is—well the difficulty is that, short of resuscitating Shakespeare, I don't know who is to write it.

I still keep wonderful. I am a great performer before the Lord on a penny whistle.

EVERY month we are able to see more and more how interesting and companionable a book the Stevenson Letters will make. It bids fair to become one of those works which are kept very close to the armchair, and kept there not merely during its first public vogue, but continuously. We have before stated—yet, as the day draws nearer for its publication, it may be stated again—that in Scribner's is appearing only a selection of Stevenson's correspondence. Many of the best letters are being reserved for the volume.

OUTWARDLY, Count Tolstoi's new novel, Resurrection, is a curious apparition. Six paper booklets, enclosed in a buff wrapper and secured by an indiarubber band, the whole looking like a packet of temperance tracts—such is the form in which the first volume of Resurrection reaches us. A list of the characters in the novel is given, and the motto-texts on the title-pages are taken from Matt. xviii. 21-22, Matt. vii. 3, John viii. 7, Luke vi. 40. The book is published by the Brotherhood Publishing Co. We think it half a pity that Tolstoi's novels should be issued in this colporteur fashion. Not that the books are the worse for it, but why not present them in the form which readers prefer and are accustomed to? We note, however, that a six-shilling edition is to follow the penny parts.

It will be observed that the new novels which have reached us this week are but three in number, a very tiny output even for the end of August. One reprinted novel has, however, been issued to swell the number—Maria Edgeworth's Ormond (Gresham Publishing Co.), with an introduction and illustrations. It will be interesting to learn to what extent Ormond will be read in this form. People are just now very readily buying the sixpenny reprints of the middle-century fiction; but will they go back to an Irish story dating from 1817?

MR. G. W. STEEVENS'S Indian letters to the Daily Mail, written at the time of Lord Curzon's inauguration as Viceroy, will be published by Messrs. Blackwood under the title, In India.

OWING to various misleading statements that have appeared regarding the publishing firm of Messrs. Hurst & Blackett, we are requested to state that the business has not been purchased by Kelly & Co., nor by Kelly's Directories, Limited. The business will be carried on as before. Mr. Herbert Blackett, who has been connected with the firm for the past twenty years, remains a director. He will in future further become manager and sole representative.

WITH the disappearance of the Suffolk Chronicle as an independent journal another link between Dickens's early days and the present time vanishes. Had it not been that the editor of the Suffolk Chronicle required extra help in reporting an election in the thirties, Mr. Pickwick might never have got into trouble at the Great White Horse Hotel, and might never have met Mr. Peter Magnus, while Sam Weller would probably have sought his bride elsewhere than at Mr. Nupkins's. For Charles Dickens was one of the reporters who went down from London to assist the Suffolk Chronicle in its difficulty, and there is no doubt that his stay at Ipswich was the foundation of the Ipswich chapters in Pickwick, and probably also of the Eatanswill election. The Suffolk Chronicle is now merged in the Suffolk Times and Mercury.

APPROPOS of Pickwick, this is the concluding passage of Mr. George Gissing's introduction to that book in the forthcoming Rochester edition :

It has been remarked that Mr. Pickwick and his serving-man bear a certain far-off resemblance to the Knight of La Mancha and his squire; and in one respect, at all events, the parallel is suggestive. Like Cervantes' great book, Pickwick appeals equally to childhood and to those of riper years. Don Quixote enthralled a boy's mind with mere joy in the picturesque, the adventurous; not till long after does he perceive the profound significances of that study in human nature. So, in the minor degree, with Dickens's work. To the young, its high spirits, its hilarity, its brisk movement and gay surprises, are an all-sufficient delight. Turn to the volume in middle age, and these things assuredly have not lost their charm; but the eyes bring a larger power of seeing, and to follow the old story from page to page is to marvel at the observation, the charity, the wisdom, which insensibly convert a book of jests into a cherished masterpiece of literature.

MR. QUILLER COUCH has just added another to the limited editions which are the delight of some collectors. He has had a little volume of verse printed to be sold at the Fowey Cottage Hospital Bazaar. The book contains ten pieces, and is limited to 300 signed copies. We quote from the "Commendatory Verses on the Ensuing Lays" at the beginning of the work :

Though Shakespeare needs no Pyramid,
Milton nor urn nor pall,
I've yet to learn what good they did
Our Cottage Hospital.
Though Pope could perfect Art command,
And Shelley Lyric skill,
On our Subscription List they stand
For absolutely nil.
You must allow the time has come
For Someone to begin
To wipe off this opprobrium,
—And that's where I step in!
Though Bees of Hybla never swarmed
About my berceauette;
Though I with Orpheus ne'er have charmed
Tigers and Apes (as yet)—
The shilling you in me invest
Will help maintain a Cot:
The money spent on all the rest
Admittedly will not.

Among the poems in the tiny volume is the "New Ballad of Sir Patrick Spens," which may be remembered by readers of the Pall Mall Magazine; and the title of the work is A Fowey Garland.

THE editors of the Pall Mall Magazine are doing their best to remove the reproach that English magazines cannot compare with the Americans in illustrations. In the matter of quantity, Harpers' and the Century are still first, and probably will not be beaten for all-round merit for many years to come, yet the brilliance of some of the figure illustrations in the current Pall Mall Magazine has never been excelled by any American periodical. Mr. Greiffenhagen, Mr. E. J. Sullivan, Mr. A. S. Hartrick, to name no others, may be seen this month at their best.

THE Century, by the way, makes a departure in its terminology this month. The September number is described as a "Salt-Water Number." The sea truly reverberates therein. Among other articles is an account by Captain Joshua Slocum of his voyage of 46,000 miles around the world in a sloop single-handed; and the indispensable Mr. Bullen describes "The Way of a Ship."

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "The ACADEMY had something to say last week about Rudyard Kipling's 'first and only appearance on the stage,' an event which is supposed to have occurred during his schoolboy days at Westward Ho! This is a mistake. The Allahabad Pioneer published in its weekly edition dated January 2, 1884, an account of an amateur performance of 'Plot and Passion,' which came off a few days before the previous Christmas Day at the Railway Theatre at Lahore. Mr. R. Kipling took the part of 'M. Desmarets.' Mr. Ernest Benedict, C.E., a son of Sir Julius Benedict, was 'Fouché, Duke of Otranto'; and Mrs. Benedict, 'Madame de Fontanges.' The local dramatic critic wrote: 'Desmarets (Mr. Rudyard Kipling) "smiled and smiled and smiled and was a villain" of the more pronounced type. To my thinking he overdid some portions of the business, notably a certain devilish delight over the fall of Madame de Fontanges at the end of the third act. He showed, however, an undeniable talent for acting, much power of facial expression, and an enormous pair of top-boots, into which from time to time he almost disappeared.' The extract may be of use to the future biographer who cares for these things."

"I WANT to know a butcher paints, a baker rhymes for his pursuit," wrote Browning; but he said nothing of bankers. And yet the literary style of a banker should be as well worth studying as that of any man. At least, so we thought, until at Exeter last week we picked up the local evening paper and read an article entitled "The Voices of the Gloaming. By a Banker." On laying this aside we felt we had read enough banker's prose for one sitting. The essay begins:

The orb of day has sunk low down beneath the horizon, and the roseate and purple glory of his train has given place to a changeful and subdued glow of wanting tints of emerald green and violet. The twilight is advancing, and as the light of day fades into the gloaming the Queen of eve shines forth in ever brightening lustre, while near her may perhaps be glimpsed, glittering like a tiny sparkling diamond, that coy and giddy little twinkler, the nearest tributary of our great luminary, which is careering round and round, immersed in the full ardour of his burning rays, at the lightning speed of a hundred thousand miles an hour.

We are now turning to a new work on Buds and Stipules, by Sir John Lubbock, another banker, to adjust our balance.

THE first of the almanacks for 1900 to reach us is The Philatelist's Almanack, issued by the ingenious Mr. J. W. Palmer, "The Stamp King." Mr. Palmer, in addition to philately, cultivates also the muse. He even addresses (in August) an ode to the old year—a remarkable anticipatory feat:

Old year, again, with beating heart
I watch thy weary steps depart,
I see thy form bent very low,
Thy failing powers quickly go.

This is the true poetical prevision.

A LITTLE article in the Speaker, entitled "In Pater's Rooms," will be read with interest by the devoted band of students of Marius the Epicurean and Imaginary Portraits. The slight description of the sitting-room itself has something of Pater in it: "Yes; there were, indeed, rose-leaves on the table, set in a wide, open bowl of blue china; and it was just possible to detect their faint smell. The warm blue tone of the room was the first impression one received on entering: the stencilled walls, the cushions of the chairs, the table-covers, and the curtains to the mullioned window, that projected over the pavement—all these were blue. And whatever in the room was not blue seemed to be white, or wood in its natural colour, or polished brass. The books, in their low, neat case, seemed all white calf or vellum; above them an alto-relief in plaster showed white; in the corner a pure white Hermes on a pedestal stood with tiny wings outspread."

MR. EDMUND GOSSE.

From the Copyright Series of Portraits of Contributors to the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

MR. EDMUND GOSSE, whose portrait we give this week, has been invited to attend the first performance of Ibsen's new play in the capacity of what might be called English Literary Ambassador. It is just twenty years since Mr. Gosse published his Northern Studies, a volume which must have been for most Englishmen their first introduction to the work of Ibsen and Björnson. Since then Mr. Gosse has steadily acted as literary middleman between Scandinavia and this country, although of late years Ibsen has been to a large extent taken out of his hands by others, notably by Mr. William Archer. Mr. Gosse, however, was the pioneer; hence there is peculiar fitness in the invitation to him to act as England's representative at the forthcoming performance.

A CORRESPONDENT forwards us the following cutting from Tuesday's Daily Chronicle:

HATASU.

SIR,—In regard to a letter in your issue of Aug. 25 I have merely to point out to the writer that I never suggested that Hatasu grew a beard.—I am, sir, yours, &c.,

D. SCOT SKIRVING.

"I merely draw attention to the letter," he remarks, "as a sublime example of the unintelligible things one finds in one's morning paper the day after returning from a Norway fjord. Who is Hatasu? Why is his beard interesting? It is awkward to have to go out and meet one's friends entirely ignorant of Hatasu. Editors should write footnotes for their travelled and travelling readers."

HEAD-LINE editing surely reaches its apogee in the list of headings which the Cincinnati Inquirer has placed over its report of a sermon delivered a few weeks ago by the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage. It was thus that the sermon was recommended to the Inquirer's readers: "Jephthah, The Old Freebooter—At an Early Age He Was Forced to Rough It—He Held Up the End of his String in Great Shape—and Soon Sewed up the Games of Twenty Cities—On His Return from Victory He Kept a Promise—He Must Sacrifice the First Person Seen in His Door—He Looks—Holy Horrors—It is His Fair Daughter—But Jephthah was a Man of His Word—And the Beautiful Young Girl was Slain."

ACCORDING to an article on Mr. Pinero, which appears in Cassell's Family Magazine, that gentleman seems to have expressed very oddly his feelings on first meeting Tennyson. "How did I like him?" he is reported to have said, "God bless my soul! I was frightened out of my life. It was overwhelming—like meeting Milton face to face!" But why Milton? Why should meeting one poet seem like meeting another?

IN the reminiscences of eminent persons which "L. F." contributes to the Cornhill for September a few glimpses of Tennyson are also to be had. According to this lady the poet objected to say "good-bye" when parting from a friend in the evening. He said "good day," keeping "good-bye" for more solemn occasions.

A CORRESPONDENT, who seems bent on extensive travel, asks our readers to help him in his search for guide-books ("akin to Murray's") to Northern Asia, Africa, America, East and West Indies, Australia, Persia, and Siam. Mr. Murray, he explains, publishes no guides to these lands.

MR. E. T. REED'S series of pseudo-heraldic pranks in Punch is a joy in the memory; but it is now, also, a book on the shelf. Among the literary examples of Mr. Reed's humour is the coat conferred on Mr. Louis de Rougemont, whose Adventures have recently reached book form. This we are tempted to repeat:

LOUIS, FIRST BARON ISLAND DE ROUGEMONT.

Arms (quarterly): i. a thorough-bred riding-turtle naiant and ridden on the curb, thereon a Swiss gentleman rouge-monte proper in nudity dirigeant with the big toe; ii. a flight of wombats volant, soaring in desuetude on the wing across a setting sun; iii. under a chief nunes, adept and ubiquitous in reclame, several gulls of science landed and exploited proper ad nauseam; iv. looking up a genealogical tree shady or insufficiently indorsed, an inquiring editor spectacted or "Massingham" chronically regardant in scepticism a series of travellers' tails artistically garnished and flaunted in the Press.

Bibliographical.

"So far," says a contemporary gossip, "no attempt has been made to illustrate on a large scale, and from every side, the life-work" of Dante G. Rossetti. This is apropos to the promised "illustrated memorial" by Mr. H. C. Marillier. I sincerely hope that that gentleman will give us "a Rossetti gallery such as has not been seen before," but meanwhile let us give credit where credit is due. There is, for example, the Dante Rossetti and the Pre-Raphaelite Movement of Mrs. Wood, published by Low & Co. in 1894. Therein are reproductions, admirably executed, of eight of the most remarkable of Rossetti's paintings. Then, did we not receive last year from Mr. W. M. Rossetti, via Mr. George Allen, a volume entitled Ruskin: Rossetti: Pre-Raphaelitism, containing reproductions of eleven famous pictures by the painter-poet? It would, of course, be very satisfactory if a thoroughly representative reproduction of Rossetti's pictorial work could be placed within the reach of the art-loving public.

The late Mr. Edmund Routledge will hardly rank with the literary publishers; still, he deserves to be remembered with gratitude as the editor of Every Boy's Magazine and Every Boy's Book, which have, no doubt, given pleasure and imparted instruction to thousands who are now "old boys." I believe Mr. Routledge was the compiler of a little book on Everyday Blunders in Speaking, and of a condensed but comprehensive Date Book—both of which, I dare say, have been found useful. In my own slight intercourse with him I did not note any particular turn for or interest in literature, but he appeared to have some shrewdness as a business man. I understand that he latterly acquired a share in the proprietorship of a well-known weekly, for which he wrote (I am told) some literary and theatrical matter.

Charles Reade's It is Never too Late to Mend, and Wilkie Collins's A Dead Secret, having been published originally in 1857, are now out of copyright, and are to be re-issued at the nimble sixpence. For once we can be glad that literary works are now public property, for it is to be hoped these cheap editions will help to convince a good many ignorant readers of to-day that exciting stories of adventure and embroglio were written and read long before Mr. Guy Boothby or Mr. Max Pemberton (to name no other popular contemporaries) were heard or thought of. By the way, why not reprint, in a cheap form, Collins's Basil and After Dark, and Other Stories, which date from 1852 and 1856, and Reade's Christie Johnstone, which dates from 1853?

The promised Life, Letters, and Reminiscences of Sir Arthur Sullivan, by Mr. Arthur Lawrence, can hardly fail to be attractive reading. I would that the book had been all from the composer's own pen—that he had, in fact, himself written his reminiscences; and the more so because he contributed lately to Mr. O'Connor's paragraph-paper some agreeable recollections. We may expect that the forthcoming book will go somewhat into detail. Meanwhile, let due praise be given to the excellent little monograph on Sir Arthur which Mr. Charles Willeby included in his volume on Masters of English Music, and which, up to now, has remained the best available account of the musician's life and work.

Announcement is further made of the Life, Letters, and Reminiscences of Mr. Sims Reeves, also to be edited by Mr. Arthur Lawrence. Here, again, Mr. Lawrence has had his predecessors, for did not Mr. Sutherland Edwards put together particulars of the Life and Artistic Career of the popular tenor, and publish them so long ago as 1881? Moreover, Mr. Reeves has himself transferred his Recollections to paper and type. The book came out about eleven years since, and was quickly followed by Mr. Reeves's other brochure—My Jubilee; or, Fifty Years of Artistic Life.

The first published account of the Baroness Nairne was, I suppose, the memoir which the Rev. Charles Rogers, LL.D., wrote for the first collected edition of the lady's verse. This dates back a good many years. On the other hand, it is just five years since Messrs. Oliphant, of Edinburgh, issued a little book about the Baroness, from the pen of her great-grand-niece. We are now told to expect a volume on Lady Nairne and Her Songs, which has been written by a clergyman of the Scottish Establishment, and which, we may hope, contains some new matter of interest and moment.

The next volume of the series of "Periods in European Literature," edited by Prof. Saintsbury, will be on The Augustan Age, and from the pen of Mr. Oliver Elton, whom some may recognise as the author of An Introduction to Michael Drayton, published at Manchester a few years ago. After that will come a volume on The Romantic Triumph, by Mr. T. S. Omond, who must not be confounded with Mr. G. W. T. Omond. The latter has written books on The Lord Advocates of Scotland, The Scottish Union Question, Fletcher of Saltoun, and so forth, to say nothing of some stories. Mr. T. S. Omond, I fancy, has published only a pamphlet on the subject of English Verse Structure. Of Mr. G. Gregory Smith, who has written for the series a volume on The Transition Period, I know (I am ashamed to say) nothing.

Nobody, I think, should be a publisher who is not fruitful in ideas. As a class, I consider, publishers are too fond of the game of "follow-my-leader." Thus I see that one of them is now announcing a "Sports Library," a series of little works on separate pastimes, as if I had not had dozens (nay, hundreds) of such manuals of all sorts and sizes on my table during the last few years! When, again, I note the advertisement of a new series of publications on Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture, I bethink me of the series of handbooks on The Great Artists which helps to fill one of the shelves of my library, and which appeared no later than the early nineties. In this case, to be sure, "artists" stood for "painters" only, so to that extent the new series will have novelty.

I read that the latest editor of Walton's Lives is going to tell us, in his prefatory essay, that in his opinion Walton's merits as a biographer have been exaggerated. I dare say they have; but if so, why does this gentleman take the trouble to add another to the editions already in existence? Mr. Dent published the Lives in a dainty form last year; Messrs. Methuen reprinted them in 1895; and there were other editions in 1888 and 1884, no doubt still in the market. However, the aforesaid latest editor may say what he likes about the Lives. Wordsworth described them as "satellites burning in a lucid ring," and nothing can shake their position as a classic.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Modern Jew.

The Modern Jew. By Arnold White. (Heinemann. 6s.)

EIGHT years ago Mr. Arnold White was sent to Russia by the late Baron Hirsch to obtain, if possible, some amelioration of the lot of the Russian Jews, and facilities for their emigration to the philanthropic colonies founded for them in Argentina. It was, therefore, to be hoped that in the present volume we might have a temperate, reasoned, and evidenced statement of the Jewish case that might help to clear away the fog which the extraordinary proceedings at Rennes have thrown round it. But it is not thus that Mr. Arnold White has set to work. Dominated, apparently, by the desire for "timeliness," he has collected into one volume the contents of his note-books with so little method that the reader is hurried by way of England from Russia and the Continent to America, then back again to Russia and then to England again without apparently any reason. Yet Mr. White has done what in him lay to bring some order into this chaos. With a faith in the virtues of a good headline, he has split his book up into chapters, each bearing a title, with, however, but little relation to its contents. Thus we turn to the chapter "The Jew in America," to find there nothing but the story, told in the sufficient compass of two pages, that two Aragonese nobles, "unquestionably of Jewish blood," lent Ferdinand and Isabella the money for Columbus' expedition of discovery; and to the one headed "Jewish Humour," to be rewarded by about the same quantity of jokes from Jewish newspapers.

But it would be idle to deny that Mr. Arnold White's matter possesses much interest. The main position, to which he returns again and again, is that the Jewish race are "increasing by leaps and bounds in numbers, in wealth," and so on, so fast that the nations of Continental Europe will soon rise upon them and cast them forth. Then, he says, they will come to England, who alone knows no distinctions among her immigrants, with the dire result of "the press being captured as it has been captured on the Continent, and the national life stifled by the substitution of material aims for those which, however faultily, have formed the unselfish and imperial objects of the Englishmen who have made the Empire." To avert these evils but one remedy is, he thinks, possible. Turkish Armenia, which he describes somewhat vaguely as lying "between the valley of the Tigris and Euphrates," has been depopulated by Turkish massacres, and is now "available for resettlement." The Jews of Poland and the Russian Pale should be dumped there on "the break-up of the Turkish Empire"—an event which he seems to consider imminent. By this means the flow of pauper immigrants into Europe would be cut off, and we should be saved from a massacre which would throw back civilisation for a hundred years. For it is by no means all Jews to whose presence among us Mr. White objects. The rich Jews, or "Jewish aristocracy," are, in his opinion, worthy of all praise. They differ, he says, from their Christian peers "by more strenuous and uniform patriotism, by more systematic and larger benevolence, by quickness and by a nimbleness and rapidity of intellect, and sensitiveness to public opinion [!], which is not a common characteristic of nobles of recent creation." Moreover, they intermarry with Christians, and will, therefore, in time become absorbed like the Huguenots and other immigrants, whom we have welcomed with good results. Then there is the professional class, "the highly-educated and Anglicised Hebrew, who has practically relinquished his faith without abandoning his racial characteristics." Although he will not allow his daughters to intermarry with Englishmen, he is too valuable a citizen to be spared. The pauper Jew immigrant is, as we have seen, to be restrained from immigration, but there remains the unlovable trading class, nearly always belonging to the Ashkenazim, or German-speaking variety of Jew, who will neither intermarry with the English, provide for his own poor, nor comport himself like a decent citizen. "This," says Mr. White, "is the class which is the cause of coming danger; and the peril arises, not from their enjoyment of life, nor from their capture of the good things that are going, but from their hide-bound refusal to discharge the responsibilities as well as accept the privileges of money-making." It seems impossible that England should longer warm these vipers in her bosom, and yet Mr. White makes no distinct proposal for their removal. They are, no doubt, intended to be taken to Armenia, but they are mostly well off—the fact that "they fill the stalls of every fashionable theatre, occupy the best rooms at the best hotels," and the like, is dwelt upon with much emphasis—and will, therefore, hardly fall under Mr. White's proposed legislation against alien paupers. We can, therefore, only suppose that they are to be expatriated by what Mr. White's Russian acquaintances would call "administrative order," or, in other words, by the scruff of their necks.

This is a pretty sweeping programme, and, before it is adopted, it may be well to see whether there is not something to be said against it. And here we luckily need hardly go beyond the pages of Mr. White's book. "You are a most polite disputant," says Sir Anthony Absolute to Mrs. Malaprop, "for every third word you say is on my side of the question." And so it is with Mr. White. The Jews are increasing on us hand-over-hand, he says in effect. Yet he tells us that the Jews in England number "probably not more than 120,000 or 130,000," a figure which he afterwards reduces, without reason given, to less than 100,000. Their wealth is enormous is another of his arguments; and is met by his own assertion that four-fifths of "the Hebrew population of the world drag out an existence of tribulation and anguish" in abject poverty. Their children are, he says, "astonishingly clever," the Jew has obtained "intellectual pre-eminence" in the professions, and they acquire wealth by "superior sharpness over the native-born"; and then we find him giving in full Lord Rothschild's letter to the parents of the pupils in the Jews' Free School at Spitalfields, warning them that the diligent attendance at the Chedorim, or Hebrew schools, was enfeebling the minds of their children, and his own remark that "over the Yankee of the Eastern States, the Auvergnat, the Scotchman, the Armenian, and the Greek mercantile community," the Jew has no pre-eminence of astuteness. Lastly, against his statements that Jews cannot be turned from their faith, we have his quotations that "250 Jews, or the sons of such," are ordained clergymen of the Church of England, and that "Jewish baptisms are of very frequent occurrence in these days"; while his frequent allegation of the "solidarity" of the Jewish people is countered by his regret that at the very time when Russia was sweeping the lower class of Jews into ghettos under circumstances of hideous cruelty, the richer Jews were engaged in raising the successive loans without which Russia must soon have become bankrupt. We really need go no further to see the utter baselessness of the case which Mr. White would set up.

As it is probable that this book will be followed by others dealing with the same subject, either from the Semite or the anti-Semite point of view, it may be as well here to state a few plain facts. In the first place, is it the fact that Israel is the sort of monster which her foolish enemies and some of her even more foolish friends would make out, so prolific that her sons would soon, if allowed to increase unchecked, outnumber the rest of the human race, and of such transcendent abilities that the whole earth must soon belong to her? We have no figures that will enable us to estimate accurately the numbers of the nation before its dispersion by the Romans, except the remark of Josephus that 1,100,000 perished in the war with Titus (Bell. VI. ix. 3). This is probably a gross exaggeration; but if we take into account the numbers who were afterwards killed in the two years' war with Hadrian (still called the War of Extermination), we may guess that a million Jews really died at the hands of the Romans. But the latter did not kill women and children, regarding them rather as valuable property, and on the usual calculation this would give a total for the whole nation of six million souls. These were the descendants of those who returned from the Babylonian captivity; but it was only the fanatics, the clergy, and the paupers of the nation who did so return. The prosperous Jewish bankers and merchants remained with their dependents under the shadow of the Persian kings, and it is from them that the Sephardim, or Jews of the Peninsula, are probably descended. If we consider that they were equal in number to those of the Western Dispersion, we shall find that the Jewish subjects of the two Empires before the fall of Jerusalem must have numbered twelve million souls, while now, according to Whitaker's Almanack, there are not more than seven million in the whole world. Since the War of Extermination, too, they have been at peace, while the non-Jewish nations have endured constant wars, and have yet doubled their populations many times over. Where, then, is the evidence of their increase?

Nor will the legend of the mental superiority of the Jews over their neighbours hold water for a moment when seriously examined. Few will dispute in these days that a sound body is necessary to a sound mind. Yet Dr. Jacobs, in 1886, proved before the Anthropological Institute (S. A. I. xv. 267) that the modern Jews of all ages contributed more insane, deaf-mute, and blind persons than their neighbours to the common stock, and that their mortality, after reaching the age of sixty, was also greater. Individual cases, of course, prove nothing, but it is probable that the average intellectual power of the Jew, like that of other Semites, is low in comparison with that of the Aryan, or perhaps even of the Mongol races. The absolute incapacity which they have shown throughout their history to maintain for more than a very short period of time any form of self-government is, perhaps, the most striking proof of this. On the other hand, they have always been willing, as the late Leroy-Beaulieu said (we owe Mr. White the quotation), to amalgamate with any nation which gives them the chance; and when the effect of religious animosities has died away, they will probably be absorbed by the nations among whom they live, to the ultimate benefit of both parties. From all which facts it results that the anti-Semitic scare is a bugbear which will some day follow the fear of witchcraft and the dread of the end of the world into the limbo of forgotten follies.

Goethe.

HE took the suffering human race,
He read each wound, each weakness clear;
And struck his finger on the place,
And said: Thou artest here, and here!
He looked on Europe's dying hour
Of fitful dream and feverish power;
His eye plunged down the weltering strife,
The turmoil of expiring life—
He said: *The end is everywhere,
Art still has truth, take refuge there!*
And he was happy, if to know
Causes of things, and far below
His feet to see the lurid flow
Of terror, and insane distress,
And headlong fate, be happiness.

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

"THEY call me master, but continue to follow their own noses."—GOETHE.

History in Homespun.

Letters Received by the East India Company. Vol. III.: 1615. Edited by William Foster, B.A. (Sampson Low, Marston & Co.)

WE have every respect for the dignity of formal history. But for our own reading the sting is less in Gardiner or Macaulay than in those documents, artless and unadorned, which, written with no eye on posterity, show history in the making. The letters now before us are records of the early struggles and successes of the East India Company. They are mainly reports sent by the factors in India and the isles to Sir Thomas Smith and the Company in London. In 1615 the charter had been held for sixteen years. Settling first in Sumatra and Java, the adventurers had made their way to Surat upon the mainland. The Portuguese had protested against this invasion of a profitable monopoly, and had taken their licking at Swally Road. Now it became a question of maintaining the commercial position by every possible means. One of the factors—William Edwards—was despatched inland to visit the Great Mogul, Jahangir, at Ajmere, and sue for his favour. Others made haste to write to the Company, detailing the qualities of goods which in their experience found the most ready market among the natives, and requesting the necessary consignments. Thus, Thomas Elkington writes:

Commodities fitting to be sent for this place yearly will be some 200 cloths, the most part stametts and Venice reds, the rest yellows, popinjays, grass greens, and pink colours; but for other colours by no means to send any. . . . Sword-blades, broad and crooked, with thick backs, and such as will bow and not stand, but no straight. Coral in round or long beads and branches; great vent for it here, and will turn to great profit, whereof may it please your Worships with the first to send what quantity you can procure of any of the sorts, especially round beads and branches, with some amber beads and amber unwrought; fair emeralds and pearls likewise well requested, with some crimson-coloured velvets and satins of the best. Any other commodity that our land affordeth I cannot perceive to be here requested.

William Edwards sends very similar advice from Ajmere: "I wish that you send no sad colours of any sorts except grass-green, for they delight altogether in light colours, and if you hold to those colours now sent, I think you shall not err therein." Divers commodities which would not sell had nevertheless a value as presents. Such, for instance, were "comb-cases, black looking-glasses, cases of bottles, pictures, knives, spectacles, burning-glasses, &c."

Some five or six white beaver hats, with the brims somewhat broad, would be well accepted; as many cushionets, such as are used in London by women to work upon, with their boxes well set forth; some pillow sweet-bag, or other like thing of the rockwork used lately in England, and now out of fashion, and therefore may be had good cheap, give good content.

The factors had to be liberal of presents both to the Mogul and to his grandees. "We are to buy their loves with our moneys." The great success was scored by a young mastiff which Edwards took to the Mogul. A leopard was brought to make trial of it, "which the dog so pinched that few hours after the leopard died." Also it outdid some Persian dogs in a boar-fight, and altogether the Mogul was so pleased that he said "that a rich jewel would not have more contented him." On the other hand a fancy portrait of the Mogul painted in England turned out, not unnaturally, so unlike that it could not be presented. Complaints to the Company as to the bad quality of the goods sent out, and of the ship equipment provided for the factors, are not uncommon.

The baftas you sent in the Osiander are the most part of them so spotted, stained, and some rotten, that they will never yield the price they are rated at, and of force they must be so before they were put aboard, for that the papers are fair without and the goods rotten within. As also the parcel of wax is so bad that no man will look at it.

The cloth sent by the Dragon was "not very well conditioned"; sword-blades were "neither good nor well-fashioned"; a case of knives had bad blades; the masters of the ships neglected a consignment of mastiffs, and they died. Worst of all, the workmanship of the vessels proved gravely defective.

In the night and in a stiff gale of wind the Gift her long boat broke from her stern, and with her the jollywatt, and were both driven into the bottom of the bay, the stem of the long boat breaking short off by reason of bad and sappy timber whereof it was made and bad workmanship, wherein generally your lordships are much abused in all your provisions by such workmen as you employ, to the hazard of all, shuffling up their work in such manner, in hope of never hearing more of it by reason of the length of the voyage, as is lamentable to see men to be so respectless of the safety of such a voyager and men's lives, and all for some private gain of their own; being thought the Hector's foremast was defective before it was set in.

Apart from these picturesque details of Jacobean merchant adventure, the letters contain some elements of humour in the bickerings and discomforts of the factors themselves. There is, for instance, a certain egregious Samuel Juxon, who appears on the scene with a stilted epistle to Sir Thomas Smith in which he acknowledges his "imbecility" in "marine discourses," and fears "that my rustical discourse should in no wise be answerable to him that writeth to least effect, or that the splendid and copious advice of others may darken and obscure my slender and insignificant methods." One can hardly be surprised that Sir Thomas Smith curtly endorses the letter, "Of no moment at all." The next we hear of Samuel Juxon is that he takes part in a violent quarrel between Mr. John Oxwicke and other factors on board the Hector, and declares "that John Oxwicke abused me by most base and vile words and struck me twice or thrice on the face until the blood gushed out of my nostrils, and challenged me the field, in the presence of Edmond Aspenall and Robert Johnson." Shortly afterwards Samuel Juxon's brief and stormy career as a factor closed, for the "flux" or dysentery carried him off in fourteen days.

The majority of the Company's correspondents are business men of no great standing or education. A new note is, however, struck in 1615 by the appearance on the scene of Sir Thomas Roe. The factors soon saw the desirability of having the interests of England represented at the court of the Mogul by someone of greater weight and significance than themselves. "A lieger here," writes one of them, "of necessity you must keep for redressing of wrongs, otherwise we must be subject to many inconveniences in our affairs, and him to be a scholar of good understanding and presence, for such a one will be much respected here." Consequently, in 1615, Sir Thomas Roe was sent out as a special ambassador from the court of King James to that of the Mogul. Nor could a better choice have been made. A scholar, traveller, statesman, and man of business, Roe maintained the better Elizabethan traditions in the midst of the Jacobean decadence. He enjoyed the friendship of John Donne and of Ben Jonson, both of whom addressed poems to him. Roe arrived on the scene in India about September, and his vigorous diplomacy soon triumphed over the difficulties before him. His despatches are models of dignity and incisiveness. Here is an example, from a protest sent to the discourteous and unfriendly Governor of Surat:

The injuries you have offered me, contrary to the faith given by your King, to all civility and law of nations, being a free Ambassador, and contrary to your own honour and promise, forceth me to send you word I am resolved not to endure it. I come hither not to beg, nor do nor suffer injury. I serve a King that is able to revenge whatsoever is dared to be done against his subjects. I come under assurance of the Great Mogul's firma and letters sent unto the King of England, my master, promising all love and friendship to him; and therefore I am confident that no man dare presume to wrong me. . . . I am sorry for nothing but that ever I vouchsafed to send you any remembrance of me, of whom in love you might have received anything, but by this course, of me, nor my nation, I am resolved you shall never get one pice; assuring you I am better resolved to die upon an enemy than to flatter him, and for such I give you notice to take me until your master hath done me justice.

The full narrative of Sir Thomas Roe's mission is contained in a Journal of his own. This has just been re-edited, together with the letters and other documents bearing on the subject, by the editor of the present volume, Mr. Foster; and should give Roe his rightful place as one of the founders of the Empire. A touch of comedy is added by the pranks of a page of the ambassador's, who was left behind sick at Surat while his master went up to Ajmere, and on his recovery caused trouble between the factors and the natives by his insolent demeanour. He made wanton advances to the wives of respectable Banyans, beat the "peons," and outraged the sentiment of caste by running into the houses and "putting his hands into their pots of meat and drink of purpose to anger them." A very recognisable type of Anglo-Indian 'Arry!

The editing of the volume is unexceptionable, and Mr. Foster's notes are always helpful and entertaining. In one of them he tells the sad story of the Souldanian Corée who was brought home to England by Captain Towerson, who kidnapped him at the Cape. He was lodged in Sir Thomas Smith's house, where he had to his good entertainment made for him a chain of bright brass, an armour, breast, back and head-piece, with a buckler, all of brass, his beloved metal; yet all this contented him not, for never any seemed to be more weary of ill-usage than he was of courtesies; none ever more desirous to return home to his country than he; for when he had learned a little of our language he would daily lie upon the ground, and cry very often thus in broken English: Coree home go, Souldania go, home go. And not long after, when he had his desire and was returned home, he had no sooner set footing on his own shore but presently he threw away his cloathes, his linen, with all other covering, and got his sheep-skins upon his back, guts about his neck, and such a perfum'd cap as before we named upon his head; by whom that proverb mentioned 2 Peter 2, v. 22, was literally fulfilled: canis ad vomitum.

And this is the pathos of empire.

The New Topography.

Toledo: the Story of an Old Spanish Capital. By Hannah Lynch. (Dent & Co. 4s. 6d. net.)

A new literature of topography is springing up—a literature which is concerned more with the spirit of a place than with its form. The old topographers came with rule and schedule. Even Defoe, whose love of place was as near to a passion as anything in his nature, saw only the actualities of a town, its houses, shops, inns, trade, and customs. These he examined and described with gusto; and so, with less genius, Pennant worked, and Grose, and a whole school of writers whose methods survive in the ordinary guide-book. Your new topographer is different. The first thing he does on arriving in a place is to throw himself on his back and dream. He postpones all minor inquiry until he has caught the spirit of his surroundings. He thinks less of the place than of the human spirit which has passed into it; he is solicitous to find not a description, but a metaphor. In the first sentence of her book Miss Lynch speaks of the "legendary still visage of Toledo." And presently you find her quoting the intensely modern words of M. Maurice Barrès: "It is less a town, a noisy affair yielding to the commodities of life, than a significant spot for the soul, . . . an image of exaltation in solitude, a cry in the desert." In the new topography, as we may call it, line and measurement, epitaph and inscription, orderly sequence of statements are not wanting, but they are servants to the early and intuitive comprehension of the soul.

This method lifts topography to a higher notch in the literary scale. Books about places have always depended for their charm on the amount and the quality of personality brought to bear on stocks and stones. But now the personality is to go farther: it is to see that the stocks and stones have accumulated a soul, that the river heaves with its own memories, and that the trees preserve an undying whisper of tradition. So there will be two personalities instead of one, and deep may call unto deep.

Miss Lynch is sealed of this new school, and we may say at once that her Toledo is a charming book. In spite of her resolve to show us the heart of Toledo, we have here presented no city of a nebulous fancy, or a poetic wish. Toledo, throned among her rocks above the dead Tagus, with her air of surly pride and venerable feudality, has to be accounted for by patient procession of fact and detail. The vague memory of Celtic shepherds watering their flocks along the Tagus; the faint finger-mark that indicates Rome's half-mastery of the city of the rocks; the dim days of early faith, and the stubborn Toledan Councils that hurled down decrees and bans in defiance of the Pope; the short Gothic dynasty lit up by the deeds of Wamba and Rodrigo—Rodrigo who invited all the chivalry of Europe to his inaugural tourney; then the Moslem era, when Toledo foamed at the mouth, and struggled, and fell, and rose again in sickening conflict, but accepted the Moorish arch, and many a divine arabesque and patio, and noble bridges and delicious gardens: through all these periods, with their dim and intricate associations, Miss Lynch takes us with a verve and a loyalty to her main idea which win her pages from anything like tedium.

Still, we are not ungrateful when we are permitted to walk in the Toledo of to-day, and apply its history to its appearance. Unfortunately the fierce element in Toledan character has declined into rapacity and shameless beggary:

Other Spanish towns are proud and noble in their decay; Toledo is, unhappily, degraded and brutalised. She has no commerce, no stir, no money. She has no communication with the outer world, except through the travellers who briefly pass her way, and upon whose exploitation she lives. She has no standard of civilisation. Her object is to make every foreigner pay for every step he takes along her rude and inhospitable pavements. The people have no desire whatever to make a good impression, no pride in the hope that the stranger shall go away and speak them fair in remote parts. They neither want his good opinion nor his sympathy; but they want as much of his money as they can get. The ill-will is general. Canons, citizens, sacristans, guides, interpreters—all appear to be in a secret league to multiply difficulties and exact tips. Only the common women, all over Spain the cream of the race, retain something of Spanish good-nature and courtesy.

However, the traveller who is weary of parting with his coppers may taste revenge by watching the Toledans raking the Tagus for gold that never comes. Miss Lynch's picture of the dead river and the gold-seekers is striking:

The most witching element in the enchantment of this river is its stillness, its unfathomable, unbroken quietude. In the sixteenth century it was navigable as far as Toledo, but the mills upon its bank are now for ever silent; no traffic has disflowered its legendary charms; neither boat nor barge cuts a way along its inactive waters. In an age when every resource of nature is feverishly applied to the service of commerce or luxury, there is something majestic in such uselessness. When the wherry that plies sleepily from bank to bank floats into view, the sight is a positive shock of artistic sensibilities. It seems an idle desecration. Only the gold-seekers—symbol of eternal illusion, ever nourished and ever elusive to the grasp of man, who builds fresh illusions of the ashes of past deceptions—may continue to trouble its wild and untamed depths. So from time to time these children of tradition, believing in the tale of its golden sands, go down to the reedy banks, after an inundation, with sifters, and industriously gather up the sand the river has flung from its bottom. They pour water over it, shake it well, and then hungrily examine the grains that remain, in the vain hope of finding gold. Before Ponz's time the dean of the Church of the Infantas was said to possess a piece of gold cast up by the Tagus, and the complaint then was that many another piece had been carelessly broken and scattered by the silversmiths. But Ponz doubts the golden legend even so early as the last century. To explain the undoubted fact that the river had at different times cast up treasure, he assumes that in each reversal and exodus of the race brought about by the evolution of Toledo's history—Roman, Gothic, Moorish, Hebrew, and Christian—the fugitives had the habit of burying near the river treasure in provision for the expected return. Even this is no supposition to be scorned, and adds to the romantic interest of the deserted Tagus.

The street scenery of Toledo has the same note of deadness, the present fluttering like scant rags over the past:

Streets so narrow that hand may touch hand from either side, and soft converse be held through opposite windows; so rounded that an enemy advancing might fall upon you unperceived. How many lovely façades, alas! eaten away, a sullen, magnificent protest against modern times, with divine arches showing here and there through miserable plaster! Everywhere Moorish faience, and curious Toledan doors in Arabian or Gothic porches, for all the world like the doors of palaces in fairyland, ornamented with huge carved iron nails. And when the doors stand open, glimpses of bright, clean patios, with their gleaming bands of azulejos, their centre well, and little stunted trees. All so dull, so still, so silent.

A complaint, and we have done. Miss Lynch's account of the old Toledo sword-making is very meagre: it fills one page. Considering that the general reader associates Toledo with little else than the steel blades with which it armed the knights of Europe, Miss Lynch might, we think, have condescended to him more in this matter. There is no lack of information on the subject, and it would have served Miss Lynch's turn to have explored it: for what is more pathetic than the pretence which is still made of keeping up the old craft? The tinkle of discouraged anvils, that will not cease and cannot triumph, is Toledo's voice to-day.

A Mighty Hunter.

After Big Game in Central Africa. By Edouard Foa.
Translated by Frederic Lees. (A. & C. Black. 21s.)

THIS chronicle of sport is relieved and elevated by a great deal of keen observation. If this were not so, many readers might find it difficult to stomach the long tale of slaughter. Between August, 1894, and November, 1897, M. Foa shot 488 head of big game and 520 head of small game; he snared, trapped, or netted 192 animals; poisoned four; and captured twenty-four animals alive. As will be surmised, M. Foa is an old hand. For the last fourteen years he has travelled incessantly in Africa, hunting, exploring, observing; and this is not the first record of sport he has published. The Foa expedition, of which this book gives the sporting side, started from the Zambesi in August, 1894, to cross Africa. M. Foa had a mission from the Minister of Public Instruction, and it is clear from Mr. Lee's statements that he did an immense amount of scientific work and collected specimens with industry and acumen for the Paris Museum. The grande médaille d'or was awarded him for these results by the Paris Geographical Society; and M. Foà is preparing a separate and larger book dealing with the general results of his journey.

Here we pass from Mr. Lee's introduction to a frank and curiously French chronicle of shooting. M. Foà appears to be a thorough sportsman, but he recounts his exploits with the fervour and fancy of a Frenchman. He adopts the dramatic present tense on almost all occasions, and when this is not enough he showers dots among his words, and seems to pant as he narrates the tale of thrilling danger or escape. As a specimen of M. Foà's more excited manner, take his description of his really narrow escape from a gigantic wounded elephant. He and his native hunters had encountered a small herd of elephants, and in the end they killed four. But not before one of the animals had nearly avenged his race. A cry of rage from an unexpected quarter, a "shrill trumpet-blast similar to the shriek of a siren," and the black mass "bursts like a locomotive from the thicket we are skirting."

Each of us leap aside in search of safety. . . . Kambombe and Tchegallo, who were ahead, make off to the left; Tambarika and Rodzani scamper off the way we came; Msiambiri and I dash straight ahead through the hole made by the herd. . . . The ground trembles. . . . A sinister rustling of the leaves, a breaking of branches, the shriller and shriller trumpet blasts tell us that the elephant is behind, and overtaking us. . . . There is no doubt about it. . . . We throw down our heavy rifles so as to run the quicker.

It is impossible to describe the terror, mingled with rage, which fills me at this moment. During our mad race all my thoughts are summed up as follows: "No rifle, . . . many elephants killed with impunity, and this is the hour of reckoning! . . . the game is up, . . . a rapid vision of my native country." . . . That is all. . . . And now, clenching my fists, I run and jump in a supreme struggle for life. . . . Minutes slip by and seem hours. Some one, whom I recognise as Msiambiri, though without seeing him, brushes past me. . . . Our feet pass swiftly over the ground; trees upon trees flash past. . . . Behind us the shrill cries stop, but on our heels are heavy footsteps which shake the ground; a powerful, spasmodic breathing is heard; then, warm air passes over my shoulders and neck. . . . Heavens! it is its trunk. . . . "Tchitamba! tchitamba!" (trunk), murmurs the wretched fellow at my side. On we fly, maddened and blinded, bruising ourselves in grazing trees, insensible either to thorns which tear us or to branches which whip our faces. . . . It is useless! . . . I shall soon grow feeble and fall. . . . Then I hear, as in a dream, the cry "A mola!" ("It is all over"), uttered in despairing accents, and I see a body rise in the air. . . . I am alone. . . . The noise has ceased. . . . I continue running for a few seconds unconsciously, but the awakening comes. . . . I stop, and the reality stares me in the face. . . . Yes, I am saved; but the other is dead!—and through my fault. . . . Remorse and regret complete my distraction. . . . I lean against a tree, faltering, overcome.

After this it is pleasant to find M. Foà in his appendix writing generously and calmly about the elephant. He there discusses the possibility of domesticating the African elephant, and he has the candour to admit that this desirable and profitable end will never be gained until the hunting of the elephant is forbidden in Central Africa. At present the animals' habits are being modified by the everlasting chase. No longer do elephants herd calmly in grass countries and among the swamps and shelters that they love. Instead they are continually on the move. "A herd here to-day will be fifty miles away to-morrow, and the day after will be somewhere else. Probably you will never see it again." Under these conditions elephants cannot be captured. A stray elephant may be caught, but the opportunity to create establishments like those in India is not existent. The elephant's powers of travel and its distinctive character among beasts are thus touched on by M. Foà:

The elephant has only one enemy—man. It fears none of the animals. In addition to intelligence relatively superior to theirs, it possesses strength, size, courage if need be, and, moreover, a sense of touch more delicate than that of any of them, even the monkey. It travels everywhere, swims like an amphibian and crosses ravines and rivers, forests and thickets, without distinction. Everything gives way before it. It climbs and descends hills which one would think inaccessible to it; it crosses whole countries in a night, like an undisputed master in his vast domains; it is here, there, and everywhere, hiding like a mouse despite its great size, and noiselessly disappearing like an unseizable Proteus, much to the discomfort of the hunter; finally, if its life is spared, it is ready to become once more, as in former times when it fought by his side, the ally, the friend, the servant, and the protector of man. The elephant is the true king of animals. Compare this noble animal with the useless lion, that nocturnal prowler at the mercy of a pack of wolves.

M. Foà admits that the death-pangs of an elephant are enough to make the most hardened hunter remorseful. "Several times have I said to myself, upon seeing these splendid animals suffer, that I ought to place my rifle in the gun-rack for ever." No such feelings attend the slaying of a man-eating lion, a fine instance of which occurs early in the narrative. A couple of natives came to speak to M. Foà on behalf of a chief. They said that a lion had eaten an old woman, and had since come prowling in search of another meal. M. Foà set off to the village, and, on the very night of his arrival, when it was too late to organise a hunt, the same lion appeared and carried off a boy at the very moment when he cautiously reached through the half-open door of his mother's hut to take up a bundle of firewood. An immense clamour arose, and the mother threw herself in tears at the Frenchman's feet. At daylight, with ten natives, M. Foà set off in chase, and very soon traces of the lion and child were found. At last M. Foà was in this position: he could see the tops of tall grass swaying, but could not locate the hidden lion. Kambombe mounts a tree; the other natives take up strategic positions.

Kambombe gives me information in a low voice from his tree: "He's off. . . . No, he comes this way. . . . He stops and looks in the direction of the men. . . . He raises his mane. . . . Ah! he comes in your direction. . . . at walking pace. . . . He is going to pass the ant-hill. . . . Ah! if you were here! . . . How well I see him. . . . He looks behind him. . . . There he is! there he is! . . . Get back a little; get back!"

One can understand with what anxiety I hear these words. Following his advice, I retire two steps. My men are behind me with their weapons ready. "Only fire in case of necessity," I tell them. . . . "Don't hurry yourself" . . . murmurs Tambarika.

The rustling grass bends forward, then opens on either side, and the lion walks out eight yards away from me, looking behind him, engrossed by the noise of the voices. Upon turning his head he sees me standing motionless, shows his teeth, and snarls, without deviating from his path. At the same time his tail rises, he flattens his ears, and I see he is going to charge at the very moment when, having followed him with my rifle, and aiming at the nape of his neck, I pull the trigger. . . . His four feet give way under him, and he falls stone-dead without a movement. [ . . . ] At the camp in the evening, when looking at the sky sown with stars, so serene and calm, I was still thinking of the poor negress over there, her mother's heart so wrung, and I asked myself how many such unknown sorrows there are each day in the universe.

Turning again to M. Foà's appendix, we find an interesting note on the precise behaviour of a lion when, as in the above case, it is met at close quarters and is provoked to attempt a charge. In the daytime lions usually avoid travellers, and, when seen, make off with an assumption of dignity until they are out of sight, when they suddenly gallop off to safety. But a lion's tactics can never be reckoned on with certainty, and it is important to be able to interpret its behaviour.

First signs of anger are shown as follows: its tail rapidly twists from side to side, the bottom slightly rising; and, the black tassel at the end beating the air, it lowers its head more than usual and growls, at intervals showing its teeth. Then its voice becomes louder, it roars, shows its teeth, and lowers its ears, the movements of the tail increasing all the time. At the time of charging—that is, at the height of its anger—the tail rises in the air until it is almost vertical, the black tassel continues to move, the ears are flattened completely, and the animal comes toward you at a slow trot, then at a gallop, and finally springs forward with open mouth and extended claws. Sometimes it shows these various symptoms without charging, restrained by prudence; but it never charges without showing them. When the tail rises the hunter can bring his rifle to his shoulder and await his opportunity. In hunting, a man who is on his guard is worth four. A charge is extremely dangerous, almost always fatal when unexpected, either because of dense vegetation or other causes; but if you see the animal getting ready, flight is useless. Stand your ground: the only thing to do is to keep cool and trust in your weapon.

M. Foà's rifle seems never to have been silent; yet he had a hunter's disappointments in full measure. Once, after a month of nightly watchings, he comments:

Eight successful days out of thirty-seven! That was sufficient, however, for I killed animals which amply repaid me for my trouble. But what feelings of discouragement I have had also, what moments of real anguish? How many times have I said to myself on returning, tired out by my night of waiting, during which fever was my only visitor: "I shall return there no more!" Yet I was there in the evening. There is a host of sensations in the life of a nocturnal hunter which would need a more skilful pen than mine to describe them adequately.

But even in these pages M. Foà gives us many a hint of the psychology of the combats and ambushes incident to big game shooting. Mr. Lees' translation might be better. The excess of the present tense might have been avoided, and in not a few cases the rendering is too literal. But the book is well edited and well illustrated, and it provides some memorable reading.

Scamping the West Countrie.

A Book of the West. Vol. I., Devon; Vol. II., Cornwall.
By S. Baring-Gould. (Methuen. Each 6s.)

ONE thing is very certain, patience is a virtue that every day recedes farther from "popular" authors. Their books, which come tumbling one upon the other like boys from school, bear every mark of hurry, and the ambition to be immediately read and remunerated seems to be the only one that has any force with them. To make literature, that is a secondary matter entirely. Let us take Mr. Baring-Gould as an example. Many years ago he wrote Mehalah and John Herring, wherein are strength and order and a dominant purpose. To-day he puts forth A Book of the West, two bulky volumes of odds and ends of gossip concerning Cornwall and Devon, flung down just as they came into his head, without any studious care for arrangement or well-knit framework. In the preface we find these disarming sentences:

In this Book of the West I have not sought to say all that might be said relative to Devon and Cornwall; nor have I attempted to make of it a guide-book. I have rather endeavoured to convey to the visitor to our western peninsula a general idea of what is interesting, and what ought to attract his attention. The book is not intended to supersede guide-books, but to prepare the mind to use these latter with discretion. . . . My object, then, must not be misunderstood, and my book harshly judged accordingly. There are ten thousand omissions, but I venture to think a good many things have been admitted which will not be found in guide-books, but which it is well for the visitor to know, if he has a quick intelligence and eyes open to observe.

The critic's ground is here almost cut from under his feet. Mr. Baring-Gould practically says: "I am writing merely for tourists as much in a hurry as myself. It is no business of any reviewer at all." But when books are printed and bound and illustrated, and marked six shillings, and entitled pretentiously, they come into the reviewer's purview, and we therefore feel bound to protest. Moreover, we know something of Devon and Cornwall, and have much love for them, and we hate to see them perfunctorily treated. Mr. Baring-Gould has not even so far revised his work as to take out the phrase "the writer of this article" in the middle of it, thus betraying its miscellaneous origin. A book entitled A Book of the West should be a real book, the outcome of much pains and much toil and much thinking.

The pity of it is, that Mr. Baring-Gould is really a good and erudite writer. He knows his subject well; he knows the West-Country people; he is interested in legends; he has a robust, sympathetic, tolerant mind, and a fine sense of life. In other words, he is the born historian of Devon and Cornwall. Yet, instead of doing the work thoroughly, easefully, once for all, he pitches out these volumes of anecdotes and quotations, scraps and whimsies, and passes on to his next piece of book making, having accomplished really nothing at all. The thing was worth doing slowly, laboriously—in short, thoroughly. It must now be done again: as it stands it is a medley. It is not guide-book, as Mr. Baring-Gould admits—it is too heavy and cumbersome and incomplete; it is not history—it is too haphazard and incomplete; it is not narrative—it is too jumpy. It is just the erratic, disordered talk of a clever, well-informed, genial man, printed and bound up with pictures. It is notes for a good book; it is anything but the book itself. We have a theory that in compiling this go-as-you-please effort Mr. Baring-Gould was carried away by the ideal which rose before him as he penned this sentence in connexion with Lynton (a sentence surely out of place in any work which does not profess to be a guide-book): "At Lynton is the fine mansion of Sir George Newnes, the publisher of Tit Bits and many kindred papers, who was created a baronet by Mr. Gladstone for political services."

Every now and then Mr. Baring-Gould shows us what an epic he might have made. Thus, in the Cornish volume, in an excellent chapter concerning smuggling, there is this fine passage:

I was in a little seaport tavern in Cornwall one winter's evening, over a great fire, with a company of very old "salts," gossiping, yarning, singing, when up got a tough old fellow with a face the colour of mahogany, and dark, piercing eyes, and the nose of a hawk. Planting his feet wide apart, as though on deck in a rolling sea, he began to sing in stentorian tones a folk-song relative to a highwayman in the old times, when Sir John Fielding, the blind magistrate at Westminster, put down highway robbery.

The ballad told of the evil deeds of this mounted robber of the highways, and of how he was captured by "Fielding's crew" and condemned to die. It concluded:

When I am dead, borne to my grave,
A gallant funeral may I have;
Six highwaymen to carry me,
With good broadswords and sweet liberty.

Six blooming maidens shall bear my pall,
Give them white gloves and pink ribbons all;
And when I'm dead they'll tell the truth,
I was a wild and wicked youth.

At the conclusion of each verse the whole assembly repeated the two final lines. It was a striking scene; their eyes flashed, their colour mounted, they hammered with their fists on the table and with their heels on the floor.

Some, in the wildness of their excitement, sprang up, thrust their hands through their white or grey hair, and flourished them, roaring like bulls.

When the song was done, and composure had settled over the faces of the excited men, one of them said apologetically to me: "You see, Sir, we be all old smugglers, and have gone agin the law in our best days."

That is the best thing in the book.

Mr. Baring-Gould's quaint stories are sometimes excellent. "I am not sure," he writes, "that West-Country women ever forget that they were once comely. An old woman of seventy-five was brought forward to be photographed by an amateur; no words of address could induce her to speak till the operation was completed; she then put her finger into her mouth. 'You wouldn't ha' me took wi' my cheeks fallen in? I just stuffed the Western Marnin' News into my mouth to fill'n out.'" Peter Odgers lived at Mullion, in Cornwall. One day when out with his horse and cart he drank too freely of cider, and was overcome. Some boys took the horse out of the cart and drove it away. An hour later Peter awoke. "Well, if iver!" he said. "Be I Peter Odgers, or be I not? 'Tis contrary anyway. If I be Peter Odgers, I've lost an 'orse; if I baint, why I've gained a cart."

A final objection—the book is without an index.

Yiddish.

The History of Yiddish Literature in the Nineteenth Century.
By Leo Wiener. (Nimmo.)

OBVIOUSLY the first question is: "What is Yiddish?" and we are bound to say that we have had some difficulty in excavating the answer from Herr Wiener's imperfectly ordered introduction. Herr Wiener has spared no pains or learning in writing this book: he has made a tour through Europe with the express view of gathering material; he has ravaged the book-stores of Warsaw and Cracow, and has collected a library of eighteen hundred Yiddish volumes, which now repose in Harvard Library. His erudition is undoubted; but if he had joined to it a little more respect for the methodical and lucid exposition of first principles, his ignorant readers would have had doubled cause for gratitude. Briefly speaking, it appears that Yiddish, more politely termed Judæo-German, and more impolitely Jargon, is a dialect of High German, written in a Hebrew alphabet, and largely adulterated with Hebrew and Slavonic elements. Hebrew being the "learned" language of the Jews throughout the Middle Ages, Judæo-German naturally absorbed Hebrew, just as other German dialects absorbed Latin. The Slavonic infusion is explained by the history of the language. It was used by the colonies of Jews from the Middle Rhine who settled in Bohemia, Russia, and Poland about the beginning of the sixteenth century. It was fostered by the isolated life of such communities, in ghettos and pales, which prevented their taking part, as Jews have done, for instance, in England and Spain, in the normal literary and linguistic development of the countries they inhabited. Even the German Jews, from the time of Mendelssohn onwards, became merged in Gentilism: in the Slavonic lands alone they have remained to this day a caste. Up to the nineteenth century, Yiddish literature remained thoroughly mediæval in its type, and in its popular branches it is so still. But during the last hundred years it has been used also by enlightened Jews, who desired to set on foot among their backward countrymen a propaganda of the Mendelssohnian reform. Had they succeeded Yiddish would probably have ceased to exist. Probably it will, in any case, perish before long; but its end has been deferred by the Russian persecution of the eighties, and by the renewed migrations of Yiddish-speaking Jews to dwell as aliens in London, and to an even greater extent in America.

The Jews were, as Herr Wiener says, "the most potent factors in the dissemination of folk-literature in the Middle Ages," and popular Yiddish literature remains a mass of folk-stories and folk-lore garnered from all ends of the earth:

Their mysterious world is peopled with the imaginary beings of the Talmud, the creatures of German mythology, and the creations of the Slavie popular mind. These exist for them, however, not as separate entities, but as trans-fused into an organic whole in which the belief of Babylonia and Assyria has much of the outward form of the superstition of Russia, just as the spirits of Poland and Germany are made to be brothers to those of Chalda and Egypt. To their minds the transmigrated souls of the Gilgulim, the scoffing Leezim, the living dead bodies of the Meessim, the possessing Dibukim, the gruesome Scheedim, are as real as the Riesen and Schraetete of Germany, and the Nischtgute (niedobry), Wukodlaki (werewolf), Zlidne, Upior (vampyre), and Domowoj of Russia. The beast Reem of the Talmud, the Pipernütter (Lindwurm) of Germany, are not less known to them than the fabled animals of Russian fairy tales. In case of sickness they consult with equal success the miracle-working Rabbi with his lore derived from Talmud and Cabbala, as the Tartar medicine-man (znachar), or get some old woman to recite the ancient formula for warding off the evil eye.

If you try to analyse out from this cosmopolitan mass the racial characteristics, two present themselves. Yiddish is essentially urban and profoundly melancholy. Its folk-song is lyrical, but entirely devoid of natural magic. Humanity is all in all; its setting nothing. If a flower or a tree is named it is as a symbol, not for delight. The Jew, indeed, has been since the dispersion a dweller in cities. Centuries of exclusion and oppression, moreover, have set their brand upon his Ethos.

The perfection of art is to the mind of a Jew its ability to move to tears. It is expected of the violinist that he shall play the saddest tunes in the minor key, such as will make his hearers weep like "beavers"; the precentor's reputation depends on his powers to crush his audience, to call forth contrition of spirit, to make the hearts bleed; and the author who can make his reader dissolve in tears, no matter how absurd the story, is sure to become popular with a Jewish public.

Let us tell the reader a secret. Yiddish literature does not come to much after all. It is the voice of a worn-out people, hidebound in convention, and missing the Antæan contact with earth which is the fount of song. Therefore, for the most part, we forbear quoting. But for a sample here are two brief stanzas, with Herr Wiener's translation. And perhaps they have something of the lyric cry:

Jähren kleine, Jähren schoene,
Was sent ihr asô wënic dâ?
Ihr sent nor gekummen,
Me hât euch schoen aufgenummen,
Un' sent nor gewë'n bei uns ein Scho?

Jähren junge, Jähren g'ringe,
Was sent ihr asô gich aweg?
Es seht euch nit këin Ängel,
Es derjagen euch nit die Voegel,
Ihr sent aweg gâr ohn' ein Eck!

Little years, beautiful years, why are there so few of you? You had scarcely come, you were well received, and you stayed but an hour with us!—Young years, light years, why have you passed so quickly? Not an eye can see you, not a bird can fly as swiftly, you have passed without return.

The folk-literature of Yiddish has always been very largely in the hands of the badchens or marshaliks. These are jesters, whose proper functions are at weddings. Originally they delivered witty and even serious discourses to the bride, the bridegroom, and the guests; they came to form a regular minstrel class, and at the present time they are chiefly singers of songs. The Yiddish theatre also has its rise in specific national custom. The earliest plays are mysteries performed on the feast of Purim, and dealing with such subjects as "The Sale of Joseph," "Ahasuerus," and "David and Goliath." There is a secular theatre now; but the mysteries are still played by badchens and beggar-students, and, in strangely corrupt forms, serve, like our own St. George play, for the mummers at festival quêtes.

Herr Wiener deals at length with the chief figures of the Yiddish literary revival of the last half-century. He singles out for especial praise Leon Perez; and quite rightly, for in the "Chrestomathy," which concludes the book, Perez' "Bontsie Silent" stands out with startling effect from the mediocrity of its companions. We regret that we have not room to quote this fine story, remarkable alike for its humanity and its satirical vigour. Perez is clearly an artist. But, as Herr Wiener points out, it is, in a sense, by accident that Perez writes in Yiddish at all. Himself emancipated, and thoroughly in touch with general European learning and culture, he devotes himself to the spiritual enfranchisement of his own people. He regards literature, not as "a flimsy pastime of the otiose, but a consolation to those who have no other consolation; a safe and pleasurable retreat for those who are buffeted about on the stormy sea of life." He is not, however, popular; and Yiddish critics say that his love of symbolism makes him unintelligible to precisely that class for whom he writes. Verily, the prophet is without honour in his own country.

Other New Books.

REMINISCENCES OF THE KING OF ROUMANIA.

EDITED BY SIDNEY WHITMAN.

From the Balkan Peninsula the jangling sound of confused issues arises without much interruption; Servia, Bulgaria, Montenegro, and what is left of European Turkey joining in the hubbub each with its own peculiar note of discord. Only from Roumania do we seldom hear anything, until people have come to forget that it is one of the emancipated states of Turkey, and to imagine that it is separated from those who are its fellows by something broader and deeper than the Danube. For this happy state of things the Roumanians are indebted to no overweening merit of their own. They, too, have known the worse than Turkish curse of Levantine and Phanariot rule, and had they been left without, or even with indifferent guidance, would have been in no better condition than the Servians now are. The credit belongs to King Charles, or Carol, the Prince of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, who was elected to rule over the provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia in 1866, and has for three-and-thirty years worked for his adopted country in the face of misrepresentation and opposition with the happiest results.

King Charles was the second son of Prince Charles Anthony of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, and was born just over sixty years ago. Though a Hohenzollern, he is partly French by descent, his paternal grandmother having been a Princess Murat, and his maternal grandmother Stéphanie Beauharnais, the adopted daughter of Napoleon I. This mixed descent will account for the many non-German traits which are to be found in his character. The story of his arrival in the Principalities reads like a chapter from some romance of Ruritania, and the spectacles of Herr Hettingen, the second-class carriage through Austria (then arming against Prussia), the landing at Turnu Severin, and the headlong gallop to Bucharest, were but a fitting prelude to the stormy and difficult years which were to follow. Many a time did Prince Charles think of resignation; but he acted always on his father's maxim, "A wise and an honest ruler must never pursue a personal policy, but only a national one." That the king possesses the power of statecraft in the highest degree is shown by the way in which he has surmounted the financial troubles of Roumania, the pitfalls of the Jewish question, the dangers of the Franco-German War and of the Russo-Turkish War—when the very existence of the country was at stake—the peasant rising of eleven years ago, and the dynastic opposition which has been scurrilous and bitter ever since he took up his duty. All this is set forth clearly in Mr. Whitman's story, and an added value is given to the book by the letters from Queen Victoria, the Czar, the German Emperor, Napoleon III., and others, by which it is illustrated. Especially to be noticed are the prescient letters of Prince Charles Anthony, King Charles's father, who, writing in closest intimacy to his son, showed a statecraft and a gift of political foresight which prove him to have been a very remarkable man.

The book really ends with the coronation of King Charles on May 22, 1881, when the independence won on the battlefields in Turkey was finally acknowledged, and Roumania became a kingdom, and one of the great European family. The king's crown was, in accordance with his wish, made of steel from a Turkish gun captured at Plevna, and in putting it on, King Charles said, "I assume with pride this crown, wrought from a cannon sprinkled with the blood of our heroes, and consecrated by the Church; I accept it as a symbol of the independence and power of Roumania." Mr. Sidney Whitman has given us a valuable contribution to the history of the States of Eastern Europe, and one which throws many a sidelight on the politics of the greater States of Europe during the past thirty years. Incidentally, it proves how large a part the personality of a ruler still plays on the world's stage, and the superiority of a limited monarchy over all other forms of government. (Harper Bros. 10s. 6d.)

THE ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT FISHERIES.

By JOHN WATSON.

The "Angler's Library" has established its claim to confidence, and this volume is as good as its predecessors. No doubt Mr. Watson's book can be regarded only as a tentative guide, for, as he himself points out, the great system of lakes, tarns, and rivers with which he deals contain potentialities of sport far beyond anything now existing in the Lake District. Excellent as the sport is in many places, the natural advantages of the district have not yet been much cultivated or improved. In this connexion the author prints a very practical letter from Captain Ormrod, of Wyresdale Park, Lancashire, in which the writer, after declaring that he has always looked upon the Lake District as "thousands of acres of water almost wasted," sketches the lines on which reform should proceed. He says:

I consider it quite out of the question to think of improving the larger lakes at present. Beyond keeping down the perch, which are far too numerous. I should not interfere with the present state of things. Perch can be netted out during the spawning season very easily, and destroyed. They do little harm to trout except for the fact of their being most voracious, and where there are a lot of perch there cannot be many trout.

What I should suggest is that a start should be made with one of the smallest lakes in the Lake District.

If the thing is properly managed in a practical manner, in three years' time the fame of this little lake will have reached over England. New fishing hotels will be started on its banks; fishing tickets will be sold which will begin to repay the outlay; and hotel managers who live on other lakes less favoured will be clamouring for some way of introducing fresh blood into their waters, so that they too may benefit by the influx of angling visitors. There is no exaggeration in all this.

The literature of fishing in the Lake District is curiously scant, and is not very practical. Mr. Watson's work is perhaps a shade too practical, but his material is so extensive that he must have been hard put to it to find space for necessary information, apart from reminiscence or anecdote. But he pauses to remark that the casual visitor knows little of the beauties of Windermere.

It is alike beautiful in spring, in summer, in autumn, in winter; and only those who know the "river lake" as comparative strangers are bold enough to set the transcendent beauty of one season against another.

Its ordinary aspects are known to thousands of people; fewer know the great charm of trout-fishing through a summer night; and fewer still, perhaps, the almost inexpressible beauty of being abroad on the lake just at the dawn of a new day in May or early June. These are things which must be experienced—they leave impressions which can never be translated.

The book is admirably illustrated by photographs. (Lawrence & Bullen. 5s.)

ILLUSTRATED SPORTING BOOKS. BY J. HERBERT SLATER.

Illustrated sporting books are entirely worthy of a well-arranged catalogue to themselves, and this has now been provided by Mr. Slater. Published prices or auction prices are given throughout the volume, which forms a very handy guide to an interesting and rather recondite world of books. (Gill.)

Fiction.

Siren City. By Benjamin Swift.
(Methuen & Co. 6s.)

In earlier books Mr. Swift has been preoccupied with his own brilliance, and these books have suffered, as books will, from such a preoccupation. We are glad to observe that in Siren City he has almost abandoned the pyrotechnic displays of youth, and settled down to the serious development of his talent. Siren City is certainly his best book, and it is the work of a strong man. It has sobriety, not only of manner, but of spirit. It will command respect, in place of the wonder accorded to his previous novels. Nevertheless, it is so far from being a complete success that after the perusal the faults, not the merits, stand out conspicuous. The faults are of several kinds, and they differ in degree.

To begin with the most important, the theme has intrinsically neither originality nor bigness, and it is not treated in a way to conceal these defects. The siren city is Naples. Mrs. Morpeth and Rebecca, wife and daughter of a great English banker, are on a visit there. They meet Count Hector di Rosa, who calls himself of the historic family of Maddaloni. Hector is handsome, passionate, vicious, and a fool. Rebecca falls in love with him; he gives a ball in his immense bare palace, and in an instant they are engaged. The banker angrily recalls his wife and daughter. Hector follows them to England, stays at the Morpeth mansion in Pont-street, and ends by infuriating the banker. He elopes with Rebecca. Married to the rascal, and isolated in the immense bare palace, Rebecca suffers a sudden and horrible delusion. She has a child; her husband gets imprisoned for life for a lottery fraud; her mother dies. She returns to England; after much delay is reconciled to her father; journeys again to Italy to see Hector die; and then marries an excellent guardsman, Roland, who from the beginning has adored her. These things, with the machinations of a couple of Neapolitan usurers, Vacca and Tizio, constitute the plot.

It is just the usual story of the young woman who at the bidding of her heart makes a silly mistake, and emerges safe in the end by means of a nicely contrived piece of good fortune. We must have encountered the identical plot dozens of times. Of course Mr. Swift has added Naples. His descriptions of Naples and the Neapolitans are good, the best things in the book, though inclined to the hue of purple. Here is one:

Neapolitans are noctambulists, and love their city as much when it covers itself, like London, with the dark as with a garment. The great red beacon of Vesuvius is the city's torch and pillar of fire by night, and in the starry south there is always a great league of stars. The sea, all the silver and gold of it, pouring round the happy isles, is the city's broad southern gate, and when it is moon-bright or moon-yellow, as in autumn, there is no more amazing scene. Temples of the Saracens, temples of Serapis, old shrines of the sun and pillars of forgotten gods, may still be seen, watching the bay from their ruins, and stretching gaunt arms out of forgotten ages. And although those altars and symbols are now dust, the heart of Naples is still pagan, city of suffering, bride that has endured the caresses and lusts of countless aliens and barbarians, when they came to make their bed with her by the sea. Mysterious mistress who has been in wedlock with North and South, and in harlotry with East and West, putting on gold raiment of the morning, all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies! Her streets indeed may be gay, but her gaiety is full of the earnestness of vital and organic passion. It is a gaiety whose goal is persons as well as things, and which, if unsatisfied, never lets itself go unavenged.

He has in truth made Naples a siren city, but it is not a siren city for his characters. It does not "call" to them like the East. Indeed, most of them seem to regard it as a beautiful place to depart from. Even when Rebecca lives within it, she shuts herself up and will not see it. Curiously, this part of the book is the only part in which is struck the lofty and dignified note of tragic pathos. Elsewhere, either Mr. Swift has curbed himself too tight, or he has failed to find any grand aspect of his theme. The consequence is that, except for the episode of Rebecca's dreadful isolation in the palace, the actual story has an air of being common, undistinguished.

To leave this and come to the next point—that of construction. We are bound to say that Mr. Swift's ideas upon the proper shape of a novel have amazed us. The story begins on page 29, and it duly ends on the last page. Pages 1-28 should have occurred immediately after page 287. We seek in vain for a reason why Mr. Swift should have selected, apparently by chance, a passage from the conclusion of his tale, and placed it at the front of the book as the first chapter. Young authors are indubitably prone to begin their novels in the middle, but this feat of Mr. Swift's surpasses anything in our experience. So far as we can see, it serves no purpose, except to disfigure the form and weaken the interest of the tale. We attribute it to simple thoughtlessness. Further, Mr. Swift has an unmistakable aptitude for slurring over important scenes in his drama. For example, the recital of Hector's fraud is not at all convincing, and the night temptation of Rebecca by the boy Tizio—which should surely have been impressive—seems to us a mere hasty sketch. The return of Lady Middlemass's missing husband is like a joke at the expense of the reader.

Lastly, there is the question of style. The faults of Mr. Swift's style, when at its strongest, are sufficiently clear in the passage already quoted. He is, in addition, guilty of positive sins. He seems not yet to be quite cured of the disease of feeble epigram: "It is one of the ironies of civilisation that certain women become marriageable only after they are married." Could not nearly anyone produce this sort of thing by the gross? In many places the writing is really bad, and even incorrect, as in the following sentences:

It used to amuse him to compare the amount of attention paid to rank, combined with splendour, compared to the amount paid to it when its purse is empty.

It was evident that he was not jealous of Maddaloni's appearance. He did not require to be.

Such sentences, in a novel of the pretensions of Siren City, appear to us to be very regrettable.

Our indictment of Mr. Swift is a fairly comprehensive one. In stating it as fully as limited space permits, we have sought to render a service not only to him, but to English literature. For we think—and we are not alone—that he might belong to English literature. He is a writer; he has the sense of words, withheld from nearly all. His great strength lies in his grasp and presentation of character. With a single exception all the characters in Siren City are admirably drawn: this is the merit of the book—a merit, however, not sufficient quite to redeem it.

The Magic of the Desert: A Romance. By W. Smith-Williams. (Blackwood. 6s.)

As a romance this book is lacking in coherency and unity. On the other hand, its rather scrappy pages are enlivened by a series of capital yarns, told with all the buoyancy of literary adolescence. The author has been around; and surely not one of his lively impressions can have been reserved against a future occasion.

The hero starts for Australia in the train of a colonial governor. On the way through the Canal he sees a mirage, which we mention because apropos of it occurs the phrase which gives its title to the book; for which elsewhere we have sought in vain for any justification other than its impressive appearance: "How wonderful it is . . . that Nature should play such pranks, and that there should be such magic in the Desert!" Of that particular desert, however, no more is seen. We are presently in an Australian colony, and plunged in the social whirlpool of which the Governor's House is the centre. Of the tornado of popular wrath that swept over the club founded to enable "the nicest people to meet in the nicest way"; of the lady whose milliner's confection of precious stuffs, at £5 a yard, found itself parodied in the decoration of a whole room of her rival's house; and of the reputed convict who in his prosperity cherished the popular delusion as a preferable alternative to the divulgence of the fact that he was the innocent origin of the rabbit pest, and of many other like topics, we hear exuberant news. And there is delivered a rather delightful letter from "Aunt Julia" (of whom we would gladly have learned more), expressive of her admiration of a land in which the sun was accustomed to "rise in the middle of the night." When the yarns of the colony are exhausted Mr. Williams, by the heartless device of killing his governor on the eve of matrimony, sets his hero free to volunteer in a South American war, which is the main episode of the assortment. And it is very capitally done. Here, for instance, is some real observation. A torpedo-boat is to make a night attack; her friends watch her from the shore:

Suddenly the thin, clear notes of the bugles pierced the air; the search lights flashed out; the electric arms fell tentatively for a few moments upon the surface of the sea, and soon caught the approaching Nina in their grasp. The stir on the ships, the bosun's whistle, the tramp of the crews hurrying to quarters, the shouts of the men on the look-out, could be plainly heard from the plateau. The Nina was now like a fairy in pantomime advancing down the centre in a flood of light, which, while it did not make her grey hull very conspicuous, appeared to solidify the dense masses of smoke trailing out of her funnels.

That is one of the best bits in the book. The worst (and the funniest) is the description of how the reprobate Dick, who, "he does not know why," determines to become "a monk of St. Francis"—whatever that may be—was discovered lying prone before the altar, while the monks, singing (to organ accompaniment) the psalm De Profundis, approach him one by one, and scourge his "grovelling body" with a thong, in order to make him, after the manner of Dotheboys Hall, happy and contented. The points will probably be lost upon the general public, but for the sake of any reader who is qualified to appreciate its exquisite absurdity we have noted so much.

The Secret of Sorrow. By Cecil Headlam. (Macqueen. 6s.)

"BEING the Confession of a Young Man"—so runs the sub-title, and the array of quotations (there are four before the tale commences) and general parade of a somewhat facile culture prepare us for a slightly insincere and affected confession—the confession of a poseur. Young men of the stamp of George Hesperdale have swaggered through the pages of scores of novels during the last decade. They all go the same gait.

We delighted in seeing and tasting every side of London life. If the mood was on us we would be fashionable, and suffer inordinate boredom in smart drawing-rooms. The mood would change, and we then affected the clothes and manners of a sham Bohemianism. The mood that was past always gave a fresh and pleasing piquancy to the mood that was present. We took all life outside our own as little more than a jest. We cared as little for it, in our hearts, as does the bather for any particular wave which passes under him and causes his nerves to tingle. We were careful of our own feelings, but to the instruments that roused them we paid in comparison but little heed. One night we would dine magnificently at Willis's Rooms or Kettner's, and sup at the Continental, the next, perhaps, at the most insignificant restaurant in Soho. One night we would listen, quivering with emotions of pleasure and pity, to the performance of a Wagnerian opera. The next night we would go home aching with laughter at some screaming French farce.

And this is "seeing life"!

George Hesperdale seduced a peer's daughter. (The seduction scene is gross, after the refined Gallic fashion.) Some time afterwards the pair met again, and Lady Mary forgave him and married him. Then in a year or two the terrible question began to trouble him, Was I the only one? Follows jealousy, with a tragic ending. Indeed, George Hesperdale might have stepped full-grown out of some fiction by René Maizeroy. He was an unredeemed cad, and that is the first thing and the last to be said about him.

As a whole, The Secret of Sorrow lacks both good taste and (what is more important) imagination. The first chapter, however, describing the infancy of the ineffable George, is good and strong.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE PATH OF A STAR. BY MRS. EVERARD COTES.

Another addition to the vivacious works of the lady who is known as Sara Jeanette Duncan. The Adventures of a Memsahib here finds a worthy companion. The author's eye for humours is as keen as ever. (Methuen. 6s.)

FOR THE SAKE OF THE DUCHESS. BY S. WALKEY.

"A Page from the Life of the Vicomte de Championnet." The Vicomte tells the story himself, as so many vicomtes have done of late. "It was a beautiful duel, and all the time I kept wondering where I should pink Silvain first. He panted like a stag, but came upon me with such excellent spirit that I was loth to kill him in a hurry." A spirited, if conventional, romance. (Arrowsmith. 6s.)

CARAMELLA. BY G. P. HAWTREY.

A good-humoured medley of story, satire, and burlesque. Caramella is the island where Tennyson's Lotos Eaters settled, and Mr. Hawtreys's hero has adventures among their descendants—Ajax, Helen, Achilles, and all the rest. "Thank goodness, it is not necessary for me," says the author, "to explain how England is governed. To tell you the honest truth, I have no idea. It rubs along somehow, and one or two foreign nations are said to be jealous of it; but I don't think that anyone knows why." (Arrowsmith. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Knapsack Library.

I ONCE had a dream of editing a little library of books for the scholar gipsy, such books, in such miniature yet comfortable format, as he would care, and be able, to carry with him in a wayfaring knapsack. Nothing has ever been so exquisite as the format of that little unborn library. If you can imagine exactly the kind of book that would go with a meal of bread and honey by the roadside, you will have some idea of the deliciousness of my edition, say, of Spenser's Minor Poems. Well, I took the dream to a publisher, and, as he was a lover of beautiful books as well as a publisher, he thought it a charming little dream, and longed to set paper-makers and printers and binders at work upon its embodiment immediately. There was but one difficulty: "Who, then, would buy?" In his shop he had so many dreams to sell. Prudence counselled that he should add no more for the present. "For," he said, "it is a melancholy fact that your tourist, particularly your cyclist, on whom we should chiefly rely, never reads anything—either at home or abroad. Your bookish pedestrian is extinct, or only survives in numbers too small to carry off even the most limited edition."

Personally, I think the publisher was too pessimistic, though I confess that two or three booksellers I likewise consulted confirmed his view. One of these, something of a philosopher, with an eye for the causes of things, suggested a possible reason. "It comes a good deal," he said, "of some of you literary men, so to say, fouling your own nests. It was Stevenson who began it with his talk of longing for a more manly way of life—as if he could have been happy for five minutes in a world without words. Then Mr. Lang, perhaps the most literary temperament that ever lived, would have you believe that to write a good book is nothing compared with playing a good game of golf. And, of course, all the imitative youngsters follow suit. It is a pose, a fashion, like any other, and it will pass; but, meanwhile, it is not very good for the book trade."

There is a great deal in what the bookseller said. At the moment, books are at considerably more than a threepence in the shilling discount. Only battle-axes are at a premium. "Life is more than literature," like many another good phrase gone wrong, has run amok in certain brains; and we have the strange spectacle of a highly organised civilisation aping the barbarism from which it started.

"Life?" Yes! But it seems rather the taking of life that is meant; and if life is more than literature, how much more is it than mere golf and cricket, or even soldiering and sailing? No one would deny that the "crowded hour of glorious life" is worth all libraries, including even my Knapsack Library, though perhaps it depends a little on what you crowd into that hour; and I fancy that Scott must have meant something more than, say, a good time with a Gatling gun.

Of course, a book is no more a substitute for life than a fiddle is a substitute for a beautiful woman; but a book is more important than a cricket bat, and a fiddle than a sword. Similarly, had I to choose between the lark and Shelley, I would choose the bird with the bigger brain and the many meanings in his voice.

Fortunately, however, no such choice is necessary, and I confess that, as a matter of personal practice, when the lark begins over the down, I shut my Shelley. One poet at a time. (On the other hand, I prefer Izaak Walton, always, to fishing.) I have mentioned Shelley advisedly, as representative of one of the two types into which true knapsack writers are divided. True knapsack literature either fulfils Walter Pater's ideal of literature in approaching as near as possible to music, or it is like the smoking of a pipe. For us to take it away with us, a book must either be a song or a companion. Shelley is not much—or, perhaps, too much—of a companion; but who shall match him at a song? While for a thoroughly seasoned briar, who is there still that can compare with Charles Lamb?

But, before I steal bits from my unwritten preface to "The Knapsack Library," I realise that I have not quite finished the vindication of that library's existence. Says your plain athletic man—there is no such sentimentalist—"With all this glorious nature about you, this blue air, this green grass, these variously coloured cows; this haughty exercise of prize muscles: what do you want with books? Are not these enough? Leave your bookishness in your London chambers, dear bookworm, and come eat with us the simple grass, like Nebuchadnezzar."

"Bookishness!" I never talked of that. I am no bookworm; nor, indeed, any book-feeding insect, unless it be a book-butterfly happy in the sun of literature. Nor did I for a moment mean that one should read while rowing, or cycling; nor would I advise it during football, or cricket—though in the latter game it might, perhaps, be recommended to "stonewallers," as a pleasant way of passing the time—it would be delightful to watch the effect of an Australian cricketer reading Marcus Aurelius at Lord's).

In fact, however it may sound, my Knapsack Library is not necessarily intended for reading at all; for, more than likely, it would be composed of the books one knows by heart. In book-love, as in any other form of love, there is a physical as well as a spiritual. I know, say, pretty well all I care to read of Mr. Swinburne by heart—the reader must excuse my thus bragging a prodigious memory—but was that any reason why I shouldn't carry for the last fortnight in a cruel saddlebag Faustine, and Felise, and Dolores, and fifty more imperishable shapes of music? It is not enough to say a poem you love, you must see, even touch it too. You want it with you in its bodily presence, that at evening you may place it on your dinner-table, as you would set a rose in a glass; or that at morning it may be a lark at your bedside. You pack it among your clothes for lavender. There is, perhaps, hardly a purpose to which a real book may not be put—including reading.

Those who aver that nature—plus boating—is enough holiday, and that books are an effeminate intrusion, talk as though one expected them to take Mommsen in their travelling bags, and it is difficult to persuade them that our sixpenny Ouida (and what a boon is that!) is not one of the Fathers in disguise. They know so little of the secondary, or rather primary, uses of books. All books to them are either guide-books, or lexicons, or—Whyte-Melville. They either teach you something dull, or miserably pass the time in the intervals of grouse-shooting. The only book they can see in a man's hand on a holiday is a Bradshaw—a book one is always glad to lend to a friend. If you took a fiddle with you on your wanderings, or if you ran the terrible risk of taking a friend, they would understand easily enough. Well, they must be kind enough to try and comprehend that the book one takes on a journey is at once a fiddle, a friend, and a flower, and, last of all, a book. There is so little room in a knapsack that you are obliged to be thus epigrammatic in your baggage. Probably, if I were a great singer—a Correze, for I am just deep in love with a sixpenny Moths—I might not take a book with me; for, apart from the psychological fact that great singers never read anything, I should be able to shape for myself my itinerant feelings in the presence of the various well-known phenomena of nature; but, as I am neither a singer, nor even a “word-painter,” I am driven to express myself at second-hand in all the irrelevant splendours of literature. Sometimes, as I coast down a hill, I chant out in a rapture of speed something gloriously different from Mr. Lang’s Theocritus. As I dodge the affrighted occupants of a wagonette, I am probably exclaiming (genuinely, it will be observed, “from memory”): “Men call thee a gipsy, gracious Bombyca, and lean and sunburnt; it is only I that call thee honey-pale. Swart is the violet, and swart the lettered hyacinth. Yet are these flowers chosen the first in garlands.”

Uphill, I have found this verse from a great living poet no less useful (again I quote from memory, but this time, I suspect, more accurately):

You with shelly horns, rams! and promontory goats,
 You whose browsing beards dip in coldest dew!
 Bulls, that walk the pastures in kingly-flashing coats!
 Laurel, ivy, vine, wreathed for feasts not few!
 You that build the shade-roof, and you that court the rays,
 You that leap besprinkling the rock stream-rent:
 He has been our fellow, the morning of our days!
 Us he chose for housemates, and this way went.
 God! of whom music
 And song and blood are pure,
 The day is never darkened
 That had thee here obscure.

This learned metre is not a fortunate choice for hill-riding, as you need almost as much breath for its properly decorative pauses as for mounting the hill. No doubt some sufficiently solemn physiologist would be able to trace the exact correspondence between the metre and the hill. “Tell me the poem you quoted,” he might say, “and I will tell you the length of the hill, the rate you mounted, and the point at which you decided to continue the poem—but not the hill.”

It will be observed, as I have endeavoured to point out, that these merely accidental, but on that account all the more typical, quotations have absolutely nothing to do with the matter in hand. That very fact vouches for their sincerity as quotations. Had they been à propos you might have suspected them. It is their very irrelevance which stamps them as jetting up from the deep rock-springs of human joy; and they may serve as an illustration of the place of books on pilgrimage. I suspect that the inspired reading (or remembering—the same thing!) of books is much the same as the creation of them. Inspiration of any sort is seldom relevant to the moment. Because you love one place with all your heart you must go to another to express it. The adjustment in these matters is something much subtler than external correspondence: it is merely one key of emotion crying out for a companion in the same key. That companion may talk any language, or celebrate something quite different from that which excites the first emotion; all that matters is to strike a similar note of true feeling.

Emotion of any sort does not crave the scientific expression of itself; the expression of the diametrically opposed emotion will serve its turn, if only the expression be spirited or splendid or tender as itself. Words caught in the passionate rhythm of any feeling are such wonderful things. Feeling of any kind seizes upon any instrument to express itself. Death will sometimes play the guitar and love the piano, while war of late has been satisfied with the banjo. In short, one reads or sings a favourite book en voyage, as better educated people hum “My girl is a high-born lady,” or some such wayward lyrical expression of thankfulness for the gift of life. It isn’t “bookishness” at all; it is only another form of concertina.

Joy often expresses itself in the saddest songs—in fact, it revels in them. We don’t write love-letters in the presence of the beloved. Similarly, we don’t necessarily read Richard Jefferies to Nature’s face. Nature would become self-conscious on the instant. She loves to be worshipped, but she hates to be inspected. Books on the country are best read in town—though Nature does not object to a gracefully-made quotation from the poets. They are never too personal.

And, of course, books on a journey do not only provide us with that verbal outlet for feeling which man, being unhappy as an enforced dumb animal, is always craving, but they do often enhance for us the charm of natural things. “Nature,” indeed, is largely the creation of the poets. If the sea had not been already created, it is certain that Mr. Swinburne would have created it; and no one can read Mr. Meredith’s nature-poetry without gaining a deepened intimacy with the earth and a keener zest in his intercourse with her. The beauty of the earth is the result of a long series of discoveries, and the discoveries are always being made. Indeed, the paradoxical position of those who would banish books from our holidays is seen when one realises that nothing is so saturated with literature as what we call “Nature.”

But it is most, perhaps, for their sense of unexactness that companionship that books are well taken on a journey. As the companionship of old friends is but little dependent on talk, and is far more an intercourse of the wireless telegraphy of silence, so with books. When we wish them to talk, they talk, just as long or short a time as we please; but, for the most part, we take them along with us as imaginative presences, symbols of fair natures in whose atmosphere we delight to move.

RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

Mme. Maman.

From the French of Jean Madeleine.

QUITE little, coming out of school, she had begun to look at him, and found him nice. When love began to trouble her, she lifted the edge of her window curtain, and flung him a kiss which never reached him. And she grew up with this thought. He became the Being of her heart, the vibration of her maiden’s dreams. But he knew nothing of it. It is a crime for a young girl who loves to let anything of it be seen. Her only hope lies in being understood. She was not understood. He went away, remained some years abroad, then came back. On his arm leant a perfectly charming young woman. He was married.

In the square where she sometimes came to sit with a book she perceived one afternoon, playing near the bench, two little fellows, with a big Norman nurse. Loving children dearly, she asked of the woman:

“To whom do these pretty little darlings belong?”

The answer caused her delicate blonde profile to bend over the book. They were his.

Next day they came again. She called them.

“You are not afraid of me, I hope? Sit down here, come.”

She lifted one on each knee. Leaning over the warm, curly heads, she examined them tenderly. They let her do so, with the easy familiarity of children. She asked:

“What are your names?”

One of them replied, “Peter.”

She shivered. His name!

It was Peter she kissed first.

Ever afterwards she came every day, and sat upon the bench they played about. Every day at the hour she knows the blue cloaks of the little dears will appear at the railings of the square. They know her now quite well, the pretty lady, and as soon as they arrive they hasten to kiss her. Oh, those kisses of his children, the clasp of those little dimpled arms, in which she seems to find once more something of him! See, here are his very eyes, the dimple at the tip of his chin. Who knows if sometimes some of those caresses showered upon them do not reach him?

She has become their friend, the friend of both babies, their confidante, their "Madam Mamma," as they call her, associating thus their tenderness and their respect. Pictures, sweets—she always brings them some small pleasure. And the little ones never ask themselves who is this pretty unknown lady, who kisses them and spoils them, and whose eyes follow them so wistfully as they race round the damp-eaten garden.

The new foliage brightens the square. A delicate gaiety, this awakening of warm lights, with shuddering still along the branches; stilly impressions, that give coolness to the spring sunshine.

The alleys begin again to echo tiny footsteps, after the long winter, during which the little ones have coughed so much. And once more the wide ribbons of the nurses float and wave under the frail foliage, in slow, multi-coloured procession.

She is seated on her bench once more.

But why do they not come, the little blue cloaks? Why are they alone absent, when all the sparrows of the square are back?

An anguish seizes her. "No, it is not possible." And day after day she watches the iron railing enviously.

What a joy! It is they. Both of them, but their dear little faces are clouded by the deep mourning of their cloaks. They are walking very gravely, as if struck or bewildered still by the quiet of the house suddenly become so sad, the twilight of shuttered windows, the meals quickly despatched in silence, and the going to bed at night with no mamma to come any more and kiss them in their cots. It is most touching, and funny as well, to watch them walking thus, holding each other's hand, stiffened in their mournful astonishment.

She is just rising, but beside them she perceives their father. He! He, also, is all in black, with a wide band of crêpe round his hat.

So she is gone, the young creature he had brought hither from afar, and who leant on his arm!

And there is not the faintest jealousy in her heart of the dead woman.

From the distance they perceive her, but no longer rush to her to be kissed. The presence of their father, their black clothes, in which they feel as if they cannot run, intimidate them, keep them immovable in an unconscious and awkward trouble. They only point her out to their father, who lifts his hat, but does not approach.

And when they have passed she remains on her bench, depressed, struck to the heart by a horrid chill. A sensation of forsakenness, of sudden solitude, seizes hold of her; she feels languid from lassitude, with her arms fallen in that pretty suffering attitude of sorrow-touched womanhood. Then jealousy of the dead grasps her—the dead who has carried away all her children's kisses, probably all of his too. All the heart of his being! A little while ago, in divining the intimate drama, she only saw the heartbroken look of the young mother kissing her babies for the last time. The sympathy of the frail and blonde woman had gone out to that other frail and blonde woman, bent little by little, then carried off in full tenderness, in full happiness. And by the mysterious affinity of a like temperament she had bestowed all her pity on the vanished —her heart had followed the coffin shrouded in roses and white lilies.

Now all that has gone. She only thinks of the rival, of her who had robbed her of her love, to whom the children she would were hers belong: of the other, the hated one. And her wish to be kind remains impotent before this unhealthy impression that troubles her serenity.

Little by little, as the days follow, the children come back to her. It was like a fresh start. At first the timidity of the early days, then the gathering familiarity, and then the joy of free and complete friendship. You would have said that the tragedy, still not understood, a thing of outward details only, had so taken hold of their poor, fragile little lives that they were as if suddenly congealed in the great cold of the house, and that poor little lives needed to be born again in the fresh opening of their minds and their hearts.

He accompanied the children each day to the square, but he never approached her. He lifted his black hat from the distance with a dejected gesture.

One afternoon she saw him come into the garden. He was alone. He seemed to be looking about for something, and, perceiving her, he approached the bench on which she was seated. She feigned to continue her reading, but her fingers trembled upon the open page.

"Mademoiselle—"

He was in front of her, all in black—the rigid black of recent mourning. It was the first time she heard his clear, grave voice.

"I ask you to pardon, Mademoiselle, what I am going to say. It is hardly usual, but you are above convention. My children have so often spoken to me of you, they love you so." His voice lowered. "You know there is no mother now at home. Will you replace her who has gone?"

He held out his hand.

She closed her eyes, benumbed by a strange bliss that she had never dreamed of. And she remained surprised that this immensity of joy which seemed to come to her from a long way off, from an unknown land, that filled all space, and flowing through her veins, stirred her being deliciously, should find place in her heart—in such a little heart as hers—where it melted into an exquisite unconsciousness.

She placed her hand in his.

"Thanks," she said, "you are kind. What you have said has made me very happy!"

Again she closed her eyes.

"But if you will allow me, I will remain simply your friend, and for those little darlings I shall be 'Madam Mamma.' It will be better so."

For suddenly, in the midst of her great joy, she remembered the evil feeling of the other day, her jealousy of the dead. She told herself that if she lived in that atmosphere which had been the other's home, still impregnated with her soft perfume, every minute in contact with objects to which something of the dead still clung, in the continual touch of their two souls, her jealousy would be free to seize her again; there would be ceaseless, unwonted moments of struggle with that impalpable existence with which she would ever be in touch, and that he, too, would never be entirely hers, for no power, no tenderness, could prevent the other from having been.

It was not possible to turn backward and find the past intact. Life could not be begun afresh.

Then, as the evening was falling, she left the square and went away slowly, walking like a widow, so weary.

Things Seen.

The Modern Christian.

As we were moving from the corner an old newspaper seller had stepped on the footboard and made as if to mount the 'bus with his papers. But the conductor had stopped him and dismissed him to the kerb again. No sooner were we started than a woman who sat close to the door began to upbraid the conductor for this. She kept up an alternation of blame and chaff, for while rating the man she wished to keep his favour. Impossible to convey the manner in which a woman of this type talks!—she was one of those to whom marriage gives a formidable assurance, and I was easily aware that she would offer advice on any occasion, and take the side of the angels with nod and wink and virtuous compression of mouth. "What I say is, live and let live. Pore old man! And him with grey hair too. You'll be grey-haired yourself some day, young man. Yes, Live and let live, that's the motto. Perhaps someone on the top wanted a paper. Where's the harm? Pore old man! Eh, what is he?—a sheeny? A sheeny! That's different. A sheeny, was he? Oh, well, I must say I'd never encourage a Jew"; and she leaned back, quiescent, with folded arms and correct lips.

The Battle of the Books.

THE air of the library was filled with the soothing influence of Sunday afternoon, and I, who had taken the most comfortable arm-chair with the intention of reading, had fallen asleep and wandered into a dreamy allegory. I thought I was on a hill in the land of literature, and in my memory were the incidents of a climb on the road stretching down behind me. I had started with all the enthusiasm of a traveller in the morning of his journey—"I will press onward," I had said to myself, "and soon the whole world of learning will be mine." But ever as I went I had turned aside from the straight road that led to knowledge, and strayed into the neighbouring fields to pluck flowers that had withered in an hour and fallen from my hand. And at last I was at the summit, and lo! I had taken only the first step. Before me, and on either hand, lay a vast country bounded by hills higher than mine, each with a prospect wider than that upon which I was gazing. The task had grown larger, and would continue to grow larger as I advanced with it. And, having learned that it was impossible of accomplishment, I was glad that I had gone astray to pluck the flowers.

Suddenly the door of the library opened and I was awake. Small footsteps told me that some one—just such another traveller as I had been at the beginning of my journey—had come for a book. On one side of me was a shelf full of the stirring deeds of warriors—books with gay covers bursting to tell all the things that boys best love to hear. On the other side was a shelf of "Sunday books." They were dry stuff, these Sunday books. They bristled with didactic dialogues between hideously omniscient parents and children astoundingly ignorant and most astoundingly desirous of learning. The footsteps indicated hesitation. A new battle of the books was raging. The Sunday books, strong, no doubt, in the atmospheric influence of Sunday, warred against the week-day records of deadly peril. For a minute or two the fight continued, and then the victory was won. The footsteps gravitated to the shelf of warriors.

The traveller had turned aside to pluck a flower.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. REMY DE GOURMONT has made an interesting and most erudite study of the Esthétique de la Langue Française. He is at war against the disfigurement of the pure and elegant French tongue by the introduction of base foreign words. His supreme concern is the physical beauty of words, and he tells us that "the signification of a word and the intelligence of a woman add nothing to, nor take anything from, the purity of their form." He objects to the Latinised termination ation substituted for the normal French aison.

Out of two thousand words purely Latin in sion and tion, there are not twenty that can be used in a page of beautiful prose literature: there are even less which a poet could dare to insert in a line of verse . . . if we cannot treat certain questions without their help, we can discard the greater number in essential art, which is the ideal painting of life.

Technical terms of any kind M. de Gourmont haughtily rejects, as having no place whatever in literature. These are fit for the barbarian and pedant. Why should not the French say longue-vue instead of telescope? And he opposes bécane to bicycle, as more agreeable and sonorous. He makes merry over the delirium græcum of modern commercial language. A seller of photographic apparatus pompously calls his shop photo-emporium, and notifies that he sells vitagraphes and kromskopes; another calls the oils he sells engines- auto- and moto-naphtha. Such is the lamentable result of the vulgarising of instruction without taste. "It is correct to speak French as little as possible, and to have the air in pronouncing barbarous syllables of confessing a secret." Here and there M. de Gourmont gives lists of pedantic words with their equivalents in picturesque old French words, and it needs no persuasion to convince us that beauty and charm, as well as sense, all lie on the side of the old French. Who, for example, would consent to say adéphagie when he might say fringale? And surely mésurage is a far prettier word than the more learned mensuration. There is a visible beauty in languages," he adds, "which is diminished by introduction into the verbal city of foreign figures of dissonant voices." M. Anatole France has defended the right to misspell in every form, with all its fantasies; but while M. de Gourmont thinks that many unnecessary double letters might with advantage be suppressed, his point of view on spelling is opposed to M. France's. If there were no fixed and unalterable laws of spelling, personal whims and eccentricities would speedily bring about a dreadful state of anarchy in books. His horror of German and English, with their present ravages upon Gallic soil, is so intense that he even welcomes Latin as a safeguard against them.

Balzac's letters to Mme. Hanska, Lettres à l'Etrangère, is a monster tome. These letters are by no means light reading. They suggest a kind of feverish activity and a state of constant worry. In one he writes: "Must I then cross all Europe to go and show you a visage aged but a heart ever deplorably young, which still quickens about everything, an ill-written line, an address, a perfume, as if I were only thirty-six?" The note of melancholy is profound, and never absent; age and disease are terrors that haunt him constantly. An indolent person like myself admits that such a sentence as this is enough to fell imagination or ride it like a nightmare:

Walter Scott wrote two novels a year, and was said to find happiness in his work; he astonished England. This year I have produced, first, Le Père Goriot; secondly, Le Lys dans la Vallée; thirdly, Les Mémoires d'une jeune Mariée; fourthly, César Birotteau. I have sent three numbers of the Études de Mœurs to Mme. Béchet, and three numbers of the Études Philosophiques to Werdet. Finally, I shall have finished Séraphite. But also, shall I be alive or in my right mind next year? I doubt it. Sometimes it seems as if my brain were inflamed. I shall die on the breach of intelligence.

Brain inflamed! Why, it inflames the reader's brain alone to think of so much intellectual labour massed into a single year. Prodigious is a very small word indeed to qualify the feat. Recall the first four books, colossal triumphs of an astounding career, and tell yourself these creations were almost simultaneous.

Here is an odd sketch of George Sand :

Last year George Sand did not leave Paris. She lives in the Rue Pigalle, 16, at the bottom of a garden, over the coachhouse and stables of a house on the street. She has a dining-room where the furniture is of sculptured oak-wood. Her little sitting-room is coffee-coloured, and the room she receives in is full of superb Chinese vases, full of flowers. There is always a flower-stand full of flowers. The furniture is green; there is a side-board full of curiosities, pictures by Delacroix, her portrait by Calamatta. The piano is magnificent, straight, square. Chopin is always there. She smokes nothing but cigarettes [this Balzac underlines, "cigarettes" being in small capitals]; she does not get up before four o'clock: at four Chopin has finished giving his lessons. You go up to her rooms by the stairs called the millier, stiff and straight. Her bedroom is brown; her bed two mattresses on the ground, Turkish fashion. She has such pretty, pretty little hands—a child's.

I hardly know what M. Hugues le Roux meant to make of his novel Jeunes Amours. As memories of adolescence it is not particularly original. M. le Roux treats his heroine in the spirit of respectful admiration, and seems to expect the same from the reader. The lady is over thirty, and falls in love with her son's comrade, a boy of fifteen, who reciprocates her passion. The author perceives nothing ghastly in the situation.

H. L.

A Library for Children.

A NUMBER of other suggestions as to the best dozen books for children reach us this week from parents and observers. The word children, it should be explained, means in this connexion boys and girls below the age of twelve.

Mr. Arthur Rickett sends us the following list, and remarks :

Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales.
Grimm's Fairy Tales.
Arabian Nights.
Eastern Tales.
Wonder Book. Hawthorne.
Christmas Carol. Dickens.
Little Lame Prince. Mrs. Craik.
Cross Purposes, and Princess and the Goblin. George Macdonald.
Alice in Wonderland.
Through the Looking-Glass.
Book of Nonsense. Lear.

NOTE.—Up to twelve, surely, it is little use to appeal to children except through the imagination, and it was with this idea that my selection practically consists of fairy tales in one form or another. A great mistake, it seems to me, is made by including in these lists books that are written by clever writers about children, but which require grown-up people to appreciate them. They remind me of Mr. Bultitude's middle-aged reflections while in the youthful body of his son. How is it that George Macdonald's delightful fantasies are so largely neglected? When I was a child George Macdonald gave me more delight than any writer, except, perhaps, Hans Andersen, and the storyteller of the Arabian Nights.

Mr. Rickett states the case soundly. His list, according to his guiding principle, is good. Perhaps Kingsley's Water Babies might supplant with advantage the Eastern Tales. Hawthorne's Tanglewood Tales and Kingsley's Heroes seem also likely to be favourites with the kind of reader here suggested: they might take the place of Dickens and Edward Lear. Mr. Kipling's Jungle Books will, we trust, if they cannot be coaxed into the first twelve, be at any rate thirteen and fourteen on the list.

Mr. Alick D. Brash :

Little Lord Fauntleroy. Mrs. Burnett.
Black Beauty. Mrs. Sewell.
Eric. Dean Farrar.
The Water Babies. Kingsley.
Us. Mrs. Molesworth.
Her Benny. Hocking.
Grimm's Fairy Tales.
Alice in Wonderland.
Story of a Short Life. Mrs. Ewing.
Sweetheart Travellers. Crockett.
Probable Sons. Amy le Feuvres.
Child's Garden of Verse. Stevenson.

This list is more miscellaneous. Children are, of course, catholic minded, but it is a far cry from Lewis Carroll to Probable Sons. We are doubtful about Stevenson's Child's Garden, but the fact that the majority of lists include it is, perhaps, against us. The author's original appeal, however, was to the adult; and most children, we fancy, would in their hearts find far more pleasure in the domestic tragedies of Jane and Ann Taylor. Parents, however, like to have Stevenson in the house.

Mrs. Sappho Scott :

I send you my own favourite books at the age of twelve, and those that I have ready for my little daughter. These are mine :

Shakespeare's Poems.
Scott's Poems.
Swiss Family Robinson.
Queechy.
The Little Duke. C. M. Younge.
Grimm's Goblins.
Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales.
Little Women and Good Wives.
Feats on the Fjord.
Gulliver's Travels.
The Days of Bruce.
The Boy's Own Paper.

These are Marjorie's :

Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare.
The Water Babies.
Ab. Stanley Waterloo.
The Jungle Books.
Alice in Wonderland.
Hans Andersen.
Treasure Island.
Grimm's Goblins.
Little Women and Good Wives.
Robinson Crusoe.
Heroes. Kingsley.
The Boy's Own Paper.

Mrs. Scott's record is personal and historical, and we cannot, therefore, criticise it. But exactly how Shakespeare's poems please a child it is difficult to understand. Scott, of course, is a natural choice. Treasure Island, for a girl of under twelve, is a curious inclusion, but the remainder of the list for Marjorie is interesting and well chosen.

New Tennysonianana.

A WRITER in the Nottingham Guardian has been privileged to give a very interesting Tennyson document to the world. In 1868 Mr. Edward Campbell Tainsh forwarded a copy of his Study of the Works of Alfred Tennyson, and it was in acknowledging this that Tennyson entered on a series of interesting explanations of various obscure points in his poems. In giving these to the world the correspondent writes as follows :

"When 'Enoch Arden' appeared in 1864 a cleavage took place in the ranks of Tennyson's admirers. Mr.

Tainsh, representing one section, contended that we find here 'a sort of mechanical supernaturalism such as is found in Pagan art, instead of that spiritual supernaturalism which otherwise pervades his writings, and which seems the most natural thing of all, God being postulated.' On the other hand, many discerned in the new element now introduced for the first time by Tennyson in 'Enoch Arden' the apprehension and expression of certain profound psychical truths—and this is not merely as Mr. Tainsh would have us believe, the enhanced admiration of those 'whose standards of judgment had been formed by lower masters.' Tennyson's letter to Mr. Tainsh touches upon passages in 'Enoch Arden' which, in the critic's opinion, 'give to the thoughtful student the impression of unreality, and therefore a weakness in the structure of the story.' The following lines are cited as an instance of 'mechanical supernaturalism':

Though faintly, merrily, far and far away,
He heard the pealing of his parish bells.

Tennyson's comment is this: 'A friend of mine told me that he had heard his own parish bells in the midst of an Eastern desert—not knowing at the time it was Sunday. He accounted for it to me by stating that there was a ringing in his ears which his old associations moulded unconsciously into the sound he heard. There is nothing really supernatural, mechanically or otherwise, in E. A.'s hearing bells; though the author most probably did intend the passage to tell upon the reader mystically.' The poet had another intention, surely. Earlier in the narrative we read of Enoch and Annie:

So these were wed, and merrily rang the bells,
And merrily rang the years, seven happy years,
Seven happy years of health and competence,
And mutual love and honourable toil.

Again, when sad at heart Annie consents to marry Philip, the poet, with full intent, alludes to the ringing out of the merry bells. Apart from whether or not a mechanical supernaturalism is involved, the repetition of the phrase to call up Enoch's experiences, when alone and far away, is eminently effective. In reply to another criticism on the same poem, Tennyson says in this letter: 'The costly funeral is all poor Annie could do for him after he was gone—entirely introduced for her sake, and, in my opinion, quite necessary to the perfection of the poem.' In later editions of his 'Study,' it may be mentioned, by the way, Mr. Tainsh adheres in the main to his original objection, occasionally substituting the word preternatural, however, for supernatural.

Some students of the late Poet Laureate may recall that Mr. Tainsh examines, verse by verse and canto by canto, 'In Memoriam,' aiming to explain 'certain obscurities,' and the like. In this connexion Tennyson's letter is of peculiar interest. For instance, the final two lines in Canto 36 run:

And those wild eyes that watch the wave
In roarings round the coral reef.

In 1868 the commentator gave it as his opinion that by 'those wild eyes' was meant a sailor. Tennyson replies that what he intended is the 'Pacific islanders'—wild having a sense of 'barbarism' in it, I should not have ventured so vague a periphrase for 'sailors.'

Again, in the last line of Canto 87 allusion is made to 'the bar of Michael Angelo,' signifying, as Mr. Tainsh read it, the eyebrows of the great Italian master, which 'met in the middle and formed nearly a straight line above his eyes.' Tennyson's meaning is stronger, more profound. The words signify 'that broad bar of frontal bone over the eyes for which he [Michael Angelo] was remarkable.' One could have wished that, despite his dislike of 'writing even so little about my own composition,' Tennyson had indicated a few more 'of those little errors that I have no time to explain.'

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE Goethe celebrations in Germany seem to be of rather ancient origin, for they commemorate the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of his birth. That sounds an event sufficiently remote; but there are many ties of his with England which make the author of Wilhelm Meister almost a modern. He was alive when Disraeli read that book and admired it to the point of gently imitating it in Contarini Fleming. Goethe returned the compliment and read Disraeli; also Bulwer. With Scott and Byron he was, of course, very familiar, and Carlyle. But what brings Goethe down to date most of all is the friendship that he had with Thackeray. It was the friendship of an old author and a young man who had not published—one cannot say had not composed—a line; for Thackeray, when a youth, in the last of his teens, was "finishing" in Weimar, and made friends with young Mrs. Goethe, and was by her admitted to the sanctum which Napoleon himself (who read Werther seven times) was proud to enter.

BARON GRANT, the butt of much misfortune and much ridicule at various times of his life, ended his days in repose at a quiet place in Sussex, and leaves behind him an enduring memory. One hopes he sometimes came to Leicester-square late in his life and rejoiced in it as the most frequented of public grounds set apart by private or public munificence for the rest and recreation of the poor. On the site of another of his former possessions he could hardly, however, look without a pang. Had he kept his own great pleasure garden at Kensington for a few years longer he might again have been a millionaire. It is now covered with streets of mansions and flats that yield a rental equal to a king's revenue. For the house itself at Kensington Mr. James Knowles may be permitted a regret. It was the magnum opus of that architectural career which he abandoned for magazine editing and owning. Few architects in our day have had so lavish a client as was this bearer of an Italian barony; and artists had good reason to regret the failure of a princely purchaser who wrote for one picture-dealer cheques of £100,000 at a time.

MR. J. E. C. BODLEY, who was once Sir Charles Dilke's private secretary, but has been in the delightful banishment of Biarritz for now nearly a decade of years, is pushing on with his monumental book on France, the next volume of which is to deal with the Church, and with the general state of religion among the French. The workroom at the Château de Bellefontaine contains its dossiers marked with such labels as "The Concordat," "Anti-Semitism"—to which last one may imagine that rather heavy additions have now each day to be made. It is a strange fate that has converted Mr. Bodley—Messrs. Macmillan may claim to have been the missionaries—into the historian of the Roman Church in France; for he very nearly became its chronicler in modern England, and this by the will of Cardinal Manning. As secretary of the Housing of the Poor Commission Mr. Bodley won the warm friendship of the then aged Archbishop of Westminster, who had long interviews with him, and of whom the story is told, that when one night the talk at the Archbishop's House, Westminster, was prolonged till nearly eleven, the Cardinal's devoted valet apologetically intruded, and confided to Mr. Bodley as he left: "You see, sir, I have got to get the Cardinal to bed, and he doesn't jump in like you and me—he has his little readings to do." Undoubtedly the Cardinal intended to nominate Mr. Bodley as the writer of, at any rate, his political biography. But the Cardinal died—unexpectedly to himself, whatever were the fears of those about him—and the literary legacy was never made. Among the relics at the Château de Bellefontaine, however, is the malachite crucifix, familiar to those intimates of Cardinal Manning who were admitted to his inner sanctum.

LORD WILTON is leaving Houghton Hall, the famous old Norfolk home of the Walpoles, and is renting instead Drayton Manor, the home of the Peels, near Tamworth. Both houses in their day have been famous in the annals of art-collecting, and both houses illustrate the difficulty with which works of art remain in one family, however historic and wealthy it may have been. Horace Walpole, in his Anecdotes, makes many allusions to the pictures at Houghton, as if they were there for ever, and regrets the almost giving away of Vandycks for which there was no room in the Hall. It is all one now, whether they came or they went; and the larger part of the Peel collection, despite the publicity given in the Law Courts lately to certain heirlooms in the possession of the present baronet, was long ago dispersed, to the great gain of the Dutch section of the National Gallery.

LADY EDEN is known on the boulevards as the unambitious heroine of a Whistler portrait, a Whistler lawsuit, and a Whistler brochure. In the North of England her name is very differently associated. For her Cottage Hospital at Bishop Auckland promises to be a centre of perpetual benefactions where they are most of all needed—among a population of workers in the mine and at the furnace. The house-party invited to Windlestone, Sir William Eden's place, near at hand, to assist at the Hospital opening, will not, of course, include Mr. Whistler, who is absent in Paris; but Lord Rosebery will be there; and so will Lord and Lady Londonderry, at whose festivities for the coming of age of Lord Castlereagh the Edens have been assisting.

In placing Abergeldie Mains at the disposal of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, the Queen has proved her appreciation of the companionship recently given her by her soldier son at Osborne. Of old, Abergeldie was lent to the Empress Eugénie on several occasions; and only rapidly increasing infirmity has cut short the intercourse of the ex-Empress and the Queen, between whom was established a singularly close confidence. It seems as if the ties between the Queen and the Duke of Connaught were now to be drawn closer and closer; and the bond is one to which other exigencies must yield, even those of the Duke of Connaught's distinguished military career.

MR. WHITEING must by now have become the most clerically quoted of novelists. At the Catholic Conference in Stockport this week Cardinal Vaughan delivered an address; but the daily newspaper report—even the Daily News report—left out, as Mr. Whiteing might very well complain, the most interesting passages—those in which the Cardinal quoted from No. 5, John Street, accompanying his extracts with enthusiastic praises of the whole novel.

Correspondence.

The "High History."

SIR,—Mr. Nutt's "critical attitude" is again sadly out of the perpendicular. He asserts that the Welsh Graal represents "an earlier form of the romance" than the High History. I prove to demonstration that it does nothing of the kind, and he replies that he is satisfied with having brought me to recognise the true facts of the case. Again, he asserts that my opinion as to the originality of the High History is opposed to that of all my predecessors without exception. I quote his own words disproving the assertion, and he answers that on other matters, as I myself had pointed out, I disagree with Mr. Potvin. His quibbles as to my "substituting the genuine form Alain for the bogus form Julien," and so forth, are not things to answer. What else would he have had me do in a translation intended for the general reader?

In simple fact, his present difficulties arise out of the "incorrect critical attitude" he has chosen to adopt in claiming to speak as an "expert." It is a dangerous claim at best, one better left to others to discover than for the claimant himself to announce. Others besides myself may have smiled at Mr. Nutt's assumption of the character; but what I wish now to point out is that the assumption really heavily handicaps himself. The real student and critic, whose one object is to ascertain and state the truth, is thankful to accept and acknowledge correction.

So long as Mr. Nutt maintains his pretension to speak as an "expert" on matters of which his "expert" knowledge is at most not greater than that of the editor and the translator of the High History, I leave him to the society of his fellow experts and professors in Le monde ou l'on s'ennuie. I decline to follow him there.—I am, &c.,

SEBASTIAN EVANS.

[This Correspondence must now cease.—ED. ACADEMY.]

Dr. "Anna" Kingsford.

SIR,—With reference to your "Memoirs of the Moment" in your issue of August 19, will you allow me to say that Mrs. Kingsford's baptismal name was "Annie," not "Anna"? She was my sister.—I am, &c.,

J. BONUS (Major-General).

The Cedars, Strawberry Hill:
August 21, 1899.

Books Received.

Week ending Thursday, August 31.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- Jowett (Rev. J. H.), Meditations for Quiet Moments (Religious Tract Society) 1/8
Norfolk (Henry, Duke of) and Gatty (C. T.), Arundel Hymns. Part II. (Boosey) 1/0

POETRY, ETC.

- Langbridge (F.), Little Tapers (Religious Tract Society) 1/0
Derry (E.), Rhymes of Road, Rail, and River (Arrowsmith) 1/0
Woodward (A. T.), Songs from a Studio (Robertson & Co.)
Thielton (A. E.), Some Textual Notes on the Tragedie of Antony and Cleopatra, with Other Shakespearean Memoranda (C. S. Palmer) 2/6
Bell (H. J. S.), A Modern Hermit (Juta & Co.)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- Statham (Rev. S. P. H.), History of the Castle, Town, and Port of Dover (Longmans) 10/6
Plummer (M. W.), Contemporary Spain (Truslove, Hanson, & Comba)

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- Poster (W.), The Embassy of Sir Thomas Roe to the Court of the Great Mogul, 1615-1619 (Hakluyt Society)
Fletcher (J. S.), A Picturesque History of Yorkshire (Dent) net 1/0

EDUCATIONAL.

- Countts (W.), Publi Vergili Maronis Aenidos. Libri I.-III. (White) 3/6
Le François (E. B.), Les Deux Bossus, from "Les Légendes de France" (Blackie) 1/0
Ely (G. H.), Songs of Béranger (Blackie) 1/0
Abbot (A.) and Key (A.), Progressive Lessons in Science (Blackie) 3/6
Riddell (J.), Practical Plane and Solid Geometry (Oliver & Boyd)
Marshall (A.), Elements of Economics of Industry (Macmillan) 3/6
Thomson (C.), Adventures of Beowulf (Marshall) net 1/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

- White (A.), The Modern Jew (Heinemann) 7/6
Padelford (F. M.), Old English Musical Terms (Hunstein, Bonn)
Ferris (G. H.), History of the Peace Conference at the Hague (International Arbitration Association) net 1/6
Sheldon (C. M.), For Christ and the Church (Bowden)

NEW EDITIONS.

- Grand (S.), The Tenor and The Boy (taken from "The Heavenly Twins") (Heinemann)
Dennis (J.), Chiswick Shakespeare: Macbeth: Othello (Bell)
Hugo (V.), The Satyr. Translated by C. J. Bowen (Rice)
Dean (T.), Reveries of a Widow (Routledge) 1/6
Dickens (C.), David Copperfield. 3 vols. (Dent) net 3/6

** New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

TO BE SOLD, by TENDER, the old-established PUBLISHING BUSINESS of A. D. INNES & COMPANY, Limited, of 31 and 32, Bedford Street, Strand, London, W.C., including Leasehold Interest, Goodwill, Copyrights, Trade Fixtures, Furniture, Plant, Machinery and Stock-in-Trade.

The Copyrights include a large number of Works by many noted and popular Authors of the day, a list and full particulars of which may be seen at the undermentioned office of The Law Investment and Insurance Corporation, Limited.

Tenders to be sent in addressed to the SECRETARY of THE LAW INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE CORPORATION, Limited, 9, Serle Street, Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C., before the 14th SEPTEMBER, 1899.

Particulars and Conditions of Sale and Forms of Tender may be obtained gratis of the above-named Secretary, and of the Vendors' Solicitors, Messrs. SHARPE, PARKER, FRITCHARDS & BARRAM, 12, New Court, Carvy Street, London, W.C.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

IMPORTANT—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL & RAITON, Limited, high-class
Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet
Street, E.C.4. have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines
for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built
Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 32, or 64-page
Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence
New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 6512. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BOOKS WANTED, at Prices affixed.
—"Snob and Gownsmen," 1829-30, £5.—"The Germ,"
1850, £2.—"Old Paris," 1878, £2.—"The Lover's Tale," 1833, £3.
—"Borrow's" "Wild Wales," 1862, £1.—"Moore's" "Alpine in 1864," £2.
—"Pittman's" "Comic Tales," 1841, £5.—"Queen Mab," 1813, £7.
—"Alice in Wonderland," 1868, £2.—"Pauline: a Fragment,"
1833, £20. 2,000 Books Wanted at fancy prices. List free.
EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.,
68a, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS., intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing
in foreign languages.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on
DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums
on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish. Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALIAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

The Old Series of THE ACADEMY, which
ended on October 1st, completed a volume.
The Index can be obtained gratis on application to the Publisher.

LIBRARY of a COUNTRY GENTLEMAN,
COMPRISING
BLACK LETTER VOLUMES, CURIOS, BOOKS OF TRAVEL, RARE EDITIONS, LEGAL, HISTORICAL,
STATISTICAL, THEOLOGICAL, and POETICAL WORKS;
LOCAL and FAMILY HISTORIES;
SPORT, AGRICULTURE, &c., &c.

TO BE SOLD AT HAWICK, N.B.,
On TUESDAY, 26th SEPT., 1899.

Catalogue on application to Mr. R. F. ATKINSON,
Auctioneer, Hawick, N.B.; or Messrs. Geo. & Jas. OLIVER,
Solicitors, there.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

THE YORKSHIRE COLLEGE, LEEDS.

The 26th Session of the Department of Science, Technology, and Arts will begin on OCTOBER 2nd, and the 63rd Session of the School of Medicine on OCTOBER 2nd, 1899.

The Classes prepare for the following Professions: Chemistry,
Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, and Sanitary Engineering,
Mining, Textile Industries, Dyestuffs, Art, Leather Manufacture,
Agriculture, School Teaching, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.
University Degrees are also conferred in the Faculties of Arts,
Science, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.

Lyddon Hall has been established for Students' residence.
Prospectus of any of the above may be had from the Registrar.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES,
ABERYSTWYTH.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the post of
ASSISTANT LECTURER in the Department of LOGIC and PHILOSOPHY. Applications, together with testimonials, must be forwarded, on or before September 9th, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.

August, 1899.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and
COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

Four Scholarships and One Exhibition, worth £150, £75, £75,
£50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 27th, 1899—viz., One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Physics and Chemistry. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Biology and Physiology.
Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London Medical School.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One
Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty years of age (if of sufficient merit) in Physics, Chemistry, Animal Biology, and Vegetable Biology.

The Jefferson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin,
Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—
Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of
June, 1899.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.

For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and
COLLEGE.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS.

Systematic Courses of Lectures and Laboratory Work in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc.
Examinations of the University of London will commence on October 2nd and continue to July, 1900. Attendance on this Class counts as part of the five years' curriculum.

Fees for the whole Course, £21, or £18 18s. to Students of the Hospital; or single subjects may be taken.

There is a Special Class for the January Examination.
For further particulars apply to the WARDEN of the College,
St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C.

A Handbook forwarded on application.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL—AN EXAMINA-
TION FOR FILLING UP about THIRTY VACANCIES
on the Foundation will be held on the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 11th SEPTEMBER NEXT.

For information apply to the BURSAR of St. Paul's School,
West Kensington.

MOUNT VIEW, HAMPSTEAD.
HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

The NEXT TERM will begin on THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21.

Reference is kindly allowed to Mrs. BENSON, Colonel LITTLE, Professor JOHN RUSKIN, Miss MADELINE SHAW LEFAYRE, and
others.

For Prospectus apply to Miss HELEN E. BAYNES.

THE MARIA GREY TRAINING COL-
LEGE, Salisbury Road, Broudesbury, London, N.W.

A FULL COURSE of TRAINING in preparation for the CAMBRIDGE TEACHERS' CERTIFICATE in the Theory and Practice of Teaching is offered to Ladies who desire to become Teachers.

Kindergarten Teachers are also prepared for the Higher Certificate of the National Froebel Union. Junior Students are prepared for the Cambridge Higher Local Examinations.

Scholarships offered in all Divisions.

COLLEGE YEAR BEGINS SEPTEMBER 13th, 1899.

The Winkworth Hall of Residence for Twenty-one Students
will be opened opposite the College in September, 1899.

Address Miss ALICE WOODS, Principal, The Maria Grey
Training College, Salisbury Road, Broudesbury, N.W.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED),

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of
all the BEST
ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books
at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS
per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUB-
SCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis
and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in
TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY,
SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SUR-
PLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

80-84, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria

Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

SELECTIONS FROM

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S
PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.....full of thought and knowledge and power."

British Weekly.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Ser- mons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence,
and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

"Forcible, clear, gracious, and suggestive."

Presbyterian.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other
Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. MacLaren's works."—Christian World Pupil.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other
Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."

Methodist Times.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."

New York Observer.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."

North British Daily Mail.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other
Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d., post free.

ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS
of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited
and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN.
Containing over 500 beautiful and suggestive illustrations. With a Textual Index and Alphabetical List of Subjects.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD.,
21 & 22, Farnival St., Holborn, W.C.

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The SEPTEMBER CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND BOOKS and NEW RE-MAINERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & Son, Library Department, 188, Strand, London, W.C.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each offered for
"Life of John Mytton," 1835—Collins' "Wild Red Deer,"
1862—"Old English Squire," 1821—"Progress of a Midshipman," 1821—"Shirley Deer Parks," 1867—"Tom Raw the Griffin," 1828
—"Trials for Adultery," 7 vols., 1781—"Warwickshire Hunt," 1837—Freer's "Last Decade," 2 vols., 1863—"Desperate
Remedies," 3 vols., 1871—"Pair of Blue Eyes," 3 vols., 1873—
"Lorna Doone," 3 vols., 1889. Rare Books supplied. State
Wants.—BAKERS GREAT BOOKSHOP, BIRMINGHAM.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish. Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL & KAILTON, Limited, high-class
Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet
Street, E.C.4, have specially built Rotary and other fast Machines
for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built
Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page
Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence
New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

ESTABLISHED 1861.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on
DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums
on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months,
and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS
of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE
(Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C.4, LONDON;
And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

THE YORKSHIRE COLLEGE, LEEDS.

The 26th Session of the Department of Science, Technology, and Arts will begin on OCTOBER 3rd, and the 69th Session of the School of Medicine on OCTOBER 2nd, 1899.

The Classes prepare for the following Professions: Chemistry,
Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, and Sanitary Engineering,
Mining, Textile Industries, Dyeing, Art, Leather Manufacture,
Agriculture, School Teaching, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.

University Degrees are also conferred in the Faculties of Arts,
Science, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.

Lyddon Hall has been established for Students' residence.

Prospectus of any of the above may be had from the REGISTRAR.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and
COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

Four Scholarships and One Exhibition, worth £150, £75, £75,
£50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 27th, 1899—viz., One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Physics and Chemistry. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Biology and Physiology.
Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London Medical School.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One
Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty years of age (if of sufficient merit) in Physics, Chemistry, Animal Biology, and Vegetable Biology.

The Jefferson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin,
Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—
Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of
June, 1899.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.

For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and
COLLEGE.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS.

Systematic Courses of Lectures and Laboratory Work in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc.
Examinations of the University of London will commence on OCTOBER 2nd and continue to July, 1900. Attendance on this Class counts as part of the five years' curriculum.

Fees for the whole Course, £21, or £18 18s. to Students of the Hospital; or single subjects may be taken.

There is a Special Class for the January Examination.

For further particulars apply to the WARDEN of the College,
St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C.

A Handbook forwarded on application.

UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW.

CHAIR OF HISTORY.

The University Court of the University of Glasgow will at an early date proceed to APPOINT a PROFESSOR to occupy the above Chair in this University, recently rendered vacant.

The Professor will be required to enter on his duties as from 1st October next, from which date the appointment will take effect.

The normal salary of the Chair is £900, subject to § VIII. (2) and (3) of Ordinance No. 25. The appointment is made ad vitam aut culpam, and carries with it the right to a pension on conditions prescribed by Ordinance.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, who will furnish any further information desired, twenty copies of his application and twenty copies of any testimonials he may desire to submit, on or before 18th September next.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,

Secretary of the Glasgow University Court.

1, West Regent Street, Glasgow.

MOUNT VIEW, HAMPSTEAD.
HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

The NEXT TERM will begin on THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21.

Reference is kindly allowed to Mrs. BENSON, Colonel LITTLE, Professor JOHN RUSKIN, Miss MADELINE SHAW LEFAYRE, and
others.

For Prospectus apply to Miss HELEN E. BAYNEZ.

THE MARIA GREY TRAINING COL-LEGE, Salisbury Road, Brompton, London N.W.

A FULL COURSE of TRAINING in preparation for the
CAMBRIDGE TEACHERS' CERTIFICATE in the Theory
and Practice of Teaching is offered to Ladies who desire to become Teachers.

Kindergarten Teachers are also prepared for the Higher Certificate of the National Froebel Union. Junior Students are prepared for the Cambridge Higher Local Examinations.

Scholarships offered in all Divisions.

COLLEGE YEAR BEGINS SEPTEMBER 13th, 1899.

The Winkworth Hall of Residence for Twenty-one Students
will be opened opposite the College in September, 1899.

Address Miss ALICE WOODS, Principal, The Maria Grey
Training College, Salisbury Road Brompton, N.W.

THE SOLICITORS' TYPE-WRITING CO.,
68a, Lincoln's Inn Fields, type AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently and quickly. Special rates for contracts. Typing in foreign languages.

SELECTIONS FROM

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S
PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.
"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.....full of thought and knowledge and power."

British Weekly.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence,
and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

Forcible, clear, gracious, and suggestive.

Presbyterian.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other

Sermons.
"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power
which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. MacLaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other

Sermons.
"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."

Methodist Times.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."

New York Observer.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of

Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."

North British Daily Mail.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other

Sermons.
"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d., post free.

ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS
of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited
and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN.
Containing over 500 beautiful and suggestive illustrations. With a Textual Index and Alphabetical List of Subjects.

Just Published. Price 4d., or 3s. per dozen.

RELIGIOUS EQUALITY. A Lecture by
Dr. MACLAREN.

Just Published. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Ruyton.

The Freeman says: "Preachers and teachers will find in them many helpful suggestions."

The Glasgow Herald says: "They will probably interest and instruct many who would an ordinary sermon flee."

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards,
1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Spiritual Principle of Nonconformity.
By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.

"Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence."—Manchester Guardian.
"Nothing could be more timely than these learned and suggestive lectures."—Christian World.

Twenty-first Thousand. Limp cloth, price 6d., post free.

OUR PRINCIPLES: a Congregationalist
Church Manual. By G. B. JOHNSON.

Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CONDUCT of PUBLIC MEETINGS.
By J. HUNT COOKE. A Clear and Concise
Manual for all Public Speakers.

Just Published. Post 8vo, cloth, with Portraits, price 6s., post free.

WELSHMEN in ENGLISH PULPITS; or,

Sermons by English Congregational Ministers from Wales. With Introduction by Rev.
CHARLES A. BERRY, D.D. Edited by Rev.
DANIEL WATERS.

The Expository Times says: "And here we have thirty excellent portraits of prominent and eloquent Congregational preachers, with their thirty sermons, and the price is but a few shillings."

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD.,
21 & 22, Farnival St., Holborn, W.C.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE.

- The Highest Andes. By E. A. FITZGERALD. With 46 Illustrations, 14 of which are Photographs, and a Large Map. Royal 8vo, 30s. net.
Also a Small Edition on Handmade Paper, limited to 50 Copies, 4to, £5 5s.
- Through Asia. By SVEN HEDIN. With 300 Illustrations from Photographs and Sketches by the Author, and 3 Maps. Second and Cheaper Edition in 16 Fortnightly Parts at 1s. each net; or in 2 vols., royal 8vo, 20s. net.
- The Caroline Islands. By F. W. CHRISTIAN. With many Illustrations and Maps. Large crown 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- A New Ride to Khiva. By R. L. JEFFERSON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

POETRY.

- English Lyrics. Selected and Arranged by W. E. HENLEY. Second and Cheaper Edition. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d.; leather, 3s. 6d. net.
- Lyra Frivola. By A. D. GODLEY, M.A., Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. Pott 8vo, 7s. 6d.

The Works of Shakespeare.

- General Editor—EDWARD DOWDEN, Litt.D.
Messrs. METHUEN have in preparation an Edition of Shakespeare in Single Plays. Each Play will be Edited with a full Introduction, Textual Notes, and a Commentary at the foot of the page.

THE FIRST VOLUME WILL BE—

- Hamlet. Edited by EDWARD DOWDEN. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. Arranged and Edited, with Notes, by SIDNEY COLVIN. Demy 8vo, 2 vols., 22s. net.
- The Life and Letters of Sir John Everett Millais. President of the Royal Academy. By his Son, J. G. MILLAIS. With nearly 300 Illustrations, of which 9 are in Photographs. 2 vols., royal 8vo, 32s. net.
An Edition limited to 350 Copies will also be printed. This will contain 22 of Millais's great paintings reproduced in Photographs, with a case containing an extra set of these Photographs pulled on India paper. The price of this Edition will be £4 4s. net.
- The Expansion of Egypt. A Political and Historical Survey. By A. SILVA WHITE. With 4 Special Maps. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.
- The Vicar of Monkenstow: a Biography. By E. BARING-GOULD, M.A. A New and Revised Edition. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [Ready.]
- A Constitutional and Political History of Rome. By T. M. TAYLOR, M.A. Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, Senior Chancellor's Medalist for Classics, Porson University Scholar, &c., &c. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Ready.]
- A History of the Church of Cyprus. By JOHN HACKETT, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- Bishop Latimer. By A. J. CARLYLE, M.A. [LEADERS OF RELIGION SERIES.] Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

- Christian Mysticism. The Bampton Lectures for 1899. By W. R. INGE, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Hertford College, Oxford. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- An Introduction to the Books of the Bible. By W. H. BENNETT, M.A., and W. F. ADENEY, M.A. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.
- St. Paul, the Master-BUILDER. By WALTER LOCK, D.D., Warden of Keble College. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [Next week.]

The Churchman's Bible.

- General Editor—J. H. BURN, B.D., Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Aberdeen.

Messrs. METHUEN propose to issue a series of expositions upon most of the books of the Bible. The volumes will be practical and devotional rather than critical in their purpose, and the text of the Authorised Version will be explained in sections or paragraphs, which will correspond as far as possible with the divisions of the Church Lectionary. The volumes will be produced in a very handy and tasteful form, and may be obtained in cloth or leather bindings.

THE FIRST VOLUMES WILL BE—

- The Epistle of St. Paul to the Galatians. Explained by A. W. ROBINSON, B.D., Vicar of All Hallows, Barking. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

- Ecclesiastes. Explained by W. A. STEWART, M.A. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

The Churchman's Library.

Edited by J. H. BURN, B.D.

- The English Prayer-Book: its Literary Workmanship. By J. DOWDEN, D.D., Lord Bishop of Edinburgh. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

The Library of Devotion.

Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUMES.

- A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life. By WILLIAM LAW. Edited, with an Introduction, by C. BIGG, D.D., late Student of Christ Church.
- The Temple. By GEORGE HERBERT. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by E. C. S. GIBSON, D.D., Vicar of Leeds. [Ready.]

SCIENCE.

- The Scientific Study of Scenery. By J. E. MARK, Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- A Handbook of Nursing. By M. N. OXFORD, of Guy's Hospital. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

CLASSICAL.

- The Nicomachean Ethics of Aristotle. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by JOHN BURNET, M.A., Professor of Greek at St. Andrews. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.
- The Captivi of Plautus. Edited, with an Introduction, Textual Notes, and a Commentary, by W. M. LINDSAY, Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
- Zachariah of Mitylene. Translated into English by F. J. HAMILTON, D.D., and E. W. BROOKS. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [BYKANTINE TEXTS.]

SPORT.

The Library of Sport.

- The Art and Practice of Hawking. By E. B. MITCHELL. Illustrated by G. E. Lodge, and others. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.
- Thoughts on Hunting. By PETER BECKFORD. Edited by J. OTHO PAGET, and illustrated by G. H. Jalland. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- The Book of the West. By S. BARING-GOULD. With numerous Illustrations. 2 vols. Vol. I., DEVON. Vol. II., CORNWALL. Crown 8vo, 6s. each. [Ready.]
- Pons Asinorum; or, a Guide to Bridge. By A. HULME BEAMAN. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. [Ready.]

The Little Guides.

Pott 8vo, cloth, 3s.; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUME.

- Shakespeare's Country. By B. C. WINDLE, F.R.S., M.A. Illustrated by E. H. New. [Ready.]

METHUEN'S STANDARD LIBRARY.

- The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By EDWARD GIBBON. Edited by J. B. BURY, LL.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin. In 7 vols. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 6s. 6d. each. Crown 8vo, 6s. each. Vol. VII.
- The Diary of Thomas Milwood. Edited by G. C. CRUMP, M.A. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- La Commedia di Dante Alighieri. Edited by PAGET TOYNBEE, M.A. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ILLUSTRATED AND GIFT BOOKS.

- The Lively City of Ligg. By GELETT BURGESS. With many Illustrations by the Author. Small 4to, 3s. 6d.
- The Phil May Album. 4to, 7s. 6d. net.
- Ulysses; or, De Rougemont of Troy. Described and Depicted by A. H. MILNE. Small 4to, 3s. 6d.
- The Crock of Gold. Fairy Stories told by S. BARING-GOULD, and illustrated by F. D. Bedford. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- Tommy Smith's Animals. By EDMUND SELOUS. Illustrated by G. W. Ord. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d.
- A Birthday Book. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL.

- Practical Physics. By H. STROUD, D.Sc., M.A., Professor of Physics in the Durham College of Science, Newcastle-on-Tyne. Fully Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [HANDBOOKS OF TECHNOLOGY.]
- General Elementary Science. By J. T. DUNN, D.Sc., and V. A. MUNDRELL. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [METHUEN'S SCIENCE PRIMERS.]
- The Metric System. By LEON DELBOIS. Crown 8vo, 2s.
- A South African Arithmetic. By HENRY HILL, B.A., Assistant Master at Worcester School, Cape Colony. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
- A Key to Stoddman's Easy Latin Exercises. By C. G. BOTTING, M.A. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.
- New Testament Greek. A Course for Beginners. By G. RODWELL, B.A. With Preface by WALTER LOCK, D.D., Warden of Keble College. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [SCHOOL EXAMINATION SERIES.]
- Examination Papers in English History. By J. TAIT WARDLAW, B.A., King's College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.
- A Greek Anthology. Selected by E. C. MARCIANT, M.A., Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, and Assistant Master at St. Paul's School. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [Ready.]
- Cicero de Officiis. Translated by G. B. GARDINER, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. [CLASSICAL TRANSLATIONS.]

The Novels of Charles Dickens.

Crown 8vo. Each Volume, cloth, 3s.; leather, 4s. net.
With Introductions by GEORGE GISSING, and Notes by F. G. KITTON.

Messrs. METHUEN have in preparation an Edition of those Novels which have now passed out of Copyright. Mr. George Gissing, whose critical study of Dickens is both sympathetic and lucid, has written an Introduction to each of the books, and a very attractive feature of this edition will be the illustrations of the old houses, inns, and buildings which Dickens described, and which have now in many instances disappeared under the touch of modern civilisation. Another valuable feature will be a series of topographical and general notes to each book by Mr. F. G. Kitton. The books will be produced with the greatest care as to printing, paper, and binding.

THE FIRST VOLUMES WILL BE—

- The Pickwick Papers. With Illustrations by E. H. New. 2 vols.
- Nicholas Nickleby. With Illustrations by R. J. Williams. 2 vols.
- Black House. With Illustrations by Beatrice Atwell. 2 vols.

EDUCATIONAL—(continued).

The Little Library.

Pott 8vo, each volume, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.
Messrs. METHUEN intend to produce a series of small books under the above title, containing some of the famous books in English and other literatures, in the domains of fiction, poetry, and belles lettres. The series will also contain several volumes of selections in prose and verse. The books will be edited with the most sympathetic and scholarly care. Each one will contain an Introduction which will give (1) a short biography of the author; (2) a critical estimate of the book. Where they are necessary, short notes will be added at the foot of the page. The Little Library will ultimately contain complete sets of the novels of W. M. Thackeray, Jane Austen, the sisters Brontë, Mrs. Gaskell, and others. It will also contain the best work of many other novelists whose names are household words. Each book will have a portrait or frontispiece in photogravure, and the volumes will be produced with great care in a style uniform with that of "The Library of Devotion."

THE FIRST VOLUMES WILL BE—

- A Little Book of English Lyrics. With Notes.
- Pride and Prejudice. By JANE AUSTEN. With an Introduction and Notes by E. V. LUCAS. 2 vols.
- Vanity Fair. By W. M. THACKERAY. With an Introduction by S. GWYNN. 3 vols.
- Pendennis. By W. M. THACKERAY. With an Introduction by S. GWYNN. 3 vols.
- Eothen. By A. W. KINGSLAKE. With an Introduction and Notes.
- Cranford. By Mrs. GASKELL. With an Introduction and Notes by E. V. LUCAS.
- The Inferno of Dante. Translated by H. F. GARY. With an Introduction and Notes by PAGET TOYNBEE.
- John Halifax, Gentleman. By Mrs. CRAIK. With an Introduction by ANNIE MATHESON. 2 vols.
- The Early Poems of Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Edited by J. C. COLLINS, M.A.
- The Princess. By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by ELIZABETH WORDSWORTH.
- Maud, and other Poems. By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by ELIZABETH WORDSWORTH.
- In Memoriam. By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by H. C. BEECHING, M.A.
- A Little Book of Scottish Lyrics. Arranged and Edited by T. F. HENDERSON.

FICTION.

- The King's Mirror. By ANTHONY HOPE. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Next week.]
- The Crown of Life. By GEORGE GISSING, Author of "Demos," "The Town Traveller," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- The Strong Arm. By ROBERT BLER. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- To London Town. By ARTHUR MORRISON, Author of "Tales of Mean Streets," "A Child of the Jago," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]
- One Hour and the Next. By the DUCHESS OF SUTHERLAND. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- Siren City. By BENJAMIN SWIFT, Author of "Nancy Noon." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]
- Vengeance is Mine. By ANDREW BALFOUR, Author of "By Stroke of Sword." Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- Pabo the Priest. By S. BARING-GOULD, Author of "Mehalah," &c. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- Giles Ingilby. By W. E. NORRIS. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- The Path of a Star. By SARA JEANETTE DUNCAN, Author of "A Voyage of Consolation." Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]
- The Human Boy. By EDEN PHILPOTTS, Author of "Children of the Mist." With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- The Human Interest. By VIOLET HUNT, Author of "A Hard Woman," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- An Englishman. By MARY L. FENDERED. Crown 8vo, 6s.
- A Gentleman Player. By R. N. STEPHENS, Author of "An Enemy to the King." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]
- Daniel Whyte. By A. J. DAWSON, Author of "Bismillah." Crown 8vo, 6s.

A New Edition of the Novels of Marie Corelli.

This New Edition is in a more convenient form than the Library Edition, and is issued in a new and specially designed cover.

In crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.; leather, 6s. net.

- A Romance of Two Worlds.
- Vendotta.
- Tholma.
- Ardath: the Story of a Dead Self.
- The Soul of Lilith.
- Wormwood.
- Sarabba: a Dream of the World's Tragedy.
- The Sorrows of Satan.

METHUEN & CO., Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1427. Established 1869.

9 September, 1899.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE new way of publishing books through the agency of newspapers seems to be by no means spent. We understand that an important announcement will be made this month by a leading London paper which has not hitherto entered into this class of business. Of the nature of its particular publishing scheme we are not at liberty to speak; but it is breaking no confidence to say that it is not the Hundred Worst Novels.

WE recommend to the notice of the Library Association, now meeting at Manchester, the following letter from an over-conscientious parent to a local librarian, illustrating one of the many difficulties which beset the routine of that official:

I return you a book which my boy has had from your library. He joined it without telling me and I have forbid him borrowing. I am a believer in the second coming of our Lord—see 2 Peter iii. 10-12—and think it likely that He will do so shortly. How could I meet Him with a clear conscience whilst I had borrowed books in my house? May I respectfully urge upon you to read 1 Thessalonians v. 2, and flee from the wrath to come, for, sir, your business is sinful. "Better be a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord, than dwell in the tents of wickedness" (Psalm lxxxiv. 10).

ONCE again it is our duty to give the names of the six new books most in favour in America during the past month. The six favourite old books would make a more interesting list, but unfortunately there is no opportunity for acquiring data. Possibly, indeed, old books are not read at all. These are the six (David Harum, into whose merits we propose shortly to look searchingly, of course coming first):

David Harum. E. N. Westcott.
Richard Carvel. W. Churchill.
When Knighthood was in Flower. "E. Caskoden."
The Market Place. H. Frederic.
No. 5, John Street. R. Whiteing.
The Fowler. B. Harraden.

Only two of the books, it will be noticed, are of English make.

APROPOS the popularity of Richard Carvel, the second book in the list above, we are informed that its position there is largely due to advertising. Upon this novel alone, we are told, as much as eighteen thousand dollars was expended in advertisements.

A WRITER in the current Journal of Education records an interesting, but polyglot, utterance which Browning once made to him concerning the poem, "The Lost Leader": "I know it is rough and rugged; but ich kann nicht anders; my genius, such as it is, is prime-sautier—if I hesitate I'm lost."

THE gigantic illustrated Sunday supplements which of late years have been issued by the leading American papers could not be expected to stay. Their cost must be enormous.

We are not surprised, therefore, to hear that the New York Times has decided to abandon its Sunday supplement. In future the Sunday issue will be of the same size and character as the week-day issues.

IN addition to the Life of Mrs. Lynn Linton, on which Mr. G. Somes Layard is now engaged, other new Linton books may be expected. One of these is a little volume, entitled Reminiscences of Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, and Others, with a preface by Miss Beatrice Harraden. Another is Mrs. Linton's last novel, which was withheld from serial publication, and which contains her ripest views on social questions.

A NEW collection of studies of seventeenth century life, by Prof. Dowden, will be published shortly, under the title Puritan and Anglican.

THE arrangements for the new de luxe edition of Mark Twain can now be made public. The edition will consist in all of twenty-two volumes, all, save the last—to be called Literary Essays—illustrated. The title of the edition is the "Author's Edition." Prof. Brander Matthews will write a biographical criticism, and there will also be a special general preface from Mark Twain's own pen. Everything, indeed, is satisfactory about the new edition, except that only six hundred persons in this country will be able to possess it. Reasons for the justification of such limits can always be found, but a sense of absurdity remains none the less. All future books of Mark Twain's are to be added to the edition, if the subscribers care to have them: a concession which promoters of Library Editions always ought to make, but do not. The English publishers are Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

IN the Literary Essays volume will be found, we imagine, the trenchant article on the Jew which Mark Twain contributes to the September Harper's. Therein he answers a number of questions which a Jewish correspondent had asked him concerning Jews and his feelings towards them. The last question ran thus: "What has become [among the persecutors of Jews] of the Golden Rule?" Mark's answer is characteristically direct: "It exists, it continues to sparkle, and is well taken care of. It is Exhibit A in the Church's assets, and we pull it out every Sunday and give it an airing. But you are not permitted to try to smuggle it into this discussion, where it is irrelevant and would not feel at home. It is strictly religious furniture, like an acolyte, or a contribution plate, or any of those things. It has never been intruded into business; and Jewish persecution is not a religious passion, it is a business passion."

WE regret to announce the death of Prof. Peter Peterson, of Bombay. He was an occasional contributor to the ACADEMY in past years. Prof. Peterson was a candidate for the Boden Chair of Sanskrit at Oxford, and had some reason to be hopeful of success. In Bombay he was well known, and interested himself, during his twenty-six years of life there, in all questions affecting the welfare of India.

THE discussion between Mr. Stephen Gwynn and Mr. Andrew Lang concerning the merits of Miss Austen may be said to be over, Mr. Lang's Longman's notes being finally answered by Mr. Gwynn in the Pall Mall Gazette. The sum of it is that Mr. Lang likes Miss Austen and her work more than Mr. Gwynn does; and there's an end as far as that incomparable storyteller is concerned. But a new cause of war has been set up by Mr. Lang in the person of Charlotte Brontë, and we may therefore expect, as Mr. Gwynn suggests, more battle on this ground. Mr. Lang has written this judgment: "Miss Brontë had neither wit nor humour. Passions in tatters, parts to tear a cat in, were in her line." So many Brontëolators are there, that surely much disputation must ensue.

CONCERNING Charlotte Brontë, M.B.-E. (initials which we may take to indicate Miss Betham-Edwards, herself a novelist) has been writing to the Westminster Gazette. She has been in Brussels, exploring the Brontë district there, as described in Villette, and particularly the house. M.B.-E. writes: "Externally, the wide, two-storied house, with its double row of six windows on either side of the door, is unchanged. The interior has been much altered within the last three years, the premises having been purchased by the town and turned into a municipal school. But much familiar to Charlotte Brontë readers is still there—the covered alley, as in her days, covered with greenery, the pear-trees, the préau, or inner recreation ground, the little rooms for pianoforte practice; above all, the mistress's parlour in which Lucy Snowe's fate was decided."

SUBSEQUENTLY Miss Betham-Edwards visited friends of the Hegers, the originals of Monsieur Paul and Madame Beck, who died not so very long ago. "Never, surely," she remarks, "was human being more unkindly treated by novelist than poor Madame Heger by her artiled pupil. As I studied the calm, intelligent, dignified face of the old Belgian lady [in the portrait] before me I could well believe all that my hostess said of her. 'Madame Heger was in every respect a remarkable woman, and it may be said that the greater number of well-educated elderly ladies now living in Brussels were her pupils. She was the very soul of order, and her establishment was of the first class. M. Heger also possessed unusual accomplishments. His powers as an elocutionist were remarkable; no one in his time was said to surpass him in the art of reading aloud. The pair were devoted to each other, and their three daughters, two of whom are now living, were most carefully brought up. Charlotte Brontë's pictures of the school life were doubtless due to the distastefulness of her foreign and Catholic surroundings. She was evidently very unhappy at Brussels.' M. Heger, the Paul of Lucy Snowe, as represented by a bronze bust, was a man of great mental power and decision of character. The pair, I was told, of late years never alluded to Villette or its author, and any vexation that had arisen therefrom was clean forgotten."

SIR WILLIAM CROOKES's presidential address, delivered before the British Association at Bristol last year, has just been published in an enlarged form by Mr. Murray, in time for this year's meeting at Dover. Sir William Crookes gives it the title The Wheat Problem, and he has incorporated with it two articles by American experts. Mr. Murray issues the work in flaming orange paper covers.

It was stated in the ACADEMY a little while ago that croquet had inspired but little verse, and mention was made only of that of Mr. Cholmondeley Pennell and Frederick Locker-Lampson. Mr. Ashby-Sterry, writing in the Graphic, adds to these names. Shirley Brooks and others treated the game lyrically in Punch, he says; Mortimer Collins, in his Echoes from the Clubs; Mr. Savile Clarke somewhere else, and many singers in London Society. Also Mr. Ashby-Sterry himself has rhymed on the subject.

For croquet, itself, I have no admiration—
But who, in his senses, could ever refuse
To hammer his toes in a quiet flirtation
With one of those daintily booted croqueuses?

he once sang. Still, we cannot hold our contributor much to blame for not remembering or knowing of all the wealth of fugitive croquet verse.

SOME little while ago a writer in the ACADEMY inquired into the popularity of Mr. Silas K. Hocking's stories, and Mr. Hocking replied, objecting to one or two points. In last week's Daily News Weekly is printed an interview with Mr. Hocking with reference to the same article, wherein the novelist expressed his case rather more fully. We quote a few passages:

"What do you think of the suggestion that Nonconformist readers have no appreciation of art—I mean literary art?"

"I think there's nothing in it. Why should there be any difference between Church people and Nonconformists in artistic appreciation? My firm opinion is, that taking the same social grade, there is as much appreciation of art, whether literary art or any other kind, in Nonconformist circles as in Church circles."

"It was said that your books are not stocked in West-End book-shops."

"I can't help that. It is very likely true. I have never sought to interest Belgravia. After all, Belgravia is only a small part of London, and London is only a pin-point in the world. While my books travel widely in India, South Africa, Canada, and Australia, Belgravia needs not to be worried about. It may be that Belgravia desires something more piquant than I have set myself to supply. I have heard that it is largely interested in books that deal with playing tennis with the seventh commandment."

"Well, there is something like that in real life, is there not?"

"No doubt there is. Yet I am all against the realists. I have never sought to be a realist. Not that it is so very difficult. But your realist is apt to bring the ugly into the foreground, and I think writers of fiction can be better employed than in the assiduous depicting of sewers. Artists—the great ones, at least—concern themselves with the lines of beauty."

"This, of course, puts you at a great advantage in one way, inasmuch as it commends you to the parent as a safe purveyor of pabulum for the young person?"

"Certainly it does, and there is no reproach in it that I can see. I have never kicked over the traces in this direction. But before now I have hurt the narrow theologians; yet that does not grieve me greatly. . . . The great thing is to keep young, so as to sympathise with the youthful generation that is always springing up with a keen hunger for fiction."

Incidentally, Mr. Hocking remarked that it was he who gave Dr. Conan Doyle the idea of removing Sherlock Holmes by dropping him down a crevasse.

THE lady who is known as Sarah Grand has just performed upon her novel, The Heavenly Twins, an interesting operation. She has cut from it the narrative of Israfil and Diabolus, and has issued it through Mr. Heinemann as a distinct book, under the title The Temor and the Boy. According to a publisher's note this course is the result of a number of requests from readers.

THE Right Honourable James Bryce, M.P., whose portrait we give this week, would possess, if he appended the initials of all his distinctions, a name extending from the Athenæum Club to the Savile. In addition to P.C.,

MR. JAMES BRYCE.

From the Copyright Series of Portraits of Contributors to the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S., and M.P., Mr. Bryce is honorary LL.D. of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Michigan; D.C.L. and Litt.D. of others, and corresponding member of various societies. He and Mr. Lecky are, perhaps, the two most learned men in Parliament. Mr. Bryce's experiences in preparing his last important book, Impressions of South Africa, must make the present situation peculiarly interesting to him.

COLERIDGE, as everyone knows, in his early days of authorship, added to an always precarious income by contributing political and social squibs and poems to the Morning Post. Best known among these contributions is "The Devil's Walk," which appeared a hundred years ago last Wednesday, a fact which the present editor of the Morning Post recalls with pride. The whole poem, which is very long, was the joint work of Coleridge and Southey, but Southey's share is not brilliant. Coleridge's best three stanzas are still as pointed as ever:

He passed a cottage with a double coach-house,
A cottage of gentility,
And he grinn'd at the sight, for his favourite vice
Is pride, that apes humility.

He saw a pig right rapidly
Adown the river float,
The pig swam well, but every stroke
Was cutting his own throat.

Old Nicholas grinn'd, and swish'd his tail
For joy and admiration—
And he thought of his daughter, Victory,
And her darling babe, Taxation.

POEMS addressed to dogs hardly ever fail to make their appeal to a reader who has loved dogs himself. They are not very numerous, but we never remember to have read a really bad example. Either bad poets do not address their dogs, or the Muses are particularly kind when they do. Another and very pleasing tribute of this nature was printed in last week's Spectator, which is certainly the right place for it. We quote the last two stanzas:

Sure, somewhere o'er the Stygian strait
"Panurge" and "Bito," "Tramp" and "Mike,"
In couchant conclave watch the gate,
Till comes the last successive tyke,
Acknowledged with the countersign:
"Your master was a friend of mine."

In dreams I see them spring to greet,
With rapture more than tail can tell,
Their master of the silent feet
Who whistles o'er the asphodel,
And thro' the dim Elysian bounds
Leads all his cry of little hounds.

The author of these verses is "John Halsham," who wrote a very agreeable book of country meditations entitled Idlehurst.

MISS J. H. FINDLATER, who ought to know, being herself a gifted Scotch novelist, discusses the "Scot of Fiction" in the September Atlantic Monthly. Incidentally she draws a picture of him as he must appear to the foreign readers of the Thrums and Drumtochty books:

This phenomenal and fictitious Scot would, of course, begin life as a highly intelligent herd boy: then he must go to the village school so that that awful stock figure, "the Dominie," may "walk on." (I have counted eight Dominies in Scotch fiction, of a curious similarity.) From the village school the herd, having now fallen in love with the laird's young daughter, migrates to London in search of a wider sphere for his energies. His extraordinary career begins: the wool-sack looms ahead: he maintains meantime all the frugal habits learned at home, always grudging a sixpence when possible, but habitually posts the greater part of his weekly earnings to his saintly mother. Struggles and parsimony are crowned with success, and unrelayed by his achievements the Scot of fiction returns to his native village to marry the laird's daughter, to rescue the faithful Dominie from despair and drink, and to fold his aged parents to his beating heart. Throughout his career the Scot of fiction keeps up church attendance in Babylon the great, and enters upon long discussions of predestination and election in season and out of season.

Fortunately there is no quarter of the globe in which a living Scot cannot be studied to correct this picture. Miss Findlater ends by showing to what extent Scotland is now apportioned among the novelists. "I think," she says, "but I may be mistaken, that the part extending between Peebles and Galloway does not belong to anyone in especial." Doubtless it soon will.

THE decision of an American Sunday-school to exclude Mr. Kipling's works from the library on account of their alleged profanity has suggested to a writer in the World a possible step farther in the same direction. He writes:

I went into the library a Sunday book to get;
The Superintendent up and said, "Here's Kipling's works, a set

Where all's put in that's right for little boys to read about,
While all that isn't proper is most carefully left out.

For "Tommy" 's such a vulgar word, and impolite to say,

So we call him "Mr. Atkins" in a patronising way;
And we've made you an edition where all the red is grey,

A book that's fit for Sunday-schools and for the Sabbath-day.

And so forth.

Bibliographical.

WITH all due respect to the admitted cleverness of Mr. E. J. Sullivan, I cannot say I read with gratification the announcement that he has prepared, and will by and by publish, a number of pictorial illustrations of Tennyson's poems—those poems, presumably, which are out of copyright. We all remember the volume of 1857, in which such acknowledged masters as Rossetti and Millais joined in the loving interpretation of the poet's fancies. We all remember, also, Doré's drawings for an edition of the Idylls. Mr. Locker-Lampson has told us (see the Life) that Tennyson was "not entirely satisfied" with Doré's efforts, and I suspect that feeling was general at the time and is unaltered now. The fact is, a poet can be illustrated (in the true sense of the term) only by a kindred spirit with equal power in the kindred art. Skill is not enough; there must be the sympathetic imagination. For myself, I cannot conceive anyone less Tennysonian than Doré, and we have yet to see how Tennysonian Mr. E. J. Sullivan will prove himself.

Dr. Walter Lock's St. Paul, the Master-Builder, is "to popularise," we are told, "the recent additions to our knowledge of St. Paul as a missionary, a statesman, and an ethical teacher." It was only the other day that we had from Dr. G. H. Gilbert The Student's Life of St. Paul. Late last year there came to us from America The Life and Letters of Paul the Apostle; while almost simultaneously there appeared in London Paul, the Man, the Missionary, and the Teacher. In the spring of 1898 we had had Dr. Liddon's Sermons on Some Words of St. Paul. In 1895 the Rev. E. J. Hardy made us walk with him In the Footprints of St. Paul; and in the previous year we had an English version of the Abbé Fouard's St. Paul and his Missions. The books on the Apostle threaten to grow into a library by themselves. And, meanwhile, the Life and Letters, by Conybeare (of which there was a new edition in 1892), and the Life and Works, by Farrar (reprinted last year), may be said to hold the field in their respective ways.

I commented last week upon the tendency of publishers to play "follow-my-leader." Since then I have read the advertisement of a promised series of books on the Master Musicians (as I think they are to be called). In this connexion I should like to ask whether the volumes of the Great Musicians series, published by Messrs. Low, Marston & Co., between 1881 and 1890, are, or are not, out of print? The Great Musicians were from the pens of such well-known writers as Sir Julius Benedict, Dr. Hueffer (the Editor), Mr. W. S. Rockstro, Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Sutherland Edwards, Mrs. Julian Marshall, and so forth; and really I do not think more competent authorities are available at this moment. Let us hope that the new series of monographs will be either cheaper than, or superior to, its predecessors on the same subject.

It is good news for those who are genuinely interested in Dickens that Mr. F. G. Kitton is to be associated with Mr. George Gissing in the production of the "Rochester" edition of Dickens's works. Mr. Kitton knows those works, and everything associated with them, more thoroughly, perhaps, than any man living, though he would perhaps yield to Mr. Percy Fitzgerald in his grasp of one of them—Pickwick. Mr. Kitton has shown his capacity in this regard by his little book on The Works of Charles Dickens (in which the history of each is recited), and also by his work on Dickens and his Illustrators. It is pleasant to gather that such pictorial illustrations as the "Rochester" edition will contain will deal, not with the creations of the novelist, but with the actual localities and buildings described or mentioned in the novels.

It is stated that Mr. G. W. Appleton, author of the story called The Co-Respondent, has written a new novel called A Fair Sinner. I should not be surprised if that turned out to be a reproduction, in the form of prose fiction, of a play by Mr. Appleton, also called A Fair Sinner, which was performed in London and the Provinces so long ago as 1885. The Co-Respondent, I believe, has also been seen in dramatic shape on the theatrical "boards." Nowadays the public can often "pay its money and take its choice" in the matter of a story; it can have it as a narrative, or as a drama, or as both, just as it prefers. And usually it is obliging enough to take the story in both forms. So much the better for the author.

Some blunders are immortal; once made, they cannot, apparently, be unmade. Not so very long ago there appeared a cheap little biography of Fletcher of Saltoun, which, one would have thought, would have drawn attention anew to the fact that it was to "a very wise man" of his acquaintance that he attributed the saying about a nation's ballads and a nation's laws. Nevertheless, here we have Mr. John Hollingshead, who has some pretensions to be regarded as a literary man as well as a theatrical manager, attributing the saying once more to "Old Fletcher of Saltoun" in the widely-read columns of the Daily Telegraph. To be sure, there is the theory that Fletcher foisted an utterance of his own upon an entirely mythical "wise man"; but there is positively no ground for the suggestion.

Apropos to a reference made by me last week to Mr. G. Gregory Smith, I find that that gentleman published in 1890 a book on The Days of James IV., and in 1898 an annotated edition of The Spectator. With reference, again, to a cheap reprint of Roade's Christie Johnstone, I have to record that that story and Peg Woffington were published together in 1897, price sixpence; in 1893, price one shilling; and in 1895, price two shillings. Christie Johnstone can be obtained separately at half-a-crown.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Dante and his Readers.

An Introduction to the Study of Dante. By J. A. Symonds.
Fourth Edition. (A. & C. Black. 7s. 6d.)

It is not superfluous to notice even the fourth edition of a book which has been the pioneer and first-cause of much present-day literature on Dante. It is impossible to estimate fully the influence which it has exercised, or the number of converts it must have brought into the fold of Dante. Its excellence is shown by its vitality; nor is it likely to be superseded. The thorough Dante student, indeed, will require something more elaborate, but as an introduction it is as sufficing for the neophyte as it is attractive in its style and handling.

"This mask of Dante's face was given to me at Florence in 1863 by the late Barn Kirkup, who believed in its genuineness." J.A.S.

That Dante students have multiplied since Mr. Symonds first wrote the book is abundantly clear by the increased provision made for them; but have Dante's readers multiplied in like proportion? Shakespeare has a thousand readers for one student; nor need you belong to a society in order to pick up and read Shelley. How many, we wonder, read Dante in this informal fashion? Very few, we suspect. Yet wherefore? Because all this paraphernalia which surrounds the name of Dante alarms them; because a poet who needs so to be introduced, commented, and lectured upon, must (they think) be truly formidable to an unlearned man; because, in fine, Dante has a reputation as a recondite poet. He is difficult, they would say: that damning adjective which excuses half the sloth and want of enterprise among readers. Then, too, you can only read him properly in Italian; and translations are never a satisfactory substitute for the original.

Against all this, we protest that there is no efficient reason why you should not read Dante as you read Milton, without binding yourself to the labours of the professed student. There are many good translations in English; and the oldest and most accessible of all—that of Cary—sufficed for at least one distinguished modern writer, who used boldly to maintain that it was preferable to the original, because blank verse was a better medium than terza rima. Dante is not of those poets whose power resides so largely in their diction as to make them truly untranslatable. His characteristic gifts remain intact in English. He is difficult sometimes. The strangeness of his subject-matter to a modern Englishman often makes it hard to get at the kernel. Well, when a nut is too hard to crack we lay it by and try the next. The average reader of Shakespeare has a seared conscience with regard to "skipping." And it is as possible to skip in Dante as in Shakespeare. Skip—but read him. There are frequent and long passages in the Paradiso which are simply little treatises on scholastic philosophy or Roman Catholic theology. If you have no taste that way, pass on. Nor, again, does any law oblige you to look up the history and identity of all the numberless personages in the circles of the three Realms as you go along. It is interesting for an historical student. Nevertheless, if you be other-minded, keep on your way, and be content to know so much of them as Dante tells you. You will avoid the voice of the commentator perpetually breaking in on Dante—which is quite intolerable to any man of poetic feeling. At the most, you may stop when you have finished a canto, and look up the details regarding what you have just read, which you will find succinct in Cary. If you take these liberties impenitently, and attend to nothing but the poetry, you will enjoy Dante at first reading. On any other method you certainly will not; though you may enjoy your own ingenuity, and take it for enjoyment of Dante.

We want, we repeat, to see more general readers of Dante; and for the general reader the poetry is the thing—not the date of the suppression of the Templars, or the unsavoury adventures of Cunizza. What does he want with the authentic history of Paolo and Francesca while he is reading their movingly unauthentic history in the Florentine poet? Left thus to himself, Dante will make his own impression, according to the capacity of the mind that reads him. One great feature indeed there is, which can only be grasped when the book is finally shut and the mind recoils upon a survey of the whole—that is his amazing symmetry. No poet has possessed the sense of form and proportion upon such a scale. He is content to rest for a large portion of his effect and grandeur solely upon the way in which the poem is slowly, surely, intricately reared to its height, from basement to crowning tower. It is the most architectural of poems. The symmetry, indeed, is Gothic, not Greek; but it is perfect in its order. Mr. Symonds points out that the number of words is exactly calculated in each Part and Canto; so that Dante himself alludes to the fact that he has reached his appointed limit of space in certain lines. But this is merely the outward mechanical sign of a subtly presiding inward order. His symbolism, exceedingly wonderful and inter-related, is part of this; but upon that side of Dante (inadequately treated by Mr. Symonds) we will not touch. It is for the poet or the student-specialist.

"The allegory," said Hazlitt, regarding intimidated readers of Spenser, "the allegory will not bite them." So, leaving symbolism and scholasticism apart, it needs no apparatus of commentary to follow the vivid series of pictures which unroll themselves throughout the "Divine Comedy." Dante's power of intense vision is compelling. Most marked, because most obvious, in the Inferno and Purgatorio, where the scenery is concrete, it is really most wonderful of all in the subtle otheriality of the Paradiso. He can borrow even from Virgil, and heighten upon Virgil. The approach of Charon and passage of the spirits transcends in lifelike grimness the passage in the Latin poet.

Lo! toward us in a bark
Comes on an old man hoary white with eld, Crying, "Woe to you, wicked spirits! Hope not Ever to see the sky again. I come
To take you to the other shore across,
Into eternal darkness, there to dwell
In fierce heat and in ice."

At Virgil's rebuke:

Straightway in silence fall the shaggy cheeks
Of him the boatman o'er the livid lake,
Around whose eyes glared wheeling flames. Meanwhile
Those spirits, faint and naked, colour changed,
And gnashed their teeth, soon as the cruel words
They heard. God and their parents they blasphemed,
The human kind, the place, the time, and seed
That did engender them and give them birth.
Thus all together sorely weeping drew
To the curst strand, that every man must pass
Who fears not God. Charon, demoniac form,
With eyes of burning coal, collects them all,
Beckoning, and each that lingers with his oar
Strikes. As fall off the light autumnal leaves
One still another following, till the bough
Strews all its honours on the earth beneath,
E'en in like manner Adam's evil brood
Cast themselves one by one down from the shore,
Each at a beck, as falcon at his call.

A few strokes paint for us the whole scene—sad, murky, fuliginous. So with the outcasts on the verge of Hell, "in the scorn of the outer dark":

Various tongues,
Horrible languages, outcries of woe,
Accents of anger, voices deep and hoarse,
With hands together smote that swelled the sounds,
Made up a tumult that for ever whirls
Round through that air with solid darkness stained,
Like to the sand that in the whirlwind flies. . . .
And I, who straightway looked, beheld a flag,
Which, whirling, ran around so rapidly
That it no pause obtained: and following came
Such a long train of spirits, I should ne'er
Have thought that death so many had despoiled.

It is related as with the eye of a reporter that one Dantesque image of the sand in the whirlwind gaining in effect by the stern directness of the rest. Who can forget the first glimpse of the infernal city, with its minarets burning in the valley below? Yet the words are few, simple, casual. Mr. Symonds remarks the poet's gift of selecting the precise detail which will make a thing visible and real to the reader; and his examples could not be bettered. His poetic taste tells strongly in such matters. Finest, perhaps, of all is the passage of the succouring angel across the infernal lake:

More than a thousand spirits
Destroyed, so saw I fleeing before one
Who passed with unwet feet the Stygian sound.
He, from his face removing the gross air,
Oft his left hand forth-stretched, and seemed alone,
By that annoyance wearied.

Nothing could more vividly bring home to us the scene and the surroundings than that finely imagined gesture. His images have the same direct force, drawn often from the homeliest things. The souls who lie prostrate, shielding themselves with their hands alternately from the snowing flames and the torrid soil, are compared to the vagrant dogs of the city:

Thus use the dogs in summer still to ply
Their jaws and feet by turns, when bitten sore
By gnats, or flies, or gadflies swarming round.

Yet his imagery, at need, can be both subtle and daring to a degree. When the light of an angel dissipates the visions on which he is gazing, he thus illustrates it:

E'en as a sleep breaks off, if suddenly
New radiance strike upon the closed lids,
The broken slumber quivering ere it dies;
Thus from before me sunk that imagery.

Nothing in Shakespeare or Shelley could be bolder or subtler than "the broken slumber quivering ere it dies."

Or take the lovely image which describes the ethereal aspect of the spirits in the moon:

As through translucent and smooth glass, or wave
Clear and unmoved, and flowing not so deep
As that its bed is dark, the shape returns
So faint of our impictured lineaments,
That on white forehead set a pearl as strong
Comes to the eye: such saw I many a face.

There is here image within image, as Mr. Symonds remarks, the second intensifying the beauty of the first.

But, in truth, citing from Dante is like chipping a jewel from a casket to show the work. Each image, each description, must be read in its place: there only the power of the brief, sparing words is felt. They gain by relation, and are not truly separable from the design of which they form integral part.

Now is the hour that wakens fond desire
In men at sea, and melts their thoughtful heart,
Who in the morn have bid sweet friends farewell,
And pilgrim, newly on his road, with love
Thrills, if he hear the vesper-bell from far,
That seems to mourn for the expiring day.

That is famous and beautiful, but infinitely more exquisite as a prelude to the serene scene of the evening hymn, and the descending angels with their young green plumes and vesture. Or how can you appreciate, unless you have first emerged with the poet from Hell, those lines in the opening of the Purgatorio?

Sweet hue of eastern sapphire, that was spread
O'er the serene aspect of the pure air,
High up as the first circle, to mine eyes
Unwonted joy renewed, soon as I 'scaped
Forth from the atmosphere of deadly gloom
That had mine eyes and bosom filled with grief,
The radiant planet that to love invites
Made all the Orient laugh, and veiled beneath
The Pisces' light, that in her escort came.

Read in its place, the effect of the passage is like "May-time and the cheerful dawn." It needs no commentator to tell us these things are beautiful, to carry us through the crescendo of terrible and wonderful things in the Inferno, or to impress us with the sublime vision of the Rose of Heaven which is the culmination of the Paradiso and the poem. And if the light of Dante's heavenly circles be overwearying to some eyes, there are others who will find in it sufficing austere loveliness, though into the depths of its significance and philosophy they do not strain their eyes.

The Creeds of the East.

Asiatic Studies, Religious and Social. By Sir Alfred C. Lyall, K.C.B., D.C.L. Second Series. (Murray.)

THE second series of Sir Alfred Lyall's Asiatic Studies contains much matter of considerable interest to the student of the history of religions. The volume is not entirely homogeneous, being, in fact, a collection of scattered essays written at divers times in recent years. There are two interesting dissertations on "Religion in China"; there is a chapter on "History and Fable," in which is traced the evolution of Fiction as a literary species; there is another in which a political question, that of the conditions which determine or render possible permanent dominion in Asia, is discussed, with especial reference to the opposed views of Lord Curzon and the late Mr. Charles Pearson as to the future of the Chinese Empire. But the subject with which Sir Alfred Lyall is mainly preoccupied, to which he returns again and again from various points of view, is that of Hinduism; its origin and threatened extinction; its relations to ethics and to philosophy; the light which it throws upon current conceptions of the general course of the religious evolution of humanity. In the forefront Sir Alfred Lyall puts three letters on the present religious situation in India, originally written under the signature of Vamadeo Shastri. Of these he says:

I ventured upon the attempt to represent, or at least throw light upon, certain religious views, feelings, and opinions which I believe to exist, not without considerable influence, among the conservative classes of India, but which are apt to escape the attention of Englishmen, whether at home or in that country. For this purpose the assumption of a pseudonym was convenient, and, I hope, excusable. It has been chosen to denote an orthodox Brahman, versed in the religion and philosophy of his own people, and to some extent in the literature of the West, who is chiefly interested, like all Indians of the old schools, in the religious situation, and who surveys from that standpoint the moral and material changes that the English rule is producing in India.

The "Letters from Vamadeo Shastri" are a fine example of that "irony of L—l" of which Mr. Kipling writes. The speculations of the learned Brahman, concerned, as Oriental learning always is, almost entirely with the things of the soul, are arrested by the sight of that "young India" whose ancient creeds are rapidly breaking down at the touch of English so-called "civilisation," which, while it destroys, is unable to rebuild, and for a constructive theory of life can only offer to a continent of confirmed pessimists the phantom of "moral and material progress." The letters resolve themselves into a subtle and searching criticism, alike of Hinduism in its strength and its weakness, and of the Western creeds as they reveal themselves to the light of dry reason, whether in the cruder presentation of the missionaries or in the ingenious sophistry whereby Mr. Balfour, not so long ago, attempted to establish the "Foundations of Belief." Here is a sample of the polished and scholarly style which Sir Alfred Lyall lends to his Brahmanical avatar:

One word more. The virtue chiefly inculcated by our own sages and divines has been asceticism, which, of course, your modern spirit of material progress is doing its best to deride, and if possible to destroy—very successfully, so far as the rising generation of Young India is concerned. We Brahmans have been for ages teaching the Hindus the way and means of speedy escape from the world of restless strife and effort; you English are turning the popular mind in the contrary direction of multiplied desires, and an incessant, energetic struggle against the physical and climatic impediments to a pleasurable existence in this country; your doctrine is that even in India life can and should be made comfortable. I myself am personally inclined to hold, with my forefathers, to the opinion that this temporary habitation of consciousness is not, in India, at any rate, worth expending much labour upon in the way of improvements, or for the purpose of prolonging one's lease of it. I prefer the simple life and a speedy departure to another tenement; but this is a matter of taste, and all I remark is, that with you lies the responsibility of leading Indians to adopt the Western theory of existence. The old faiths, which all came from Asia, all proceed upon the contrary theory that, for the majority of human beings, life is hardly worth living in this world, and that man must look to Hereafter either for an escape from suffering, as we Hindus believe, or for an eventual compensation for it, which is the Christian view. In India our ultimate ideal has not been beatification—for which, judging by the analogy of Nature, we had no warrant—but absorption; and if you can convince us that existence in an Indian climate can be made enjoyable to most of us, it is manifest that this may in time affect our customary point of view. I own that you are doing a good deal to soften and enliven material existence even in this melancholy, sunburnt country of ours, and certainly you are so far successful that you are bringing the ascetic idea into discouragement, and, with the younger folk, into contempt. It remains to be seen whether you will be able to guide the impulse that you are giving us toward a scramble for sensuous enjoyment, and what principles you can suggest to us for controlling it.

Others of Sir Alfred Lyall's essays have an interest which is less immediate and practical than historical. Those on "The Golden Bough: a Study in Comparative Religion," on "Origins and Interpretations of Primitive Religions," and on "Natural Religion in India" deal with the wide problem of the beginnings of religion. They are in large measure a criticism of the recent views of religious evolution put forward by Mr. Frazer in his Golden Bough and by Mr. Jevons in his Introduction to the History of Religion. Sir Alfred Lyall appears to hold that in explaining the growth of religious custom and religious myth both Mr. Frazer and Mr. Jevons tend to lay too much stress on the savage personification and deification of natural processes and too little on the phenomena of dreams and on the deification of the mighty dead to which dreams give rise. That is to say, he gives renewed support to the "ghost theory" of Mr. Herbert Spencer, a powerful attack on which by Mr. Andrew Lang has recently aroused a slumbering controversy. Probably most scholars would admit that both the animistic cult of ancestors and the animistic cult of natural forces have co-operated in the beginnings of religion, and the inevitable question, as to which came first, and how they have modified and reacted upon each other, are probably insoluble. Sir Alfred Lyall, however, argues that in Hinduism, which has the advantage of existing at one and the same time in various grades of its evolution, from the primitive cults of the jungle tribes to the spiritual conceptions of the philosophers, the "links and gradations between spirit (that is, 'ghost') worship and the adoration of the higher divinities," are particularly clear and well-defined. It will be remembered that it was precisely these "links and gradations" which Mr. Andrew Lang found it so difficult to discover among the African and Australian peoples. Certainly Sir Alfred Lyall is able to give some curious instances in which the conversion of a dead hero into a divinity appears to be an historic fact. "The spirits of more than one Englishman," he says, "and of one Englishwoman, are now worshipped in India." Who the Englishwoman was, we are not told. That General Nicholson, who fell at Delhi, has or had a sect of worshippers, is, we suppose, familiar. Sir Alfred Lyall adds the case of a Captain Pole, who quite recently had his shrine and priest in a South Indian forest. We do not think that these instances, to which might be added the innumerable hagiologies of the Roman Catholic Church, are very conclusive evidence for ghost worship as a starting-point of religion, for presumably all that happened was the transfer to General Nicholson and Captain Pole of already existing forms of cult. One would like to know whether they were not regarded as avatars of known divinities. As an illustration of the frame of mind which tends to such events, we are told the following story:

Some fifty years ago a very high English official died in a fortress, at a place that is one of the centres of Brahmanic orthodoxy, and at the moment when the news of his death reached the Sepoy guard at the main gate, a black cat rushed out of it. The guard presented arms to the cat as a salute to the flying spirit of the powerful Englishman, and the coincidence took so firm a hold of the locality that up to a few years ago neither exhortation nor orders could prevent a Hindu sentry at that gate from presenting arms to any cat that passed out of the fort at night.

Another of Sir Alfred Lyall's stories is too good not to be included in this review. He gives it as an example of the difficulty sometimes presented by the disentangling of the honoured ancestor from the incipient deity:

We had last year a census of all India; and I noticed in an Indian newspaper of March last that one Hindu household filled up his schedule by returning, as Head of the Family, his household deity, whose profession he described as subsistence on an endowment, while the question whether the divine personage was or was not literate was somewhat indirectly answered by entering him as Omniscient.

The Making of a Colony.

Admiral Phillip: the Founding of New South Wales. By Louis Becke and Walter Jeffery. (Fisher Unwin. 5s.)

READERS of Naval Pioneers of Australia, reviewed in these columns a few months since, will welcome this volume which the same fellow-labourers contribute to the "Builders of Britain" series. It was Lord Palmerston who said: "Whenever I want a thing done in a distant part of the world, when I want a man with a good head, a good heart, lots of pluck, and lots of common sense, I always send for a captain of the Navy." And upon that principle Lord Sydney, Home Secretary, would seem to have acted when at the end of the last century he chose the little hook-nosed, long-jowled, be-ringleted sailor man whose portrait faces the title-page of this book to be the Moses of this most miserable Exodus. He was forty-eight when it was determined to relieve the congested condition of the English gaols by transporting a portion of their wretched inmates to the Antipodes. It is probable that among naval officers there was no very keen competition for the leadership of so precarious an enterprise; and for once in those corrupt days the heads of affairs were at liberty simply to select the most likely man to conduct it. Their happy choice fell upon Phillip.

The Sirius (re-christened to do honour to the Southern Hemisphere), a ship of the sixth rate, of 612 tons, carrying 20 guns and a crew of 160, was the leader of the expedition. She was tended by the Supply—170 tons, 8 guns, 50 men—"a very improper ship for this service," sailing indeed as ill almost as the Sirius. They were to convey nine transports, having on board 600 male and 180 female convicts, who were to be dumped down at the ends of the earth—out of the way. Under the command of Major Ross, lieutenant-governor, was a force of 200 marines to keep the rogues in order; only it was found very soon that the marines had left their bullets at home. By Phillip's diligent importunity the expedition was tolerably well found in victuals and stores to last two years. It was hoped that before the complete expenditure of the food supplies the colony would be self-supporting, and that hemp for canvas and ropes, timber for the navy, and, as the Home Office vaguely phrased it, "most of the Asiatic productions," would furnish material for export. It was at the Cape that the Governor procured the stock from which what Australians call "our great pastoral industry" had its origin: fifty sheep, half-a-dozen cows, a couple of bulls, six horses, and some pigs and goats (no rabbits). And there are Australian sheep-breeders to-day who could not off-hand tell you within a thousand or two how many sheep they own.

Under the blessing of God [writes Collins, the Judge-Advocate] was happily completed in eight months and one week a voyage which before it was undertaken the mind hardly dared to contemplate. . . . We had sailed five thousand and twenty-one leagues . . . in a fleet of eleven sail. . . . Only thirty-two persons had died since leaving England. The high health which was apparent in every countenance was to be attributed not only to the refreshments we met with at Rio de Janeiro and the Cape of Good Hope, but to the excellent quality of the provisions with which we were supplied by Mr. Richards, junior, the contractor.

Let the name of Mr. Richards, junior, contractor, be held in benediction. The story of the second fleet was very different.

It was Jackson Bay that was finally chosen to be the cradle of the infant colony; Botany Bay, originally designated, afforded no shelter from easterly winds, the "disaster" wind of that seaboard; and there, on January 26, 1788, the Union Jack was hoisted. The colonists, to the number of 1,030, were assembled; the marines fired three volleys (they had plenty of powder); Judge-Advocate

Collins read the Governor's commission, and Phillip made a dry little speech:

You have now been particularly informed [he said] of the nature of the laws by which you are to be governed, and also of the power with which I am invested to put them into full execution. There are among you, I am willing to believe, some who are not perfectly abandoned, and who, I hope and trust, will make the intended use of the great indulgence and lenity their humane country has offered; but at the same time there are many—I am sorry to add, by far the greater part—who are innate villains and people of the most abandoned principles. To punish these shall be my constant care, and in this duty I will ever be indefatigable, however distressing it may be to my feelings. Not to do so would be a cruel injustice to those whom, as being the most worthy, I have first named. . . . Therefore, you have my sacred word of honour that whenever you commit a fault you shall be punished, and most severely. . . . I speak of what comes under my particular observation; and again I add that a vigorous exercise of the law (whatever it may cost my feelings) shall follow closely on the heels of any offender.

Two things the Governor set himself principally to do: first, to get his "lags" reasonably to work upon the soil; and secondly, to secure the goodwill of the natives. The former was a task of immense difficulty. A more unlikely lot no nation-builder, it may safely be said, has ever had to deal with. "Fifty farmers with their families," he wrote, "would do more in rendering this colony independent of the mother country than a thousand convicts." The creatures were for the most part hopeless degenerates, vicious to the core; their qualities miserably perverted. The principal industry of the more energetic was to thieve from their neighbours their allowance of food. They stole even the things they had least use for—spades, axes, and the like; they would have lain down and died sooner than have used them. There was a "snide" among them who fashioned dollars out of pewter spoons; there was a prophetic genius who fabricated gold-ore out of brass-filings; they brought home from their wanderings wonderful tales of great rivers and quarries of marble, that set the community upon the alert. They had never a locksmith, but they had a craftsman who, with a bent nail, could unfasten the cunningest lock that came out of Sheffield—not in the least the talent to unlock the treasure chambers of a new country. Such a crowd called for severe treatment; and it was over his disciplinary measures that Phillip came acutely into conflict with Major Ross, his second in command.

Ross it was who was responsible for that oversight in the matter of the bullets: and he was from first to last a thorn in the side of the little sailor-man. A good average regimental officer, no doubt, but quite unfitted for this exceptional duty, and with about as much pliancy as a ramrod. His letters home are full of whining complaints. The colony could not support itself for a hundred years. "It would be cheaper to feed the convicts on turtle and venison at the London Tavern than to send them here." It was necessary for the support of the Governor's authority to constitute a criminal court, and this Ross declared to be outside the terms of his commission. And, in general, Phillip was anxious that the officers should share in his personal concern over the well-being of his troublesome citizens. He asked only "that officers would, when they saw the convicts diligent, say a few words of encouragement to them; and that when they met them idle, or straggling in the woods, they would threaten them with punishment"; and it was pointedly refused.

What with the recalcitrancy of Ross and the venomous tricks of the convicts, the Governor's well-meant attempts to make friends with the aboriginals, who at the first seem to have been kindly disposed, met with but indifferent success. The convicts—one can hardly regret it—fell victims, some of them, to the just resentment of the simple savages, and Phillip himself was severely wounded by a panic-stricken native in the midst of a friendly palaver.

Things dragged on till 1789, and it was more than two years since any communication had arrived from the home authorities. The prospect was beyond measure depressing. Trench, a captain of the marines, wrote home by the Sirius: "The country is past all dispute a wretched one, and totally incapable of yielding to Great Britain any return for colonising it." Another writer described it succinctly as "the outcast of God's works." On November 1, 1789, the allowance of stale pork and verminous rice was reduced by a third. On April 1, 1790, the weekly ration of each person, without distinction, was diminished to four pounds of flour, two pounds and a half of salt pork, and one pound and a half of rice. Famine was striding upon them, and vainly they swept the wide spaces of the ocean with telescopes that brought them not within a thousand leagues of a sail. One officer had already gone mad of melancholy, and was rowing himself backwards and forwards between two headlands all day long in a skiff. But the Governor attended, with unshaken confidence, to the daily business of the settlement, and by the Sirius wrote home a very quiet and businesslike account of the conditions.

For early in February the Sirius had been despatched to China, in company of the Supply. The life of the settlement depended, it would seem, upon her:

Nothing more was seen of them [writes the young lieutenant, Southwell] till the 5th April, when at daybreak he was roused from his slumbers by the look-out man, with the news that a sail was in sight. The ship, as she neared the land, was judged by him to be the Supply, though he wondered at her returning so soon. Foreboding an accident, he desired the gunner to notice if the people mustered thick on her decks as she came in under the headland. His misgivings were well-founded—the ship was the Supply, and the Sirius had left her bones on Norfolk Island. . . .

At last, no moment too soon to forestall an end of immeasurable horror, the groping glasses discerned another sail. Let Trench finish the story:

The weather was wet and tempestuous; but the body is delicate only when the soul is at ease. We pushed through wind and rain, the anxiety of our sensations every moment redoubling. At last we read "London" on her stern. . . . A few minutes completed our wishes, and we found ourselves on board the Lady Juliana, transport, with two hundred and twenty-five of our countrywomen, whom crime or misfortune had condemned to exile.

Among the trifles of news she brought was that of the French Revolution.

In 1791, not before he had seen the colony fairly in train, Phillip's health broke down; he must ask leave to retire; and King, the second of the dynasty of naval governors, reigned in his stead. Phillip died in 1814, and it was only nine years ago, through inquiries set on foot by the New South Wales Government, that his tomb was discovered in St. Nicholas's Church, Bathampton, near Bath. So little did the Empire of so many makers take note of him. For, after all, he was just a brave sailor-man who did what he was told.

Mr. Recke and Mr. Jeffery have done an extremity of justice to their matter; even to the detail of a good index.

A Surfeit of London.

Stories of the Streets of London. By H. Barton Baker. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d.)

THE general anecdotal survey of London is surely out of date, and this for two reasons: firstly, it has been sufficiently done; and, secondly, London is grown too big to admit of its being done well any longer. The penalty on such an attempt is a certain dilution of style and tepidity of sentiment; clichés are hatched in swarms, and a thousand involuntary exaggerations and unrealities have to be employed in order to cover the enormous subject-area with any sort of grace. No author can feel an eager personal interest in half the persons and topics which London secretes in her enormous past; hence such an interest must be simulated, and the reader's attention whipped and tickled and cajoled as he is dragged round the never-ending streets.

This discrepancy between author and subject breeds terrible inevitabilities of description. Dr. Johnson is "the ponderous lexicographer." We have "dear, delightful Charles Lamb" breathlessly and needlessly dropped upon the page. When a person is too uninteresting for the author to describe he is set down as "the famous" so and so; as Dr. Sacheverell, "the famous High Church champion," and John Emery, "the celebrated Yorkshire comedian." Hobbes, we are told, "wrote his famous Leviathan in Fetter-lane." But when Izaak Walton's house in Fleet-street is located the case is different. The reader's taste must be flattered, and the house becomes the picturesque carved-fronted dwelling where the master of the gentle art, Izaak Walton, carried on his millinery business, and from which, many a time and oft, he has started, humming one of his quaint, sweet ballads, upon those piscatorial expeditions to the banks of the Lea, immortalised in The Compleat Angler.

And so we rush on. Places are "haunted." We are bidden to "conjure up their memories," and though conjuring up spirits is, at the best of times, an exhausting business, our ear is still pulled, and we follow through the endless changes of place, costume, sentiment, everything. We travel from Dan to Beersheba, and ache to find no square inch of the way barren.

It is a positive relief, in turning over Mr. Baker's industrious pages of anecdote, to alight now and then on something which detaches itself from the hurly-burly of reminiscence and compilation. Thus the newspapers have lately compared M. Guérin's exploit in the Rue de Chabrol to that of Sir Francis Burdett at No. 80, Piccadilly. Mr. Baker gives the latter story in these words:

The mention of Sir Francis Burdett conjures up a reminiscence of No. 80, Piccadilly, which was the residence of "Old Glory," as he was nicknamed by his admirers. In Cobbett's Political Register, 1810, he denounced the House of Commons as a set of borough-mongers and violators of Magna Charta. Parliament was more jealous of its honour then than now—perhaps it had more honour to be jealous of—and an order was issued for his committal to the Tower. As soon as the news spread abroad a vast concourse filled Piccadilly from Hyde Park Corner to the Haymarket, and every person who came that way was compelled to take off his hat and shout for the idol of the hour, or—take the consequences. The Life Guards were called out, the Riot Act read. Nevertheless the mob commanded every householder to illuminate his windows on pain of having them smashed. Those who obeyed were raided by the military, and their lights were extinguished. Thereupon the logical crowd battered in all glass within stone's throw, and wounded and even killed several innocent people. On the morning of the third day of the riot the Sergeant-at-Arms, with a prise of constables, forced his way to the house, followed by a carriage and a detachment of soldiers. Upon entering the drawing-room they found themselves in the presence of a very strikingly arranged dramatic tableau. Sir Francis was posed in the centre of a group which consisted of his wife, his three sisters, his brother-in-law, Mr. Coutts, the banker, and Mr. O'Connor, while his son, a boy of fourteen, was reading aloud Magna Charta.

It should be added, in conclusion, that Mr. Baker's pages, though not inspired, are never dull, and that they are well adapted to impart a first acquaintance with the associations of London streets and an initial enthusiasm. Mr. Charles G. Harper's illustrations are good; some of them are excellent.

An Ambassador of Commerce.

The Embassy of Sir Thomas Roe to the Court of the Great Mogul. Edited by William Foster. 2 vols. (Hakluyt Society.)

THE Hakluyt Society have done well in including the journal of Sir Thomas Roe among their publications. For, as we pointed out in reviewing another book of Mr. Foster's last week, Sir Thomas Roe fairly deserves to be counted amongst the Makers of the Empire. The journal, of course, has been published a score of times, from its first appearance in Purchas his Pilgrimes onwards. But previous editions have been merely abridgments, and Mr. Foster has the honour of being the first to give Roe's own MS. in extenso. He has further inserted at appropriate places in the text some fifty of the ambassador's letters and despatches, gleaned from various sources, and has added divers other illustrations, many of which are drawn from the lively narrative of the chaplain Terry.

Sir Thomas Roe was the scion of a famous City family, who had received an Oxford education and had made his way to Court. He was an intimate friend of the English Marcellus, Prince Henry, and of his unfortunate sister, Elizabeth of Bohemia, the "Queen of Hearts." The voyage to India was not his first experience of distant travel. In 1610 he had fitted out a couple of pinnaces, had made sail to Guiana, and had explored some three hundred miles of the then little known Amazon River. He was "of a pregnant understandinge, well spoken, learned, industrious, and of a comelie personage," and when the governors of the East India Company decided that the interests of their factors at Surat required the presence of a competent representative at the court of the Great Mogul, they could not have made a better choice than they did. Roe was glad enough to undertake the mission. His patrimony was impoverished, and the dissolution of the "Addled Parliament" of 1614 had left him without active occupation. He set out for India in the Lion, under Captain Keeling, in February, 1615. Although chosen and salaried by the East India Company, he took rank as an ambassador of King James and was empowered to negotiate a permanent treaty with the Great Mogul. He landed at Surat in September, and after victoriously overcoming the difficulties put in his way by the Portuguese and by the native governor of the district, he reached Ajmere, where Jahángir, the son of the great Akbar, was holding his court, in December. The Journal gives a vivid picture of the personalities and intrigues of seventeenth century India, and in particular of Jahángir himself—weak, but amiable—and of his destined successor Khurram, the future builder of Agra and Delhi. Jahángir, for a great monarch, was singularly greedy for presents, and, much to Roe's annoyance, the parsimony of the East India Company made it very difficult to satisfy his demands. In particular, he was interested in the works of art which the ambassador had brought from England, and the Journal describes some amusing scenes which took place. On one occasion Jahángir had six copies of one of Roe's miniatures made by native artists, and defied him to tell the original from among them. This he did, but with great difficulty, and the King "was very merry and joyfull and craked like a Northern man." Later on Jahángir heard that Roe had another miniature which he had not shown him.

Hee asked for the Picture. I showed him two. Hee seemed astonished at one of them; and demanded whose it was. I answered a friend of myne that was dead. Hee Asked mee if I would giue it him. I replied that I esteemed it more than any thing I possessed, because it was the Image of one that I loued dearly and Could neuer recouer: but that if his Maiestie would pardon mee my fancy and accept of the other, which was a french picture but excellent woork, I would most willingly giue it him. He sent me thancks, but that it was that only picture hee desired, and loued as well as I, and that if I would giue it him hee would better esteeme of it than the richest jewell in his house. I answered I was not soe in loue with anything that I would refuse to Content his Maiestie. I was extreame glad to doe him seruice, and if I could giue him a better demonstration of my affection, which was my hart to doe him seruice, I was ready to present it to him. At which hee bowed to mee and replied it was sufficient that I had giuen it: and hee confessed hee neuer sawe so much arte, so much bewty, and Conjured mee to tell him truly whither euer such a woeman liue. I assured him ther did liue that this did resemble in all things but perfection, and was now dead. Hee returned mee that hee tooke my willingnes very kindly, but that, seeing I had soe freely giuen him that I esteemed so much, he would not robb mee of yt: only hee would show yt his ladyes and Cause his woorkmen to make him 5 Coppyes, and if I knew myne owne I should have yt. I answered I had freely and willingly giuen it and was extreame gladd of his Maiesties acceptance. He replied he would not take yt: that hee loued mee the better for louinge the remembrance of my frende, and knew what an injurie yt was to take it from mee; by noe means hee would not keepe yt, but only take coppyes, and with his owne hand hee would returne yt, and his wiues should weare them.

Evidently Roe attached some sentimental value to the miniature in question, and Mr. Foster suggests that it was that of his wife. She was the widow of Sir George Beeston, and Roe seems to have married her somewhat secretly just before he started on his voyage. But if so, why did he make what Mr. Foster calls the "diplomatic statement" that the original of the miniature "was now dead"? Is it certain that Lady Beeston was not Roe's second wife? John Donne wrote him a letter in 1607 in which he enclosed a letter to "your lady." This, however, is not as conclusive as it looks, for Donne was always communicating with Lady Bedford and other great ladies of his acquaintance through his friends and theirs.

Sir Thomas Roe did not succeed in getting the desired treaty out of Jahángir, and to this extent he must be said to have failed in his mission. The wily Mogul was unwilling to treat an Occidental King on the footing of equality which he reserved for the Shah of Persia and the Sultan of Constantinople. He would only extend to the factors at Surat the dubious protection of revocable farmáns. But at the same time it is clear that the personal impression produced by the intrepidity and the statesmanlike bearing of Roe upon the Indian court was a considerable one, and the total outcome of his diplomacy was an immense increase of English prestige in the East. Roe had got the footing, which the factors before his coming had desired in vain, at the seat of empire:

The provincial authorities were restrained from acts of oppression by fear of representations at headquarters, and thus time was given for the English to root themselves firmly in the country and to accustom the natives to their presence. By the time Roe left India this had been accomplished; all danger from the Portuguese appeared to have passed away; concessions had been obtained which "he thought as much in generall as he could expect or desire"; and a good understanding had been established with the court.

Roe returned to India in 1618 with a flowery letter of goodwill from the Mogul to King James. His after career is part of English history. Twice again he was sent as royal ambassador—once to Constantinople, whence he brought back the great Codex Alexandrinus of the British Museum; once to Sweden, to negotiate a truce between that country and Poland. Then he suffered a grave disappointment, when Windebank was preferred to him as successor to Carleton in the Secretaryship of State. He retired to the country, until his services were again in request in connexion with the attempts to wind up the Thirty Years' War. He sat in the Long Parliament, but could not bring himself to take up arms against either his king or his country, and obtained leave to retire to Bath for his health.

Other New Books.

THE VINEDRESSER, AND OTHER POEMS.

BY T. STURGE MOORE.

Mr. Sturge Moore belongs to the class of poets who possess abundant art and technical accomplishment, but are lacking in central inspiration. Here is a piece which represents his average gift:

TO SLOW MUSIC.

Like shovels white of porcelain
In pyramids of seas deep,
Are shells half scooped into brown sand
Which ebbing waves drew on a heap.
Like blush by smooth nail overlain
Are others; five for either hand,
Nay, plenty for both hands and feet
Of Venus when she walks the strand
Escaped from perfumed Temple's heat.
Like wail which for Adonis rang,
Drawn up and round a hollow maze,
In others dwells a wealth of soup,
That she prefers to all men's praise.
Made coral by a moment's pang
And snapt off from true hearts are found
The branching red rich veins of those,
Who, wounded by her son, have drowned
Seeking a "sea-change" for their woes.

The idle nymphs in caves far down,
Secluded life-long from alarms,
Where distance lulls the billow's roar
And moony sea-light dreams of day,
Made every shell that strews the shore.
They with their handywork do crown
Long tresses—twine their grand white arms
With chains of cowries, and array
Their necks and bosoms. . . . Naught of lily (Since Venus never tells) know they,
Naught of the tender violet's charms,
Of daisy naught, nor daffodilly!"

Here you have the merits and defects of Mr. Moore's verse. It is carefully wrought, with sound knowledge and taste; though even here, "Like blush by smooth nail overlain," and "Like wail which for Adonis rang," are awkward contractions, which should be left to versifiers less expert than Mr. Moore. One can see that he has studied diction with an eye to colour. But there is small central impulse, a vacuum of compelling thought or emotion. The diction, in consequence, with all its deliberate choiceness, has no inevitability, no magic. In fine, it is a dilletante book, which may be read with pleasure by dilletantes, but can hardly grip those who take their poetry seriously. (Unicorn Press.)

THE EARLDOM OF WILTES. BY JOHN HENRY METCALFE

"Time hath his revolutions; there must be an end to all temporal things—finis rerum—an end of names and dignities and whatsoever is terrene; and why not of DE VERE? For where is DE BOHM? Where is MOWBRAY? Where is MORTIMER? Nay, what is more, and most of all, where is PLANTAGANET? These are entombed in the urns and sepulchres of mortality." Odsbodkin, what opportunities of eloquence come to a judge! These words, uttered by Lord Chief Justice Crew, in reference to the Earldom of Oxford, are worthy of Sir Thomas Browne. But, said the judge, "I suppose that there is no man that hath any apprehension of gentry and nobleness, but his affection stands to the continuance of so noble a name and fame, and would take hold of a twig or twine thread to uphold it." The "twine thread" of the lapsed Wiltes peerage is, so to speak, skinned by Mr. Metcalfe in these handsome pages containing the story of the earldom conferred by Richard II. on Sir William le Scrope. The life of this brave man and loyal supporter of a weak monarch has been made familiar to Englishmen by Shakespeare. Here it is set forth with such picturesque details as the following:

His manors were so numerous and in so many counties that, it is said, he could, when riding from his castle of Upsall, in Yorkshire, to London and returning thither, always rest each night on his journey in some manor house upon his own land.

It was in holding Bristol Castle for the king against Bolingbroke that the Earl lost his cause and his head;

Duke of Anmerle.—Is Bushy, Greene, and the Earl of Wiltshire dead?

Scroop.—Ay, all of them at Bristol lost their heads.

Unfortunately for the earldom there was no lineal heir, and the King's Charter was held to limit the succession to such heirs, excluding collateral descent. The question slept for centuries, but in 1859 the present head of the Scrope family claimed the peerage, and his claim was heard by the House of Lords. On that occasion Mr. Metcalfe thinks that the decision virtually rested with Lord Chelmsford and a Scotch law lord, Lord Colonsay. Proof of descent was admitted, but Lord Chelmsford disallowed the claim on two grounds: firstly, on the ground that the Charter assumed to "give to a dignity a descensible quality unknown to the law," although in this contention he had a powerful precedent against him; secondly, because for a very long time the peerage had not been claimed, showing (in his lordship's opinion) that it was the "belief of those who would have been entitled to succeed that no right of succession remained." This decision evoked a powerful protest from a number of peers, headed by the Duke of Norfolk; and Mr. Metcalfe has no difficulty in presenting a strong case for the revival of the Wiltes peerage. This is virtually a handsome Blue Book on the claim. (Chiswick Press 10s. 6d. net.)

Fiction.

MAMMON & CO. BY E. F. BENSON.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

MR. BENSON, after a digression towards Byron's Greece, here returns to the Mayfair of Dodo, and is found not to have increased in stature. But as a delineator of a certain stratum of fast, or "smart," society, with all its merry frothiness and well-groomed immoralities, he is as entertaining as ever. Kit, Lady Conybeare, does not, perhaps, quite reach the audacious altitudes of Dodo; but that may be because Dodo came before her. Possibly the people who now read Mr. Benson for the first time will wish for nothing better. That Kit is of the same genus we can show in a moment. "Dear Jean Worth!" she cries in a new dress (orange chiffon, in four tints, with a net of pale mandarin yellow all over it, to which was tacked a cusped acanthus pattern of sequins), "what a lot of money I owe him, and what a lot of pleasure he gives me! I should be puzzled to say which was the greater." Unhappily, Kit's gaiety lasts only for half the book, and then Mr. Benson, deeming himself a merciless realist instead of only a satirical observer, plunges that agreeable young woman in a complication of miseries, which, culminating in a serious illness, lead her, vid an angelic young American sister-in-law, to what we feel sure is dull and unepigrammatic reformation. No more recklessness about money, no more creations by Worth, no more cheating at baccarat, no more gambling in West Australians, no more liaisons with other members of the peerage; and, what is more serious, no more frivolous speeches.

Kit's high spirits having been disposed of so prematurely we have to get what amusement we can from Mrs. Murchison, an American Malaprop, admiration for whose possibilities sometimes carries Mr. Benson away. Thus, on one occasion she is describing her winter on the Nile: "Then another day we went to see the tree under which the Virgin Mary sat when she went to Egypt, which was really a remarkable coincidence, because my name is Mary too, and the guide gave us a leaf from it as a memento Mary. Ah, dear me, how charming and quaint it all was! Then we went up the river in our own private diabetes and stuck on a sandbank for weeks." It will be noticed that Mr. Benson is still very young. On another occasion also the author's mischief carries him, we think, a little too far. He writes: "Many people have their own pet plan of sending themselves to sleep. . . . Kit's method, though she usually fell asleep immediately, was to enumerate her dislikes. This was a long and remarkably varied list, beginning 'Marie Corelli, parsnips,' and she seldom got to the end of it." We doubt if that is quite sportsmanlike.

We have said enough to indicate that Mammon & Co. is amusing. It cannot be said that it is more. Mr. Benson asks to be taken seriously as the historian of 1899 London society, but we are unable to oblige him. To feel any but the most superficial interest in these well-dressed puppets of his, and their alleged astounding relations to each other, is not possible. Yet we will continue to be entertained as long as Mr. Benson invites us.

Thady Halloran of the Irish Brigade. By J. W. Breslin.
(T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THESE continental adventures of a fighting Irishman in the service of Charles Edward are done in a manner so neat and workmanlike that it seems harsh to say that their intrinsic value is small. Yet there is nothing else to be said; and the book only proves once more that skill without original inspiration is futile. Mr. Breslin has seen again all the old scenes, felt the old feelings, heard the old phrases.

What of this? "Thady dexterously mixed a large proportion of the brandy with the wine, and plied the courier with the mixture, while serving Gagdon and himself but sparingly from what was still left in the preceding flagon."

And again: "For answer, Thady's sword leapt from the scabbard; but ere the blades could cross . . ." When the fair one confessed herself frail, "Thady staggered and passed his hand across his eyes as if the whole world had suddenly grown dark to him, and his face was contorted by the fierce working of the passions within. Once he opened his lips to speak, but . . ." (Our italics.)

Further: "In a flash he was sprawling on the floor and Thady was standing over him. 'I'm as big a blackguard, maybe, as the best of ye; but I'm not that kind of blackguard.'" (An "unmannerly knave" had assaulted a woman.)

And so one might continue. The volume is a series of outworn clichés. We do not mean to assert that it is not readable. One can read it "without fatigue" of brain or heart. It is like drinking tea or smoking a cigarette—neither here nor there. The curious fact is that Mr. Breslin undoubtedly has talent concealed about him.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE ORANGE GIRL. BY SIR WALTER BESANT.

Sir Walter Besant's new novel opens in London in the year 1760, and is concerned mainly with young Will Halliday; with his reversion to £100,000; with his cousin Matthew, who wants him to sell it; with Mr. Probuss, an attorney of the most transparent rascality; and with the "orange girl," sweet Jenny Wilmot, the actress of Drury Lane. The money motive works strongly, and introduces us to the King's Bench and Newgate. Throughout we have a carefully drawn London background. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

TO LONDON TOWN

BY ARTHUR MORRISON.

Herein the author of Tales of Mean Streets and A Child of the Jago, books to which the new story is related, makes a departure. The life of the East End is still his theme, but the sunnier, healthier side is this time depicted. We are taken, for instance, to Epping Forest; and even though squalor is still present, a certain sense of romance is present too. (Methuen. 6s.)

A NAME TO CONJURE WITH. BY JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

The author of Bootle's Baby here deserts soldiers for the literary life. Her heroine is Mary Lessingham, the daughter of a suddenly-impoorished millionaire and wife of a journalist. Being put to it for means of subsistence, she took to novel-writing and became an idol of the hour. Her first book was called "Day Dawn," and her first publisher Winklemann. The tragedy of the story is that, in order to sustain herself in an artificial life of literature and society, the heroine takes to stimulants, and is enslaved by them. (White. 6s.)

THE WELL-SINKERS.

BY ETHEL QUINN.

The author's name is given variously as Ethel Quinn, on the cover, and Teth Quin, on the title-page. The book is a new volume in the "Overseas Library," and is a grim little story of life on a New South Wales station. The more unlovely side of Australia may be studied here. "Leave the tall gum-trees to overlook the weary plains. Leave them all, and close the pages of a disappointing story of a disappointing land." That is the end. (Unwin. 2s.)

THE UNSEEN HAND.

BY LAWRENCE L. LYNCH.

A complex, yet clear, melodramatic story of wealth, and marriage, and murder, opening on the evening when "the great suburban mansion was ablaze with light." Even the reader who likes this kind of story will be inclined to endorse the words of Rob Jocelyn: "In all my experience I never saw a case so tangled up, so difficult to terminate without a thorough expose, almost unbearable for some of those most interested." (Ward, Lock, & Co. 3s. 6d.)

THE STORY OF A KISS.

BY ANDREW R. COWAN.

The kiss was given by Mary Ainslie to Mr. Carlow under the impression that he was Allan Failford, her betrothed. Thenceforward all was frustration and General Post between the lovers. The story, by the way, which was related to the author and is retold by him, is a rather interesting departure in narration. (Unwin. 5s.)

AN AMERICAN CITIZEN.

BY MADELEINE L. RYLEY.

This novel is by the author of the play of the same name now running at a London theatre. The action passes in New York and on the Riviera, and there is an abundance of smart dialogue. (Walter Scott, Ltd. 3s. 6d.)

THE ROMANCE OF NUN'S HOLLOW.

BY RIETTE.

This terrifying sentence meets us on the third page: "And after a few miserable years, she returned to her father's house, with her little infant daughter, only to linger a few short months, fading gradually away, day by day, until she was laid to rest in the little Churchyard, by the side of her mother, who, in her day, had been a great beauty, and a 'Toast' among all the neighbouring squires, who vied with each other to gain even a passing glance from the beautiful daughter of the impoverished Earl Stow, who had suitors and enough for her hand, empty as it was, and which she finally bestowed on Matt Darcy, to the great grief of many sporting sons of Mars, who had seen her undefeated in many a good and trying run with her father's well-known pack." (Digby, Long & Co. 3s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions ..... 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Tolstoi's New Novel.*

THERE are those who attribute Tolstoi's continual castigation of indulgence largely to disappointment, affirming that he did not condemn until the capacity for similar indulgence was no longer his. The taunt is contemptible; but we allude to it here for the definite reason that one thing which Resurrection demonstrates very clearly is the advantage that it can be to a great novelist to be old in years and in experience, and to have burnt the candle freely when he was young. Moving and robust as the story is—and it would be hard to add to the vigour of some passages—it is yet always the work of an old man. The incidents may be the incidents of the youngest realist among us, but behind them all is the pity, the knowledge, the understanding of age. Mixed with this sympathetic insight is a grim irony which also gains force from the age of the observer who uses it. When a young man points at grotesque inconsistencies we are not much moved. "He will come to think them necessary," we say, and pass on. But when a man who has been through the fire, a man who, many years ago, could write Anna Karénina and The Death of Ivan Ilyitch, is found tearing the mask from things, we are bound to attend. Thus, near the beginning of the book it is necessary that in the account of a trial for murder the glamour that ordinarily hangs over a court of law shall, for the reader's right comprehension of the author's purpose, be removed. Tolstoi, with perfect gravity, proceeds to remove it. At the moment one does not perhaps notice what is happening, but by the time the scene is over, and Maslova has been sentenced to Siberia for a crime she did not commit, the full force of the author's saturnine device is felt, and we know in a score of ways that no one sitting in judgment upon her is more honest than this prostitute, and most are less so. Here is an example:

The president, who had to take the chair, had arrived early. The president was a tall, stout man, with long grey whiskers. Though married, he led a very loose life, and his wife did the same, so they did not stand in each other's way. This morning he had received a note from a Swiss girl, who had formerly been a governess in his house, and who was now on her way from South Russia to St. Petersburg. She wrote that she would wait for him between five and six p.m. in the Hotel Itálie. This made him wish to begin and get through the sitting as soon as possible, so to have time to call before six p.m. on the little red-haired Clara Vasilievna, with whom he had begun a romance in the country last summer. He went into a private room, latched the door, took a pair of dumb-bells out of a cupboard, moved his arms twenty times upwards, downwards, forwards, and sideways, then holding the dumb-bells above his head, lightly bent his knees three times.

As the trial proceeds, with its terrible issues, we now and then observe the president glancing at the clock. To take another passage—the judges are entering the court. Everyone rises as they come in, Justice incarnate.

Last came the third member of the court, the same Matthew Nikitich who was always late. He was a bearded man, with large, round, kindly eyes. He was suffering from a catarrh of the stomach, and, according to his doctor's advice, he had begun trying a new treatment, and this had kept him at home longer than usual. Now, as he was ascending the platform, he had a pensive air. He was in the habit of making guesses in answer to all sorts of self-put questions by different curious means. Just now he had asked whether the new treatment would be beneficial, and had decided that it would cure his catarrh if the number of steps from the door to his chair would divide by three. He made twenty-six steps, but managed to get in a twenty-seventh just by his chair.

* The Resurrection. By L. Tolstoi. (Brotherhood Publishing Co.)

After this whatever is august about the tribunal has evaporated. Those keen eyes have pierced the "glamour." How very real it all becomes!

Among the jury who have to return a verdict on the case and vote for Maslova's innocence or guilt is Count Tolstoi's hero, Nekhludoff. Upon this circumstance and the fact that he recognises the prisoner as his aunt's quondam protégé, whom years before he had seduced, the story rests. Nekhludoff is a character with whom readers of Tolstoi are familiar—a mixture of good and evil, or rather, strength and weakness, in an aristocratic framework. He is rich and idle, but he is capable of thought, and the voice of duty can still be as a trumpet-call to him. As he sits in the jury-box and sees before him what he believes to be the result of his sin, anguish settles on his soul, and the turning-point of his life is reached. He determines to amend the past as far as possible. That night he takes his resolution:

"I shall tell her, Katúsha, that I am a scoundrel, and have sinned towards her, and will do all I can to ease her lot. Yes, I will see her, and will ask her to forgive me.

"Yes, I will beg her pardon, as children do." . . . He stopped—"will marry her if it is necessary." He stopped again, folded his hands in front of his breast, as he used to when a little child, lifted his eyes, and said, addressing some one: "Lord, help me, teach me, come and enter within me, and purify me of all this abomination."

He prayed and asked God to help him, to enter into him and cleanse him; and what he was praying for had already happened; the God within him had awakened in his consciousness. He felt himself one with Him, and therefore felt not only the freedom, fullness, and joy of life, but all the power of righteousness. All, all the best that a man could do he felt capable of doing.

His eyes filled with tears as he was saying all this to himself, good and bad tears: good because they were tears of joy at the awakening of the spiritual being within him, the being which had been asleep all these years, and bad tears because they were tears of tenderness to himself at his own goodness.

That is another passage which no young man would have written.

It is with the progress of Nekhludoff's resolution that the first volume is concerned. So far—as far as Chapter LIX.—it has not wandered; although it receives a check when Maslova, whom he visits in prison, assures him that she would rather be hanged than do anything so dull as marry anyone, least of all himself.

Resurrection should please both sections of the author's followers—those that want a story, and those others also that ask only for messages. In Resurrection Tolstoi, probably with full consciousness, has fused his earlier and later periods; his power of narration is in as full play as in The Cossacks, for example—that incomparable full-blooded tale—while, at the same time, here, with all his faculties alive, is the Great Iconoclast, the censor of idle living, of bloodshed, of excess, of hypocrisy, of everything contrary to the teaching of Christ. It is as though Tolstoi said: "The novel pure and simple I have lost heart to write; the sermon pure and simple you have no interest in reading; you shall have the two inextricably mixed." And since life is a didactic business, the story comes to be as much like a piece of life itself as if it were without deliberate moral purposes at all.

In style it is extremely simple and naïve, almost childlike. Tolstoi's aim being that his story shall be read—and it seems already to have readers of every European nationality—he has naturally adopted a manner straightforward and emphatic. He qualifies nothing. Everything is stated so dogmatically that no appeal seems possible. Nothing is hidden from this novelist: that is the impression conveyed. An ordinary novelist might allege half as much and be disbelieved, but there is something in Tolstoi's manner which carries conviction with it. It may be only trick; it may be only commanding personality; it may be truly knowledge. For the moment, however, we are not concerned with criticism: this is merely an attempt to give an idea of Resurrection, and to recommend it.

A Masterly Lie.

In the case of Montserrat no other expression could fittingly be used to describe the condition of things than to say that the place has been wiped out.

In these words, last Friday, the newspapers finally described the worst effect of the recent hurricane in the West Indies. There is surely a pleasant significance in the fact that three weeks had passed before a news agency ventured, on the arrival of the mail from the West Indies, and on the authority of letters received by the Relief Committee, to supplement its original alarmist telegrams by this calm ratification.

This discreet and truthful journalism recalls the case of an island catastrophe of the last century which was very differently handled. The event was the reported blowing up of the island of St. Vincent, and the journalism was Daniel Defoe's. In sober fact, the island was not blown up, or even damaged, but Defoe imposed his masterly lie upon London for the very same length of time which—in this age of telegraphs—has been devoted to obtaining the truth about the West Indian hurricane.

Defoe's narrative appeared in Mist's Journal of July 5, 1718. In those days there were no press agencies. Merchantmen, sailing slowly under convoy, would arrive at last in the Thames, and the sailors would soon be spinning their yarns in the dens of Redriff and Wapping. By this means, and by the letters received by City merchants, the news of an earthquake or other event, such as this of St. Vincent, would break upon the coffee-houses, and find its way into the Flying Posts, the Intelligencers, and all the rival prints of that gossiping age. As everyone wanted news, and as news could not be quickly checked or supplemented, there was the strongest temptation to inflate a rumour into a detailed narrative. The clever journalist was he who could lie plausibly. Now of all journalists, and of all liars, Defoe was the greatest. This coffee-house tale, of St. Vincent going up in dust to the skies, would hit his taste to a miracle. He had done things in this kind before; and there need not be the slightest delay in giving the public satisfaction—in Mist's Journal.

Defoe began his narrative with the assurance of an artist. Having no more fact to go upon than would just wet his pen, he declared that he was overwhelmed with reports of the event, the like of which "never happened since the Creation, or, at least, since the destruction of the Earth by Water in the general Deluge."

Our accounts of this come from so many several hands, and several places, that it would be impossible to bring all the letters separately into this Journal; and, when we had done so, or attempted to do so, would have the story confus'd, and the World not perfectly inform'd. We have therefore thought it better to give the substance of this amazing Accident in one collection, making together as full and as distinct account of the whole as we believe is possible to come at by any intelligence whatsoever; and at the close of this account we shall give some probable guesses at the natural cause of so terrible an operation.

Defoe proceeds with marble gravity to describe the island of St. Vincent, its position, physical character, and people. Next, he gently leads up to the catastrophe by stating that, on March 24, a French sloop, which had passed the island two days previously, arrived at Martinico. The master of the sloop reported that he had purchased some fish from the savages of St. Vincent, who brought them to him in three canoes, and that all was safe on the island for anything that he perceived. However, one of the Indians had told them that they had been frightened with earthquakes for some time. On the 27th, in the morning (Defoe proceeds), all those parts of the seas were darkened in a dreadful and mysterious manner, which no one could account for, though it was to be mentioned that on the 26th, about eleven o'clock at night, a dreadful flash of lightning, as it seemed, was witnessed from some neighbouring islands, where the effects of the disaster were perceived long before their cause was known.

By dwelling on these phenomena, and making them seem real, Defoe prepares his readers to accept their grand cause. Thus he describes, with the nicest assumption of knowledge, how fine dust fell all about those parts, but—you are to note—not all of a thickness, for (here you have a vision of Defoe rummaging among piles of foreign letters) some Ships had it nine inches, others a foot thick—upon their Decks; the Island of Martinico is covered with it at about 7 to 9 inches thick: at Barbadoes it is frightful, even to St. Christopher's it exceeded four inches; it is fallen over the whole extent of the Isle of Hispaniola, and there is no doubt but it has been seen on the Continent of New Spain, about the point of Guiana, or the mouth of the Oronoco, all which will perhaps be accounted for in some measure in the following Narrative.

Observe how Defoe pretends to sympathise with his reader's incredulity, and promises him light if he will but grope on. The dust having continued to fall for several days and no man being able "to find out, or so much as guess, at the meaning of it, or of any natural Cause to produce it till the whole came to discover itself," the news came by "some Vessels that were under sail, in the Night of the 26th, belonging to Martinico," by which we had the following particulars: that on the night of the said 26th, about Midnight, the whole Island of St. Vincent rose up in the Air, with a most dreadful eruption of Fire from underneath the Earth, and an inconceivable Noise in the Air at its rising up, that it was not only blown up, but blown out of the very sea, with a dreadful force, as it were torn up by the Roots, or blown up from the Foundations of the Earth.

We have it now, and Defoe's game is to heap up the wonder while his readers are yet speechless. "The Terror was inexpressible, and cannot be represented by Words." The island "was rais'd so furiously that the Earth was entirely separated into small particles of Dust, . . . and fell light and gradually, like a small but thick Mist." But whereas the more solid parts of the island "suppos'd to be of Stone, Slate, or Clay," would not dissipate in the air, these parts fell in solid masses into the sea, where (our author sagely reflects) they must have made sounds like cannon. Having appeared to reason privately that there must have been sounds like cannon, the arch-humbag bethinks himself that these were the "Reports or Blows which were heard even to St. Christopher's Island (which is a vast distance from St. Vincent), and of which the people in these Islands, as well as in the Ships, heard about a thousand or twelve hundred distinct Blows or Reports, and supposed it to be the Noise of Guns."

Easily divining his reader's next demand, Defoe tells how, when the intelligence got abroad, sloops, barques, and all kinds of vessels, sailed to the spot to inquire and give aid; and we are shown these mariners cruising about, rubbing their eyes in bewilderment, blaming their steersmen, and taking observations, and finally realising that the island was no more, and had left no vestige on the face of the waters except—Defoe loves to recommend a staggering fiction by a small concession—“three little rocks,” while the Sea that swept over it was “excessive deep, and no Bottom to be found, at two hundred Fathom.”

Defoe now proceeds to look for probable causes of the disaster, and with admirable candour and caution affects to see two possible explanations: (1) an earthquake, or (2) subterranean fires on which a vast body of water was let loose. But first he loftily pooh-poohs those who by casting up the Dimensions of the Island, to reduce it to cubical inches, are pretending to tell us what weight of Earth this Blast has rais'd up, and consequently would tell us what force it was that must raise it; but this is a perfectly needless Enquiry, and many Ways impracticable also.

An earthquake he rejects as too weak an instrument; because—and here his frankness in stating the problem becomes positively dazzling—for an Island to be blown up into the Air, as if it were undermin'd and b'own up by Gun-powder, like a Bastion in a Town besieged; and, for the force to be such, as to blow up the solid Earth into the third Region, as we may say,—to such a stupendous prodigious height, as to have it go up an Island, and come down in Sand;—go up in Bulk, and come down in Atoms;—to go up Perpendicular, and be spread about to 100 miles distance;—this is unaccountable, but by some Force superior to that of ten Millions of Barrels of Gun-powder.

Defoe therefore favours the idea that an inrush of the sea on subterranean fires had caused steam to generate on such a scale that a stupendous explosion followed. This theory he ingeniously supports by references to hot springs, and by volcanoes, of which he gives a cloud of names. He even observes that a vast body of the sea invading a great body of fire would “not fail to blow up, not such an Island as St. Vincent only, but an Island 40 times as big, in proportion to the extent of the Fire below.” All this is brought forward so gradually, so plausibly, with such nice deductions and asides, not omitting an ascription of power to the Creator—who “might as easily Blow this whole Earth up”—that one might suppose that the work of deception was done. But Defoe knows better. He knows that the spell of his narrative is likely to be broken when the reader returns to actual life, to the sober incidents of present time and place. And so he seeks to bring home the destruction of St. Vincent by associating it with these very actualities. The bursting of the island of St. Vincent through a conversion of the sea into steam may be familiarised, he says (the italics are ours, the impudence Defoe's), “by the throwing a Pail of Water hastily into a Furnace—suppose such as a Brewer's Furnace—which will immediately burst out again, with a violence proportioned to the quantity of Water.” This is delicious, but it is not all. The fictive and remote catastrophe shall be allied to a catastrophe real and authentic. Let the last doubting Thomas recall a very sad accident which happened not many years ago in London, and which most people have heard of—viz., at the Foundry at Windmill Hill, by Moorfields, where the Metal for casting of a great Gun, running into a Mould ill prepared, and which had receiv'd some Water (tho' by the relation of all concerned in it, and that were alive, that Water, by the Cavity of the Mould, could not be equal to a Gallon; yet it blew up the whole Work, and blew the melted Metal up, as light as if it had been the lightest Earth, throwing it about the whole Place, separated in small parts like Drops, so that it overwhelmed, as with a Shower of Molten Brass, those that were near, and almost all who were in the Place were either kill'd or terribly hurt by it.

Three weeks after this amazing concoction had appeared, when its hypnotic force had weakened, and murmurs of dissent were growing, Defoe inserted in Mist's Journal the following paragraph:

They pretend to tell us a strange Story, viz., that the Island of St. Vincent is found again, and is turn'd into a Volcano, or Burning Mountain; but we must acknowledge we do not believe one word of it.

And so, leaving his accusers to gasp, Defoe returned to legitimate fiction. He was then writing Robinson Crusoe.

Things Seen.

Happiness.

Just an impression of quiet happiness—nothing more—yet it remains. I came upon it suddenly while wandering through the salt marshes at the sunset calm that followed a two days' gale. The ferryman, in answer to my hail, was straining across the shallow, sun-flashed water, when my eye fell upon the little coasting barque Elizabeth and Children that had come up the river with the tide in the afternoon. She had been made spruce after the gale, and now, it being evening time, the skipper's wife and children had come over the marshes to sit with him. They did not talk; they did not need to be amused; they just sat together in the stern—re-united—port after storm. The skipper smoked his pipe, looking intently at nothing, after the manner of sailormen; Elizabeth knitted, smiling quietly; the boy read; the girl was sewing, singing as she sewed; and the grandmother sat with her hand tucked under the skipper's arm. That was all—just happiness, perfect happiness—that was all.

Freedom.

THROUGH my dreams ran the clatter of hoofs, and the rumble of wheels. When I awoke I ran to the window, and, ho! ho!—it was the circus, in travelling dress, whirling through the village in the quiet dawn. Just a mile or two of painted vans—creaking, colossal—lumbering after one another at vague intervals. The roofs of the vans were littered with hay, and on the hay negroes—with red shirts open at the neck—sprawled. The drivers of the vans, no longer dandy grooms, but sleepy men in corduroys, were strapped round the waist to prevent them falling off into honeysuckle hedgerows. Sometimes the panels of a van were open, and then I saw through bars the free animals of the world—lions, bears, eagles. The plump circus horses, that ambled at night-time round the ring, were now dragging the vans, three abreast, tugging, straining at the traces. So through the village for an hour went the circus, and every van was locked and padlocked, and every live creature caged or harnessed.

It seemed, as I leaned from the window in that grey dawn, that all the world was captive: then, suddenly, when the last of the vans had gone by, and I thought the sight was ended, I heard the clatter of innumerable hoofs on the hard road, not the heavy footfall of harnessed beasts, but the quick rush of free things. They galloped past, those horses and ponies, for whom there were no vans to drag, and they carried neither bit nor bridle, rein nor trace. They were just let loose to go their own way along the high road, and following them came three mounted gipsy men with long whips, but the gipsy men were always far behind the free things—half a hundred of them neighing and tossing their manes. It was a heartsome sight! How often since have I heard the little hoofs of those free things pattering through the dawn.

Essays in Enthusiastic Journalism.

II.—“Le Petit Journal des Refusées.”

The feathered birds with pinions cleave the air;
Not so the mackerel, and much less the bear!

Nor less unlike than these were the Lark and Le Petit Journal des Refusées. This last periodical was, during its brief day, the most outrageous violation of good taste extant; our audacity shrunk from no extreme; we were bound to out-lark the Lark itself.

For it had dawned upon us that the Lark had a policy; it was still sui generis, but as our sermons became more serious, our pleasantries grew more subtle. We were drawing away from pure nonsense, but as the Lark was still too precious to us to be abandoned, some of les jeunes determined to throw off a satellite which, revolving to a madder tune, might relieve our abandoned desires. And so, after a mighty travail, Le Petit Journal des Refusées was brought forth. It was to send out a rollicking, whooping gabble of nonsense-verbiage, with no trace of sobriety in any form. It might be silly, but it should not be sly. There should be no arrière pensée. It was to be the “freak monthly” of the era reduced to an absurdity.

The craze for “fad magazinelets” in the United States was then in full cry. It was in that marvellous year of our Lord, 1896, when whoever could get possession of a printing-press was helping to burden the news-stands with cheap satire and pretentious precocity. Art was running amuck through Posterdom; Literature was staggering blindfold in a drunken spree, and every little dog was having his day in journalism while the pamphleteering mania lasted. The Lark had little part in this pandemonium, but the Refusées set a pace that few could, or wished, to follow.

Where, indeed, in the world, beside San Francisco, is there a place in which such misspent, insane endeavour could be possible; where two men, no longer in their first youth, and with an hundred other irons in the fire, would toil for a month to produce sixteen pages of such fantastic rubbish as we perpetrated in that little office on Sutter Street? But my own blood had not yet begun to cool; nor has it yet, thank God! I would link arms with any other such madman as Porter Garnett, in any other such absurd enterprise to-day, at the drop of the hat! But not in London town. We should need the rattle of the “nickel-in-the-slot” gambling machines to egg us on at every corner, the miles of squalid or florid wooden houses, the glamour of new-made fortunes, the picturesque juxtaposition of extremes, the flap of the “yellow” supplement, the frank lips, the open hands, the keen eyes of a city of quick-witted, reckless, gaming, shameless, scurrying, hot-blooded Philistines, and the friendly badinage of Mine Own People. No, not in your London town!

With something like a blush I recall the intellectual orgies of that month. There were intervals of sobriety, when I lay over my draughting-table designing and detailing chiffoniers and library furniture, but there was wine and whisky in the off-shore breeze, and as soon as my fellow-imbecile appeared in the afternoon we proceeded in our foolery with all the spirit that goes to produce a debauch. Thus we cajoled the Tenth Muse of Nonsense. It was gas-lit work, most of it, and bore traces of late hours. We dared each other to wilder sortics from the walls of Convention. How many times have we not gone back to a finished drawing and retouched it in order to destroy some fancied verisimilitude!

We found a backer for our folly—one could find a patron for any wild-goose chase in that dare-devil community—and after we had doffed our motley, and gone to camp in the virgin redwoods, while the crime went to press, we looked at each other and wondered—Porter Garnett and I—if what had been was so. We were awakened to our senses by receiving a number of copies of Le Petit Journal des Refusées.

In the memory of man the shape of a magazine had not varied from the severe rectangle; but here was a new heresy. The booklet was cut to the shape of an inebriated trapezoid—trimmed like the spanker of a ship. Each copy was printed upon a different pattern of wall-paper, with what effects of bizarre floriation and outré decorative problems the sane mind recoils from imagining. Here in our little packet were sixteen several nightmares, and one had the grim choice of horrors—to go mad at not being able to decipher the text through the involutions of this duplex aberration, or, attacking the copies printed on comparatively subdued tones, to lose reason more surely in the endeavour to disentangle the sinuous vermiculations of perverted syllogisms—in a word, one pang was the slow ache of the bruise to Taste, the other the swift pain of the stab to Reason. Though the above sentence is not a quotation, it may give some hint of that style in which the Refusées achieved an infamous distinction. And thus should manner ever marry matter, according to the modern Æsthetic.

The book purported to be compiled from contributions that had been refused by at least three periodicals of repute, and these articles were all signed by women's names—a sufficiently obvious satire, and well atoned for; though vengeance still pursues us. To bring an end to these hyperboles we escaped blasphemy by a hair's breadth, we violated all dignity, we defamed taste; yet all without an unclean suggestion or a double meaning.

But nothing is strange enough, nothing is mad enough, to excite a ripple of interest in San Francisco—not, at least, in literature. Nor can one lose caste in a town where there are no classes. Perhaps the fit did us no harm; it at least quieted our spirits, and the jeers of our friends soon died down as they confidently awaited our next indiscretion. It is hardly necessary to say that not a penny was made out of the adventure. The edition passed out of sight, almost unnoticed in the ruck of the army of amateur journals; and how many, if any, were sold, or even how many were printed, we never thought to inquire. We were content with the sixteen terrible copies that we presented, shamelessly enough, to our friends.

Still, in spite of the humiliation of this confession, I would like to look on, sometime, and see some other butterfly-brained enthusiast do a little blood-letting like the Petit Journal affair, for the childish fun of the game, in an excess of jubilant carelessness over the issue. It may do me good, then, for I may sometime grow up after all!

GELETT BURGESS.

A Library for Children.

THIS subject has interested so many of our readers that we have procured the opinions of a few booksellers. These, it may be assumed, show what books are actually in most demand for children.

A London (City) firm sends us the following list:

FOR CHILDREN UNDER SIX.

Baby's Opera. Walter Crane.
Struwwelpeter.
Alice in Wonderland.
Andersen's Fairy Tales.

FOR CHILDREN FROM SIX TO TEN.

King of the Golden River. Ruskin.
Heroes. Kingsley.
Child's Garden of Verse. Stevenson.
Arabian Nights. Andrew Lang's edition.

FOR CHILDREN OVER TEN.

Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare.
Tom Brown's Schooldays.
Lyra Heroica. Henley.
Deeds that Won the Empire. Fitchett.

Three other booksellers also supply answers to the question. This is from Eastbourne :

Robinson Crusoe.
Andersen's Fairy Tales.
Little Lord Fauntleroy.
Alice in Wonderland.
The Struwwelpeter.
Arabian Nights.
Mother Goose's Nursery Rhymes and Tales.
Masterman Ready.
Blue Fairy Book.
Pilgrim's Progress.
Ministering Children.
Swiss Family Robinson.

And this from Manchester :

Robinson Crusoe.
An Old-Fashioned Girl. Louisa M. Alcott.
Nelly's Dark Days. Hesba Stretton.
Jessica's First Prayer. Hesba Stretton.
Carrots. Mrs. Molesworth.
Andersen's Fairy Tales.
Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare.
A Peep Behind the Scenes. Mrs. Walton.
Alice in Wonderland.
Jackanapes.
The Water Babies.
Little Lord Fauntleroy.

And this from London (West Central) :

Struwwelpeter.
Book of Nonsense. Lear.
Grimm's Fairy Tales.
Andersen's Fairy Tales.
Alice in Wonderland.
Jungle Book. Kipling.
Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare.
Masterman Ready.
Tom Brown's Schooldays.
Robinson Crusoe.
Westward Ho!
Child's Garden of Verse. Stevenson.

A Correspondent writes : " I am much interested in the twelve best books for children. I venture to send the name of one which seems to me little known, and which is so very good—The Gentle Heritage, by F. E. Crompton, suitable for the ages of five to nine, and a pleasure for the children of an older growth to read aloud, which is not always the case. Tales from St. Paul's Cathedral and Tales from Westminster Abbey, both by Mrs. Frewen Lord, are also great favourites with my children. It would be very interesting to me personally if the twelve best books in French for children of eight to twelve could be given ; but perhaps this is not possible."

The question of Shakespeare's position in regard to children is interesting. We have demurred to Shakespeare's Works (as being too ponderous) and to Shakespeare's Poems (as being clearly unsuitable) ; but it was not our intention to suggest that Shakespeare's plays were beyond the capacities of children under twelve, if properly presented. In this connexion Mrs. Sappho Scott sends us an interesting letter, from which we quote her experience of Shakespeare when a child :

" My mother being dead, I lodged with a family of dull folk, in order that I might go to an especially good school, and the dull folk did not like my reading out of school hours. So I spent many hours with my needlework in a little room from which all the books except those which, ' of course, no child would dream of reading ' had been removed. The three left were a one shilling Shakespeare—think of the print—a paper-covered half-crown copy of Scott's poems, and a Bible—also atrocious print. I read all three again and again, and did not guess till age brought a greater knowledge how little I understood them. To my ignorance each seemed entirely comprehensible.

Then came a time when I was to be sent up for a College of Preceptors exam. No objection, therefore, could be raised to my extra reading, and a schoolfellow lent me Vanity Fair. I ripped out Collier's British Empire and set Thackeray between its covers, and so read all the evening ; and when night came I stood by the gas, with a finger on its turn, reading, reading, when I ought to have been in bed.

But though Vanity Fair became then, and has been ever since, one of the world's wonder-books for me, Shakespeare, Scott, and the Bible were first favourites. I only did not include the Bible in my list because I liked it—not from a religious, but from a literary, point of view."

Mrs. Harriet S. Miller writes : " I have been much interested by reading in the ACADEMY various suggestions for a child's library. Surely, children ought to be allowed to choose their own books, as I was allowed, at the age of eleven, seventy-seven years ago ! It was a very small choice of books, but small as it was I still feel how much I owe to their immortal authors. The years just preceding the age of twelve, when memory is at its keenest, seem to me now the most precious for acquiring lifelong knowledge. No fairy tale could have fascinated me more than all those in the list I enclose :

Pope's Homer's Iliad.
Paradise Lost.
Hundred Wonders of the World.
Thomson's Seasons.
Elegant Extracts, in Prose and Verse, including Gulliver's Travels.
An odd volume of the Spectator (8vo).
Miss Edgeworth's Tales.
Rasselas.
Paul and Virginia.
Elizabeth ; or, the Exiles of Siberia.

Fragments from Regnier.

ÉPIGRAMME DE MATHURIN REGNIER.

Faite par lui-même.

J'ay vescu sans nul pensement,
Me laissant aller doucement
A la bonne loi naturelle ;
Et si m'estonne fort pourquoy
La Mort osa songer à moi
Qui ne songeay jamais en elle.

Adaptation.

Obedient to sweet Nature's laws
Thus long I've lived without a pause
Of care to cloud my brow.
Then great indeed my wonderment
That Death, to whom I never lent
One thought, dare claim me now.

HÉLAS.

Plus ne suis ce que j'ai été
Et ne le saurai jamais être.
Mon beau Printemps et mon été,
Ont fait le saut par la fenêtre.
Amour ! tu as été mon maître,
Je t'ai servi sur tous les Dieux
Ah ! si je pouvais deux fois naître.
Combien je te servirais mieux.

Adaptation.

No longer am I what I was,
Nor e'er again shall be.
My blithesome spring and summer days
Long, long have fled from me.
My Master Love ! all Gods before
I've served thee well, and fain,
Ah ! could I but be born once more,
Would serve thee well again.

PAUL SWINBURNE.

Memoirs of the Moment.

NEWBY HALL, where the Prince of Wales is to be the guest of Mr. Vyner, was designed in the first instance by Sir Christopher Wren, and the subsequent additions are all in keeping. Yorkshire had at one time rather a particular taste for classical architecture, not at all in keeping with the real tastes of its people or the genius of the place. Newby Hall is, of course, a sporting centre, like almost every other great house in that county. Earl de Grey left the property to his daughter, Lady Mary Vyner, when his title went to his nephew, the Marquis of Ripon, whose eldest son bears it. Lady Mary's interest in sport was perhaps modified by her interest in Church affairs, but her son, the present owner of the Newby property, maintains the old traditions intact. The parties at the house are usually arranged with a view to the sporting proclivities of the guests; and sportsmen, whatever they may be to outsiders, are never a bore to each other. Lord Bennet, in his younger days, when visiting the Yorkshire seat of the Duke of Cleveland, wrote in the visitors' book:

What a pity at Raby
There isn't a baby.

Adapting the lines, a guest of Mr. Vyner's not long ago wrote in a private letter of ecstasy to a fellow-sportsman:

What a blessing at Newby
There isn't a booby.

LORD LONSDALE is about to do the dreadful deed, or what would be accounted such in the Hall of Justice at Rennes. He is going to attend at Stuttgart, and, as the guest of the Emperor William, the German autumn manoeuvres.

VARYING reports are printed as to the condition of the Marquis of Bute. He is doing well; he has had a relapse; he has not had a relapse; he is making satisfactory progress. Perhaps it is an inevitable consequence of the nervousness of the patient, to whom the publicity of official bulletins is odious, that unauthorised rumours should appear. But the truth is that the condition of the patient is very serious. Ever since the year 1886 this fit of apoplexy, with the attendant paralysis, has been anticipated. He has been a warned man all the time, and the strength which has deferred the fall of the blow until now has been an astonishment—perhaps even a slight humiliation—to the men of medicine who predicted it. The vague fear, so long harboured by Lord Bute's family and friends, has been realised at last; and it is turned instead to an imminent menace and dread.

In personal appearance and in manners the late Baron Grant was a man of considerable distinction. When the King of Italy made him a Baron there was, of course, the jest about a "barren grant" of honours. But many an English title has been bestowed with less personal fitness and less public cause. Baron Grant was a good speaker, with a sense of logic as well as of expression. He was, besides, the most sanguine of men, sanguine of making a "coup" till the very last Saturday of his life, when his name once again appeared on the lists in the Bankruptcy Court. Leicester-square will be his best memorial. Its proved beneficence as a place of recreation rewarded his good-heartedness; and the statue of Shakespeare, which he believed to be the first ever erected out of doors in England, remains as a monument also to his own good taste.

CARDINAL VAUGHAN, who so much enjoyed his recent stay with Lord and Lady Edmund Talbot that he has arranged to return thither, is by no means willing that the chivalry of the French nation, as a whole, should be passed sentence upon in England as all of a piece with the quality of mercy and justice in the Dreyfus case. The Cardinal has a little evidence to offer—evidence much more relevant and first-hand than most of that offered at Rennes. He himself was at school in France, and he has not, like a very common type of ecclesiastic, obliterated from his memory the fact that he was once a boy. Moreover, he remembers that he belonged in those days to the church militant. He confesses that he fought many a French fellow with his two English fists; and he remembers also, and holds in grateful remembrance, the fair-play shown to the Herefordshire boy when he beat one of his four hundred French schoolfellows. The other three hundred and ninety-nine did not turn and cage the British lion; and the masters patted him, and approved the punchings he gave their young compatriots, so long as his cause was a good one, all national prejudice notwithstanding. The generation of Frenchmen so schooled must differ very widely to-day from their contemporaries—the Merciers and the Zurlindens.

IF Mr. Owen Glynne Jones had not lost his life on the Dent Blanche, he would before long have added greatly to the reputation as a writer he gained by a book he published about rock-climbing in England. He had already projected for next year a climbing tour in India, and he intended to make his trip the subject of an illustrated volume.

The Empty Homes of England.

Devizes Castle.

DEVIZES CASTLE, which is now for private sale, is one of the few successful imitations which have ever been built of a mediæval castle. With the exception of two of the ancient towers, which are still in good condition, it is almost entirely modern; but it is built upon a portion of the site of the old fortress, and is the legitimate heir of its historic associations. The new castle does not pretend to be a reproduction of the old one, but an imitation, on a modified scale of size, of a castle of the period when the original pile was built.

Through all the centuries which we call mediæval Devizes Castle was one of the most famous strongholds in Europe. One of the old French chroniclers said of it: "Il elevast la teste par desous tous les autres chasteaux de l'Angleterre." To Matthew Paris it presented itself as the most magnificent castle in Christendom, and it is clear that it was a work of immense strength, rendered almost impregnable by its solidity and its commanding site. Devizes was built upon the foundations of a far earlier fortress by that redoubtable castle-builder, Roger Poor, Bishop of Salisbury, who flourished like the green bay-tree in the reign of Henry I. He spent untold sums upon this stronghold—all, of course, "for the ornament of the Church." The stern experiences of Devizes Castle began in 1146, when Bishop Roger's political intrigues got him into trouble. King Stephen, suspecting the Bishop of favouring the claims of Matilda to the throne, besieged the castle. The shrewd Churchman had prudently taken himself elsewhere, but had left the Bishop of Ely in charge of the castle and of a certain lady, Matilda of Ramsbury, who was the mother of Roger's son, the Lord Chancellor. Stephen perceived the hopelessness of storming the castle, but presently, having the good fortune to capture my lord of Sarum and his son, the Chancellor, he erected a gibbet in front of the castle, and sent word to the lady of Ramsbury that her son and his father would both be hanged upon it unless she prevailed upon the Bishop of Ely to surrender. After three days she outwitted Ely, delivered the place to the King, and so saved the two dignitaries. The Empress Matilda was very soon afterwards hunted into the castle by Stephen, but, happily for herself, she escaped to Gloucester. Henry II. erected Devizes Castle into a Royal palace and a State prison—for the matter of that, indeed, Robert, Duke of Normandy, the first Henry's elder brother, had been confined there at the very beginning of the twelfth century; and Hubert de Burgh, Earl of Kent, was not the least important of the many State prisoners who afterwards occupied its dungeons. Devizes was bestowed upon eleven Queens of England as part of their dowers, the first being Matilda, and the last Catherine Parr. Even in the lifetime of the last of the eighth Henry's wives the castle was falling into decay—a decay which, helped by the inevitable Cromwellian siege, went on until all that now remains of this famous outcome of priestly ambition are a few Norman gateways, the rampart walk, the bastion, a tower or two, and some dungeons.

The picturesque buildings now known as Devizes Castle were commenced some sixty years ago by Mr. R. Valentine Leach, and they were added to, and remodelled by, his successor, Sir Charles Rich, Bart. The castle dominates the town, from which, however, little more than its towers and battlements can be seen. There is now neither draw-bridge nor moat. The one disappeared ages ago, and the other has been filled up to form a portion of the grounds. It is not its size, which is distinctly moderate, but its admirable architecture and its beautiful and consistent decoration which make the house remarkable. There is nothing of the lath-and-plaster Gothic of Nash or Wyattville about it. Consistency of design was the main object aimed at in the building of this modern copy of a feudal fortress; and everything, down to the characteristic axe-work of the Norman builders, is in exact imitation of ancient models. The house contains some fine apartments, notably the gallery and the drawing-room. The ceiling of the latter is emblazoned with the arms of those Queens of England who at one time or another possessed the castle. A sliding panel leads from the drawing-room to a secret chamber in the old Ivy Tower. The upper windows of the castle afford charming glimpses of the Mendips and the Cotswolds, Salisbury Plain and Roundway Down. Few buildings, even among those which have stood for centuries, have such a wealth of climbing greenery, some portions being absolutely buried in the crimson and gold, the green and white, of creeping and flowering plants.

Correspondence.

The Knapsack Library.

SIR,—I have been much interested in the article contained in your issue of this week by Mr. Le Gallienne concerning "knapsack" books, and it has just occurred to me that as you have had sent you various lists of books—"Children's Books," "An Old Maid's Books," &c.—it might be interesting to ask your readers for a list of, say, twelve "knapsack" books. On my annual holiday, just ended, my list was as follows:

Songs and Sonnets of Shakespeare.	Golden Treasury.
Keats.	"
Selections from Wordsworth.	"
" Shelley.	"
" Herrick.	"
" Coleridge.	Chiswick Press.
Complete Angler.	Facsimile of first edition.
Walden.	Scott's Camelot.
Under Two Flags.
Forest Lovers.
Cloister and Hearth.
Cigarette Maker's Romance.

The last four in the paper-backed sixpenny editions. The whole parcel weighed very little and took up small space.

You will see that there are six poetical and six prose works.

Perhaps I may say that I am engaged in mercantile work and always look forward to my holiday as a time for a little pleasant reading among the hills or on the seashore of North Wales.—I am, &c.,

RAYMOND DELL.

Little Sutton: September 2, 1899.

The William Black Memorial.

SIR,—No one can object to the form of the "William Black" Memorial, the ACADEMY sketch of which I have just seen on my return from Oban. Reasonable objection, however, can, I think, be taken to the site selected for it. In some respects the choice is suitable, for it is close to a favourite residence of the novelist, and stands at the seagate of the Western Highlands he loved so well; but in others the choice does not commend itself. Duart Point is already crowned by Duart Castle, a building the predominating feature of which is the same massive square tower which characterises the memorial. The general appearance of both is so similar that the conjunction is undesirable. As it at present exists Duart Point is one of the most picturesque headlands on the coast. Should the memorial be erected near it, the beauty and symmetry of the promontory will be destroyed from many view-points. The Beacon will "kill" the Castle, or the Castle the Beacon.—I am, &c.,

J. CALDER ROSS.

Strathguy: September 6, 1899.

On the Trail of "The Bookworm."

SIR,—Re "The Bookworm" of September 2, Christie Johnstone and It is Never Too Late to Mend were printed so far back as 1893, at sixpence.

If The Great Artists "which helps to fill one of the shelves of my library" were taken down occasionally, he would find how far wide of facts his notes of this "series" are. Instead of being published in the early nineties, six of them at least were published in 1879, three or four in 1880, and the end of them 1891-2. Again, "Sculpture" was treated of, in the lives of Ghiberti and Donatello, by Leader Scott; and in Della Robbia, Cellini, and other Celebrated Sculptors of the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries, also from the same hand; while, of course, "Buonarroti" was as much a sculptor as a painter.—I am, &c.,

T. EDWARDES-JONES.

Ipswich: September 2, 1899.

SIR,—In your issue of August 26 "The Bookworm," referring to the "Old Playgoer's" letters in the Pall Mall Gazette, states: "It is well known that Mr. Arnold contributed to the Gazette from time to time a number of such articles, many of which are referred to in the volumes containing the Letters." Now, I can find only three of the "Old Playgoer's" notes alluded to in the Letters—viz., "The Silver King," December 6, 1882; "Impulse," May 25, 1883; and "Much Ado about Nothing," May 30, 1883. If Mr. Arnold contributed to the Pall Mall Gazette any other articles of this class besides the one on "Hamlet," I and, I am sure, many of your readers would be glad to hear of them.—I am, &c.,

THOS. B. SMART

(Compiler of the Bibliography of Matthew Arnold).

A Hint to Lexicographers.

SIR,—I may be held as hypercritical in raising as a moot point a question regarding the impressions given to the mind by the term "grey" or "gray"; but there is a blue tone that has no other word to convey it to the ordinary reader's imagination than "gray," which, according to one's dictionary, means "a mixture of black and white; an ashy colour." Painters and colour scientists having recognised the difficulty, overcome it by interchanging the vowels. Thus, in works on painting, gray expresses a mixture of white and black, or black and any other colour; gray is used for a mixture of white and blue.

One desiring to describe azure-gray eyes must use that too strong a compound in every passing allusion to the colour of the eyes, and jar his literary sense, or fall back upon the loose and, consequently, dangerously weak terms gray or grey, either of which some readers may take to indicate the dirty or ashy hue.

Concerning this word's ambiguity we find in Chaucer, "Hire eyen grey as glas." There is in Homer no word which defines blue or gray exactly; and, according to one's Liddell & Scott, γλαυκῶπις, used in an Homeric epithet of Athena, implies not so much the colour as the glare or gleam of her eyes, although other authorities, if memory serves, prefer azure-eyed. Later, γλαυκός is held to have meant cerulean (cæsius) gray, blue; and in this sense the present writer would render—τὸ δὲ βλέμμα νῦν ἀληθῶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πυρὸς ποίησον· ἔμα γλαυκὸν, ὡς Ἀθήνη·

ἔμα δ' ὕγρον, ὡς κυθήνη, from an ode of the prim Anacreon, unless the poet uses the adjective in the Homeric sense, as does Lucian in the Dialogues.

That γλαυκός (cæsius) was used definitely for gray such a compound as γλαυκοχαίτης sufficiently demonstrates, for blue hair is surely uncommon.

Since, therefore, ancient writers do not seem to assist us here, and the lexicographers have offered no hand in the dilemma, and as a precedent has been made by the world of painting, may I venture to solicit an opinion on the suggestions (a) that henceforward gray be used by careful writers to express a tone of blue; gray, a shade of black; (b) that in new editions of dictionaries the distinction be observed?—I am, &c., J. MALHAM DEMBLEBY.

Bradford: September 4, 1899.

Samuel Richardson.

SIR,—It has occurred to me that the enclosed information, which I have come across while reading for a biography of the novelist Samuel Richardson, may be of interest to your readers, and suitable for insertion in your paper.—I am, &c., CLARA THOMSON.

Apropos of the interesting volumes lately published by the Hakluyt Society, The Embassy of Sir Thomas Roe to the Court of the Great Mogul, it is worth while recalling that Roe's later embassy to the Ottoman Porte formed the subject of a work edited by Samuel Richardson, the novelist, in 1740. This year also saw the publication of a much more memorable book, namely, Pamela; or, Virtue Rewarded, and, notwithstanding the difference in the subject matter, it is easy to trace the hand of the novelist in the preface and index to Roe's letters. The index, indeed, like that afterwards affixed to Clarissa Harlowe, is a summary of, rather than a guide to, the contents, and throws a good deal of light on Richardson's methodical habit of work. The book, a huge folio, was published at the expense of a Society for the Encouragement of Learning, which, it is sad to relate, had but a brief existence.

Sixpenny Reprints.

SIR,—A paragraph in your Bibliographical column last week no doubt refers to our sixpenny editions of Dead Secret and It is Never too Late to Mend. In the same series we have already issued Basil and Christie Johnstone.—We are, &c., DOWNEY & CO., LTD.

London: September 6, 1899.

Peccadilloes.

SIR,—

Since, it would seem, 'twere no less absurd to say "By the by," than "by the from"—why spell the word that way?

Our language has, of course, the preposition "by"; Though not the substantive can diligence descry! But there is "bye" in use: whose meaning may be sought And found by reference to the world of sport: Videlicet, the trite familiar byes Of Cricket, Running, and other "heats," of "rounds" and "ties"—

A something passed—gone by. Thus "by the bye" is said When something gone by prompts to something ahead. As thus: Here, by the bye, 'twere not amiss to say That "by the bye" is quite distinct from "by the way"; And that the use of "by," preceded by article, Is only (and always) correct when used as particle!

—I am, sir, yours discriminatively,

GOOD-B'YE.

The Old Captive.

To hear once more the thunder of the surf,
To breathe once more the salt and stinging wind,
To set my cheek once more against the wave,
To look once more across the billowy Sea!

Chained in the pen of silent heavy hills,
I dream hot nights of that sweet long ago,
When I leaped down the beach in the dim dawn,
And plunged to meet the sun—and knew the Sea!

And they drove in the boats with a shout and a song,
And they spread wide the nets in the face o' the wind,
And the ship strained and dipped like a swooping bird,
And we rushed onward, mad for the open Sea!

Never to feed my eyes on strange dim coasts,
Never to touch a branch washed in by the tide,
Never to gaze on dark and silent men
From some far isle in the mysterious Sea!

Never to see the white sails gleam and fade,
Nor watch black masts against the setting sun,
Never to glide within some wondrous port,
Nor breathe spice winds blown soft across the Sea!

Never to feel the great sail fill and stretch,
Nor plough white fiery trails beneath the stars,
Nor float below some tow'ring rosy berg,
Nor ride the sheer gulfs of the stormy Sea!

And they rushed down to the beach to drag us in,
And they pulled hard at the rough and glistening rope,
And the glad keel rubbed harsh on the shelly sand,
And their arms strained us, home from the terrible Sea!

Though in my life I lost thee, tired and dead,
Me they shall bring to thee, O long desired!
Me they shall lay at sunset on the sand,
Where the strong tide swings outward to the Sea.

Me like a cradled child the waves shall rock,
Rock 'neath the moon, and sink to those dim caves,
Those wide green glooms, those clear and pallid depths,
The silence and the strange flowers of the Sea.

And they shall bear me down with a glorious song,
And they shall shout to the crash and boom of the surf,
And they shall thrill to the whip and sting of the spray,
While the great waves ride triumphing out to Sea!

Where the pale light strains down through undreamed deeps
To glimmer o'er the vast unpeopled plains,
The ancient treasure piles of dead kings' fleets,
The mighty bones long bleached beneath the Sea,

There where cool corals and still seaweeds twine,
There on the solemn level ocean floor,
Till God's great arm shall terribly plough the deep,
I shall lie long and rest beneath the Sea.

Josephine Dodge Daskam in the "Atlantic Monthly."

Announcements.

M. MICHEL's Life of Rubens will be published by Mr. Heinemann in October. It is a companion work to the same author's Rembrandt, and forms two large volumes, with several hundred text illustrations and eighty full-page plates. The book will appear simultaneously with the French edition, to the contents of which are added reproductions of several pictures in English hands.

MR. HEINEMANN will also publish Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse's book on British Contemporary Artists—seven studies of the following distinguished painters: Sir Laurence Alma-Tadema, Sir Edward Burne-Jones, Sir John E. Millais, Lord Leighton, W. Orchardson, Sir E. Poynter, and G. F. Watts. The volume will be copiously illustrated.

MR. ROBERT HICHENS's new novel is entitled The Slave, and will be published about October 1.

MR. EDMUND GOSSE's Life of John Donne, in two volumes, will be issued towards the end of the month by Mr. Heinemann. It contains a number of portraits and some new material concerning the Dean's life.

AN English translation of Dr. Bloch's The War of the Future will be published on September 15 by Mr. Grant Richards under the title of Is War Now Impossible? This translation is abridged from the six massive volumes in which the original Russian work appeared, but it contains a large number of the original maps and diagrams.

MR. ANTHONY HOPE's new romance, The King's Mirror, which will be published by Messrs. Methuen on September 13, gives an account of the life of King Augustin of Forstadt, forming a secret history of the Court of Forstadt during the years embraced by the record.

MESSRS. METHUEN are about to publish, in their "Library of Devotion," a new edition of George Herbert's Temple. This has been edited, with an introduction and numerous notes, by Dr. Gibson, the Vicar of Leeds, and it contains also Walton's Life of Herbert. The text is that of the first edition.

THERE are a great many folk-tales and legends to be met with in various parts of Italy relating to Virgil as a magician. Mr. C. I. Leland has been engaged in collecting such stories from oral narration, and has succeeded in bringing together sufficient to make a good-sized volume. He will edit them with introduction and explanatory notes, and will publish them shortly through Mr. Elliot Stock.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. will publish immediately a new novel by Mr. Bloundelle Burton, entitled A Bitter Heritage.

MR. JOHN HOGG is about to publish King Radama's Word; or, John Aikin's Adventures in Madagascar, by Robert Flynne, with an appendix bringing events in Madagascar down to the present time; also The Ducot's Mine; or, a Fight for Fortune, by C. R. Kenyon.

Real Pictures of Clerical Life in Ireland is the title of a new volume of sketches by Dr. J. Duncan Craig, author of John Maverell, which will be issued very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock. Some of these sketches are true narratives of events which happened in Ireland's dark days, though the names of the actors are suppressed.

In Monte Carlo, a novel by Henryk Sienkiewicz, the author of Quo Vadis, is announced for immediate publication by Messrs.

Greening & Co. In Monte Carlo is translated from the original Polish by Mr. S. C. de Soissons, who is also engaged on other translations for the same firm.

A STORY of religion and the stage, entitled The Shadow on the Manse, written by Mr. Campbell Rae-Brown, the author of that weird novel, The Resurrection of His Grace, will be very shortly published by Messrs. Greening & Co.

THE Funk & Wagnalls Company announce The Funk & Wagnalls' Standard Encyclopedia, which will be a companion work to The Funk & Wagnalls' Standard Dictionary. The same general principles that have been followed in The Standard Dictionary will be followed in the making of this encyclopedia; each class of subjects will be in charge of a recognised expert specialist—in all over two hundred expert scholars will be engaged in the preparation of the work; all treatment of terms will be condensed to the last degree consistent with completeness and clearness; and every available device will be used to make the work easy of consultation.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON announce the early publication of the following books: The English Reformation, a Lecture, with Preface and Notes, by the Rev. W. H. Hutton, B.D., Fellow and Tutor of St. John's College, Oxford; History of the Prayer-book, by the Rev. J. H. Maude, M.A., Fellow, Dean, and Lecturer of Hertford College, Oxford; An Elementary Church History of Great Britain, by the Rev. W. H. Hutton, B.D., Fellow, Tutor, and Librarian of St. John's College, Oxford, forming two new volumes of the Oxford Church Text-Books.

MISS FRANCES GERARD will shortly publish, through Messrs. Hutchison, The Romance of Ludwig II. of Bavaria, a life of the mad King of Bavaria, as Ludwig II. was called. When that description of him is forgotten he may still be remembered as the patron and friend of Richard Wagner. Miss Gerard spent some time in Bavaria collecting information for the work, which is to have over fifty illustrations.

A MEMOIR of Canon Hinds Howell, almost the oldest clergyman in the diocese of Norwich, who died recently in his ninety-first year, will shortly appear from the pen of his daughter, Miss Agnes Rous Howell, with an introduction by Edward Meyrick Goulburn, D.D., late Dean of Norwich.

MR. JOSEPH HOCKING's new novel, The Scarlet Woman, will be published on October 15.

MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL & SON have now ready for publication several works dealing with Imperial questions. Among these is a cheaper edition, with all the original illustrations, of Mr. Demetrius Boulger's Life of Sir Stamford Raffles, the founder of Singapore and of the Zoological Gardens. The price is now 6s. net. Other works are Miss Kingsley's Story of West Africa and Dr. Morgan Grace's Sketch of the New Zealand War, both of which contain much hitherto unpublished information. Dr. Grace's book is the first account of the war with the Maories which is based on an intimate knowledge of the personnel and tactics of both parties, and is dedicated to Sir Anthony Home. Second editions are ready of the Hon. W. P. Reeves's Long White Cloud and New Zealand, and of Mr. Boulger's Story of India, the two last-named, and Miss Kingsley's book, being volumes in the "Story of the Empire" series.

* * * Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK !

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.
Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.DARLINGTON'S
HANDBOOKS.Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.
Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN. — With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J.
PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor
JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING;
A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE
MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORTH WALES COAST.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

THE ISLE of WIGHT.

THE WYE VALLEY.

THE SEVERN VALLEY.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and
ST. LEONARDS.LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED, and SNOWDON.ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRIC-CIETH, and PWLLHELL.MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOU-CESTER, and CHELTENHAM.LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the World."What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times."The best Handbook to London ever issued."
Liverpool Daily Post.

SECOND EDITION, ENLARGED, 5s.

Sixty Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With an additional Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON &amp; CO.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.*The Old Series of THE ACADEMY, which ended on October 1st, completed a volume.
The Index can be obtained gratis on application to the Publisher.*

A THIN UOGOA.

EPPS'SThe choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the con-
sistence of tea, of which it is now with many beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.
Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—JAMES
EPPS & Co., Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London.COCOA ESSENCE*An American Transport in the Crimean War.

THE CRIMEAN WAR.

127 streets were blocked with snow. With what we had brought them, the garrison had a good supply of food, but scarcely enough fuel to cook it, and none whatever wherewith to keep themselves warm.I made inquiries for the Pasha in command, and was directed to a house occupied by him. Through the interpreter I asked the guard in what room he was to be found, and he pointed out the door to me. On entering, I saw, literally, a pile of bodies, a dozen or more heaped up together and all asleep. They were awakened by the noise we made, and as they uncoiled themselves, the Pasha was discovered at the bottom of the heap, where he had kept himself warm by having men instead of blankets piled over him.When he learned that a steamer had come to him with provisions, he soon got over his resentment at having been so

By Capt. CODMAN.

Price 3s. 6d.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON &amp; CO.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY."The following have appeared, and the numbers containing some of them can still be obtained; or Complete Sets may be had separately for 3s. 6d.:—*BEN JONSON.
JOHN KEATS.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.
TOM HOOD.
THOMAS GRAY.
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
LEIGH HUNT.
LORD MACAULAY.
ROBERT SOUTHLEY.
S. T. COLERIDGE.
CHARLES LAMB.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
SAMUEL PEPYS.
EDMUND WALLER.
WILKIE COLLINS.JOHN MILTON.
WILLIAM COWPER.
CHARLES DARWIN.
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.
HENRY WADSWORTH
LONGFELLOW.
ANDREW MARVELL.
ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS CARLYLE.
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.
CHARLES DICKENS.
JONATHAN SWIFT.
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.
WILLIAM BLAKE.
SIR RICHARD STEELE.
ALEXANDER POPE.
DOUGLAS JERROLD.
FRANCIS BACON.
HENRIK IBSEN.

LIBRARY of a COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

COMPRISING
LACK LETTER VOLUMES, CURIOS, BOOKS OF TRAVEL, RARE EDITIONS, LEGAL, HISTORICAL,
STATISTICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND POETICAL WORKS;
LOCAL AND FAMILY HISTORIES;
SPORT, AGRICULTURE, &c., &c.

TO BE SOLD AT HAWICK, N.B.,

On TUESDAY, 26th SEPT., 1899.

Catalogue on application to Mr. R. F. ATKINSON,
Auctioneer, Hawick, N.B.; or Messrs. Geo. & Jas. OLIVER,
Solicitors, there.

CATALOGUES.*SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT

of LITERATURE.

No. 539, just published, for SEPTEMBER.

INCLUDES A

Fine Copy of Caxton's Edition of the Golden Legend, 1493, Sets of Hansard, Linnean Society's Transactions and Journal, Ray Society's Publications, Punch, Baily's Magazine, and the usual good selection of Books of all Classes.

Post free from HENRY SOTHERAN & Co., Booksellers, 140, Strand, W.C.; and 37, Piccadilly, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS

promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each offered for

"Life of John Mytton," 1835—Collins. "Wild Red Deer,"
1862—"Old English Squire," 1821—"Progress of a Midshipman," 1820—"Shirley Deer Park," 1847—"Tom Raw the Griffin," 1820.
—Trials for Adultery, 7 vols., 1781—"Warwickshire Hunt,"
1837—"Freer's Last Decade," 2 vols., 1863—"Desperate
Remedies," 3 vols., 1871—"Pair of Blue Eyes," 3 vols., 1873—
"Lorna Doone," 3 vols., 1889. Rare Books supplied. State
Wants.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, BIRMINGHAM.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.
—KING, SELL, & RAILTON, Limited, high-class
Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet
Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines
for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built
Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 32, or 64-page
Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence
New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 6512. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

BYRON, SHELLEY, KEATS.—Prize
Essays, with Portrait of Foundress, bevelled, gilt, 2s.
For prize conditions send addressed halfpenny wrapper to ROSEMARY CRAWHAY, Ewlich, Breconshire.

THE BOOK OF BANDER:

A Scripture-form Story of Past and Present Times.

By the AUTHOR of "THE NEW KORAN."

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

IT records the efforts of a "Church of Confessions" to correct ancient errors, to reconcile the Jews, Christians, and Moderns of Syria on the basis of pure Theism, and generally to promote amity among all groups and grades of mankind in spite of their natural differences. The broadminded will most respect its teaching, and there is reason to believe that it will be appreciated and found useful by reformers of various schools who have been favourably impressed with its companion work in Scriptural style and arrangement.

"The New Koran" is exactly the opposite of "The Book of Mormon." Its narratives are short and varied, interesting and life-like, and the whole is set in a page or a paragraph without its useful lessons. It is as readable as "Robinson Crusoe," and as instructive as Theodore Parker's Sermons. Young and old, rich and poor, rulers and subjects may read it with equal pleasure and equal profit."—Harker's Review.

"He speaks through the mouth of one Aido Morata, who is a preacher, calling all religionists to a sense of brotherly feeling, denouncing their vices and follies, and exhorting them to pursue the path of rectitude. The work is eminently readable, is far from being pedantic or dogmatic, and displays an amount of keen reflection, which proves the writer to be an astute thinker and profound observer of the actions and thoughts of Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans."

"It is an exquisite and delicate instrument for the healing of men's strifes, and for combining an untiring energy towards progress with a graceful contentment under the difficulties and troubles of life. . . . May we all do our best to learn for ourselves and then teach to others the lovely lessons of truth and virtue which this book contains, so that we and they may reach that region of sound judgment where the follies and frailties of our childhood cannot follow us."—Sermon by Rev. G. Vossy.
"We very sincerely trust that its diffusion will not be retarded by what a liberal mind ought to regard as the eminent merit of study independence of all the reigning schools of thought. . . . Objective, dramatic, impressive, aphoristic, pregnant with thought and transparent in expression, it has every requisite for public recitation, while far more than a 'forty-four-hundred' of homilising would be needed to exhaust its manifold suggestiveness."—Review by Dr. RICHARD GARRETT.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, London,
Edinburgh, and Oxford.

NETHERTHORPE GRAMMAR SCHOOL,

STAVELEY, DERBYSHIRE.

The Governors of the above School invite APPLICATIONS for the OFFICE of HEAD MASTER to the above School.

The School is carried on under a Scheme of the Charity Commissioners (a copy of which, price 6d., may be had from the undersigned).

Extensive Laboratories are now in course of construction, and it is intended, upon their completion, to conduct the School as a School of Science for Boys and Girls under the Science and Art Department.

The Head Master must be a Graduate of some University in the United Kingdom, or the British Possessions, or have such other qualification or certificate, or other test of his attainments as may be fixed from time to time by an regulation of the Governors approved by the Charity Commissioners.

The fixed salary is £20 per annum, with residence and school premises, besides a Capitation Grant and the privilege of taking Boarders.

Candidates are requested to send their application, with testimonials and full particulars as to age, qualifications, &c., to the undersigned on or before September 30th, 1899.

By order,

G. H. BARLOW, Clerk to the Governors.

Staveley, Chesterfield.

September 12th, 1899.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.*THE YORKSHIRE COLLEGE, LEEDS.

The 28th Session of the Department of Science, Technology, and Arts will begin on OCTOBER 2nd, and the 60th Session of the School of Medicine on OCTOBER 2nd, 1899.

The Classes prepare for the following Professions: Chemistry,
Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, and Sanitary Engineering,
Mining, Textile Industries, Dyeing, Art, Leather Manufacture,
Agriculture, School Teaching, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.

University Degrees are also conferred in the Faculties of Arts,
Science, Law, Medicine, and Surgery.

Lyddon Hall has been established for Students' residence.
Prospectus of any of the above may be had from the REGISTRAR.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and

COLLEGE.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS.

Systematic Courses of Lectures and Laboratory Work in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc.
Examinations of the University of London will commence on OCTOBER 2nd and continue to July, 1900. Attendance on this Class counts as part of the five years' curriculum.

Fee for the whole Course, £21, or £12.5s. to Students of the Hospital; or single subjects may be taken.

There is a Special Class for the January Examination.

For further particulars apply to the WARDEN of the College,
St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C.

A Handbook forwarded on application.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,

experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of
all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books
at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS
per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUB-
SCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis
and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in
TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY,
SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SUR-
PLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., London;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

F. V. WHITE & CO'S

LIST.

Second Edition now ready.

A NAME TO

CONJURE WITH.

By JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

Second Edition ready immediately.

IN FULL CRY.

By RICHARD MARSH,

Author of "The Beetle."

"The story is told in a sequence of dramatically rendered scenes, culminating in about the most sensational murder trial on record."—Graphic.

ADELINE SERGEANT'S NEW NOVEL.*BLAKE OF ORIEL.

By the Author of "A Valuable Life."

THE CRISIS IN THE TRANSVAAL.

A NEW EDITION OF GEORGE GRIFFITH'S SUCCESSFUL BOOK.

Price 1s.

BRITON OR BOER?

By the Author of "The Destined Maid."

F. V. WHITE & CO.,

14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

J. W. ARROWSMITH'S LIST.

CARAMELLA. A story of the Lotus Eaters Up to Date. By GEORGE PROCTOR HAWTREY.
Crown 8vo, 496 pp. Six Shillings.

"Caramella is just delightful . . . it is exquisite fooling never degenerating into the merely practical."—Punch.

FOR THE SAKE OF THE

DUCHESS. A Page from the Life of Vicomte de Champlonnet. By S. WALKER. Crown 8vo, 409 pp. Six Shillings.

"The story is full of effective and exciting tableaux . . . and is told with a directness and ease which make its complications simple and its tragic situations keen."—Pall Mall Gazette.

RHYMES OF ROAD, RAIL, AND

RIVER. Crown 8vo, 127 pp. One Shilling.

Bristol: J. W. ARROWSMITH.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Ltd.

THE*NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

SEPTEMBER, 1899.—Price 2s. 6d.

CONTAINS:—

THE "AMERICA" CUP RACE.

By the Hon. CHARLES RUSSELL

A VINDICATION OF THE BOERS.

By A DIPLOMAT.

AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES.

By EDOUARD RÖD.

And other Articles.

London:

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

The Old Series of THE ACADEMY, which

ended on October 1st, completed a volume.

The Index can be obtained gratis on application to the Publisher.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE.

The Highest Andes. By E. A. FITZGERALD. With 48 illustrations, 14 of which are Photogravures, and a Large Map. Royal 8vo. 30s. net.
Also a Small Edition on Handmade Paper, limited to 50 Copies, 4to, 25 5s.

Through Asia. By SVEN HEDIN. With 300 illustrations from Photographs and Sketches by the Author, and 3 Maps. Second and Cheaper Edition in 16 fortnightly Parts at 1s. each net; or in 3 vols., royal 8vo. 20s. net.

The Caroline Islands. By F. W. CHRISTIAN. With many illustrations and Maps. Large crown 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

A New Ride to Khiva. By R. L. JEFFERSON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

POETRY.

English Lyrics. Selected and Arranged by W. E. HENLEY. Second and Cheaper Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

Lyra Frivola. By A. D. GODLEY, M.A., Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. Pott 8vo. 7s. 6d.

The Works of Shakespeare.

General Editor—EDWARD DOWDEN, Litt.D.

MESSRS. METHUEN have in preparation an Edition of Shakespeare in Single Plays. Each Play will be Edited with a full Introduction, Textual Notes, and a Commentary at the foot of the page.

THE FIRST VOLUME WILL BE—

Hamlet. Edited by EDWARD DOWDEN. Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. Arranged and Edited, with Notes, by SIDNEY COLVIN. Demy 8vo. 2 vols., 25s. net.

The Life and Letters of Sir John Everett Millais. President of the Royal Academy. By his Son, J. G. MILLAIS. With nearly 300 illustrations, of which 9 are in Photogravure. 2 vols., royal 8vo. 32s. net.

An Edition limited to 350 Copies will also be printed. This will contain 25 of Millais's great paintings reproduced in Photogravure, with a case containing an extra set of these Photogravures pulled on India paper. The price of this Edition will be £4 4s. net.

The Expansions of Egypt. A Political and Historical Survey. By A. SILVA WHITE. With 4 Special Maps. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

The Vicar of Morwenstow: a Biography. By R. BAKING-GOULD, M.A. A New and Revised Edition. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A Constitutional and Political History of Rome. By T. M. TAYLOR, M.A., Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. Senior Chancellor's Medalist for Classics, Porson University Scholar, &c., &c. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

A History of the Church of Cyprus. By JOHN BUCKETT, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Bishop Latimer. By A. J. CARLEY, M.A. [LEARNERS OF RELIGION SERIES.] Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

Christian Mysticism. The Bampton Lectures for 1898. By W. R. INGE, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Hertford College, Oxford. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

An Introduction to the Books of the Bible. By W. H. BENNETT, M.A., and W. F. ADENEY, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

St. Paul, the Master-BUILDER. By WALTER LOUK, D.D., Warden of Keble College. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

The Churchman's Bible.

General Editor—J. H. BURN, B.D., Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Aberdeen.

MESSRS. METHUEN propose to issue a series of expositions upon most of the books of the Bible. The volumes will be practical and devotional rather than critical in their purpose, and the text of the Authorised Version will be explained in sections or paragraphs, which will correspond as far as possible with the divisions of the Church Lectionary. The volumes will be produced in a very handy and tasteful form, and may be obtained in cloth or leather bindings.

THE FIRST VOLUMES WILL BE—

The Epistle of St. Paul to the Galatians. Explained by A. W. ROBINSON, B.D., Vicar of All Hallows, Barking. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

Ecclesiastes. Explained by W. A. STEVENS, M.A. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

The Churchman's Library.

Edited by J. H. BURN, B.D.

The English Prayer-Book: its Literary Workmanship. By J. DOWDEN, D.D., Lord Bishop of Edinburgh. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

The Library of Devotion.

Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUMES.

A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life. By WILLIAM LAW. Edited, with an Introduction, by C. BIGG, D.D., late Student of Christ Church.

The Temple. By GEORGE HERBERT. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by E. C. S. GIBSON, D.D., Vicar of Leeds.

SCIENCE.

The Scientific Study of Scenery. By J. E. MARR, Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A Handbook of Nursing. By M. N. OXFORD, of Guy's Hospital. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

CLASSICAL.

The Nicomachean Ethics of Aristotle. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by JOHN BURNET, M.A., Professor of Greek at St. Andrews. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

The Captivi of Plautus. Edited, with an Introduction, Textual Notes, and a Commentary, by W. M. LINDSAY, Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Zachariah of Mitilene. Translated into English by F. J. HAMILTON, D.D., and E. W. BROOKS. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

SPORT.

The Library of Sport.

The Art and Practice of Hawking. By E. B. MITCHELL. Illustrated by G. E. Lodge, and others. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Thoughts on Hunting. By PETER BRACKFORD. Edited by J. OTTO PAGET, and illustrated by G. H. Jalland. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

The Book of the West. By S. BAKING-GOULD. With numerous illustrations. 2 vols. Vol. I, DEVON. Vol. II, CORNWALL. Crown 8vo. 6s. each.

Pons Asinorum; or, a Guide to Bridge. By A. HULME BEAMAN. Fcap. 8vo. 2s.

The Little Guides.

Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUME.

Shakespeare's Country. By B. C. WINDLE, F.R.S., M.A. Illustrated by E. H. New.

METHUEN'S STANDARD LIBRARY.

The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By EDWARD GIBBON. Edited by J. B. BURY, LL.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin. In 7 vols. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 5s. 6d. each. Crown 8vo. 6s. each. Vol. VII.

The Diary of Thomas Eliwood. Edited by G. C. CRUMP, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s.

La Commedia di Dante Alighieri. Edited by PAGET TOYNBEE, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s.

ILLUSTRATED AND GIFT BOOKS.

The Lively City of Ligg. By GLETT BURGESS. With many illustrations by the Author. Small 4to, 3s. 6d.

The Phil May Album. 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

Ulysses; or, De Rougemont of Troy. Described and Depicted by A. H. MILNE. Small 4to, 3s. 6d.

The Crook of Gold. Fairy Stories told by S. BAKING-GOULD, and illustrated by F. D. Bedford. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Tommy Smith's Animals. By EDMUND SELOUS. Illustrated by G. W. Ord. Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

A Birthday Book. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL.

Practical Physics. By H. STROUD, D.Sc., M.A., Professor of Physics in the Durham College of Science, Newcastle-on-Tyne. Fully illustrated. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

General Elementary Science. By J. T. DUNN, D.Sc., and V. A. MONDELLA. With many illustrations. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

The Metric System. By LEON DELBOS. Crown 8vo. 2s.

A South African Arithmetic. By HENRY HILL, B.A., Assistant Master at Worcester School, Cape Colony. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A Key to Stedman's Easy Latin Exercises. By C. G. BOTTING, M.A. Crown 8vo. 3s. net.

New Testament Greek. A Course for Beginners. By G. RODWELL, B.A. With a Preface by WALTER LOCK, D.D., Warden of Keble College. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Examination Papers in English History. By J. TAIT WARDLAW, B.A., King's College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

A Greek Anthology. Selected by E. C. MARCHANT, M.A., Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, and Assistant Master at St. Paul's School. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Cicero de Officiis. Translated by G. B. GARDINER, M.A. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

The Novels of Charles Dickens.

Crown 8vo. Each Volume, cloth, 3s.; leather, 4s. net. With Introductions by GEORGE GLISSING, and Notes by F. G. KITTON.

MESSRS. METHUEN have in preparation an Edition of those Novels which have now passed out of Copyright. Mr. George Glissing, whose critical study of Dickens is both sympathetic and lucid, has written an Introduction to each of the books, and a very attractive feature of this edition will be the illustrations of the old houses, inns, and buildings which Dickens described, and which have now in many instances disappeared under the touch of modern civilisation. Another valuable feature will be a series of topographical and general notes to each book by Mr. F. G. Kitton. The books will be produced with the greatest care as to printing, paper, and binding.

THE FIRST VOLUMES WILL BE—

The Pickwick Papers. With Illustrations by E. H. New. 2 vols.

Nicholas Nickleby. With Illustrations by R. J. Williams. 2 vols.

Clock House. With Illustrations by Beatrice Atchek. 2 vols.

EDUCATIONAL—(continued).

The Little Library.

Pott 8vo, each volume, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net. MESSRS. METHUEN intend to produce a series of small books under the above title, containing some of the famous books in English and other literatures in the domains of fiction, poetry, and belles lettres. The series will also contain several volumes of selections in prose and verse. The books will be edited with the most sympathetic and scholarly care. Each one will contain an Introduction which will give (1) a short biography of the author; (2) a critical estimate of the book. Where they are necessary, short notes will be added at the foot of the page. The Little Library will ultimately contain complete sets of the novels of W. M. Thackeray, Jane Austen, the sisters Brontë, Mrs. Gaskell, and others. It will also contain the best work of many other novelists whose names are household words. Each book will have a portrait or frontispiece in photogravure, and the volumes will be produced with great care in a style uniform with that of "The Library of Devotion."

THE FIRST VOLUMES WILL BE—

A Little Book of English Lyrics. With Notes.

Pride and Prejudice. By JANE AUSTEN. With an Introduction and Notes by E. V. LUCAS. 2 vols.

Vanity Fair. By W. M. THACKERAY. With an Introduction by S. GWYNN. 3 vols.

Pendennis. By W. M. THACKERAY. With an Introduction by S. GWYNN. 3 vols.

Eothen. By A. W. KINGLAKE. With an Introduction and Notes.

Cranford. By MRS. GASKELL. With an Introduction and Notes by E. V. LUCAS.

The Inferno of Dante. Translated by H. F. CARY. With an Introduction and Notes by PAGET TOYNBEE.

John Halifax, Gentleman. By MRS. CRAIK. With an Introduction by ANNIE MATHESON. 2 vols.

The Early Poems of Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Edited by J. C. COLLINS, M.A.

The Princess. By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by ELIZABETH WORDSWORTH.

Maud, and other Poems. By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by ELIZABETH WORDSWORTH.

In Memoriam. By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by H. C. BEECHING, M.A.

A Little Book of Scottish Lyrics. Arranged and Edited by T. F. HENDERSON.

FICTION.

The King's Mirror. By ANTHONY HOPE. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Crown of Life. By GEORGE GLISSING, Author of "Demos," "The Town Traveller," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Strong Arm. By ROBERT BARR. Crown 8vo. 6s.

To London Town. By ARTHUR MORRISON, Author of "Tales of Mean Streets," "A Child of the Jago," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

One Hour and the Next. By the DUCHESS OF SUTHERLAND. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Siren City. By BENJAMIN SWIFT, Author of "Nancy Noon." Crown 8vo. 6s.

